By regaining their rhythm, the 'Cats placed themselves right in the middle of a muddled Big Eight race. The victory enabled K-State to become part of a six-school log jam of teams with 4-6 conference records. Only the University of Oklahoma Sooners and the University of Kansas Jayhawks — the 'Cats'

Women shoot down Cowgirls, 86-62

By VIKKI WATSON

It was not unusual that the 12th-ranked K-State Lady 'Cats basketball squad chalked up another victory, defeating the Oklahoma State University Cowgirls 86-62 in Saturday night's Big Eight Conference action at Ahearn Field House.

What may be a little unusual were the ways the team went about doing it.

The obvious 24-point victory margin was quite a difference when compared with the Lady 'Cats' slim 76-71 win Jan. 18 in Stillwater. Then there was K-State's impressive 92 percent (12 of 13) showing at the free-throw line, uncharacteristic of a squad that was shooting approximately 60 percent at the line coming into Saturday's contest.

"We did a good job at the free-throw line, and we shot well from the field," Head Coach Lynn Hickey said of her squad's hot shooting that also netted 60 percent of its field goal attempts (37 of 60). "It was a good win — overall, a very big game."

The victory improved the Lady 'Cats' overall record to 18-5 and kept K-State's Big Eight title hopes alive. The Lady 'Cats remain in second place in the league with an 8-2 record, while the University of Missouri Lady Tigers, whose only loss was a 80-78 decision to OSU, are in the top spot with a 9-1 mark. MU dealt a 92-61 defeat Saturday to the University of Kansas, a 71-58 winner over K-State Jan. 28.

Sophomore Jennifer Jones, who scored 14 points in K-State's earlier meeting with the Cowgirls, canned the first four points as the Lady 'Cats grabbed a quick 10-0 lead. The Lady 'Cats utilized a full-court pressure defense to force OSU into committing five turnovers its first five times downcourt and held the Cowgirls from scoring until the 16:40 mark.

The Cowgirls could get no closer than within eight points and trailed by as many as 22 in the first half of play. Jennifer Jones led the K-State first-half attack with 10 points and four rebounds. Junior Angie Bonner, sophomore Cassandra Jones and freshman Carlisa Thomas each added eight points.

OSU made no serious second-half threat as K-State continued with its full-court pressure. Despite the fact that every Lady 'Cats player scored in the contest and the Cowgirls could never get closer than 18 points, Hickey was far from satisfied with the K-State second-half effort.

"Everybody who went into the game played well and worked hard," she said. "But in the second half we were kind of going through the motions. We can't just lay back."

Thomas, who scored 17 points in the Lady 'Cats' 94-67 win Feb. 16 over the University of Colorado, canned 14 points and grabbed a team-high eight rebounds for K-State. She also had five assists and four steals to add to her all-around performance.

"When she (Thomas) is off the floor, we've got some big gaps," Hickey said.

Jennifer Jones was K-State's scoring leader, hitting seven of eight field goals and a perfect four-of-four tries at the charity stripe for a total of 18 points. Following closely behind was Bonner with 15, Thomas with 14 and Cassandra Jones with 12.

Jackie Glossen led the OSU attack with 21 points and 11 rebounds, while Kathy Schulz canned 20 and Candy Hicks added 10.

K-State won the rebounding battle, grabbing 32 boards to 24 for the Cowgirls. OSU made 29 of 59 from the field for 49 percent and canned four of eight free throws for 50 percent. The Cowgirls fell to 14-9 overall and 5-5 in conference play.

K-State next faces Iowa State University at Ames on Wednesday and returns home for a rematch with the archival University of Kansas Lady Jayhawks at Ahearn Field House on Saturday.

The Lady 'Cats won the first contest against Iowa State Jan. 31, defeating the Cyclones 73-58 at Ahearn Field House. Bonner led the K-State charge, scoring 20 points on a seven-of-10 field goal and six-of-eight free throw performance. Sophomore Sheronda Jenkins hit 13 and Cassandra Jones added 12 for the Lady 'Cats.

In K-State's encounter with KU Jan. 28, the Lady Jayhawks handed the Lady 'Cats their first conference loss of the season. Vickie Adkins' 29 points led the Lady Jayhawks, who now stand 6-4 in conference play and 10-12 overall following their recent loss to Missouri. Missouri leads the league with a conference record of 9-1 and an overall mark of 20-3.

Cassandra Jones led K-State's efforts against KU, netting 16 points. Bonner followed with 15 and Jenkins contributed 12.

Olympics had number of stars, heroes, goats

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — Highs and lows of the XIV Olympic Winter Games, now entering hibernation for another four years:

INDIVIDUAL STAR: Marja-Liisa Hamalainen, Finnish physiotherapist who slogged through snow and ice for three gold medals and a bronze in women's cross-country skiing.

BIGGEST DISAPPOINTMENT: The U.S. hockey team, heroes in 1980, goats in 1984. They had the worst record in all 64 years of the competition.

CHEAPEST SHOT: Speed skater Erik Henriksen's unprovoked blast at Eric Heiden for not continuing skating after sweeping five gold medals in Olympic record time in the 1980 Games. Where was Henriksen this year? Only the super great can criticize the great.

DOUBLE OR NOTHING: The last gasp 1-2 finish by American twins Phil and Steve Mahre in the men's slalom after critics had buried them, along with 1983 World Cup queen Tamara McKinney, as victims of the pre-Olympic magazine cover jinx. The Mahres' exciting comeback after striking out in the giant slalom gave Uncle Sam a thunderclap climax to an otherwise mediocre Olympics (eight medals compared with 12 at Lake Placid in 1980).

BEST OVERALL TEAM: East Germany with 24 medals, nine of them gold, scoring in Nordic skiing, bobsled, luge and figure skating. These test tube automatons already have passed their onetime Soviet patrons, who had more total medals (25) but only six gold.

BIGGEST SURPRISE: The gold-silver finish of Debbie Armstrong and Christine Cooper in the women's Alpine giant slalom — both outsiders, Debbie ranking 19th in World Cup standings and Christine coming off a broken knee bone.

MOST DELIGHTFUL BRAGGART: Bill Johnson of Van Nuys, Calif., who told everybody in listening range that he would win the men's downhill ski race and then made good his boast. His was Uncle Sam's first gold medal ever in a ski event, Alpine and Nordic.

JOHNSON CONT'D: The Austrians, with a dislike for Johnson, called the darkhorse American downhill specialist "a nose-picker." Johnson retorted by picking the Austrians' pockets cold. "I like to stick it to the Austrians," he said. "They think they should never lose a downhill race."

GUTSIEST SHOW: The effort of Jamil el Reedy, the Egyptian-born school kid from Plattsburgh, N.Y., who finished the men's downhill after losing one ski, abandoning his fogged up goggles and continuing the last half of the course half-blinded. It mattered little that he was nearly three minutes behind the winner, Johnson. He didn't let the mountain beat him.

Dayton upsets DePaul

By The Associated Press

Ed Young sank a twisting bank shot with one second remaining to lift unheralded Dayton to a 72-71 college basketball victory over No. 3 DePaul on Saturday.

DePaul Coach Ray Meyer, whose team blew an 11-point lead in the final six minutes and fell to 19-2 after missing three foul shots in the last minute, said he didn't "know how it happened" that Young made the winning shot.

"We were supposed to play man-to-man. I don't know how Young got open," Meyer said.

In games involving other Top 10 teams Saturday, No. 1 North Carolina defeated North Carolina State 95-71; second-ranked Georgetown rolled past Providence 59-38; No. 4 Houston tripped Virginia 74-65; Louisville upset No. 8 Memphis State 85-78; ninth-ranked Oklahoma whipped Colorado 93-80; and No. 10 Texas El-Paso beat Wyoming 73-66.

In the upset of DePaul, guard Larry Schellenberg hit two free throws with 13 seconds left to bring Dayton within 71-70 at its home court. DePaul's Raymond McCoy was fouled, but missed his first free throw with 11 seconds left.

Schellenberg got the rebound and passed to Roosevelt Chapman, who fed Young for the winning shot to raise Dayton to 15-8.

"Our kids fought their guts out in the second half," Dayton Coach Don Donohue said. "The last play makes up for all the ones we gave away."

It was Dayton's second straight home-court victory over DePaul, which lost 80-71 in the final regular-season game at UD Arena last year.

Lady 'Cats forward Jennifer Jones has a shot blocked by Oklahoma State forward Jackie Glossen during K-State's 86-62 victory Saturday night in Ahearn Field House. Jones led the team in scoring with 18 points as the Lady 'Cats moved their overall record to 18-5 and 8-2 in the conference.

Conference race tightens as four teams fight for third

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Big Eight may not play the best basketball in the country, but does any conference have standings that are more uniform?

With four games remaining in the league race, six teams are tied for third and last place.

Moreover, it may be premature to declare Oklahoma the champion. Kansas has been doing something nobody but Oklahoma did before — win on the road. As a result of their 72-62 victory at Missouri Saturday, the Jayhawks are 7-3 in the conference, and are ready to host the 9-1 Sooners Wednesday night.

Below Kansas lies Iowa State, Missouri, Nebraska, Colorado, K-State and Oklahoma State, all at 4-6.

next home opponent on Saturday, following a road trip to Iowa State University on Wednesday — are removed from the deadlock.

But long after the conference race is over, Saturday's game will go in the record books as the contest where Jack Hartman became the standard for future coaches at K-State. After the game, in front of a cheering home crowd, the 14-year coach was presented with the game ball.

"We'll probably be practicing with it Monday," he said. "No, I'll probably put it somewhere special. I think I will."

In another statistical oddity, every Big Eight team is playing better than .500 overall. The Sooners stand at 22-3, followed by Kansas at 16-7 and Missouri at 15-10. Iowa State and Nebraska each are 14-9, Colorado is 13-10, and K-State and Oklahoma State are 12-11.

Whoever finishes third and fourth in the regular season will have the important home-court advantage in the first round of the Big Eight's post-season tournament.

Oklahoma remained alone at the top Saturday by treating home fans to a 93-80 victory over Colorado. Iowa State was on the road for a 69-48 conquest of Nebraska, and the K-State fans gathered in Manhattan to see the Wildcats whip Oklahoma State 72-56 and make Jack Hartman the school's winningest head coach.

Colorado Coach Tom Apke could hardly fault his team's effort against Oklahoma.

"I thought our kids really played hard and tough," Apke said. "We played the best game we could have, but they're just too darn strong."

Wayman Tisdale poured in 28 points for Oklahoma and pulled down 15 rebounds. In addition, freshman forward Darryl "Choo" Kennedy scored a career-high 24 points. Mike Reid had 18 points for Colorado, followed by Vince Kelley with 17 and Jay Humphries with 16.

"They're the first team to come in here and run with us, and stay with us the entire game," said Oklahoma Coach Billy Tubbs.

Barry Stevens scored 23 points and Jeff Hornacek added 22 to lead Iowa State past Nebraska. Stan Cloudy had 20 points to lead Nebraska and Dave Hoppen had 14.

Pickleball bounces into sports scene

By TOM FAY
Collegian Reporter

A new game is entering the realm of racquet sports. Pickleball, a fast-paced paddle game, is being offered at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Complex.

The origination of pickleball "came from a couple of families who were looking for a game that could be played both indoors and outdoors without taking up too much space and that was relatively easy to learn," said Joyce Halverson, assistant director of Recreational Services.

"When I first heard about the game, I went to a conference (to learn about it) and was playing within five minutes, which is kind of neat because you don't want to get caught up in a whole book full of rules," Halverson said. "You want something you can have an immediate success with."

Pickleball is played with wooden paddles and one standard-sized wiffle ball (a plastic ball with holes in it) on a court equal to the dimensions of a badminton court. The standards of pickleball are very similar to badminton, but the net is lowered so the top of the net is 36 inches from the ground at the sides of the court, and 34 inches in the middle. This will allow the bottom of the net to brush against the ground.

Ground strokes, volleys and lobs are used as in tennis, but the serve must be underhand and the ball must be contacted from below the hip. When serving, the back foot must be planted behind the back line, but the front foot may step in bounds.

Each player has two serving boxes on his side of the court. The short serve line, 6 feet from the net, is the back line of each serving box.

When a person is serving, "the ball has to go beyond the short serve line (line from which you serve) and into the diagonal box (cross court on the other side of the net)," Halverson said. "You're only allowed one serve, and the only time you can re-serve is when there is a let (when the ball hits the net and lands in-bounds on the other side). After that you may hit the ball on the bounce or in the air."

The only time players can come inside the short serve line to volley is if the ball bounces in this area, she said.

"This really doesn't inhibit play that much because the short serve line is only 6 feet from the net," Halverson said. "The rest of it you take from experience that you already have about other racquet sports."

The only way for a player to score a point in pickleball is if he is serving. If a player loses a point after serving, then no point is recorded and it's the opponent's turn to serve.

Halverson said players alternate serving positions just as in tennis.

"When you have an even score, you're on the right side serving to your opponent's right side, and when you have an odd score you're on the left."

A game is played to 11 points and must be won by two points.

Pickleball is becoming popular at several universities as a form of enjoyment and as an intramural activity. Public schools have adopted the game because it's a good rainy-day activity, Halverson said.

"Because it is a relatively new game and people have seen us (staff members) playing it, I think they've been very curious about it, but they (students) don't know enough about the rules to be able to check out the items at the desk and play on their own," Halverson said.

A free instructional clinic will be held at 9:30 a.m. March 3 in the large gym at the complex.

"We'll have a few minutes of preliminaries and give people an idea and a little demonstration, and then we're going to put the racquets in their hands to try it and see what they think," Halverson said.

"The thing that's kind of neat about the concept of pickleball is that once it bounces, it really slows up. You have a chance to play almost every ball," she said. "It's not like a tennis ball that can spin and really travel. With a wiffle ball, there's so much air coming into the ball even though your opponent can put some pace on it, and if you're quick, you can at least get a racquet on it."

Wildcat track squads run away with 11 firsts

K-State Head Track Coach Steve Miller said he was "surprised at the performances" the men's and women's track teams turned in during Sunday's home meet in Ahearn Field House, since the team had planned "to have a relaxed meet prior to the Big Eight (Conference) championships (in Lawrence) this weekend."

"The meet was really low-key even though we had some strong performances," Miller said.

For K-State, top performances came from Rita Graves in the high jump and Deb Pihl in the women's 800-meter run.

Graves set an Ahearn record and had a national qualifying mark in the high jump with a 5-11 finish.

In the 800-meter run, Pihl broke the K-State an Ahearn record with a qualifying mark of 2 minutes, 8.9 seconds.

Also for the women, Pinkie Suggs once again had a qualifying throw and a first place in the shot put with a distance of 50-3/4. In the 55-meter finals, Donna King finished in first place with a time of 7.1, Dana Brown was second with 7.2 and Crystal Hicks finished in 7.4 for third place.

Anne Stadler finished first and Lauretta Miller finished second in the 1,500-meter run with times of 4:28.7 and 4:34.2, respectively. K-State's two-mile relay team — made up of Jacque Struckhoff, Betsy Silzer, Lisa Sandel and Erin Ficke — also grabbed top honors.

For the men's team, Bob Leetch was first in the 800-meter run with a time of 1:54.2. Teammate Jack McDonald had a time of 1:54.9 for a second-place finish.

In the men's 1,000-meter run, Mike Rogers and Ray Mosier both had finishing times of 2:27.4, but Rogers was declared the first-place winner. Jon Piles turned in a 3:54.4 time in the 1,500-meter for another first-place finish for the Wildcats.

Congressman says Americans paying for economic cure

By DAVID BEVENS
Staff Writer

Unemployment and inflation may have decreased, but Americans are paying the price.

"This economic progress, this economic recovery, has exacted a very high price in terms of our values as a caring and compassionate society, in terms of the welfare and well-being of millions upon millions of hungry and homeless Americans. It also has exacted a very heavy price in terms of the future of our country," said Congressman Stephen J. Solarz, D-N.Y.

Solarz spoke to a crowd of about 200 during an All-University Convocation in McCain Auditorium on Monday about "A Look at the State of the Union."

Over the last three years, the number of people under the poverty level increased by 15 percent, from 29 to 34 million. This is directly related to the Reagan administration's economic policies, he said.

"One million women and children were eliminated from the program providing aid to dependent children," Solarz said. In addition, one million people were eliminated from the food stamp program and three million children were eliminated from the school lunch program, he said.

"Over the course of the last few years, $3.8 billion was cut from the Guaranteed Student Loan program," he said. This is a 27 percent reduction of the federal funding for college students and amounts to an elimination of 750,000 students from the program.

"And if this weren't enough, in the current budget submitted a few weeks ago, the administration called for another $330 million cut (out) of the GSL program which would have the effect of eliminating an additional 900,000 graduate and undergraduate students from the benefits of this program," Solarz said.

Solarz attested that the nation's economic recovery has been a result of the government "pumping" money into the economy, causing an increase in the national deficit.

By 1989, assuming adjustment to inflation and no increase in the tax rate, Solarz predicted the deficit will double from its present $749 billion to $1.4 trillion.

The federal deficit in 1980 accounted for 2 percent of our gross national product. Today, it accounts for 5 to 6 percent of the GNP, Solarz said.

The increase in the deficit is a result of tax cuts, an increase in defense spending and an increase in the national debt cost, Solarz said.

"I think we need to recognize that we did need, going into the 1980s, a defense spending. But on the final analysis, the defense of America depends on a strong economy. And these unprecedented increases in defense spending of 9 to 10 percent above inflation a year, run the risk of bankrupting America," Solarz said.

At a press conference held before the convocation, Solarz commented on the situations in Lebanon and El Salvador.

"I think we have recognized that we have sustained a significant setback in Lebanon. I am pleased that the president has at long last decided to withdraw the Marines," he said.

Solarz said the United States was doomed from the day the Marines landed in Lebanon.

Solarz said that in El Salvador the Reagan administration should require the Salvadoran government to eliminate death squads in turn for continued military aid. This action would eventually erode the Salvadoran government's support and lead to the downfall of the government.

Solarz said he doesn't encourage a hands-off policy in El Salvador.

"If the United States ceases to support El Salvador, it would only be a matter of time before the government would fall," he said.

Congressman Stephen J. Solarz, D-N.Y., during his All-University Convocation address Monday in McCain Auditorium, said he believes the recent economic recovery has harmed American caring and compassion for the hungry and homeless.

Mondale seizes 'great victory' in Iowa's caucuses

From Staff and Wire Reports

Walter Mondale swept the field to win Iowa's Democratic caucuses Monday night and called it "a great victory," pointing to his nomination for the White House — and to the beginning of the end of the Reagan administration.

Sen. Gary Hart of Colorado was running a far-back second; Sen. John Glenn of Ohio looked like the night's big loser. He was polling only 6 percent of the vote, in fifth place.

With nearly half the precincts reporting in the keynote contest of 1984, Mondale's vote tripled that of his closest challenger in an eight-way count.

"I think I'm going to be the nominee, and I think this win here in Iowa strengthens me considerably," the former vice president said in Des Moines. "It now appears we have won a great victory, perhaps a spectacular victory. This is the beginning of the end of the Reagan administration."

The caucuses were the first phase in the selection 50 Iowa delegates to the Democratic National Convention in San Francisco this summer, and Mondale's showing pointed to a near-sweep of those nominating votes.

A caucus is a meeting of active party members on a local precinct level who select delegates who support a certain candidate.

The precinct caucus process moves through county and congressional district conventions and ends at Republican and Democratic state conventions in June. Voters in the precincts were choosing delegates to county conventions next spring.

A candidate needed at least 15 percent of the vote at a caucus to receive any delegates. People whose favorite was less could support an alternate choice or declare themselves uncommitted.

The caucuses give control to party members, Joseph Unkis, assistant professor of political science, said.

He said the caucuses are more of a test of the candidates' ability to organize and make an appeal to the party faithful, rather than the general electorate.

The Democratic caucuses were expected to attract nearly 100,000 people to register their presidential preference in meetings convened in living rooms, schoolhouses and fire stations.

For the Democrats, Iowa was the first opportunity state party members on the local level had to tell their nomination preference. They would do it in each of the state's 2,497 precincts with a public declaration in front of friends and neighbors.

With 54 percent of the 2,495 precinct caucuses reporting, Mondale had 21,367 votes or 45 percent of the total.

The non-Mondale vote was divided eight ways, among seven rival candidates and the voters who preferred to remain uncommitted.

Those numbers:
— Gary Hart 6,921, or 15 percent.
— Former Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota 5,928, 12 percent.
— Sen. Alan Cranston of California 4,407, 9 percent.
— Uncommitted 3,346, 7 percent.
— John Glenn, 2,606, 6 percent.

Commission to award bid on firefighting facility Reagan rips Democratic candidates

The Manhattan City Commission will make its final decision tonight on bids taken last week on the new firefighting facility which is planned to serve both the University and the city of Manhattan and act as the city's fire headquarters.

Construction on the Manhattan Central Fire Fighting/Fire Training Facility should begin in about a month, Manhattan Fire Chief Bill Smith said.

The facility is to be built on six acres of K-State property on the corner of Denison and Kimball avenues.

Bidding on the project took place Feb. 14 and 16. The Manhattan City Commission will make its final decision on the bids at 7 p.m. today during its regular weekly meeting in the City Commission Room at the city office building.

K-State will pay the city about $60,000 annually for the service, with the contract to be renegotiated each year, Smith said.

The project is expected to cost about $2,155,000, he said.

"It very well could be one of the biggest stations in Kansas as far as number of square feet," Smith said.

"This facility will provide very good access to the community. The present station (at 11th Street and Poyntz Avenue) will become a sub-station. It will cover Poyntz and the downtown area and be a backup to the west station (on Anderson Avenue)."

The fire station at 11th Street and Poyntz Avenue was built in 1955. It does not provide separate quarters for male and female firefighters. Offices, which were built by the firemen, took a significant amount of space from the shop area, Smith said.

The plans for the new station include separate sleeping quarters, and separate restroom and shower facilities for men and women. The same criteria will apply to student quarters if they are built, he said.

"The student program isn't formulated yet," Smith said. "It will not begin until the facility is built. It should start in the summer of 1985."

The student program would give some students part-time jobs as firefighters. The cost of student dormitories has not been included in the total dollar estimate, but the dormitories will be located in the lower level of the building if the plans become final.

The new station will be Manhattan's fire "headquarters," Smith said. The dispatchers will have larger offices, and private quarters will be furnished for those who work overnight. A few more firefighters may be added to the staff.

The training facility will have a lecture hall and a laboratory. Because of the location of the facility, firemen will be able to generate their own fires for training purposes, Smith said. Currently, much of the training is done in the television room, kitchen or bunk rooms.

Before July 1, 1983, the University had one fire truck and a student volunteer fire service which was maintained at a cost of $37,000 a year.

Wolf Creek owners back rate hike

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Rates will increase 95 percent over five years for customers of Kansas Gas and Electric Co. under a proposal outlined Monday by the utility to phase in the costs of the $2.7 billion Wolf Creek nuclear power plant.

KG&E officials, in a meeting with the Kansas Corporation Commission, explained their phase-in plan saying it was not "a bailout scheme" for the utility but was a way to soften the expected rate increases from the plant and improve the company's finances.

If the plant's costs were charged to customers all at once, KG&E estimated rates would soar 83.7 percent.

The phase-in plan will "mitigate the initial impact on ratepayers" and allow KG&E to "regain our financial vitality," Wilson Cadman, the company's president, said.

Under the phase-in plan, overall KG&E rates would increase $390.5 million — 39.5 percent in 1985, 10.2 percent in 1986, 8.9 percent in 1987, 7.7 percent in 1988 and 8.4 percent in 1989.

The average monthly bill for residential customers of KG&E was $49.55 for 750 kilowatt hours of electricity in January. That would go to $96.84 in 1989 based on the projected overall 95.4 percent utility rate increase.

Company officials said the proposal, which was approved last week by the utility's board of directors, provided for the minimum rate increase needed to protect KG&E's finances.

"Thirty-nine and a half percent is as low as we can go and maintain financial viability," said James Haines, KG&E's chief attorney.

Wolf Creek, under construction near Burlington in east-central Kansas, is a joint project of KG&E of Wichita, Kansas City Power and Light Co., and a group of 25 rural electric cooperatives, the Kansas Electric Power Cooperative Inc.

The phase-in proposal outlined Monday did not reflect the possible effect of Wolf Creek on rates for KCP&L, which is based in Kansas City, Mo.

Cadman said the utility's plan was based on Wolf Creek becoming operational on Feb. 15, 1985, at its current $2.67 billion cost. The phase-in also includes a projected cost to KG&E of $128 million for decommissioning the nuclear power plant at the end of its 30-year lifespan.

The phase-in plan will not generate enough revenue to pay for all of the Wolf Creek project, and utility officials said their accounting plans call for recovering the full costs of the project over 30 years.

Cadman also told commissioners that the company wants the Legislature to pass a bill to mandate the phase-in of Wolf Creek rates.

The legislation would require the KCC to charge customers for the costs of the project regardless of whether electricity was needed from the plant when it began operation. It also would force customers to pay for all interest and financial "carrying charges," costs of borrowing to pay for construction and company debt.

The KCC, which regulates utilities in Kansas, reviewed the legislation earlier this month and opposed it as being too restrictive.

Several bills have been introduced in the Legislature to deal with Wolf Creek rate increases, most of which would grant the KCC the power to exclude so-called excess generating capacity from rates. The commission has requested legislation so it can prohibit utilities from charging customers for costs of a power plant if its electricity is not needed.

The phase-in plan presented Monday was not a rate increase request. A formal rate application will be filed later, Robert Rives, group vice president, said.

Syrian-backed opposition pledges to oust Gemayel

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Druse and Moslem rebel leaders returning from Syria vowed Monday to press their campaign to oust Christian President Amin Gemayel. Army and militia forces duelled with machine guns and grenades in the capital's devastated commercial district.

Italy withdrew its peacekeeping forces from Beirut and a U.S. source said the Marines would leave their airport base by next week.

Saudi Arabia, trying to mediate the bitter differences between Gemayel and his Syrian-backed opposition, sent Crown Prince Abdullah bin Abdulaziz and Prince Bandar, the Saudi ambassador to the United States, to Damascus for talks with Syrian President Hafez Assad.

State radio said Gemayel had Foreign Minister Elie Salem forego his trip to Washington and return to Beirut, as Saudi mediator Rafik Hariri was back in the Lebanese capital to continue negotiations.

Druse opposition leader Walid Jumblatt and Shiite Moslem head Nabih Berri ended coordination talks with Syria before heading back to Lebanon. In Damascus, Berri demanded Gemayel's resignation.

While Jumblatt issued a similar statement, the demand by Berri indicated a further hardening of the opposition line.

Italy's 1,400-man unit moved out of its zone in West Beirut's Sabra and Chatilla Palestinian refugee camps and suburban Bourj el-Barajneh at daybreak. More than 1,000 Italians boarded five ships at Beirut port and sailed to Livorno, Italy. Another 100 Italian soldiers stayed in the capital.

Only the French are firmly installed in Beirut, along the "green line" separating Moslem West and Christian east. The French unit has no orders to pull out, sources said. France has submitted a resolution to the U.N. Security Council that the multinational force to be replaced by a U.N. force.

Reagan rips Democratic candidates

By The Associated Press

WATERLOO, Iowa — President Reagan, in his harshest partisan attack to date, Monday accused former Vice President Walter F. Mondale and other Democrats of a "dinosaur mentality that offers nothing for the future but repeating their failed past."

On his first campaign-financed journey since he declared his intention to seek re-election on Jan. 29, Reagan repeatedly used ridicule and sarcasm to criticize the Democratic presidential candidates, although they were never mentioned by name or party.

"Let others appeal to greed and envy, pit group against group, treat people as helpless victims and seek to weaken our national defense," Reagan said in remarks prepared for a rally for several thousand Republicans at McElroy Auditorium.

The president's trip to Iowa irritated Democrats because it was timed to split the headlines with Mondale, the heavy favorite in Monday's precinct caucus voting.

"People who live in glass houses should never throw stones," Reagan said. "Or, to put it another way: The liberals who had total control over government, but who saddled America with double-digit inflation, record interest rates, huge tax increases, too much regulation, credit controls, farm embargoes, no growth at home, weakness abroad and phony excuses about malaise — are the last people who should be giving sermonettes about fairness and compassion."

While the remarks appeared to be a slap at the Carter administration, in which Mondale served, White House deputy press secretary Pete Rousset said it was a collective attack "on the attitude of those who know who they are."

Junior wins award for illustration

Steven Swafford, junior in journalism and mass communications, has been awarded a "Runner Up" award in the Illustration/Spot Art category in the second annual international College Fraternity Editors Association Fraternity Art Contest.

The CFEA is an association of fraternity and sorority editors at the national headquarters level.

The contest was open to all members of their organizations — both sororities and fraternities, both undergraduate members and graduates, both social fraternities and honorary.

AAUP chapter sponsors speakers

K-State's chapter of the American Association of University Professors (AAUP) will sponsor several speakers for public presentations this spring.

The first of these sessions, open to both members and non-members, will feature Michael Johnson, assistant to K-State President Duane Acker.

Johnson is to discuss the accomplishments and goals of the current Kansas Legislature at 3:30 p.m. Wednesday in Union 212.

Before joining the K-State faculty, Johnson served from 1975 to 1979 in the Kansas House of Representatives as representative of the 67th District. He is a liaison with off-campus groups, including alumni, state agencies and legislators. He formerly was an Abilene dentist and teacher.

Block and Bridle Club to travel

The Block and Bridle club is scheduled to take its annual spring trip Thursday through Sunday.

About 40 K-State students interested in animal science will tour the Larry Swanson Hog Farm in Arkansas City, Kan.

In Texas, the group's stops will include the Mike Hughes Quarter Horse Farm, Sanger; the Standard Meat Company, Ft. Worth; Valley View Land and Cattle Company, Dallas; Black Champ Enterprises, Inc., Waxahatchie and Camp Colley Ranch, Easterly.

Joint activities with the Texas A&M Block and Bridle chapter and a visit to the Cowboy Hall of Fame, Oklahoma City, will complete the trip.

Visiting educator to address club

"Classroom Management" will be the topic of a nationally-recognized educator scheduled to speak Wednesday.

Carolyn Evertson, professor of education at Vanderbilt University, will address the Phi Delta Kappa educational fraternity in the Union Flint Hills Room.

The dinner meeting begins at 6 p.m. and Evertson will give his presentation at 7 p.m.

Evertson also will lecture on classroom management at 4:30 p.m. in Blumont 217. Both lectures are open to the public.

In addition to her responsibilities at Vanderbilt, Evertson currently serves as an educational consultant to the Arkansas State Department of Education and is president of Instructional Systems, a consulting firm.

Evertson's visit is sponsored by the Educational College Council, the College of Education Student Affairs Committee and Phi Delta Kappa.

— Former Gov. Rubin Askew of Florida, 1,484, 3 percent.

— The Rev. Jesse Jackson 1,358, 3 percent.

— Sen. Ernest Hollings of South Carolina, 1,18.

Iowa will send 58 delegates to the Democratic National Convention next July in San Francisco and 37 to the Republican convention in August in Dallas.

Michigan and Arkansas already have chosen 106 Reagan delegates to the GOP convention.

The first Democratic delegates were 164 House members, chosen by their colleagues. Mondale had the support of at least 70 and Glenn was second with 17.

Besides caucuses, the other method of choosing a candidate is the presidential preference primary, which allows anyone registered under a particular party to vote for a presidential nominee. New Hampshire is the site of the first presidential primary election and receives almost as much fanfare as Iowa's caucuses.

Kansas held a presidential primary during the last election, but the state will return to the delegate system this year, Unekis said.

Whether a primary election or a party caucus is a better method of selecting a candidate is an open question. Some believe the decision should be made by parties, while others feel it should be left to the voters, Unekis said.

"It was decided by Kansas legislators to go back to the convention method," he said. "It gives more power to the parties instead of the general populace. But who are legislators made up of? Democrats and Republicans."

Unekis said he does not doubt the importance of the Iowa caucuses, but much of the emphasis placed on them is an illusion.

"I think it's important because the media makes it important," he said. "The reason it gets so much attention is because it's the first one."

The decision of a relatively small number of people can affect the rest of the campaign, Unekis said.

Re-roofing of chapel begins; cost estimated near $30,000

Construction has begun on a new roof for Danforth Chapel.

The roof of the chapel was in need of repair, Fred Ferguson, director of building utilities for University Facilities, said.

"The chapel needed a new roof, the state gave us the funds, so we're putting a new roof on it," Ferguson said.

"There are five different levels of flat roof, and these are all being replaced," Ray Lippenberger, architect for University Facilities, said, adding that the cost of the repair work is estimated at $30,000.

The exact cost to replace the roof and the official completion date are still being approved by the state architect's office, Lippenberger said.

"After all the paperwork is taken care of, we'll know a date for completion. The paperwork is very time-consuming and must be approved by the state architect, the Board of Regents and a number of other officials," he said.

Lippenberger estimated the work will take from 45 to 60 days to complete, depending on the weather.

B&R Roofing and Sheet Metal of Hays is doing the roofing work.

Consumer board offers house-hunting tips

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

As many students start the search for an apartment or house to rent for next school year, they are reminded not to forget to check for some basic contract necessities.

Kim Hefley, graduate in family economics and director of the K-State Consumer Relations Board (CRB), said there are several provisions that every contract should contain.

"The contract should state the duration of the lease," Hefley said. "Students should make sure when they sign a 12-month lease that they can sublease in the summer."

The contract also should state the names of the landlord and tenant, the due date for the rent and if there are any late charges.

The full address, including the apartment number, should be written on the contract. Hefley said this is important because the landlord may show a prospective tenant a model apartment that turns out to be nothing like the apartment the tenant actually receives.

Students should look for maintenance responsibilities expected of both them and their landlord and see which utilities are included in the rent, she said.

People renting houses or rooms in a house are likely to have more maintenance responsibilities than those renting apartments, Hefley said. Those renting rooms in a house also may find that all the rooms in the house are on one electricity meter. If that is the case, renters should find out how the utility costs are divided. If they do not have control over the heat, they should check with previous tenants to see if the room is usually really warm, Hefley said.

Another important thing to look for in a contract is what kind of notice is required to terminate the lease.

"It is extremely rare to get a 30-day notice," Hefley said. "Some contracts have an automatic renewal clause."

This type of clause states that the tenant must inform the landlord of his intention not to renew the lease before a certain time or the lease is automatically renewed.

Hefley said there are some prohibited clauses which, if included in a contract, can make it unenforceable.

These clauses include an agreement to forego any rights and remedies provided by the Kansas Residential Landlord and Tenant Act and an agreement on the part of the tenant not to hold the landlord liable or to pay for the liability of the landlord.

A clause by which the tenant agrees to pay for either party's attorney fees, in the case of a contract dispute, is illegal, as is a clause which allows a landlord to sell the personal property of a tenant in satisfaction of a claim for damages.

Another area to watch for in a contract is items relating to a security deposit. There are maximum amounts a landlord can charge for a security deposit, Hefley said.

For an unfurnished apartment, the maximum security deposit is one month's rent. For a furnished apartment, the limit is 1½ month's rent. If a renter has a pet, the landlord can charge a half-month's rent above the maximum amount allowed for each type of apartment.

Dianne Urban, students' attorney, said most of the complaints she hears from students concern security deposits when students are moving out of an apartment or when they are moving in.

Urban said careful inventory of any damages already existing when tenants move into an apartment can help prevent the holding back of any or all of their security deposit.

Inventory sheets should be filled out within five days of moving into the apartment. If the landlord is not willing to fill out an inventory sheet, the tenant can fill it out with an objective third party and have them initial the sheet. The tenant may then send the sheet to the landlord, usually by certified mail, Hefley said.

There are certain steps a tenant should take to get a deposit back.

"To get a deposit back, the tenant must make a demand for it, turn in their key, check out at the time they were supposed to and leave a forwarding address," Urban said. "Within 30 days the landlord is obligated to return the deposit or send a list of itemized deductions. Failure to do so means the landlord is liable for getting the deposit back and for damages of 1½ times the amount of the deposit that was wrongfully withheld."

If a student notices repairs that need to be made while looking at an apartment, it is best to get the repairs written into the contract along with a date that they will be done, Hefley said.

If a tenant notices repairs that need to be made after moving in and the landlord won't cooperate, the tenant can call the city housing inspector.

The inspector does not need the landlord's permission to inspect an apartment building, Urban said, but needs just a request from a tenant.

Hefley said students also should be aware of their responsibilities when signing a contract.

"Some tenants do not take contracts seriously," Hefley said. "They better read the contract and read it carefully and make sure they understand it before they sign it."

"There are basically two kinds of leases," Hefley said, "oral and written. An oral contract allows you 30 days notice before you move out and the landlord can raise the rent with 30 days notice."

"Some people think that if they don't sign a contract they don't have any obligations, and that's just not true."

"It's frustrating for landlords when tenants don't live up to their end of the contract," Hefley said. "I really feel most of the landlords in Manhattan are decent."

Another area that may not be of contractual nature, but nevertheless can cause students serious problems, is roommate responsibilities.

"Students should sit down and talk with the person they're moving in with and determine how much rent and utilities each will pay," Hefley said. "It's so much better if you just sit down and actually discuss it before you move in."

Urban said one-eighth of the people she sees have landlord-tenant related problems, and most of those problems stem from roommate disputes.

"One roommate takes off and the other one is left paying all the rent; that's been happening a lot," Urban said.

CRB members are not able to give legal advice, but can give information about the law. It also has several forms that are helpful to tenants, including inventory sheets, sublease forms, termination notices and roommate agreement forms. The board's office is located in the Student Governing Association office in the Union.

Annual Lou Douglas Lecture Series focuses on problems, solutions of Central America

Because of current conflicts in El Salvador and Nicaragua, Central America has been chosen as the theme for this year's Lou Douglas Lecture Series.

The lectures are an annual series of public forums in honor of the late Louis H. Douglas. Douglas, a respected scholar and political leader in the Manhattan community and in Kansas, was a professor of political science at K-State. He also was an active member of the Board of Directors for the University For Man until his death in 1979.

Past lectures have presented major political, economic and social issues to students and faculty of K-State, Manhattan residents and citizens of Kansas.

John Exdell, associate professor of philosophy and Lou Douglas program chairman, said this year's series "1984: The Americas in Crisis," is focused on Central America.

"We've chosen this topic because we think events in El Salvador and Nicaragua are soon likely to present our nation with some difficult choices," he said. "In 1984 we may see an historic national debate on the basic direction of our Central American policy. This year's Lou Douglas Series offers our community an opportunity to become better-informed and more involved."

In addition to the scheduled guest speakers for the lectures, negotiations are underway to add an official from the Nicaraguan government, Exdell said.

Scergio Ramirez, an influential member of the Nicaraguan government, has been invited to speak at both K-State and the University of Kansas.

He was scheduled to speak at K-State on March 2 or 3 for the lecture series, said Charles Stansifer, professor of history at KU, who is helping arrange the visit.

"He notified us that he couldn't make it for the scheduled time, and we have rescheduled him to speak April 2 or 3," Stansifer said.

Stansifer said Ramirez needs a visa, which is a government notice permitting a person to enter the United States. Ramirez has applied for the document, but he may not get it.

"We are optimistic that he'll be able to come," he said. "But other South American officials have been denied visas in the past few years. Right now, we don't know that there is a problem. But if one should arise, we would like to take care of it early."

The series is in its fifth year and is sponsored by UFM, Ecumenical Christian Ministries, the Division of Continuing Education, the Department of Political Science and other University and community organizations and churches.

Requirements erode education

Higher education may no longer be the right of all Kansans.

A bill is being considered by the Kansas Legislature which would require freshmen entering Board of Regents schools to have completed in high school four units of English, three of math, three of science and three of the social sciences. In 1990, students may also have to take two units of a foreign language.

In the past, it has been considered the right of any Kansas high school graduate to get a higher education. This philosophy seems to have worked — Kansas is ranked second in the nation in literacy, second only to Iowa.

If the bill passes, higher education will be the right of any Kansas high school graduate fortunate enough to attend the right school, at the right time and with the right adviser.

Attending the right school will be essential. One-third of schools in the state are not able to offer all the required courses in their curriculum. These are usually small schools in rural areas. They lack both the financial resources and the number of students to justify offering these classes.

Students will have to attend school at the right time. Some students do not plan to go to college. After a few years, they may decide a college education is necessary to reach their goals. It is unlikely these students will have completed the requirements to attend a regents' school.

The right adviser will be necessary to help students select the classes which will enable them to attend college. Many high schools do not have effective advising programs. Now students' futures may depend on decisions made as early as ninth grade. Will they have adequate information to make those decisions?

Education is a means of changing or improving one's situation. Those already limited in opportunity will be hurt most by passage of a bill like the one being considered. The Board of Regents realized this and took a stand against the bill at its last meeting. Perhaps the Legislature will have the wisdom to do the same.

Rights are important in higher education. This bill does not consider the most important right — the right to an education.

Abortion doesn't liberate women

Pro-choice feminists are deceived about both the source of the demand for permissive abortion and about its consequences for individual women. What abortion actually offers a woman is an opportunity to violently reject her body and that of her child to maintain an economic and political system that is anti-woman and anti-child.

Daphne de Jong has said that the downtrodden (in this case, women) are often encouraged to identify with their oppressors and hate those characteristics which distinguish them from the powerful class.

In the last 20 years, there has been a shift in the way American women view their bodies.

Susan Wooley and Kim Chernin have done extensive research showing that most women feel they're overweight even when they're not. And it is their hips, buttocks, thighs, bellies, and breasts which displease them most. These are the parts which least resemble those of men. Both found that as women became more financially and politically successful, the male-dominated media urged them to adopt boyish fashions and body styles. A woman with a voluptuous or large figure is regarded as threatening to men.

But even more powerful than women's bodies are those experiences exclusive to females: pregnancy and birth. One way to limit women's power is to degrade these. The sexism of our society is expressed in pregnancy discrimination.

People who are pro-choice on abortion often talk about the importance of the woman's control of her body and her life. I suppose it would be some kind of proof that I controlled my life if I were to cut off my hands.

And what if I chose the smallest, weakest little girl in my family? Would killing her ever set me free from the sexism that keeps women second-class citizens in our society? No; self-hatred is not freedom. Neither is hatred of one's children.

Abortion alienates women from their bodies and fails to attack the problem in problem pregnancies. The baby has never been the oppressor, just the most disposable.

Rather than changing the system of jobs and child-raising to accommodate our different role in reproduction, we are asked to scrape living children out of our bodies.

Hefner. His Playboy Foundation has long been a backer of the pro-abortion cause. Abortion allows exploitative men like Hefner to use women and dump them without ever having to cope with the consequences of their actions.

Pro-choice feminists say we need abortion because we live in an unjust society. But I know that cooperating with discrimination against ourselves will only make matters worse. I'm not fooled by promises of material perfection if only I'll work within the male-oriented system. As Rosa Parks and Frances Moore Lappe have shown, liberation begins with changes in the lives of individuals who simply won't accept their oppression.

So instead of reinforcing women's rejection of themselves and their children, I and my sisters (and a few brothers) in pro-life feminism work to help women. While many of our pro-choice counterparts are giving speeches to groups, we are giving homes, clothes and food to pregnant teenagers, battered women and single mothers.

We provide education, tenant advocacy, job training, adoption assistance, legal aid, child care, medical care, jobs and counseling for pregnant women, women who have aborted, rape victims, displaced homemakers, women with eating disorders or chemical dependencies, mixed-up teenagers, the handicapped and the elderly.

Philadelphia rape has tragic end

This is another editorial about rape.

But this editorial is about a single horrifying incident — the rape last week in Philadelphia of 23-year-old Vanessa Renee Brown.

Brown had been missing a week when her body was found in a vacant lot three blocks from her home. She had been strangled, stabbed and her throat was slit. The words "GOOD RAPE" were carved in her back.

With any luck at all, Brown's death will help spur awareness of rape as a crime of violence and not of lust. It is tragic that she had to die before this could be realized.

Brown had been raped last year also, and was scheduled to testify against William Kemp, a cab driver accused of raping her. But authorities said Kemp is not a primary suspect in the murder.

Philadelphia police believe extensive media coverage of the rape has hindered their search for the killer. They wish the carving in Brown's back had not been publicized, because they could be sure a suspect were the murderer if he were the only one to know about the carving.

Let us hope the police will find the murderer or murderers. Let us also hope that he or they are severely punished, as rapists many times have not been.

Maybe this case of rape, because it involves murder, will help to enforce the fact that rape is a crime of violence instead of lust, and that rapists should have to face severe consequences for their actions. If such is the case, Brown will not have died in vain.

Funds misdirected to pensions

WASHINGTON — Pentagon boosters have long claimed that military retirement benefits are crucial to maintaining a qualified officer corps. But a recent study by a private policy group based here illustrates the extent to which those benefits are ripping off taxpayers and may be counterproductive.

This year, military pensions will cost $16.7 billion, or 17 percent more than they did in 1981. The median benefit will be three times as large as that provided by private-sector pension plans.

But beneficiaries will have not contributed one penny to their pension plans, making military retirement the second most expensive entitlement program funded exclusively with tax dollars. As the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities points out, the most costly entitlement program, Medicaid, provides benefits to more than 14 times as many people.

Meanwhile, the wealthiest fifth of U.S. households will receive 60.8 percent of the military pension budget (the top two-fifths will garner 83 percent). About 92 percent of all military pensioners retire with maximum benefits (50 percent of basic pay after 20 years, 75 percent after 30) before their 50th birthday (the median retirement age is 43). And two-thirds of all military retirees have jobs.

Indeed, the Pentagon's pension program gives pilots, engineers and other highly skilled personnel every incentive to retire at their peak earning age and after the government has already spent substantial funds training them.

That may be the Pentagon's way of encouraging a few good men to devote their early careers to military service.

But women and children shouldn't have to suffer budget cuts to pad the checking accounts of captains and colonels. Nor may the Defense Department want to encourage a brain drain as national security becomes even more a matter of technical know-how.

There were grumblings in Vice President Bush's office as Ronald Reagan prepared to announce the redeployment of U.S. troops in Lebanon last Tuesday. In light of the crisis, Reagan asked Bush to postpone for 48 hours a five-day trip to Europe originally scheduled to begin last Wednesday. Bush's staff, however, saw in the delay request a White House desire to assure Reagan a full weekend at his California ranch.

Environmental Protection Agency Administrator William Ruckelshaus may have benefitted politically from reports that he reprimanded his enforcement staff for not being tough enough on polluters. Yet Ruckelshaus might have saved his anger for the White House, which gave him a budget that is 27 percent less after inflation than the last pre-Reagan EPA appropriation.

In Rolling Stone magazine's recent issue marking the 20th anniversary of the Beatles' invasion of America, Ronald Reagan Jr. provides what may be an anecdotal typical of his generation. "I remember once, when I was about 13," the younger Reagan said, "I borrowed 'The White Album' (one of the Beatles' last) from Patti, and my mother got upset when she heard me listening to 'Happiness Is a Warm Gun.' It really bothered her a lot."

In closing, we hear that the Rev. Jesse Jackson has chosen former Justice Department official Barbara Honneger to handle women's issues for his campaign. Honneger resigned in frustration over lax Reagan administration efforts to eliminate sexually discriminatory language in federal laws. Yet, even some feminist groups are wondering about the wisdom of Jackson's choice, since Honneger's performance in office received mixed press reviews.

Our economic system doesn't allow a family wage-earner to care for children. We fail to promote use of safe, effective contraception. Our sick values accept killing, but not evidence of sexual activity. Communities don't support women before, during and after pregnancy.

But the justifiable anger and fear women have felt as an oppressed class is then deflected by the oppressors away from themselves and onto the perfect scapegoat — the child. Since she is always weaker than her parents, she can be manipulated or even killed with no protection but their emotional security and concern for human rights.

The woman is taught she must hate and fear her daughter in a world where both compete for the generosity of the powerful. It is unnatural for women to hate their children. Therefore, lies, not recognized as such about both the child she is carrying and the effects of abortion on her future, are usually required to convince the woman to abort her baby. I know many women who have had multiple abortions and they are still poor, powerless, uneducated and unable to support themselves.

So what are the real consequences of abortion? Members of Women Exploited by Abortion, a group comparable to Vietnam Veterans Against the War, tell of great indignities and harms they suffered during and after abortions.

There are at least two practicing abortionists in the Kansas City metropolitan area who have killed women during abortions. Within a few weeks of 1982, one of these also accidentally removed a woman's colon, and was responsible for damage leading to hysterectomy in another.

Yet because of the Supreme Court's ruling against informed consent last June, we cannot require that women receive information on the risks of abortion. But we can do so for every other surgical procedure, including ear-piercing.

Over 90 percent of women physicians and the vast majority of female nurses refuse to do elective abortions. The huge payoff goes to the almost exclusively male abortionists. It is no wonder that two of the strongest pro-choice lobbies are the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists and the American Medical Association.

Another prominent abortion backer and beneficiary is Hugh

We aren't liberal wimps giving money to chic East Coast lobbies to get huge tax deductions. We are radical feminists helping real women with real problems, despite the fact that it earns us rejection by the right and the left and even by our families. We do this because we love women more than we love being fashionable.

A few of us risk not just derision and abandonment by friends, but arrest and beatings by hired thugs who would prevent us from counseling. We go to women who are about to abort and try to talk them out of it. We offer them whatever help they need before and after the birth. Yes, we show them pictures of their children. We inform them of the risks. We try in a last-ditch effort to counteract the lies perpetrated by the standard media to make women hate their bodies and their babies.

Sometimes the woman reaches deep down and finds enough self-esteem to realize if she goes through with the operation, the abortionist will leave her empty of pocket, womb and heart. But if she walks out that door with me, she'll not only save her baby's life, but her own.

Baez gives concert to help resister

SAN DIEGO — Folksinger and veteran anti-war activist Joan Baez drew 2,300 people to a benefit concert to help convicted draft resister Benjamin Sasway appeal his 2½-year prison sentence.

Sasway, 23, the first American convicted of refusing to register for military service since the Vietnam War — attended Sunday night's concert in downtown San Diego's Golden Hall along with his parents.

Baez praised him for "not cooperating with a machine that kills." "There are two terrorists that rule the world — the United States and the U.S.S.R.," Baez, 43, said after her two-hour performance.

She expressed surprise at the lively audience in a city she termed a "military bastion" because of the large U.S. Navy presence.

Sasway, from the northern San Diego County community of Vista, made no public comments during the concert. He and his attorneys have said they will appeal his conviction to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Feminist changes her view on sex

LONDON — Feminist Germaine Greer says women should not have sex just for the fun of it.

Greer, who campaigned for female equality and sexual freedom in the 1970s, said in an interview being published today in Woman magazine that sex now dominates Western culture.

She is quoted as saying that many of her supporters will be "very angry to suddenly hear me coming out in favor of chastity."

But, she added, "We've now become increasingly preoccupied with sex to a point where it dominates our very culture."

"Recreation sex is the norm — we shouldn't have intercourse for children, power or prestige — only for fun. This, I claim, is...infantile," she said.

Greer, whose 1970 book "The Female Eunuch" established her as a feminist leader, recently published "Sex and Destiny" in which she revises her philosophy.

She said adolescents "are subject to a barrage of temptation in the media. They believe sex is a social duty. They don't even know if they want it or not, but everybody is doing it, so they do it too."

LANSING, Mich. — Mountain climber and writer Andrew Miller says that if he succeeds in a 70-day walk across the frozen Arctic Circle, it will be the first time anyone has traveled to the North Pole solely by foot.

Miller, 32, said his trek with four other men, planned for March 1985, "is the epitome of adventure. We'll be striving for a point (North Pole) that doesn't really exist, except in the minds of navigators."

Others have reached the Pole by dog sled, on skis and by airplane.

The trek will be led by Michael McGuire, 24, a climber and guide from Omaha, Neb., he said in an interview with the Lansing State Journal. Also in the crew will be two Alaskan climbers and a Colorado scientist.

"Part of my interest is professional," said Miller, who lives in Fraser, Colo. "I love adventuring and would like to make a living writing about it. This could help a lot."

"Life is pretty complicated," he said. "An adventure like this removes some of the pointless complications that drive us in circles."

Schools may battle for research grants

By The College Press Service

LOS ANGELES — A fierce battle over an obscure government accounting procedure has threatened to upset the way colleges pay their graduate assistants and could give certain schools an unfair advantage in the intercollegiate competition for federal research grants.

The battle surfaced at the University of Southern California (USC), which the government ordered in December to change the way it keeps its research books.

USC had been trying to duck the accounting rule used by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) since 1980. Now that HHS is insisting USC use the rule, USC officials estimate it could cost the school nearly $3 million.

Other schools are also affected by the rule. HHS audits the research books of "more than 90 percent" of all U.S. universities, HHS negotiator Gary Logsdon said.

Until 1980, HHS let schools use federal research funding to indirectly pay parts of graduate assistants' fringe benefits — health insurance, tuition remissions, Social Security and retirement benefits — as well as to directly pay the assistants' basic salaries.

But in 1980, HHS changed an accounting rule to make schools list fringe benefits as direct costs of doing federal research projects.

The result of the change was to force schools to ask for more money in salaries to perform research for the federal government.

But in 1981, USC asked HHS if it could list the salary benefits on its research budget as indirect, auxiliary costs.

"The benefit (of the indirect accounting method) is it makes the cost of the research assistant less for the principal investigator (the professor or department requesting the funds for research)," Dennis Dougherty, USC's vice president and comptroller, said.

"The university decided to go with the indirect employee benefit (plan) in June 1983, and the HHS approved it at that time," Dougherty said. "Then they (HHS) later wrote me and told me the plan wouldn't be accepted after 1985."

As a result of having to make the change, Dougherty contends "a graduate assistant will now cost the principal investigator as much as or more than a post-doctorate student."

Consequently, researchers might be tempted to hire fewer graduate assistants.

If they don't, their schools could be at a competitive disadvantage to other schools when bidding to get federal research grants.

About 10 percent of the nation's universities, Dougherty said, have their research books audited by the Department of Defense (DOD) instead of HHS. The DOD, however, still lets its schools — which include research juggernauts like Stanford, MIT and Cal Tech — list graduate assistants' fringe benefits as indirect costs.

Consequently, a school audited by the DOD can tell the government it can do a certain research project for less salary costs than a school audited by HHS.

"HHS schools end up competing indirectly with DOD schools for the research grants," Dougherty said.

Logsdon said he agrees the HHS-audited schools "feel they don't have the same chance of getting the research award unless employee benefits are hidden as indirect costs," but says his agency feels the direct accounting method actually yields more funding for the schools in the long run.

USC is appealing to the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), which originally decided in the 1950s which schools were audited by HHS and which by DOD, to let HHS schools use the indirect accounting system.

"In every instance in which we've done an analysis of funding methods, we've found that the (indirect) employee benefit (plan) costs the government less and gives the school more," Dougherty said.

He said he expects the OMB to rule on his petition "sometime in the next several months."

A little good news goes a Long Distance.

Land a job for next summer? Call home! Your parents will relish the thought of you making money, as opposed to spending it.

Get a good grade on a paper? Parents love to see proof that they raised a smart kid.

You don't need a big event to call home. Even a little good news can go a long, long way.

And nobody's more eager to hear about it than your family.

Call between 11 pm Friday and 5 pm Sunday for the lowest rates.

When you've done something good, share the good news!

Former Wildcat baseball player's dream becomes reality

Head Baseball Coach Bill Hickey returns to K-State excited about the prospects of coaching, teaching and building a winning program.

By DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian Reporter

As a young man growing up in the small Kansas town of Buffalo, little did Bill Hickey know that one day he would be the head baseball coach of a major college — let alone his alma mater. Twelve years after leaving K-State as a player, Hickey's dreams became a reality. But it all started in Buffalo.

"When I was growing up in Buffalo, I was one of those kids very similar to the ones I'm coaching now," Hickey said. "I could run a little bit, had a pretty good arm and loved to play the game."

It was his love for the game that led to recruiting visits by Emporia State, K-State and the Big Eight Conference powerhouse of that time — Missouri.

"I came to K-State because of one guy, and that was Bob Brasher, who was then the head coach," he said. "Brasher was the kind of coach that even after you left K-State, you felt like the guy really liked you."

Upon graduation, Hickey became a graduate assistant and began working with Brasher in the Show-Me Baseball Camp system in Missouri.

"I really began to learn the game at that time, and I began to learn how to do public relations work because we had to sell our baseball camp and the game of baseball," Hickey said.

In 1973, Hickey became an assistant at Oklahoma, where he was a part of a team that won the Big Eight title and was fifth in the College World Series. But Hickey said it was the experience he gained in handling people that benefited him the most at OU.

"We had some great players at Oklahoma — Jackson Todd, who has been in the big leagues with the Mets; Bob Shirley, who has played for the Yankees; and George Frazier, who was just picked up by Cleveland."

"I got to help recruit some of these fine young people, and the experience I gained in doing so was a big help to me in helping me reach some of my goals," he said.

The experience he gained in handling people was important in advancing his career, he said, but possibly more important was what he learned from the veterans (both active and retired) he worked with at summer and winter camps during the 1970s.

"I worked with Chuck Hiller, who has been on Whitey Herzog's staff at

Kansas City and St. Louis; Dennis Leonard; Mark Littell; Steve Boros, who is now the manager of the A's; and Wally Moon, a former big league pitcher.

"These guys were people I lived with every day. I'm a 24-year-old kid, and here I am getting the opportunity to rub shoulders with these guys and pick their brains day after day after day throughout the winter and the summertime," Hickey said.

Another thing Hickey said he learned in the 1970s was that teaching the game is different from coaching it.

"It takes a lot of coaches a long time to realize that you've got to be a teacher first. If you are going to be a successful coach, you've got to be a teacher, a communicator," Hickey said.

"Jack Hartman is a great teacher. He's a great teacher. People say that Jack is a great coach, but Jack is a great teacher first. All of your coaches who have great success are teachers first and coaches second."

It was the chance to teach and coach at his alma mater that Hickey said he couldn't pass up a year ago.

"When the job opened at K-State, and I was selected to return to K-State, it was like a miracle come true," he said. "In 1972, when I left here, there was something in the back of my mind that said, 'Some day I hope I come back.'"

"The day that I got the job, I walked out on the field and goose bumps covered me. I stood in center field for a long time and thought about the guys who had played here, about the guys who had come and gone. It was an emotional time for me."

With these words, Hickey turned and walked out of his office and on to the artificial surface inside the Brandenberry Indoor Complex. There was teaching to be done.

Hartman's search for right combination may be over

It's finally happened. K-State Coach Jack Hartman has searched all season for five players who make up a consistent starting lineup. He's tried junior Eric Watson at guard, freshman Alex Williams at center, junior Tom Alfaro at forward, sophomore Jonas Cody at guard — a variety of different lineups, trying to find a spark for his squad. At last, Hartman may have found the formula for success.

Before the Feb. 8 game against Missouri, Hartman dreamed up yet another lineup to do battle with the Tigers. The result was a shocking 67-46 win for the 'Cats, their first road win of the season.

In that contest, Hartman inserted Alfaro — who had sat for two games — at guard. The junior college transfer came through, scoring a team-high 14 points. With Alfaro's play, sophomore Jim Roder, a usual starter, was relieved of the burden of carrying the backcourt load and came off the bench to chip in 13, his best off-sive showing in weeks. Since then the 'Cats have been on a roll. K-State has reeled off wins over the University of Colorado Buffalos and the Oklahoma State University Cowboys and suffered a close road loss to the conference pace-setting University of Oklahoma Sooners.

Hartman has settled on a starting five of Alfaro and a rejuvenated Roder at guard, sophomore Ben Mitchell and junior Lafayette Watkins at forward and junior Eddie Elder in the center position. With this lineup, Hartman appears to finally have the consistency he has looked for over the past two seasons.

With Roder returning to the starting lineup, joining Alfaro in the backcourt, K-State has a solid backcourt combination. In his four starts, Alfaro has scored 80 points, giving the team a much-needed outside threat. Roder, relieved of scoring duty, has given the team solid ball-handling skills, as exhibited by his eight assists last

TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

Saturday against the Cowboys. He also has shown more aggressiveness on the offensive end.

Watkins at forward gives the front line good perimeter shooting and extra quickness inside. His improved defensive play this year also has been a boost for the 'Cats. In the Colorado win, Watkins grabbed 10 rebounds, a career high.

Mitchell seems to be coming out of a mid-season slump. After scoring a career-high 21 in the 'Cats 74-66 loss to Colorado earlier in the season, Mitchell seemed to disappear from the offense for a few games. But his 15 points against the Cowboys on six of seven shooting from the floor showed he hasn't lost his touch.

Elder is the only player to have started every game this season. The 6-foot-9 junior has led the team in scoring and rebounding throughout the season, averaging 14 points and 7.6 boards a game, providing consistency to the K-State attack.

With this lineup, the 'Cats have shown signs of becoming a contender in the conference. In the first 10 minutes of the second half against the Cowboys, K-State's new starting five showed the potential they have as a unit. Nursing a slim three-point advantage at halftime, the five starters pushed the 'Cats' lead to 18, with torrid shooting and tenacious defense, before Hartman made a substitution with 9:43 left.

That kind of play among the starters has been missing at K-State ever since Ed Neely, Randy Reed, Tim Jankovich, Tyrone Adams and company left after the 1981-1982 season. In the past, fans at Ahearn Field House became accustomed to the 'Cats blowing away opponents in the style this year's team showed Saturday.

While this is evidence of the 'Cats may not yet be up to par with some of the great teams of recent years, it was nice to see that winning spark return. With its new-found starting nucleus, K-State, given up for dead only weeks ago, has jumped back into a confusing conference race.

The goal for the team now is a first division conference finish, assuring a first-round home game in the Big Eight post-season tournament. With continuing solid play from starters Roder, Alfaro, Mitchell, Watkins and Elder, as well as improvement off the bench from sophomore Tyrone Jackson and Cody, that goal is well within reach.

OU win clinches title share

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The opposing coaches insist that Wednesday night's Oklahoma-Kansas clash is only another game.

However, a victory by Oklahoma would clinch at least a share of the Big Eight Conference championship for the ninth-ranked Sooners. And a victory by Kansas, which bolted into contention with two consecutive wins on the road, would put the interest back in the race.

The Sooners show a 9-1 record in the tightly packed Big Eight while Kansas is 7-3. Both schools will have three conference games left.

Kansas' Larry Brown was one of several coaches who declared two weeks ago that the race was, for all practical purposes, already won by Oklahoma.

"Yeah, some coaches are saying it's over," said Oklahoma boss Billy Tubbs. "But have you noticed they still want to play the games? We just want to take care of our own business. If we do that, we'll be all right. We have a big challenge at Kansas."

One reason for the game's importance, Tubbs admitted, was the regular-season Big Eight title. But another is the Sooners' seeding in the NCAA Tournament.

"It's going to have a bearing on our national ranking," Tubbs said. "And that's important because of the NCAA playoffs. If you're nationally ranked, that has a big bearing on whether you're going to get seeded in the tournament."

Brown was trying to figure out a way to stop, or at least slow down, Oklahoma's sophomore all-American Wayman Tisdale, who is averaging more than 27 points.

'Cats' tennis team struggles in season's opening tourney

The K-State tennis team, in its first tournament in Lubbock, Texas, had a tough time Friday and Saturday as it met West Texas State University and Texas Tech University.

"It's pretty much what we expected," said Head Coach Steve Webb.

"The girls thought they really had a chance to win against West Texas," Webb said, but they lost five matches to four.

"We were really disappointed about that," Webb said.

Judy Miller, Kim Black and Lisa Creighton all won singles matches, and Carlye Madalen and Kim Black won their doubles match.

"They need to improve on doubles a lot. That was our downfall in the fall and it has continued into the spring. Everyone played pretty good singles," Webb said.

The women lost all nine matches to Texas Tech and the men lost all matches against both West Texas State and Texas Tech.

U.S. troops leave Beirut as fighting persists

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT — U.S. Navy helicopters took Marines from their base at Beirut's airport to warships in the Mediterranean on Tuesday as the Marine withdrawal from Beirut officially got under way.

Israeli jets, meanwhile, bombed and strafed positions in the Syrian-controlled mountains east of the capital.

"Today the support people have gone and we're working on the combat gear," said Marine spokesman Maj. Dennis Brooks. "Today is the first day of the relocation" of the 1,300 combat troops standing by since President Reagan announced Feb. 7 his plan to withdraw them.

Brooks said he could not say how many Marines were withdrawn Tuesday. He estimated it would take a week or two to evacuate the base at Beirut's airport. Since the base was established in September 1982, 265 U.S. servicemen have died in Lebanon.

The airport has been virtually circled by anti-government militias since last Wednesday, when Druse fighters drove to the coast south of the base, linking up with their Shiite allies and further undermining the government of Christian President Amin Gemayel. "I'm ready to go. I've got women to meet and beers to drink," said Lance Cpl. Samuel Lee, 20, of Miami, as he moved out. Asked about the Marines' mission, he said, "We were just trying to restore peace. It doesn't look like it happened."

Brooks said the Marines would leave their bunkers and foxholes intact. He added: "I haven't been informed who's going to be taking over these positions, but they're welcome to them."

Akef Haidar, a former Lebanese army colonel now chief of military of Amal, the largest Shiite militia, said his forces would not take over the airport positions because they hold better posts in the area.

The Israeli command said its jets struck at four buildings described as guerrilla bases along the Beirut-Damascus highway in the central mountains and returned safely after the 20-minute midmorning raid.

Radio stations said the targets near Bhamdoun were occupied by Syrian-backed Palestinian guerrillas and some were set afire.

Since the Druse offensive a week ago, the Israeli army has been sending patrols north of the Israeli defense line at the Awali River to the outskirts of Damour, 12 miles south of Beirut.

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, in Brussels, Belgium, said Israel does not intend "at this stage" to move forces into permanent positions north of the Awali.

Meanwhile, Lebanese radio stations said Saudi mediators were working in Beirut and Damascus, Syria, on a new plan calling for a cease-fire throughout Lebanon and a government declaration scrapping a May 17 Israeli-Lebanese troop withdrawal agreement.

The plan also calls for determining the future of Syria's military presence in Lebanon through the Arab League, to distinguish it from Israel's occupation status in southern Lebanon.

State committee passes proposal on drinking age

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — After limited discussion, the House Federal and State Affairs Committee on Tuesday approved a proposal to raise to 19 the drinking age for 3.2 percent beer.

But the leader of the state's dry forces, the Rev. Richard Taylor, lobbyist for Kansas For Life at Its Best, said he was not satisfied with the change and would continue to fight to raise the drinking age to 21.

The committee settled on raising the drinking age to 19 after considering a proposal to allow anyone between 18 and 21 to drink only in bars licensed to sell 3.2 percent beer. The committee flirted with raising the age to 21 before Rep. Don Sallee, R-Troy, proposed a successful amendment which would raise the drinking age to 19.

The measure now goes to the full House for debate and action, as does a second alcoholic-beverage bill approved by the committee.

Taylor, who annually campaigns for tougher restrictions on the sale and use of alcohol and drugs, said the committee had taken a "good step in the right direction, but it was not good enough."

The second committee-approved measure aims at discouraging anyone — beer and liquor retailers, parents or friends — from making alcohol available to minors. Under the bill, anyone who knowingly sells or gives beer or liquor to a minor would be held liable for any death, injury or damage caused by the intoxicated minor.

The committee approved an amendment which would allow an injured party to recover damages from either the minor or the person who furnished the alcoholic beverage. The amount of the financial award would not be limited to the degree of guilt assigned to the minor or adults involved.

Close vote expected on reappraisal bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Legislative leaders are predicting a close vote today on a bill before the Kansas House which mandates statewide reappraisal of real estate in Kansas for tax purposes by 1988.

Final action is scheduled for today and leaders on both sides of the aisle in the lower chamber, including House Speaker Mike Hayden, R-Atwood, and Minority Leader Marvin Barkis, D-Louisburg, predict a close vote on the Senate-passed bill.

"It's going to be close," Hayden said Tuesday after the bill won first-round approval in the House. "But, yes, I think it'll pass. Several Democrats said today they would vote for it. We'll wait and see."

Barkis said he's unsure how the Democrats line up on the bill, and he said no orders have come down from Gov. John Carlin to the rank-and-file to kill the bill. Carlin has vowed to veto any reappraisal bill sent to his desk that is not accompanied by a bill to amend the Kansas Constitution to allow classification of property.

"I don't know how everyone is going to vote," Barkis said. "I haven't polled everyone. It'll be close, I imagine. The governor hasn't said anything at all. Believe it or not, he doesn't run things down here."

Rep. James Braden, R-Clay Center and chairman of tax committee, carried the bill in floor debate and rebuffed several attempts to amend the bill. After winning the preliminary round, he was cautious to predict the final vote.

"There'll be a few Democrat votes unless (Carlin) really puts the pants on them tonight," Braden said Tuesday.

Braden faced several arguments during debate, including claims the state was stripping counties of their authority to appraise property.

"If you think the state is going to take over the reappraisal process, you're wrong because that's not the case at all," said Braden. "This simply calls for statewide reappraisal, but it prohibits implementation before Jan. 1, 1988. And implementation could only take place after a classification amendment has been submitted to the voters."

After January 1988, county appraisers would be required to update valuations annually, and personally inspect every piece of property once each four years. The counties would supply valuation figures to the state revenue agency via a statewide computer network to ensure each of the 105 counties was complying with the law, Braden said.

Valuations are required by law to be revised on an annual basis. However, there has not been a statewide reappraisal for 20 years and during that time inequities have developed, Braden said. That's where the amendment to allow classification of property comes in.

The Kansas Constitution requires all property to be taxed on a uniform and equal basis at 30 percent of its fair market value. However, with the inequities that have developed over the past 20 years, homeowners and farmers are getting a break because their property is taxed at a much lower percentage than commercial and utility land.

City approves contracts for fire station

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

Three contracts for construction of a fire station to serve the city and the University were approved at Tuesday night's Manhattan City Commission meeting. The facility is to serve as headquarters for the Manhattan Fire Department.

Osborne Construction Co., Manhattan, with the low bid of $1,549,791, was awarded the general contract. Central Mechanical Construction Co., Manhattan, submitted a low bid of $293,082 and was awarded the mechanical contract. Warnego Electric was named the electrical contractor with a low bid of $160,388.

Construction on the station, scheduled for completion in 1985, should begin during the next two weeks, Brent Bowman, the architect in charge of the project, said.

The commission, with Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood voting against, also authorized Mayor Wanda Fateley and City Clerk Gregg Gibson to enter into an agreement with the Union Pacific Railroad for design services for use in relocating the Union Pacific rail yards because of the downtown redevelopment project.

City planner Bruce McCallum said the design services will cost the city about $19,000. This amount isn't covered by an Urban Development Action Grant because moving the yards is considered the city's responsibility, he said.

Revenue sharing bonds are to be used to finance the services.

In another issue involving downtown redevelopment, a measure which would have turned several one-way streets into two-way streets was tabled until the next meeting because commissioners had unanswered questions about the resulting changes in traffic flow.

These changes would be necessary because of the closing of Fifth Street to make way for the Riley County Courthouse Plaza and as a result of mall construction.

The tabled measure would make Fourth Street, which lies between Humboldt and Yuma streets, two-way. Sections of Houston, Leavenworth and Humboldt streets from Juliette to Third Street also would become two-way.

Commissioner Dave Fiser said the commission should either make the streets two-way or wait until the redevelopment project is completed, probably within five years.

Fateley also disagreed with the proposal, but said she wants to receive comments from the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and Downtown Manhattan, Inc., which are scheduled to meet today.

"I've always been for two-way streets, even before the mall was brought up," Fateley said. "They were originally two-way, and I think they can be two-way again."

Nicaraguan leader announces early elections

By The Associated Press

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — The leftist Sandinista government said Tuesday it will hold nationwide elections Nov. 4, three months earlier than expected. But it insisted that Marxism would remain a part of "Sandinista democracy."

"We do not accept democracy that is ordered by the U.S. government," said Daniel Ortega, coordinator of the governing junta, an apparent reference to U.S. pressure for open elections.

Nov. 4 is two days before the U.S. general election.

Ortega spoke to an estimated 130,000 people in the Plaza of the Revolution to mark the 50th anniversary of the death of guerrilla hero Augusto Cesar Sandino, the Sandinistas' namesake.

Ortega also announced: — The president, vice president and legislature will take office Jan. 10, 1985, for six-year terms.

— The voting age will be lowered from 18 to 16.

— An amnesty for rebels, to expire Tuesday, will extend to May 4. The amnesty does not extend to rebel leaders.

He did not mention the state of emergency, in effect since March 1982, which has restricted political activity because of what the government said was the threat of a U.S. or U.S.-supported invasion.

Opposition parties say they will boycott the elections unless the government lifts the emergency and press censorship, respects human rights and cuts links between the official party — the Sandinista National Liberation Front — and government security forces.

Citing the costs in lives and damage from U.S.-backed rebels, Ortega said, "We don't want that democracy that used power to threaten and attack those who do not follow its imperialist designs."

"We don't want that kind of democracy where only 30 percent of the population vote," he said. "For us democracy is for the people...For us democracy is the agrarian reform. For us democracy is rights for the worker."

He added, "Christianity and Marxism are part of the Sandinista democracy. We took power in 1979 promising democracy and we will fulfill our promise," Ortega said.

They would be the first elections since the Sandinistas toppled the regime of rightist strongman Anastasio Somoza in July 1979. The last elections were held Sept. 1, 1974, when Somoza was re-elected easily.

It had been expected that the elections would be announced for 1985, with next Feb. 21 as the most probable date.

Most of those at the ceremony were activists from neighborhood Sandinista defense committees. There also were thousands of students, brought in from the north where they were picking cotton and coffee. About 500 Americans are helping with the harvest.

Opposition leaders have protested that lowering the voting age to 16 is an attempt to take advantage of the extensive Sandinista penetration into youth sectors.

The first speaker of the day, Juan Pablo Sanchez, organizer of the student harvest brigades, said: "If we were old enough to fight Somoza, if we were old enough to aid the revolutionary government in production, are not we old enough to vote?"

Faculty ballots to be sent

The Faculty Senate election process will begin this week.

Primary ballots will be sent via campus mail to University faculty members and should be returned to the location designated on the ballot by March 5.

Final ballots will be mailed the week of March 19 and should be returned by April 4.

The Faculty Senate Executive Committee said it urges all faculty to take part in the elections and faculty governance.

Campus news briefs

Campus to host 843 Girl Scouts

The K-State Campus Girl Scouts will be host to 843 Kaw Valley Girl Scouts and their troop leaders Saturday.

Approximately 66 troops from 23 northeast Kansas communities are registered to attend activities which begin at 9 a.m. at the KSU Stadium.

The campus scouting organization has several activities planned. The scouts will see a planetarium show on the exploration of Jupiter and Saturn. There also will be a show featuring Hero, the university's robot; the Kappa Pickers of Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority and the FarmHouse fraternity barbershop quartet.

Campus tours are scheduled, as well as a visit with the K-State cheerleaders and Willie the Wildcat and the K-State vs. University of Kansas women's basketball game in Ahearn Field House.

Convocation schedule announced

The Convocations Committee has announced the All-University Convocations for the rest of the spring semester.

Loren Jenkins, Pulitzer Prize winning foreign correspondent, is scheduled to speak March 7 on "Reagan's Policy in the Middle-East."

Mildred Carroll, superintendent of the California Institute for Men, is scheduled to speak April 27 on a topic related to prisons, crime and corrections. The title for his talk has not been announced.

Both convocations will begin at 10:30 a.m. in McCain Auditorium.

West German actor to perform

A West German actor, Rolf Gunther, is to give an unusual one-person performance of one of the best-known German dramas, "Faust I, the Gretchen Tragedy," at 8 p.m. Tuesday in the Union Big Eight Room.

The presentation will be in German and is free. Gunther's appearance is sponsored by the Departments of Modern Languages, Speech, Curriculum and Instruction and Music.

Graduate becomes assistant dean

Helen Clegg Peterson, a 1947 K-State journalism graduate from Columbus, has been named assistant dean of the University of Illinois Graduate College, Champaign-Urbana.

Peterson, who was editor of the Collegian while attending K-State, has been on the Graduate College staff at Illinois since 1967. She was named assistant to the dean in 1976 and is executive secretary of the Executive Committee of the Graduate College, which is its advisory body concerned with academic policy.

Together with Linda Wilson, associate vice chancellor for research at Illinois, Peterson initiated the Graduate College Dual-Career Couples Project to address problems of recruiting and retaining faculty and staff associated with limited professional career opportunities for dual-career couples.

residential property is taxes at about 8 percent of its fair market value, instead of the 30 percent tax level required in the constitution.

Democrats in the House, and Carlin, oppose the reappraisal bill until a resolution is approved which submits to a statewide vote the question of classification.

The Democrats say homeowners and farmers must be protected from shifts that would occur if reappraisal begins without classification.

"This is no compromise," said Barkis. "We're willing to vote for a reappraisal if it provides assurances that no tax shifts will occur. This bill doesn't provide that assurance."

The proposal to submit the classification question to voters has little chance of passing because it needs approval from two-thirds of the members of the House and Senate before it can be placed on the ballot.

Rep. Anthony Hensley, D-Topeka, offered the minority party's only amendment, to tie implementation of reappraisal directly to passage of the classification amendment.

"All this says is we will pass reappraisal in this state, but before it becomes effective, the voters of the state must have the opportunity to vote on an amendment to classify property for tax purposes," Hensley said. "It's very simple. We don't think we should start reappraisal until voters have a chance to decide on classification."

U-Learn Line

I've got an instructor who's really boring. How can I get more out of his lectures?

To restore the breakdown of two-way communication (which happens when the lecturer is boring) the listener must be aware of how to increase his participation. This is done by employing active listening habits.

Be aware of things that distract you during class and make a conscious effort to get rid of them. When you get bored, "space off" for 15 to 20 seconds, then consciously bring your attention back to the lecture. Re-attend to examples written on the board, especially if the instructor gets off on a tangent.

It's also a good idea to share notes with a classmate. Get together outside of class and compare what you've each gotten from the lecture. Repeating important terms and definitions to yourself during lecture will help you to absorb and memorize information. Write your own comments and examples in the margin of your lecture notes. It will show that you understand the concepts discussed in class, and they'll have more meaning later.

Ask questions during class. Try to use your "space off" time to construct specific questions. You're probably not the only one who wants to know the answer. If the instructor doesn't allow time for questions, write them in the margin of your notes and ask him after class or look them up in the text.

I'm going to Mexico over spring break. Do I need a passport? Is it true you're not supposed to drink the water?

According to Kansas State Travel in Westloop, a passport is not necessary. A traveler does, however, need something to prove his citizenship. You should have a birth certificate, a voter registration card or a tourist card. The tourist card may be obtained from your travel agent or the airline you're flying on.

As for drinking the water, to be safe you should definitely not consume it. It's very easy to get dysentery in Mexico, and items such as water, ice and green leafy vegetables can be hazardous. Kansas State Travel recommends staying or dining in very nice hotels and restaurants and drinking only bottled liquids or water.

Student pilots take off in aviation club

By LILLIAN ZIER
Collegian Reporter

On a clear night, Topeka can be seen from Manhattan through 1,500 and 2,000 feet in the air.

Last Thursday night, Ben Bolte, sophomore in animal sciences and industry, and Todd Kissick, sophomore in chemical engineering, took off on a local joy flight in over-cast skies.

The clouds were hovering at about 2,000 feet. At about 1,500 feet, the two could see the lights of Topeka. To the west, they watched a display of lights at Fort Riley. Large orange-yellow flares floated high in the sky, while glowing red tracers darted horizontally along the earth.

Kissick, acting as pilot-in-command, spotted the moon through a hole in the clouds. Bolte circled the plane until they reached the hole. After gaining about 300 more feet in altitude, they broke the surface of the clouds and were cruising over the drifts of gray, isolated from the earth with the full moon shining.

"I was hooked the first time I went up (flying)," Kissick said.

Kissick has been a licensed private airplane pilot since May 1983. He began taking flight lessons in November 1982 from Jouke Van Swaay, senior in mechanical engineering. The entire package, including pilot manuals, charts, plane rental and instructor fees, cost about $1,600, he said.

Since then, Van Swaay has purchased a two-seat Cessna 150 plane, which has lowered the cost of flight lessons to about $1,470. The plane Kissick took lessons in was a Piper Cherokee four-seater.

Bolte is currently working toward his license. He must complete 40 hours of flight time before he can take his written test and flight test.

"Once you solo, you're hooked," Bolte said. "A lot of people quit before then."

Bolte and Kissick have had a variety of experiences since taking flight instruction.

On Jan. 31, they flew to the Lover-boy concert in Salina and talked to members of the band after the concert at the Salina airport. Because they were the only fans who flew to the concert, they were able to visit with the lead singer, Mike Reno, and his girlfriend in person.

"There were people standing at the fence (at the airport) screaming and yelling, wanting autographs," Kissick said. "I can't wait until there's another concert around."

Members of the K-State Flying Club also are interested in flying. The club consists of 45 students and faculty members. Its purpose is to "promote interest in aviation, and to provide airplanes for members at the most economical rates possible," according to the flying club information sheet.

The club owns four airplanes. Only club members are allowed to use the planes.

"We've got airplanes that will allow you to get any license or rating you want," Hugh Irvin, systems programmer at the computer center, said. Irvin is a certified flight instructor and a member of the club. The club has a list of 14 flight instructors whom they have approved.

Irvin said the cost of learning to fly has doubled since 1976 when he got his private pilot's license. Instructor fees have remained the same, but the cost of renting the airplanes has gone from $9 per hour to $24.50 per hour.

"My wife and I take our vacations by flying private rather than flying commercially. We've flown to Seattle; Orlando, Fla. and we're planning to fly to Baltimore in April," he said.

"I also like to go to K-State men's basketball games. Members of the faculty use the aircraft for official University business and get reimbursed by the University," he said.

Irvin flew a man to Denver for a job interview. He said the flight was more economical in terms of both money and time. They were able to fly direct with no layovers, and they didn't have to go by an airline schedule.

To maintain a license, pilots must execute a take-off and landing every 90 days.

Every two years they must go up with an instructor for a flight review. In the review they are asked to do slow flight, stalls, steep turns, some instrument work, soft field, short field and crosswind landings and take-offs. It is basically a review of skill, operating practices and regulations, Irvin said.

Van Swaay said a pilot's license would be beneficial to any business person.

"There are very few commercial flights from north to south," Van Swaay said. "You may need to get to Tulsa, Okla., overnight and you can't get a direct flight. Lincoln, Neb., and Omaha, Neb., are the same way. You have to go to Kansas City before flying on."

"If you're going to Garden City, there is only one flight a day, and it is too far to drive in a day's time," he said.

Kissick said he plans to use his pilot's license in his career.

"I could be a traveling engineer going from one plant to another. Or I could be a firm pilot who flies for a company."

Bolte said flying small planes is safer than riding in a car.

"Everybody says, 'Oh, those little planes always crash,'" Bolte said. "Well, you're safer in one of those than you are riding in a car."

Kissick agreed. "There's no reason you should crash, unless a wing falls off, and then there's not much you can do. 'The ones (pilots) that are good just sort of land it and walk away from it.'"

Bolte explained how he's learned how to do forced landings.

"He'll (Van Swaay) just reaches over and pulls the throttle out and says, 'Your engine just quit. What do you do?' The first thing you do is maintain air speed, and the second thing you do is turn the plane into the wind. By then you should have your glide angle and you should be able to see where you're going to land," Bolte said.

Cadets fall in to recognize leader at first formal formation since '75

By KATHLEEN COLE
Collegian Reporter

K-State Army ROTC cadets will honor retiring Sgt. Maj. Robert A. Pinsence Jr., military science instructor, at an awards ceremony and cadet battalion formation at 4 p.m. today in Ahearn Field House.

There are two reasons for the formation. Rick Berckefeldt, senior in electrical engineering and cadet battalion commander, said.

It is intended to recognize Pinsence for 27 years of federal service, which included tours in Europe, Vietnam, the Republic of Korea and the United States. He served four years in his current assignment as senior instructor of military science at K-State.

The event also is intended to serve as part of an effort to establish greater cohesiveness within the battalion, Berckefeldt said.

"We are breaking a lot of new ground here," Berckefeldt said. "Not in recent years have cadets been able to participate in planning and organizing this type of formal ceremony."

The last Army ROTC cadet battalion formation occurred late in April 1975 when cadets assembled for the president's awards ceremony and their annual spring parade.

A formation is referred to as any assembly of military personnel in a prescribed pattern executed as either part of daily routine or for the purpose of honoring a unit or individual.

Discussion of the cadet project has been going on since early last semester, Berckefeldt said. Individual battalion staff members were assigned organization and planning tasks to carry out in preparation for the ceremony.

"My role has been to act as watchdog, keeping the planning sequence on track," he said. "It's a good learning experience and leadership exercise for us. It also helps new cadets gain visibility and establish identity in the program so they know where they fit in. Our goal is to eventually have it (the formation) once a semester, Berckefeldt said.

Berckefeldt joined the ROTC program in 1982 when he transferred from the University of Kansas as a junior. He was recommended for the position of battalion commander with the rank of lieutenant colonel for his senior year. It is the highest rank held by a cadet.

Berckefeldt is expected to lead more than 100 Army ROTC cadets in the formation. An additional part of the program will include the presentation of awards to about 25 cadets who achieved high academic standards last semester.

How to protest the seal hunt

In about a week, when the weather improves, a group of men will descend on a little island off the coast of Newfoundland. They quest for the beautiful furs of the baby harp seals. The furs, pure white and worth a small fortune, are in limited supply. Only the young seals have them, and to get them the men will crush their skulls with clubs.

Each year about this time, human greed makes monsters out of ordinary men — men who look into the big, round eyes enveloped in a mass of white and see nothing but the money they will get for killing them. And men who sit in their corporate chairs and glance at photographs of the death scene, counting the money some people are willing to pay to wear the skin of a dead animal.

But this isn't another make-your-heart-bleed editorial. It's not about the helpless cries of mother seals when their babies are clubbed to death in front of them. It's not about the blood that stains the Newfoundland snow deep red — but God forbid it touch the furs.

Instead, it's about a possible solution to one case of unharnessed human greed exploiting the helpless and innocent. These situations exist all over the world, with human as well as animal victims, but resisting each one as we can will have an effect on the others.

Greenpeace, the "Save the Whales" environmental action group, suggests a course of action for persons who are appalled by the baby seal slaughter. Geographical realities prevent personal physical action. (The "hunt" takes place on an island, with limited access, and only a few boats can get out to it.) Instead, Greenpeace asks people to write letters to these organizations:

Embassy of Canada
Tourism Office
1771 N. St. NW
Washington, D.C. 20036
and
The People of Norway
c/o Aftenposten
Akersgaten 51
Boks 1178/Sentrum
Oslo 1
Norway

Norway is one of the major sponsors of the slaughter, and provides the boats for the hunters. The letters addressed to the Norwegian people are printed in the Aftenposten, a leading newspaper.

Letters to the Canadian embassy should say that, as a person who disagrees with the Canadian government's approval of the slaughter, you will not consider Canada for vacations nor support Canadian industry. The purpose is to "hit them where it hurts," Greenpeace says — their economy.

Last year, more than a million people wrote letters of protest. As more people do so, those responsible for this and similar atrocities may realize such a flagrant display of cruelty and waste will not be tolerated.

Survey reveals student quality

A recent study released by the Higher Education Panel of the American Council on Education indicates learning may be in better shape than previously thought.

In surveys funded by the National Science Foundation and the National Endowment for the Humanities, a majority of college deans said the quality of science, engineering and humanities students has remained stable in recent years.

Deans at nearly 500 colleges and universities were surveyed. Some even said the quality of students has improved over the last five years.

Sixteen percent of the deans noted improvement in the quality of undergraduate humanities students, 26 percent saw improvement of students applying for graduate studies in humanities and 19 percent reported improvement in the quality of those awarded doctorates in humanities.

Twenty-five percent of science and engineering deans said their undergraduate students showed improvement, and 28 percent noted improvement in graduate school applicants.

Deans who felt students lacked improvement in humanities, science and engineering averaged 14 percent of those surveyed. The rest indicated no apparent change in the quality of students.

Does this survey really tell us anything? It certainly indicates that higher education is alive and well, although the statistics may not show any astounding shifts toward improvement. Nevertheless, it reveals that in spite of myriad problems reported in public education, capable students still are instilled with a desire to learn and pursue college degrees.

Reagan's luck may run out soon—

WASHINGTON — At the beginning of the year, Time magazine chose Ronald Reagan and Yuri Andropov as its men of the year. Now, the former has declared his intention to seek another term of office and the latter is dead. Time magazine, it turns out, chose a man and a ghost. It was, though, a symbolic match-up.

The death of Andropov is the firmest of all evidence that for more than a year now, the president has been sparring with a man who virtually was not there. Like some sort of Soviet Wizard of Oz, Andropov existed mostly on the cover of Time, in the statements and communiques from Moscow and from the need to somehow personify the large and baffling Soviet government. We needed a man; we needed a name. We used Andropov.

Andropov's bad luck turns out to be yet another example of Reagan's good luck. The president is not the sort of man you would want to play cards with. Not only has he led an amazingly lucky and fortuitous life, enjoying an almost effortless movie stardom and unusually good health, but his presidency has been one vast winning streak.

Take, for instance, the economy. Whatever credit you might want to give Reagan for reducing inflation, you also have to assign some of it to OPEC. Its virtual collapse as a cartel able to set oil prices — a process over which the president had absolutely no control — helped moderate, indeed reduce, inflation in the United States and throughout the world.

The same could be said for foreign policy. Neglecting for a moment that the bombing of the Marine barracks in Beirut was almost immediately overshadowed by the Grenadian invasion (operation), and concentrating instead on the Soviet Union, it is apparent now that for a long time — almost a year, probably — Moscow has been without a vigorous leader, and one that was attempting to consolidate his power.

RICHARD COHEN
Columnist

This is a year that includes the Lebanon, Central America, the KAL airliner, Grenada and the arms talks — are areas in which the United States went head-to-head either with the Soviet Union or with one of its allies, Syria or Cuba. And all the time, the United States was dealing with an adversary led by a dying man. This, more than anything, explains why the Soviet military uncharacteristically stepped forward to explain the downing of the Korean airliner and why, maybe, the Soviet response to Ronald Reagan's bullying of a foreign policy has consisted of nothing more than a pout and a snub.

Moscow being Moscow, no one in the West can be sure of what will happen next. It would be a rare Soviet regime, though, that does not contain strong elements that have watched the last year's events with chagrin — and can not wait to get even. And it would be a rare Soviet leader or leaders who (when he or they are finally selected) will not try to prove their communist bona fides by responding to President Reagan. America and the Soviet Union are in at least one way much alike: the easy way to show your patriotism and mettle is to play tough with the other country.

Now, though, Reagan's luck, and our own, may have run out. Just as Watergate incapacitated our government, sapping it of energy, so too the lingering illness of Andropov must have had the same effect on the Soviet Union. And just as a period of American vacillation — the Carter years — was followed by the Light Brigade activity of the Reagan years, in the same way we can expect the Soviet Union to make up for the time lost under Andropov.

Konstantin U. Chernenko will now sit down opposite Reagan. This time, the president is playing cards with a man instead of a ghost — and this time the new Soviet leader might be willing to do what Andropov would or could not do: call the president's bluff.

U.S. agency blacklist an outrage—

What do broadcasters Walter Cronkite and David Brinkley have in common with Coretta Scott King, John Kenneth Galbraith, Ralph Nader and Gary Hart?

These six prominent Americans were placed on a blacklist by a government agency — the United States Information Agency.

I thought McCarthyism was dead. Apparently I was wrong.

The Associated Press reported the USIA has compiled a blacklist of 84 people, including those mentioned above, who weren't invited to take part in a USIA-sponsored overseas speaking program.

The USIA's blacklist came to light Feb. 9 during a Senate hearing. Needless to say, some people weren't overjoyed to find out the American government — a "bastion" of democracy (I think Reagan said that once) — is busy making Joe McCarthy's ideas live again.

Some Democrats in Congress charged that the list was compiled to keep liberals from participating in the federally funded program. Mark Everson, assistant director for management, policy and coordination, said for every liberal on the list, there were at least two liberals who took part in the overseas speaking program.

Everson noted there were two conservatives on the list. I noted Ronald Reagan, Bob Dole and other conservative leaders weren't on the list.

He explained some possible reasons why the list was compiled.

"Some may have been rejected for political reasons, but quite clearly others were dropped because they were considered likely to be unavailable, or as journalists were prohibited by their news organization from speaking for the government, or they were thought to be poor speakers or deemed inept in their proposed fields," Everson said.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

Everson said the list was discovered in late January, after an internal investigation of the USIA.

Leslie Lenkowsky, deputy director designate of USIA, said he was conducting an investigation of agency operations for Charles Z. Wick, agency director, when the list was discovered.

The list was compiled by the Office of Program Development and Coordination, Everson said, with no reason given why a person was placed on the list.

"They were using it as a working tool, a resource, so as not to resubmit some of the names (that had been previously stricken)," he said.

A list of potential speakers was compiled weekly, with six high officials holding the right to strike names from the list. Since Reagan has been in office, 15 people have occupied those six positions, he said.

The overseas speaking program sends 500 speakers each year to Europe, Asia, Africa and Latin America. We, the taxpayers, kick in $1.6 million for the program.

I have some questions about the whole mess. My biggest question is why was the list compiled in the first place?

I must be naive. I hold the belief that the best thing about America is one can dare to disagree with the majority, and expect to at least have the right to say or write what one thinks.

Now, if the American government wants to convince other governments that our system of government and freedoms are the best anywhere, why not let those who disagree have their say overseas?

I am bothered that my tax money is being wasted on this program. I get the feeling that there is more to this story than has been told. Why does it cost $1.6 million to fund this program? That averages to $3,200 per speaker. What in the world are we doing paying this much money for this? Surely there is a cheaper way to fund the speakers.

I don't like the idea of six people determining who is good enough to represent my country. There are no written criteria on what constitutes a poor speaker or an unacceptable one for this program. Arbitrary decisions are made with no way for a person to appeal the decision. That's not the American way.

Some of America's most prominent citizens have been placed on this blacklist. Why? I don't want blanket excuses. The people named at the beginning of this column are all capable speakers. Don't snowball us, USIA. Tell us the real reasons. We, the American taxpayers, pay your salaries.

I don't like the precedent this list has set. It is easy to confine the blacklist to overseas speakers, but blacklisting domestic speakers in a similar program is only one step away.

The USIA should abandon the list immediately. Congress should enact legislation forbidding the compiling of such a list in the future. If we are a free people, we must knock down barriers such as this blacklist. Otherwise, we all lose.

Drunk driving law enforcement necessary

Editor,

The issue regarding 18-year-olds and drinking seems to be less their drinking than their combination of drinking and driving. Are people in this age group more likely to drink and drive than older folks? Are they more likely to have accidents if they do drive under the influence?

I suspect that both questions could be argued with appropriate statistics presented by either side. It is clear, however, that young drivers have more accidents in automobiles than older drivers, and it is difficult to believe that consumption of alcohol would have any positive effect on this trend.

As a compromise position, could we say that persons convicted of driving under the influence of any drug would automatically lose their driving privileges? Those between the ages of 18 and 20 would be banned from the road for one year.

The key, of course, is the automatic, no exceptions enforcement of such regulations. To date, the will to enforce them has been lacking. Driving seems to be considered a right, to be withdrawn only after repeated violations, rather than a privilege, to be rescinded if used irresponsibly.

Nudity in dance 'immoral'

Editor,

On Feb. 17 the Pilobolus Dance Theatre performed at K-State. This performance included nude dancing. Upon checking, this company is sponsored by the Kansas Fine Arts Commission and National Foundation of the Arts at the taxpayers' expense.

I object to my tax dollars being spent in this immoral manner. I object to nude dancing being called art. I object to nude dancing being presented at a tax-funded facility.

This performance could not have been done in the town of Manhattan because of laws against nude performances. So our tax-funded facilities that are exempt from the laws opened the door to this nudity. No wonder our national debt is so astronomical! I wonder how many more immoral, totally unnecessary activities my tax dollars are being spent on.

Multiple births create special problems

Club offers support to twins' parents

By CARA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

It is 2:00 a.m.

A bleary-eyed man sits on the edge of his bed. Fatigue holds him motionless. The incessant wail of a child rings in his head. Almost in harmony, the cry of a second child joins the first and prods the man to his feet.

The day of a parent with twins has begun. The itinerary is varied and rigorous, but parents don't have to handle it alone.

An organization in Manhattan, The Tworific Mother of Twins Club, aids parents of twins.

"Our purpose is to assist in medical research and the studies of twins, to exchange information from mothers of multiple births and to help mothers raise twins with individuality while respecting the bonds of twinning," said Jennifer Walters, president and founder of the club and mother of twin boys. Fathers of twins also are encouraged to join and participate in the club's activities.

Club members say they have a need for support while raising their children and for a forum of other parents to answer questions about stages of their children's growth.

"When I had the twins, the club hadn't been started yet. There are always all those questions — how do I feed them, when do I do this, when do I do that? It's always nice to know others are doing the same things you are doing," LuAnn Hoover, mother of a twin boy and girl, said.

The club is involved in every aspect of the parents' progress with the twins. They encourage expectant mothers to come to the group to learn about raising twins early. They also visit new mothers of twins in the hospital.

"We have a booklet we give them on caring for twins. We give them names and telephone numbers of mothers in the group and say, 'When you've had it — call one of us,'" Hoover said.

"Twins take twice as much time, twice as much effort, and twice as much energy," Robert Poresky, associate professor of family and child development, said. "When they go from two adults to four (people in a family), this is one of the biggest problems a couple has to work through."

"They find out that other people have had twins and survived. They can talk about their problems and find out others have them too."

Though discussion is an aid to parents, first-hand experience seems to be the best teacher.

"To say it in one word, my first few months were sleepless. I could describe my state as a zombie," Hoover said.

Sleep is not the only scarce commodity for a couple with twins. Time for themselves is rare. The role of parent during the infancy stage is almost a constant one, Rick Mann, father of twin boys, said.

Worry, questions and struggle are a large part of raising any child. In the case of twins, these are multiplied by two.

The club has clothing and equipment exchanges because the parents of twins need two of everything. They need two cribs and even double strollers, which are very expensive, Walters said.

"Immediately you start thinking of financial aspects, of getting two of everything. When you have one (child) you save things and pass them down. I learned to just do everything twice," Hoover said.

Though the parents said they immediately gear themselves to the digit two when they realize twins are in their future, some said they also struggle with the problem of others trying to create one individual out of the similarities of their two children.

"Many mothers have voiced their concern over raising their twins as individuals and that other people treat them as individuals. Also, often when there are brothers and sisters (of the twins), they are ignored by relatives and strangers. The twins are always noticed first," Hoover said.

In addition to guarding the individuality of the twins and the identities of other siblings, parents must be aware of the direction of their own relationship.

"They (twins) are so much work. When one is asleep, the other one is awake. When one is hungry, the other one is not," Mann said. "The husband-and-wife relationship is always important, but it is particularly important during the first stages when the (infants) need almost 24-hour care."

Though there are many drawbacks involved in the care of twins, most parents said they remember the surprises and joys of "twin-dom" vividly.

"I think one of my highlights was when we were coming home from the hospital. They (the hospital staff) gave me a telephone number to call to get diapers delivered by the case to the door. They said there were 144 in a case," Mann said. "I said, '144 diapers! What am I going to do with all the extra diapers?'"

"Then, when we brought them (the twins) home, my first memory is of constant (diaper) changing. It really did take about 144 diapers a week," he said.

While striving to encourage their twins' individuality, couples also notice and respect the bonds between twins.

"They develop their own language between each other," Mann said. "One could be in one room and say something and the other would understand. It was gibberish to us."

Mann said that one day one twin, Eric, was looking out the window and saw something. He said something in gibberish and Nathan, the other twin who was across the room, understood, went over and climbed up to look out the window.

"My wife said, 'Did you see that?'" I said, 'Yes!' But we didn't know what they'd seen," Mann said.

"At first they didn't have the desire to learn our language because they had each other to communicate with. But now they're doing fine," he said.

The parents understand and recognize the unique differences about twins and now, those who are members of the Tworific Mother of Twins Club are trying to attain official recognition for their twins.

"We (club members) are going to the mayor of Manhattan and the City Commission and try and get a twin week declared in Manhattan," Walters said. "We have recently received a letter from Gov. John Carlin saying that he would declare a state twin week at the end of April. But a specific date has not yet been set."

Sign vandalism costs city more than $14,000 yearly

By JAY BAUMANN
Collegian Reporter

The city of Manhattan spent more than $14,000 in 1983 to replace stolen and vandalized street signs, Earl Carlson, Manhattan traffic superintendent, said.

"Actual thefts of signs is the biggest problem, but vandalism does occur," Carlson said, adding that bending, spray painting and shooting are the common means of destruction to signs.

"Surprisingly, a lot of signs are shot within the city limits," he said. "The majority of theft and vandalism of street signs occurs like a seasonal change. You can tell when school starts and when warm weather begins."

An average of $300 is spent during summer months to replace signs, he said. During school months the average is $1,300 per month.

One problem is that the Manhattan Traffic Department has no legal right to recover stolen signs from private property.

"If we do suspect that someone has stolen a sign, we report it to the police. They have recovered a few," he said.

In 1982, the Riley County Police Department recovered about $3,000 of the $17,500 needed to replace stolen and vandalized signs.

"If someone has a street sign, more than likely it is stolen," Bill Kennedy, assistant county attorney, said. "Possession of a street sign, even if you didn't steal it, is a crime."

The cost to replace signs varies.

"Stop signs vary in prices," Carlson said. "Higher reflective types are about $60, and the cheaper ones may be $30. If we have to replace the post, that will cost another $16. Then there is the location of the sign. We may have to drill through cement and replace all the hardware on the sign. Added on top of these costs is the labor."

A person found guilty of sign theft may be charged with a minimum penalty of a Class A misdemeanor, punishable with a $500 fine and/or a maximum of one year in prison. An $84 court fee is added to this.

If the theft is classified as a Class C felony, the person may face a $500 fine and a minimum of one year in prison. A Class D felony is punishable with a $500 fine and a minimum of two years in prison. A $114 court fee is added to this.

Street signs can be returned to the Manhattan Traffic Control Center at 620 Juliette Ave. or to the RCPD, 600 Colorado Ave., with no questions asked.

Weather delays King Hall sidewalk repair; construction planned to start this semester

The sidewalk in front of King Hall is scheduled to be repaired sometime this semester.

"The work was scheduled to be completed during the Christmas break, but Mother Nature had other plans," Tom Lee, power plant supervisor II for University Facilities, said.

The sidewalk, sometimes called the "pizza sidewalk," has caused concern among some students because of loose and missing stones. The Collegian reported in December that the sidewalk would be repaired over the Christmas break.

"The weather didn't cooperate at all," Lee said. "The snow and frozen ground made the repair impossible then, but the repair job is still scheduled."

The sidewalk will be repaired by replacing the sand used as a bedding for the stones, Lee said. The sand will be a heavier, coarser grade of sand than that used now. This will help to minimize run-off caused by rain.

The sidewalk also will be contained by an edging of 4-inch by 4-inch lumber. This will hold the sand together and keep the stones from working loose, as well as cutting down on run-off, Lee said.

"No real estimate of the cost to repair the sidewalk has been figured, since it is part of maintenance and will be absorbed as part of the operating expenses," Lee said.

He said that no starting date for the work has been set, but once the work is started, it should take only a couple of days to complete.

Elderly doctor performs transplant

HOUSTON — Surgeon Michael DeBakey, who is 75, performed his first heart transplant operation in 14 years Tuesday. DeBakey pronounced the patient, George Serrahn of Daytona Beach, Fla., in stable condition at 6:30 a.m., more than four hours after the operation, said Alicia Spitzberg of the Methodist Hospital. The heart donor was an unidentified 17-year-old youth who died of a head injury following a fall. DeBakey performed 12 heart transplants in 18 months, beginning in August 1968. However, only two of the patients survived for more than four months, one living four years and the second remaining alive for six years before succumbing to chronic heart rejection, Spitzberg said. She said the operation marked the renewal of a transplant program at Methodist Hospital and the Baylor College of Medicine, where DeBakey serves as chancellor. The hospital ceased its transplant program in 1970 after the results did not justify the expenses. But development of an anti-rejection drug, cyclosporin, has made the new program possible, she said.

Take the country out of the boy?

TOKYO — American singer Willie Nelson, beginning his first tour of Japan, said Tuesday he plans to offer "both standard and original jazz," a departure from the country ballads that have made him famous. "This particular tour is going to be a little bit different," Nelson told the Foreign Correspondent's Club of Japan. Nelson, whose eight-day stint will include five concerts in Tokyo, Osaka and Nagoya, said his entourage includes four jazz musicians who worked with him on a soon-to-be released album titled "Angel Eyes." The venture into jazz adds another twist to a career that has taken the 50-year-old singer-songwriter from what he called "the bottom" of personal and artistic frustration to the top of the U.S. musical scene, a host of awards and roles in two films. Asked by a Japanese reporter to describe "the saddest thing that ever happened to you" and "the happiest moment of your life," Nelson replied: "I think the first part of my life I was rather negative about practically everything that I approached, and I drank a lot, and I probably don't remember the saddest or the happiest moments."

Bake-off winner rises to occasion

SAN DIEGO — A Wisconsin homemaker and mother of twins has won the $40,000 grand prize in the 31st Bake-Off contest with a country apple coffee cake created from refrigerated biscuits. Susan Porubcan, of Whitewater, Wis., was awarded top honors Monday in the national contest, sponsored by the Pillsbury Co., which awarded $130,000 in cash prizes. Awards of $15,000 went to winners in four other categories. Ann Mehl of Minneapolis, Minn., placed first in the refrigerated dinner roll category for her Italian crescent crostata; Kato Perlman of Madison, Wis., won in the flour category for her raspberry marzipan tart; Christine Bell of Golden Valley, New Mexico, placed first in the package mix category for her Austrian apple oven pancake, and Eileen Thorston, of Springfield, Minn., won in the microwave category with her quick apple pancake.

Official reopens roadside facilities

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Secretary of Transportation John B. Kemp announced Tuesday he has ordered the reopening of four of five roadside parks in Kansas which had been closed under a cost-saving program revealed last fall. The secretary earlier had agreed to halt the closing of any more of the parks and rest areas awaiting a determination by the Legislature whether it wanted any of them closed. Legislation is pending which would prohibit Kemp from closing any of the parks without getting legislative approval first. Tuesday, Kemp said he was "re-evaluating" the recommendations of an in-house study of the roadside parks he had done last year. The only park which had been closed and will not be reopened is located two miles south of Pittsburg on U.S. 69A.

The other four, each of which had undergone some degree of demolition, will be restored "with the same facilities as had been there when we removed the roadside parks," Kemp said in a letter made public Tuesday to Sen. Robert Talkington, R-Iola, and Rep. Rex Crowell, R-Longton, chairmen of the two transportation committees. Those four are located three miles west of Fort Scott on U.S. 54, five miles west of Batesville on U.S. 54, 1.5 miles east of Moran on U.S. 54 and 10 miles west of Parsons on U.S. 160. The reasons the Pittsburg rest stop is not being reopened, Kemp told the committee chairman, are vandals have caused extensive damage to the toilet facilities and in order to meet public health requirements, a sewage lagoon would have to be built. The total cost would be $100,000, the secretary said, "and this has not been budgeted."

Based on a study his agency did of use of the roadside parks and rest areas, Kemp last November unveiled a plan to close 23 roadside parks, convert 18 into historical marker sites, transfer 69 to the control and upkeep of local units of government and keep just 49 open at their present level of operation.

When word of destruction of the five sites reached legislators early this session, a storm of criticism followed. Crowell's committee introduced bills to stop any of the park closings unless the Legislature gave specific approval, and to provide 50 percent state funding for the upkeep of those taken over by local units of government.

The committee has not acted on the two bills.

"The re-evaluation is in keeping with discussions between Secretary Kemp and the chairmen of the Kansas House and Senate Transportation Committees," KDOT said in a statement released Tuesday.

United States lacks chemical warfare facts

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The United States said Tuesday it had no solid evidence that the Soviets used chemical weapons in Afghanistan in the past year, and that toxic chemicals killed fewer people in Cambodia and Laos than in 1982. The State Department report contrasted sharply with previous U.S. assertions that more than 10,000 people have been killed by chemical weapons in Afghanistan, Laos and Cambodia, where rebel forces are opposing communist governments.

The report, which gave no reason for the apparent decline, was the latest in a series submitted to the United Nations in support of U.S. allegations of use of Soviet chemical weapons in foreign conflicts. A U.N.-sponsored investigation two years ago found that the evidence was inconclusive. Rep. Jim Leach, R-Iowa, a leader in congressional efforts to focus attention on the problem, said, "I don't think there's any doubt that this slowdown has come about because of a Soviet concern for world public opinion. This appears to demonstrate some sensitivity on the part of the Soviets."

Meanwhile, the Soviet Union made what it termed a "concession" in talks at Geneva, Switzerland, that are intended to draft a proposed treaty banning chemical weapons. The Soviets said they were ready "in principle" to accept international inspection of plants where gas weapons are destroyed.

The United States plans to give its official response Thursday to the Soviet move at the 40-nation Conference on Disarmament.

Workshop highlights nutriment

The Kansas Nutrition Council, the state affiliate of the Society for Nutrition Education, will hold its third annual conference from 8:30 a.m. to 3:15 p.m. Thursday in the Manhattan Holidome.

The conference, titled "Nutrition and Wellness," will feature four workshops and a luncheon with the president-elect of the Society for Nutrition Education, Kathryn Kolasa, as the featured speaker. Kolasa, associate professor of food, nutrition and institution management at East Carolina University, Greenville, N.C., will address "The Nutrition Maze: Finding the Way."

Speakers for the morning and afternoon workshops include three K-State faculty members: Robert Reeves, associate professor of foods and nutrition, Katharine Grunewald, assistant professor of foods and nutrition and David Schafer, extension specialist of animal sciences and industry.

Kolasa also will be a guest speaker for the Department of Foods and Nutrition on Friday.

Proposed education aid cuts split lobbyists

By The College Press Service

WASHINGTON — The Action Committee for Higher Education is supposed to coordinate public efforts to fight for education budgets in Congress, but college lobbyists aren't planning anything special to fight the latest round of proposed student aid cuts.

Dallas Martin and Nancy Raley, both representatives of the national association of aid counselors, said that indeed, college lobbyists in general seem to have greeted the most recent aid proposals — released in President Reagan's Feb. 1 budget message — with a low-keyed, laid-back response that contrasts vividly with the calls to action and mobilization efforts of the last two years.

The crisis calls are no longer necessary, they said, because they're confident Congress won't diminish education funding during an election year.

A few Washington observers, however, say they worry the lobbyists have a "false sense of security." The last time they displayed such confidence — in 1981 — Congress cut the federal education budget by a hefty 12 percent.

In 1982 and 1983, the lobbyists beat back more dramatic budget cuts by sending a constant stream of alarmed press releases out of Washington and flying a constant stream of mobilized, well-briefed college presidents into Washington to tell Congress how more cuts would affect their campuses.

"This year, it's possible that if there's a reason, we'll have a new conference later in the budget process," Raley said.

"Our strategy is to lobby our constituencies to work to oppose the cuts by telling their representatives in Congress what the budget will do to their programs," said Charles Saunders, governmental affairs director for the American Council on Education and a leading force in organizing opposition to the Reagan college budgets of the past.

Peter Rogoff, of the Coalition of Independent College and University Students (COPUS), said most college groups in Washington will work together to make unified counter-proposals to Congress this time.

The Action Committee for Higher Education, organized in late 1981 just after Congress made its first big aid cuts, "still has a hotline and we still meet weekly," Raley said.

The plans are less aggressive than in the past, she said. "Maybe it's because the cuts proposed, at least on the face of it, aren't as drastic."

But Kathy Ozer of the United States Student Association, said, "we can be assured of real cuts if we don't wage a major battle."

Ozer is one of the few college lobbyists urging an activist response to the proposals.

She said the proposals are in fact drastic, and if approved, could eliminate 1.3 million student grants and loans for the 1984-85 academic year and beyond.

"If we talk about keeping up with federal student aid service at 1980 levels, it would cost $23 billion," Ozer said.

The Reagan administration's proposed $15.5 billion budget for the 1985 fiscal year, however, is almost 50 percent less than what it would take to restore aid programs to 1980 levels.

The 1984 fiscal year (from Oct. 1, 1984 to Sept. 30, 1985) education budget totalled $15.4 billion.

Ozer said just to keep aid programs functioning at 1983-84 levels — which are now eroded by inflation and high interest rates — Congress would have to appropriate $17 billion.

Reagan also has proposed to make it harder for middle-class students to get Pell Grants and to eliminate the National Direct Student Loan, State Student Incentive Grant and Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant programs.

To battle the proposals, USSA and COPUS hope to attract 7,000 students to its National Student Action Lobby Day on March 26 in Washington.

The groups will bus students to Washington, then shepherd them to Capitol Hill to pressure legislators into resisting the cuts, Rogoff said.

But Dallas Martin, one of the most effective campus lobbyists in Washington, said he is already quietly optimistic.

"Congress will react favorably. Maybe we will see some slight increases in programs," he said.

"There will be a chance of selective increases," Saunders said, "but not across-the-board increases."

They said they don't think it's likely Congress will abolish the three aid programs. Yet they said they didn't think there was much chance of Congress cutting aid in 1981, Bob Aaron said.

Aaron, now a University of Houston administrator, was with the ACE in 1981.

"Lobbyists then felt, 'He's a new president, and we've got problems with the economy, and we don't want to appear unpatriotic by not taking our share of cuts,'" Aaron said. "I frankly don't think we took it very hard."

Three weeks after Congress passed the November 1981 cuts, the Reagan administration announced it would next seek to slash federal college funding by another 50 percent.

At that point, lobbyists reorganized to mobilize the nation's colleges for an all-out budget fight, Raley said.

They successfully fought back most of the cuts, although a recent College Board analysis suggests federal student aid programs have been cut a total of 21 percent since 1980.

Aaron said he attributes their less urgent response this year not only to the less fearsome numbers and congressional attitudes, but to an "Ivory Tower" unease with lobbying.

Educators, he said, are uncomfortable working in Congress.

"When their feet aren't to the fire and the consequences (of the budget) aren't that sharp," he said, "their tendency is to back away a little."

"I think many educators think of lobbying as somewhat tawdry," he said. "And maybe it is. But that's the way it works."

"We don't like to use the word 'lobby,'" Raley said. "But the mechanisms are now in place. We're ready to gear up to a high level of activity if we have to."

ENERGY-EFFICIENT HOUSING

A two-day conference providing practical information on design, construction, remodeling, and marketing

February 28 and 29
K-State Union

As home buyers evaluate more carefully the long-term costs of owning a home, energy will increasingly affect decisions about housing design, construction, orientation, financing, and many other issues.

A two-day conference sponsored by the Kansas Energy Extension Service (KEES) at Kansas State University will examine the latest energy-saving innovations in housing design, construction, and remodeling.

Many innovative building practices have evolved in response to demand for more energy-efficient dwellings, including passive solar, superinsulation, and earth-sheltering.

The Energy-Efficient Housing Conference will explore these areas along with heating and cooling technology, solar heating, weatherization, marketing, and financing.

The Energy-Efficient Housing Conference will draw on the wide-ranging expertise of Kansas builders, designers, architects, engineers, equipment suppliers, real estate agents, lenders, and other housing industry officials.

The conference will look at trends in the housing industry and specific issues involved in building energy-efficient homes, such as air quality and tightness.

Registration fee for students is $30.

For more information about the conference, call 532-5575.

All KEES materials and programs are available without discrimination on the basis of race, religion, national origin, sex, handicap, or age. Anyone who feels that he or she has been discriminated against should send a complaint within 180 days to the Department of Energy, Office of Equal Opportunities, Washington, D.C. 20585. This material is made available through federal Department of Energy grant funds under P.L. 94-163 and is distributed by the KSU Cooperative Extension Service.

American Institute of Baking

A Baker's Way

By LINDA MORRELL
Collegian Reporter

The American Institute of Baking, located on Manhattan Avenue northeast of the K-State campus, is the only one of its kind in the world. Through its courses and expanding facilities, it is helping educate bakers and improve the industry.

The concept of the institute originated in 1919 when leaders in the baking industry realized the need for a research and education school for advancement of the business. John Cannon, communications coordinator for the school, said.

However, lack of financial support delayed the opening of the school.

The institute's first class met with nine members in 1922 in Chicago. The institute grew quickly and in 1960 moved to a new building in Chicago. A need for further expansion became obvious, and in 1977 AIB moved to Manhattan, he said.

AIB works with the University's Department of Grain Science to perform research.

Research departments at AIB include cereal science, cereal technology, experimental baking, technical assistance, biscuit products and nutrition, health and safety, Cannon said.

Currently, students at AIB are involved in several areas of research.

One area of study is frozen dough, Cannon said. Shelf life, quality and freeze rates are among major factors examined.

Another research area is liquid pre-fermentation systems, in which a mixture of liquid and yeast is used for rising processes.

Body acceptance of various nutrients is another study area, Cannon said. Research involves dietary and nutritional aspects of cereal grains.

The institute also is involved with dairy-related research contracts in the area of non-fat dry milk. The U.S. government is interested in the use of dry milk in breads that would be made in public facilities, such as schools, Cannon said.

Some funding and equipment for AIB is furnished through outside sources, he said.

Much of the equipment used for research and classes is donated to the institute by companies in the baking industry. Research grants and proposals provide some income for AIB, as do baking industry members' dues.

"We basically generate income through courses," Cannon said.

Courses at AIB include baking science and technology, bakery maintenance engineering, a certified baker program, correspondence courses and other seminars conducted throughout the year.

The baking science and technology course is an intense 19-week class, Cannon said. Students attend school eight hours daily to learn about supervisory and management positions. The class is offered twice a year from February to May and from August to December.

A December graduate of this course, Blake Johnston, is now a laboratory assistant in breads and rolls at AIB. He is interested in a sales position with a baking company, and took the course to get a "good background," he said.

The course covered about everything he needed to know for a sales position, Johnston said.

The bakery maintenance engineering training program is an 18-week course on the maintenance of bakery equipment. Electronics is a large part of this course, Cannon said.

A series of core requirement courses are the basis for the certified baker program. The student then branches into either the bread-cake option or the cookie option, he said.

The correspondence course is one of the core requirement areas. The program consists of 50-lesson courses on bakery, food science and sanitation.

Several seminars are presented throughout the year in Manhattan and other locations across the United States. These seminars cover various aspects of the baking industry, Cannon said. A staff possessing a combined formal education and industry training background instruct the courses and seminars.

Students attending the classes are generally sponsored by baking companies. The companies send their "promising" workers to gain management experience, Cannon said.

Tuition and fees for the courses and seminars vary, with some scholarships available.

The institute's nutrition education and communications departments provide publications and training materials for people in educational and industry positions in the United States and other countries.

Although AIB is currently the only institute of its kind, Mexico is in the process of establishing a baking school, and AIB is providing its floor plan and curriculum, Cannon said.

AIB also is working with the U.S. Wheat Commission in China, he said. A representative has visited China seven times for the project.

"More and more students from foreign countries are coming to AIB," Cannon said. Many of these are from Nigeria, he said.

Increased opportunities in the baking industry have led to the expansion of the institute.

Because the total number of students and the amount of baking equipment available are increasing, AIB recently increased its building area by 11,000 square feet.

"The American Institute of Baking has seen positive growth in the past five years. Ninety-five percent of the expansion is finished," Cannon said. The expansion is set to be completed by March.

Included in the expanded portion is a cracker and cookie production area, a space for in-store bakery instruction, a classroom and offices. Future changes for AIB include building apartments for students and adding to the educational staff, he said.

Wheat strain poses problems

By KARLA PORTER
Staff Writer

The Kansas Agricultural Experiment Station, a department of the College of Agriculture, is putting a lot of effort into a research program which may prevent its wheat variety from being wrongly classified by the Federal Grain Inspection Service.

At a press conference Tuesday, K-State President Duane Acker commended K-State's agricultural experiment stations and others for their work in agricultural research, in particular their efforts to develop tools for more accurate wheat classification.

The issue is of particular interest to K-State researchers. The local experiment station, one of six across the state, has released a variety of wheat called Arkan, which has the external characteristics of a soft wheat but the internal characteristics of a hard red winter wheat.

The problem, from the experiment station's point of view, is that the FGIS may consider only the visual characteristics of the kernels, which would probably put it into the soft wheat category, said Kurt Feltner, associate dean of the College of Agriculture and director of the local agricultural experiment station.

"It (Arkan) has (visual) characteristics that favor one of its parents," he said. "That parent is Arthur, which is a soft wheat. The other parent is Sage, which is a hard wheat. It's not exactly like either one."

Internally, however, Arkan is a "perfectly good variety" of a hard red winter wheat, Feltner said.

"It has excellent protein, winter hardness and yield. It has all those things that we want economically, as well as the milling and baking characteristics," he said.

If FGIS classifies Arkan as a soft wheat, the variety would be routed toward inappropriate uses.

"If a hard red winter wheat with good milling and baking characteristics is wrongly classified as a soft wheat, it goes to a wrong end-use. People will try to make crackers or macaroni out of it, and it's no good for that," Feltner said.

The experiment station first became aware that FGIS might classify Arkan as a soft wheat when it heard of FGIS' concerns from another source, he said. Representatives of the experiment station and FGIS have met to discuss the matter.

"They (FGIS) agreed to try to adapt new technologies so they could incorporate objective tests into their classification system," Feltner said.

While FGIS agreed to look into existing classification methods, the experiment station is busy trying to develop new physical and chemical classification tests. The administrative staff of the experiment station has reallocated $80,000 from other programs to boost the research program.

Feltner said the money is "year-end dollars," money budgeted for programs, but because of professor turnover and project terminations, the money wasn't used for its original purpose.

In addition, the program is receiving money from the Kansas Wheat Commission and other state and federal experimental stations, he said.

Others are interested in the research because the Arkan classification problem is "just the tip of the iceberg," Feltner said.

"Inter-crosses like the one between Sage and Arthur that created Arkan are becoming more common.

And the use of hybrids, which is a different process than the developed one for varieties, will cause a larger departure from what the standard kernel characteristics look like today," he said.

A more objective classification system would allow FGIS to classify kernels according to their internal properties and would eliminate the problem of kernels that don't fit into traditional visual categories, he said.

There is no definite time limit or expectation for the research program, but Feltner said he does expect some major developments to arrive in the 1990s.

"Investment in research is always a risky item. We could divert even more of the agricultural experiment station resources into that problem and not be able to guarantee anyone the answer would come any more quickly," he said.

At the conference, Acker commended the goals of the experiment station because accurate classification is an important factor in reporting the grain markets.

"There does need to be a lot of research done on quantifying or quantitative systems of appraising the grains for classification purposes," Acker said. "The classification, of course, being necessary to categorize the products so that people can refer to the markets, know what they're bidding on, what they're buying and report the markets."

FGIS will classify Arkan before the variety enters the grain market. By a year from this summer and possibly earlier, large quantities of Arkan will be in the market. Whether it will be called a soft wheat or a hard red wheat remains to be seen, Feltner said.

Researchers develop dust pellets

By MARK DAVIDSON
Contributing Writer

K-State's Feed Technology Research Unit, the only one in the United States, has developed a method of using grain dust as an economical benefit for farmers.

Owners of grain elevators across the nation are facing the problem of what to do with grain dust created during handling and storage of grain and how to prevent air pollution which causes unsafe working conditions.

Elevators collect dust and dispose of it in several ways, ranging from dumping it in landfills to selling it for livestock feeds, including those for cattle, horses, swine and sheep.

Aspirated grain fractions, commonly known as grain dust pellets, are one of the newest technological advancements in feed ingredients research. The feed has been perfected during the past year by Keith Behnke, associate professor of grain science and industry.

The pellets are made like other feed pellets currently on the market. The grain dust is collected from storage areas, combined with other feed ingredients and passed through a press. Once the marketability of the pellets is proven, it will be possible to produce them in mass quantities rather than only in laboratories.

"Grain dust is not dirt, but is actually fine grain particles," Robert Schoeff, professor of grain science and industry, said.

When 25 to 30 percent grain dust pellets are used in a feed ration, there should be no noticeable adverse effects on the animal's performance (average daily gain) as long as it is mixed with a complete ration, Behnke said.

As for the nutritional value of the pellets, "the dust's composition (size of grain particles) will vary according to the kind of grain handled," Schoeff said. The larger the size of the particles, the more nutritious is the feed.

Besides being economically priced at $50 to $60 per ton, the grain dust would supply about 9 percent protein, he said.

"One drawback from the nutritional value is that the energy content (the pellets provide) is lower and the ash (dust) content is increased," Behnke said.

In his research report, "Nutritional Utilization of Grain Dust by Monogastrics," Behnke stated, "results indicate that no significant differences were found in the average daily gain or in feed conversion between any of the diets, (0, 25 and 50 percent grain dust replacement levels)."

The report also stated that pelleted and crumbled grain dust is a feasible and acceptable feed ingredient, he said.

"The digestibility of protein, energy, crude fiber and dry matter were all significantly reduced as the level of grain dust in the diet was increased. However, the animals were able to compensate by increasing intake," the report stated.

Grain dust should not be used unless first pelleted because of the danger of grain dust explosion during the handling process, Behnke said.

Free legal counsel proposed

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin recently announced he will ask the 1984 Kansas Legislature to fund a program to provide free legal services to needy farmers who are seeking federal financial aid.

"The economic problems facing farmers have reached such magnitude that the state must assist those who cannot afford legal representation," Carlin said in a prepared statement.

Attorney General Robert Stephan proposed the program and Carlin agreed to amend his spending recommendations made last month to lawmakers, incorporating the $135,000 legal aid program in his budget for the next fiscal year, which begins in July.

Under the proposal, legal help would be provided to farmers through the 10 statewide offices of Kansas Legal Services, a non-profit organization which provides legal aid to the needy.

New technology allows U.S. to lower nuclear fuel prices

By The Associated Press

OAK RIDGE, Tenn. — After nearly a decade of declining influence in the world uranium enrichment market, the United States is going all-out to woo back customers lured away by cheaper foreign prices.

An increase in the nation's share of the market for enriched uranium, which is used as fuel for nuclear power plants, would help the U.S. economy and slow the proliferation of nuclear weapons, Department of Energy officials say.

Like any merchant trying to improve business, the United States is trying to cut its prices. The key to that is technology, now in research and construction stages.

Mined uranium is "enriched" by increasing its content of material that can undergo nuclear fission. Then it is made into nuclear reactor fuel and sold, primarily to utility companies with nuclear power plants.

The conventional way of enriching uranium is through a process called gaseous diffusion, but the Department of Energy says new technology using lasers and a gas centrifuge will cut prices to less than half their present level by the mid-1990s.

In addition to slashing prices, the United States is offering new contracts that say foreign customers no longer have to agree to buy all their enriched uranium from the Department of Energy. U.S. officials hope the lower prices and the new contract will allow the United States to beat its competition.

The Energy Department, which collected $2 billion last year by running the country's only uranium enrichment plants, has a firm hold on 99 percent of the U.S. uranium enrichment market, said Ewin Kiser, DOE's assistant manager for enrichment.

But DOE's foreign customers, who 10 years ago got virtually all of their enriched uranium from the United States, now rely on European suppliers for nearly 70 percent.

Besides losing the foreign market, DOE is enriching less uranium because the nuclear power industry has not grown as rapidly as was predicted in the 1970s.

DOE's gaseous diffusion plants in Oak Ridge, Portsmouth, Ohio, and Paducah, Ky., are operating at roughly 45 percent capacity, said John Longenecker, deputy assistant energy secretary for enrichment.

New business would help create jobs in this country. But more importantly, it would slow the spread of nuclear technology, Longenecker said.

"If we can offer a reliable supply of enriched uranium to foreign countries, they will be less likely to build their own enrichment plants and then transfer their knowledge to building nuclear weapons," he said. Enriched uranium can be used to make bombs.

Energy Department officials said the new ideas went over well at a two-day conference earlier this month in Oak Ridge.

Some 250 representatives from U.S. and foreign utilities, fuel fabricating companies and consulting firms toured the 1,700-acre Oak Ridge plant and got to peek at experiments in two new uranium enrichment technologies.

Some customers seemed more interested for now about the new contract than the new technology. DOE is allowing customers to convert their old, long-term contracts to the new terms.

Haaken Wingren, a representative for a nuclear fuel company in southern Sweden, said most of his country's 12 nuclear power plants are DOE customers, and his company would most likely switch to the new contract.

A representative from ENUSA, which buys enriched uranium for the Spanish government, said foreign buyers may be drawn to the new contract because "some countries are hesitant to be linked to just one country as a supplier." The official spoke only on condition that he not be named.

That new provision, which says DOE customers may get 30 percent of their enriched uranium from sources other than the department, could also result in the loss of some domestic business for DOE.

DOE's two European competitors are closely watching the situation. More than a dozen representatives from Cogema Inc. and URENCO Ltd. attended the conference, during which one of the companies held its own meeting with DOE customers.

Cogema holds the controlling interest in a French gaseous diffusion plant that provides enriched uranium to France, Italy, Spain and Belgium, which form the consortium, EURODIFF.

Nearly 70 utility executives listened to Cogema's sales pitch, which included guaranteed lower prices and more flexible terms than even the new DOE contract, the Cogema official said.

Students learn to play market with make-believe investments

By KIMBERLY STOLLE
Collegian Reporter

Contestants from across the state will attempt to turn $100,000 and information about the stock market into big profits during the next 10 weeks by playing the K-State Stock Market Game.

The game, which is sponsored by the Center for Economic Education, began Feb. 17 by allotting each team an imaginary $100,000. During the next couple of months, the teams will use their funds to "invest" as they see fit and try to maximize their profits.

Bette Zikmund, associate director of the center, said the game has been played here for the past six years, and although originally geared toward high school and junior high school students, it has recently become popular with elementary children and college students as well.

"The purpose of the game is for students to become aware of different economic concepts that affect our economy and that may affect them directly," she said.

"I think a lot of people view governmental decisions, regulations, the amount of the deficit and things like that as not really affecting them directly. Inflation affects everybody directly, but only because you have to pay more at the store. But the problem of inflation is that people don't feel like that's something they can do anything about or really have an understanding of," Zikmund said.

The stock market game shows the contestants how even political events have a drastic effect on the Dow Jones market, she said.

During this 10-week session of the contest, which ends April 26, 407 teams are participating in the contest. A team may consist of a single individual, a small group or even an entire class, Zikmund said.

Kansas is divided into five geographical regions. Contestants compete on the regional level to qualify for statewide competition. There are about 19 other locations where the stock market game is offered, she said.

Each team has an adviser who receives a players' manual. The Wall Street Journal code list of stocks and a general information packet.

Teams send in two to three transactions a week to the Center for Economic Education to be run through the computer in Cardwell Hall. Printouts are returned to each team to indicate all transactions and to keep a current balance, Zikmund said.

The stock market game adds a new dimension to learning and often intrigues those students who generally lack enthusiasm for school, Zikmund said.

"Sometimes there are students who are just not interested in learning the basic content of the class. I think a lot of them see it (the game) as being a challenge, a more personal thing where they are directly involved."

Winners of the regional and state competition will receive recognition at a banquet in their honor in the Union on May 12. Trophies and plaques will be awarded to the top three teams with the largest balance.

"Feedback has been really good. Because of the positive experience (of the game) at K-State, many high school students go on to attend college here," Zikmund said.

Principal-Counselor-Student Conference

The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of the high schools listed below to attend the 1984 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with their former students about the student's preparation for and experiences in KSU academic programs, the student's feelings as to how the high school curriculum could be improved, and the student's concerns about their adjustment from high school to university life.

Your participation will help the University build a stronger relationship with your former high school, while gaining valuable information about making your KSU experience a more meaningful one for you. It is also an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates.

Students attending are welcome to drop by the location below anytime between 10:15 a.m. and 12:15 p.m. on February 22. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

Hickey uses recruiting to help build program

By DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian Reporter

Baseball at K-State has changed quite a bit in the past 15 years. During the late 1960s and early 1970s, Wildcat baseball squads were Big Eight Conference pace-setters, becoming one of the first Midwest teams to travel to both Hawaii and California for weeks at a time.

The 1972 team was ranked 14th in the nation in pre-season polls, and the teams which followed from 1973-76 were all good clubs. But in 1977, recruiting became an important factor in retaining dominance in the conference, and the once-mighty K-State was dominant no more.

Besides the obvious recruiting problems, what went wrong? What happened to the spark that was present in those glory days of K-State baseball? When in the process of hiring its new baseball coach in early 1983, K-State's search committee decided to find out.

When the committee hired Bill Hickey, it brought a bit of the past back to attempt to revive the struggling program.

Hickey said he would like nothing more than to bring back "those glory days of yesteryear," but the job he faces is not an easy one. It all begins with recruiting.

"During the last few years, recruiting has really fallen off," Hickey said. "The coaches relied mainly on bringing in junior college players. I'm not against bringing in junior college players, but the total program can't survive on bringing in juco kids alone."

"You've got to have a foundation, and the foundation has to be the freshmen kids who you bring into any college situation, whether it be football, basketball or baseball," he said.

As a result of previous recruiting practices, Hickey is strapped by having only two sophomores on the squad. The team is junior and senior laden as a direct result of the number of junior college players who came to K-State while Dave Baker was the head coach.

After taking the job in 1983, Hickey hit the recruiting trail, and as a result, has several freshman players on the squad. He said he hopes to continue to build the program in this way.

"Our philosophy right now is to do an extremely good job in recruiting the high school senior, and I think we've done reasonably well in this area," he said. "We are working hard in our five-state area, and we're looking at top quality kids. We're not looking at the marginal player."

Included in the "top quality kids" that Hickey said he and his staff are looking at are "two of the top pitchers in the St. Louis area, about four players in the state of Kansas and a few kids from Indiana."

Recruiting over the five-state area that Hickey and his staff cover demands putting in quite a few hours.

"(Assistant) Coach Henderson and myself are spending almost 10 to 12 hours a day with the program," Hickey said. "A lot of that time is in the evening, when we're on the telephone with players within the region setting up visits."

"We know right now that we are at a disadvantage. We can't sell a young man from St. Louis a program that went to the College World Series last year, a program that won the Big Eight Conference last year. The No. 1 one thing we are selling is Kansas State University as an educational facility. Very close to that, and parallel to it, we're selling ourselves."

A big factor in the selling of the K-State program is the Brandberry Indoor Complex, K-State's indoor training facility that opened a little more than a year ago. Hickey speaks highly of the complex.

"Our facility is as good as Missouri's. It's better than KU's. It's better than Iowa State's. No other school in the conference has a facility like it."

"Oklahoma State may be the No. 2 team in the nation, but they sure don't have a place to practice when there's two inches of snow on the ground," he said. "Oklahoma works out underneath their east stadium in what they call 'ammonia downs,' and they only have one batting cage and have to use butane heaters."

Another thing that Hickey said he has been able to offer recruits is the chance to step into the program and play quickly.

"Most kids that have been excellent players in high school don't want to go to college and sit on the bench. That's what we're selling these young pitchers from St. Louis and Indiana. We're offering the kids a chance to come in right now and giving them an opportunity to pitch in the Big Eight Conference."

"And they don't have to take a back seat to five or six seniors or four or five juniors," Hickey said. "Right now we don't have the numbers because of lack of recruiting over the past few years."

Hickey said what encourages him the most is the desire of many high school players to give K-State a look.

"They (recruits) are eager. They want to come and see us. They want to come talk to us," he said. "Our support group, which is our athletic department and our community here at K-State, does an excellent job with our recruits. It's not a high pressure thing, and it's a situation where people will greet them (recruits) even if they don't know who they are."

"They (officials) try to make the recruit feel at home, and I think that's the most important thing when a recruit comes in," Hickey said. "When a recruit makes his final decision, he is going to go to the school that he feels most comfortable with—a place where he's going to get a chance to play, and a place with coaches he feels the most comfortable with. So, we're really working hard to sell ourselves to those kids who are coming in."

Hickey said he feels that public relations, or in his case player-coach relations, with those around the state are a key in rebuilding the program.

"We are trying to build contacts with every Babe Ruth coach and every American League coach in the state, and we're trying to set up some weekend clinics to get my coaching staff out among the people in the state of Kansas."

"We've also greatly increased our mailing list," he said. "We are attempting to explain the changes in the program and what we are trying to do at K-State."

Although he has high hopes for the future, Hickey said he is looking forward to the challenge this year.

"What I'm talking about is being competitive in every ballgame, being able to go into the conference and play everyone down to the wire—not giving up, not ever laying down, just maintaining a constant effort to succeed," Hickey said.

Cage teams on road to ISU

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

Tonight will be a doubleheader for K-State basketball teams, as both the men's and women's squads face the Iowa State University Cyclones in road action at Ames.

The Wildcats, now 12-11 overall and 4-6 in Big Eight Conference play, are coming off a 72-56 win over the Oklahoma State University Cowboys on Saturday. The 'Cats now share third place in the conference with five other schools: the University of Colorado, Iowa State University, the University of Missouri, the University of Nebraska and Oklahoma State University. Oklahoma, which leads the league race with a 9-1 record, squares off against the University of Kansas tonight, which is second in the conference with a 7-3 mark.

Iowa State is currently 19-9 overall following a 69-48 victory over Nebraska on Saturday. The Cyclones have lost only two of 12 contests this season when playing at home in Hilton Coliseum, where its average crowd of 12,512 tops Big Eight attendance charts.

K-State will be led by three starters scoring in double figures, including junior Tom Alfaro, who is coming off a 19-point performance in the 'Cats' win over the Cowboys. Eddie Elder, the Wildcat 6-foot-9 center, heads the K-State scoring with a 14.1 point average, followed by Alfaro with 11 and sophomore Ben Mitchell with 10.5.

The men's 7:35 p.m. contest immediately follows the women's contest at 5:15 p.m.

The Lady 'Cats, now 18-5 overall and second in the Big Eight with an 8-2 mark, will encounter a cellar-dwelling Cyclone squad which stands 4-19 overall and 0-10 in the Big Eight.

Tonya Burns leads the Cyclone attack, standing ninth in the conference with a 15.2 scoring average and placing third in rebounding with 8.2 caroms per contest.

The Lady 'Cats took a 73-58 home win over the Cyclones Jan. 31 and will look to close the gap between themselves and the Missouri Lady Tigers, who lead the league with a 9-1 record.

Iranians threaten vital waterway use

By The Associated Press

As Iranian forces surged across the border into Iraq at three places, pushing to within 10 miles of Iraq's main north-south highway, concerns about the Iranian threat to close the Strait of Hormuz were heightened. The strait is the vital waterway used by tankers carrying 40 percent of the non-communist world's oil supply.

Early Thursday, Iraq broke into scheduled television programming to announce that a major Iranian offensive was under way.

Iraq had said a few hours earlier that its forces had "totally wiped out" what a ranking government source termed a "limited" two-pronged Iranian attack on the south-central sector of the border region. It called this drive an "attempt to divert our attention from the massive offensive they are planning."

Then, shortly after midnight Wednesday, state Iraqi television interrupted its programs with a war communique saying the wide-scale Iranian offensive "as expected, started against our defenses in the east of Basra region."

It said soldiers of the Iraqi army's Third Corps, deployed in the southern region of the frontline, are "confronting the offensive and reaping the rotten heads" of the attackers, the communique said.

The location around Basra is the southern sector of Iraq's 733-mile frontline with Iran.

The reported Iranian offensive started at 10 p.m. Wednesday, according to the communique released by the general command of the Iraqi armed forces.

Protection of the strait was discussed in Britain's House of Commons and Pentagon sources in Washington denied reports U.S. ships were moving to the Persian Gulf. Iran has warned it will block the strait, at the gulf's mouth, if foreign powers get involved in the war.

The Iranian offensive appeared designed to cut off the southern provincial capital of Basra by gaining control of part of Iraq's strategic north-south highway, connecting Baghdad with Basra and running parallel to Iraq's eastern border.

The conflicting claims cannot be independently confirmed as neither country allows foreign correspondents to visit the battlefronts.

When the attack began Tuesday night, Iraqi state radio and TV stations interrupted broadcasts with a message from President Saddam Hussein urging his soldiers to fight hard against the invaders.

An Iraqi war communique Wednesday said Iraq had "totally crushed" the Iranians, and state-run Iraqi TV showed film of what it called "enemy prisoners captured during the latest abortive attack."

Troops more 'defensible,' Reagan says

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan Wednesday night defended his decision to withdraw Marines from Beirut, saying, "We are not bugging out, we are just going into a little more defensible position."

"I don't think you can say we have lost as yet," he said at his first formal news conference of 1984.

In a long answer to a question whether the United States had lost credibility during the recent turmoil in Lebanon, Reagan referred to the Marine withdrawal as "redeploying" and said American forces couldn't just "stay there as a target, hunkering down."

"But as long as there's a chance for a peaceful solution...we're not bugging out, we're just going into a little more defensible position."

House passes mandate for statewide reappraisal

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Saying lawmakers can no longer ignore their constitutional obligations, House Speaker Mike Hayden praised the 64 members of the Kansas House who voted Wednesday to mandate a statewide reappraisal of real estate in Kansas by 1988.

In a narrow 64-51 vote, the House returned to the Senate the reappraisal bill, ignoring Gov. John Carlin's threat to veto any reappraisal bill sent to his desk unaccompanied by a proposed constitutional amendment to allow classification of property for tax purposes.

"It took 21 years to get reappraisal through the House, that's how long it's been, so I knew it wouldn't be easy," Hayden said. "Enough people knew what was morally right. They knew they had to uphold the constitution as they swore to when they took the oath of office. The appraisal situation is so aggravated and disequilibrium they knew they had to do something. I'm very happy."

The vote was as close as leaders of both political parties had predicted, and it was Republicans, holders of a 19-vote majority in the House, who succeeded in sending the bill back to the Senate where House amendments will be considered. The bill needed 63 votes to clear the 125-member House and just five Democrats joined 59 Republicans in approving the measure.

The Senate passed the bill in the 1963 session and the House carried it over to this year. If the Senate agrees to the House changes, the bill will go to Carlin.

The Democratic governor is opposed to reappraisal without classification of property. He is trying to force the Legislature to approve a proposal to amend the Kansas Constitution to allow for the classification of property so different types can be taxed at different rates.

The governor insists such an amendment is required to avert massive tax shifts from commercial and personal property to residential and agricultural property. Republican leaders say the reappraisal data must be collected first before the Legislature can know what the potential tax shifts are so it can intelligently draft an amendment.

The stalemate has existed between Carlin and the GOP majority since he took office in 1979.

The reappraisal bill calls for statewide reappraisal, but it prohibits implementation before Jan. 1, 1988, and implementation could only take place after a classification amendment has been submitted to the voters.

After January 1988, county appraisers would be required to update valuations annually, and personally inspect every piece of property once each four years. The counties would supply valuation figures to the state revenue agency via a statewide computer network to ensure each of the 105 counties was complying with the law.

Valuations are required by law to be revised on an annual basis. However, there has not been a statewide reappraisal for 20 years and in those two decades inequities have developed. That's where the amendment to allow classification of property comes in.

The constitution requires all property to be taxed on a uniform and equal basis at 30 percent of its fair market value. However, with the inequities that have developed over the past 20 years, homeowners and farmers are taxed at a much lower rate than commercial, utility and personal property.

Most state officials agree residential property is taxed at about 8 percent of its fair market value, instead of the 30 percent tax level required in the constitution.

Republicans say the classification issue should wait until reappraisal begins and lawmakers have accurate figures with which to work. They say it would be foolish to pass a classification amendment now because the actual tax percentages might change once reappraisal is completed.

The proposal to submit the classification question to voters has little chance of passing because it needs approval from two-thirds of the members of the House and Senate before it can be placed on the ballot.

That means it needs 84 of the 125 votes in the House and 27 of 40 votes in the Senate.

Other provisions of the bill set up a statewide computer system, based in the Department of Revenue's property valuation division. Each county would buy two computer terminals and a printer at a cost of some $5,000, and the state would help with the cost. The equipment would be tied directly to a main computer in the Department of Revenue, allowing the state to keep close tabs on whether the information is being collected.

Katlin reminisces, cites office responsibilities

By DIONA NACE
Collegian Reporter

Jerry Katlin, outgoing student body president and graduate in public administration, said two of the major issues he faced during his term were the Holton Hall renovation fee and the Solomon Amendment.

The Solomon Amendment required all males over 18 years old seeking federal financial assistance to register with the Selective Service. A resolution to support the amendment was introduced in Student Senate by the campus chapter of Associated Students of Kansas student lobbying group. The resolution narrowly passed Senate but was vetoed by Katlin.

"The Solomon Amendment is the single most volatile issue I've dealt with," Katlin said. "I was flooded with phone calls, letters and visits to the office, and based on this feedback, I vetoed the resolution. This encouraged Student Senate to think before voting. It forced them early in the year to be responsible in their voting."

Academic advising became an issue in November when he began receiving negative feedback from students. Good advising requires student cooperation, Katlin said.

"It (advising) is a sink-or-swim situation for some students," he said. "Unfortunately, some advisers don't have a list of students they advise, but I also feel students need to take the initiative to seek out their adviser."

Campus lighting was not an issue during his term as student body president, but is again becoming a student concern, Katlin said.

Improved communication between students and student government was a major goal in the past year, Katlin said. Some improvements included a table in the Union for senators to answer questions, KSDB coverage of Senate meetings, a regular Collegian column written by Katlin and living group visitations by senators.

Communication with alumni also was important, Katlin said he was sometimes the only student at Alumni Association events around the state, and alumni showed great interest about the campus and Manhattan.

"One of the most enjoyable things about the year was meeting people, especially K-State alumni," he said.

Katlin said he believes the main responsibility of the student body president is to recognize campus concerns and make those in positions to correct the problems aware of them.

Katlin said he would like to be remembered as being approachable.

"Being approachable leads to being credible, and then people feel something will be done," he said.

Katlin said he believes K-State's finest qualities are its academic programs and the support students receive from faculty and administration.

"K-State is personable," he said. "It has a personality that provides an environment in which people feel comfortable."

"We don't toot our own horn often enough. We also have not traditionally been aggressive enough in areas such as student recruitment and legislative appropriations," he said. "K-State is an excellent institution. We need to go out and market our product."

Heinz begins groundwork on presidential transition

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

Since he was elected student body president last week, Ken Heinz, junior in computer science, has been meeting with other student body presidents, members of the Board of Regents, legislators and campus administrators.

"Thursday I went to Topeka with Jerry Katlin (current student body president and graduate in public administration) and we met the Student Advisory Committee (made up of student body presidents from all regents schools)," Heinz said.

On Friday Heinz was back in Topeka to meet with the regents' Fiscal Affairs Committee. "Jerry is on the Fiscal Affairs Committee, so I'll be taking over that position," he said. "That's suppose to be one of the most important committees because anything having to do with money (for regents institutions) has to go through that committee."

Heinz will be assisting the Student Advisory Committee (SAC) with a presentation for legislators later this month.

"I'm going back to Topeka on Tuesday, and we'll have a slide presentation to show the legislators what some of the campuses look like and what the schools are all about," Heinz said. "This is something SAC is putting on, and Jerry will be going with me."

Heinz said most of the legislators he met in Topeka seemed easy to work with.

"They seemed to be interested in the students," he said. "That's what they're there for, and when a student representative has something to say, they generally listen."

In Topeka, Heinz has been involved in discussions about the State of Kansas Scholarships and college entrance requirements. At K-State, he has been involved in the planning of the 1986 budget and meeting with committees and administrators.

"I have met with the (K-State) Budget Planning Committee," he said.

Selecting the members of his cabinet will be one of his first tasks as student body president, Heinz said. Until March 8, when he officially becomes president, Heinz said he will continue to meet with Katlin to discuss choosing people for approximately 75 appointed student government positions.

"The three weeks after the election are just a transition time," he said. "There is not going to be anything major happening. I'll just be seeing what is going on and working with Jerry."

Heinz said his three-week transition period will be "a crash course in time management."

"I went home this weekend and just slept," he said. "I stepped on the scale and found out I'd lost 15 pounds since Christmas just because I've been too busy to eat."

"One of the biggest things I have to do right now is get caught up in school," he said. "That's why there is a transition period, so the new president can get caught up on studying and sleeping and learn more about what will be going on."

Heinz said he is looking forward to March 8.

New York quartet to visit campus

The New York Woodwind Quintet, which has premiered compositions for Samuel Barber and Gunther Schuller, will be the next McCain Auditorium Chamber Music Attraction at 8 p.m. Monday.

The quintet's performance in the Danforth Chapel Auditorium will feature a suite of Renaissance music and works by Barber, Telemann, Mozart and Carl Nielsen.

The ensemble instruments are flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn.

Tickets are available at the McCain Box Office or in the chapel lobby prior to the performance.

Professor's speech widely printed

Last fall a speech given by Robert Linder, professor of history, at the 73rd annual convention of the Kansas League of Municipalities in Wichita, Oct. 3, was published in full in the October 1983 "Kansas Government Journal."

His speech since has been excerpted for articles appearing in the January 1984 "Alabama Municipal Journal," the official monthly publication of the Alabama League of Municipalities; and the February 1984 "The Municipality," the official monthly publication of the League of Wisconsin Municipalities.

Linder, a former city commissioner and mayor of Manhattan, spoke on "A Sense of Place: Opportunities to Improve the Quality of Community Life." In his talk he suggested that there is a resurgence of citizen concern and pride.

Visiting architect to speak Tuesday

Victor Papanek, a visiting professor at the University of Kansas, is scheduled to lecture on "Design for Human Scale," at 3:30 p.m. Tuesday in the Union Forum Hall.

His appearance is sponsored by the College of Architecture and Design and the Fine Arts Council. The public is invited.

Born in Vienna and educated in England and America, Papanek has become known as one of the world's leading industrial designers. Since 1952 he has worked, lived and taught in fourteen countries. His book, "Design for the Real World," has been issued in 23 languages, making it the most widely-read book on design in the world.

Papanek is a Mid-America State Universities Association lecturer and is a permanent senior design consultant to the World Health Organization. He is currently the "J.L. Constant Distinguished Professor of Architecture" at K-State. In 1982 he was nominated in Sweden for the Alternative Nobel Prize for his work in developing countries.

Student sails on staysail schooner

Brock Exline, junior in biology, sailed on a six week deep-research expedition in December and January aboard the R/V "Westward," a 125-foot staysail schooner.

The voyage began in St. Thomas, U.S. Virgin Islands, and ended in Miami, Fla., with port stops in Tobago and Port Antonio, Jamaica.

Exline worked with scientists, seamen and 23 other undergraduate students from colleges and universities across the nation, conducting experiments in the Caribbean Sea.

The "Westward" experience forms the Sea Component of "Sea Semester," a twelve-week undergraduate program that provides students with an intensive, practical, multidisciplinary introduction to the oceans while earning college credit.

The "Westward" voyage followed a six-week Shore Component at the Sea Education Association's campus in Woods Hole, Mass. During the Shore Component, students completed three courses: Introduction to Oceanography, Introduction to Nautical Science and Introduction to Maritime Studies.

Each student completed an individual research project designed during the Shore Component. Brock's project was titled "Halobates micans in the Caribbean Sea: factors affecting its size and distribution."

The Sea Semester program was created 11 years ago by the Sea Education Association. Since that time, more than 1500 students have participated in the program.

Comedians to compete in Laff-Off

K-State's funniest comedian will be chosen at a "K-State Laff-Off," at 7 p.m. Friday in the Union Caskeller.

The contest is open only to K-State students, faculty and staff and is sponsored by the Union Program Council's Coffeehouse Committee.

Jim Divine, sophomore in history; and Roger Garfoot, junior in electrical engineering; are student co-coordinators for the contest.

The acts may be performed solo or duo only, and must be between eight and ten minutes in length.

Applications for contestants are available in the Union Activities Center and must be received by no later than Feb. 29.

Contestants will be competing for cash prizes of $75, $50 and $25.

Professional comedian/juggler Robert York will host the "Laff-Off" and will present his own original material as well.

Campus TV network to try comeback

By The College Press Service

NEW YORK — A specialized campus version of cable television has gone on line to ten campuses, and organizers hope to wire the rest of the country soon.

The new venture, called the Campus Network, is operated by three veterans of the ill-fated Campus Entertainment Network (CEN), which flopped a year ago after trying to sell pay-per-view extravaganzas to about 40 campuses.

"This is a brand new company," CN's Brad Siegel said. "This is not CEN coming back."

There are some campuses that would hope not. CEN broadcast three programs to certain campuses in fall 1982, agreeing to provide advertising and equipment in return for the lion's share of ticket receipts.

But attendance at many of the shows was disappointing. The shows — CEN broadcast a "Devo" concert in October 1982, a performance of the show "Sophisticated Ladies" in November and a December "Who" concert — often conflicted with finals, holidays or party weekends.

Under the strain and in debt to some of the campuses, CEN suspended its programming in January 1983, promising to return with a full slate of shows during the 1983-1984 school year.

But over the summer, Siegel and his cohorts, with backing from Satcorp, a New York marketing firm, bought CEN's assets and altered its concept into a more traditional specialized cable network.

Now CN will place equipment on participating campuses and send three hours of programming a week to them via satellite. Campuses have the right to rebroadcast the shows — mostly syndicated programs like "Second City TV", music video and a European mystery show — several times and can use the CN video equipment for free up to 20 extra hours a week.

"This is a good opportunity for us to experiment and get in on the ground floor of on-campus satellite programming," said Barry Bonifas, campus program coordinator at the University of Idaho-Moscow, one of the charter CN subscribers.

Washington State University-Pullman, the University of Minnesota-St. Cloud and the University of New Mexico-Albuquerque are among the ten campuses Siegel named as charter CN subscribers.

Siegel said CN is looking for other campuses with "smaller halls" of 800 to 1000 seats.

For the charter subscriber campuses he finds through June, Siegel said there will be no charge. CN will pay for the initial video equipment.

"It's a definite risk on CN's part and not on the school's part," he said.

CN plans to make its money by selling advertising on the programs.

In doing so, it faces competition and a dismal record for advertiser-supported non-broadcast TV.

The competition comes from regular broadcast and cable television, which now has made significant inroads onto college campuses.

It also comes from University Satellite Systems, a putative network of educational programs, sports events and special campus shows much like CN's. Unveiled last summer by TV veterans Don Ohlmeyer and Jerry Weintraub, USS had hoped to go live in January. However, it has yet to begin programming.

Moreover, none of the advertiser-supported cable networks — from Cable News Network to Music Television — is profitable.

Yet Siegel said he hopes to draw students from other entertainment media through "intelligent programming."

He said CN also hopes to start pay-per-view shows like CEN's sometime this year. In pay-per-view, viewers pay to watch a specific program instead of paying to see a whole channel or watching free broadcast TV.

Siegel said CN's pay-per-view plans include two concerts, two or three early release film premieres, a comedy show and a major speaker.

Until the shows appear, he said he'll be working on signing up more schools, including the 40 subscribers CEN had when it folded. At the time, CEN had two-year contracts with all the schools.

"We're in conversation with all of them," Siegel said. "CEN owed some campuses money, small amounts. Satcorp is making good on those agreements."

Police investigate burglary

Between 4:30 p.m. Feb. 11 and 8 a.m. Feb. 12, someone burglarized a home on Hudson Avenue in west Manhattan.

Entry was gained when the suspect twisted the doorknob on a rear door hard enough to defeat the locking device. Once inside the home, the suspect was able to ascertain that the victims were in the process of moving. The suspect went through boxes and cupboards looking for valuables and apparently placed the items he wanted in the garage, then loaded a vehicle, closed the garage door and fled.

Items taken included a 19-inch Panasonic television, an Intellivision video game with cassettes, a Fox police scanner, an Olympia electric typewriter and many other items.

Loss is estimated at more than $1,000.

Anyone having information on this or any other crime may call Crime Stoppers at 539-7777. Callers will remain anonymous and may earn cash rewards of up to $1,000.

Faculty foresee federal deficit as major election issue...

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

The spending program proposed by President Reagan will give the United States a deficit of $180.4 billion, and economists say that despite political rhetoric denying tax increases, the increases are inevitable if the national budget is to be cut.

The federal deficit is the difference between what the government is spending and the revenues it is taking in.

Accumulating a deficit means the government has to borrow money to make up for its spending. This borrowing comes in the form of government bonds. Roger Trenary, temporary instructor of economics, said there is little risk involved when lending money to the government, and banks take advantage of the opportunity.

"Banks buy a lot of them (bonds)," Trenary said. "Lending money to the government is a safe kind of loan. The government is going to pay back the money."

But, this action can result in economic problems, Trenary said. When the government borrows money from different institutions, interest rates rise, he said.

"Every dollar the government borrows is a dollar somebody else can't borrow," he said. "When the government borrows money, it's forced to push up the interest rate to get other people out (of the borrowing market)."

These high interest rates, he said, affect a number of other economic components such as housing sales, construction and the production of plant equipment.

One way out (of high interest rates) would be to cut spending. But that is not as easy as it sounds, Trenary said. He said 80 percent of spending is "untouchable," meaning mandatory or politically impossible to delete.

The "untouchables" include the national debt, Social Security, defense and agricultural supports. "You can't touch the national debt," Trenary said. "If you quit payment on the national debt, you're going to end up in the same situation New York was a few years ago. The United States government doesn't default on its loans."

Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, proposing $305 billion in defense spending, has told a congressional committee many times that for the United States to keep pace with the Soviet Union's arms advancements, no amount less than his request can be spent and still protect U.S. interests.

Social Security, which has approximately 39 million beneficiaries, is politically impossible to delete, Trenary said.

The most vulnerable of the untouchables is the agricultural industry. While only a very small percentage of the population are farmers, Trenary said it's very hard to alienate their wishes.

"A while back, the dairy industry was in a battle about price supports," he said, "and they (dairy farmers) won."

The majority of economists think you have to raise taxes," he said. "If you can't touch spending, you have to raise taxes."

According to a recent story in Newsweek magazine, Martin Feldstein, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, is quoted as saying, "This budget is not what we want to see happen in 1985. We're going to have to have additional tax revenues, we're going to have to trim back on the size of the defense authorization and we're going to have domestic spending cuts."

"The amazing thing about this high deficit," Trenary said, "is that Reagan proposed this amount."

The majority of spending cuts by Reagan have been on social programs such as education and welfare. But while those cuts may appear to reduce spending, Trenary said the figures can be deceiving.

Many of the benefits of Reagan's spending cuts have been wiped out by the high interest cost of financing the national debt," he said. "The government has had to spend more money to pay for the national debt."

The worst situation the government can get into from high deficits is the "snowballing effect," he said. This effect is produced when the government is forced to get a loan to pay for its loans.

He said something must be done to curb the deficit, but no candidate wants to base a campaign on curing the deficit by cutting spending and increasing taxes, he said.

Naomi Lynn, head of the Department of Political Science, said Democrats will probably make the deficit a major campaign issue.

"The Democrats will play it (the deficit) up and make that a large issue," Lynn said. "If they are going to be successful depends on whether they can be convincing about trying to solve the deficit problem."

"The campaign rhetoric is going to be there. The Democrats have to come across as able and willing to deal with the problem," she said.

Trenary said a politician usually calls for a bipartisan approach in dealing with such a problem. President Reagan did that in his last State of the Union address. This way, he said, no one side is pinned with the blame.

The president's report on the projected economic situation is slated to come out in December of this year, one month after the presidential elections.

Donald Cundy, assistant professor of political science, said what Reagan says in the election probably won't correspond with what needs to be done.

"He's going to have to raise taxes and he knows it," Cundy said. "This way he can talk about how glowing everything is until after the election."

...while national economist increases estimate

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Congress' chief economist predicted on Wednesday that federal budget deficits could be more than $300 billion higher through the end of the decade than the Reagan administration estimates.

Rudolph G. Penner, director of the Congressional Budget Office, told the Senate Appropriations Committee that the federal budget deficit by 1989 could be more than twice the $123 billion projected in President Reagan's budget sent to Capitol Hill this month.

The bulk of the gap between the budget office and the administration estimates is attributed to differences in projections of economic performance for 1986 and beyond.

While the budget office and the administration generally agree on the economic forecasts for 1984 and 1985, Penner said, "The administration's longer-run projections for the 1986-1989 period are considerably more optimistic than CBO's."

Penner said his agency, which was formed to provide Congress with impartial economic information, predicts the budget deficit under administration policies would grow from $186 billion in 1984 to $192 billion in 1985 and $248 billion by 1989.

Reagan's budget projects a deficit of $180 billion for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1, declining to $123 billion by 1989.

Penner said his office predicts that without any action, deficits could rise from nearly $200 billion in 1985 to more than $300 billion in 1989. The administration's spending plan proposes some modest spending cuts and revenue increases to control deficits.

The new figures were released a day before the White House and Congress resume talks on reducing deficits.

As to the differences in economic assumptions used by the White House and CBO, Penner said, "The administration's projections show growth rates averaging about half a percentage point higher than CBO's, and inflation lower by a similar amount" over that period.

Alumnus to chair department's anniversary

Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, president emeritus of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md., has accepted an invitation to be the honorary chairman of the K-State Department of Journalism and Mass Communication's 75th Anniversary observance in 1985.

Eisenhower received his bachelor's degree from K-State in 1924 with a major in journalism. 14 years after the department was founded. He had been a reporter for his hometown paper, The Abilene Reflector, after graduating from high school at the age of 16, and was editor of the Collegian from his first semester on campus until his graduation.

He also was a student instructor in the journalism department and was appointed to its faculty upon graduation. Two weeks into the school year, he was appointed to a Foreign Service post at the U.S. consulate in Edinburgh, Scotland.

During the Hoover and Roosevelt administrations he was the chief information officer of the U.S. Department of Agriculture. During World War II, Eisenhower was associate director of the Office of War Information, resigning in 1943 to become president of K-State, the only alumnus to be its president.

He was president of Pennsylvania State University from 1950 to 1956, then became president of Johns Hopkins. He retired in 1967, and in 1971 returned to the presidency for a year.

He continued in government service throughout this time, serving as personal adviser to his brother, former President Dwight D. Eisenhower, particularly as special ambassador on Latin American affairs, laying the groundwork for the Alliance for Progress.

President Lyndon B. Johnson asked him to head the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence, kindling an interest that led Eisenhower to establish the Eisenhower Foundation for the Prevention of Violence, which he still heads.

K-State conferred an honorary Doctor of Humane Letters degree on Eisenhower in 1963, and he received the K-State Alumni Medallion in 1982.

In accepting the honorary chairmanship, Eisenhower volunteered to participate in a program on journalism education and journalism issues during the anniversary observance, although he cannot travel beyond the Baltimore area.

Teachers' raises merit praise

Kansas is finally taking action to obtain and retain good teachers in the state. The Kansas Senate on Tuesday approved a 10.25 percent raise in teachers' salaries. Currently, Kansas teachers are paid an average of $19,600, $2,300 below the national average. More simply put, they are given a ranking equivalent to a C when they deserve an A.

Kansas is ranked second in the United States in literacy. Teachers should receive some of the credit for the accomplishments of their students. It is only fair that teachers receive higher wages.

In Japan, teachers receive the same respect as doctors, lawyers and engineers. They also receive similar wages. Naturally, with higher wages, Japanese schools draw competent individuals into the teaching profession.

The quality of Kansas education probably will remain high, and with a raise in teachers' salaries it has the potential to increase. But the battle isn't over yet.

The Kansas House must pass the measure and Gov. John Carlin must sign it.

The governor, who asked for a 9.75 percent average salary increase, is expected to sign the measure. Carlin's press secretary, Michael Swenson, said, "He's ready to let them (the Legislature) one-up him as long as the end result is more money for education." Bravo!

The House is expected to debate two provisions tacked on the bill by the Senate. Rep. Denise Apt, R-Iola, and House Education Committee member, has said she expects the House to pass the bill. This could mean a reduction in state funding, but would allow the districts to make up the difference through increased local taxes, the Kansas City Times stated.

In any case, the Legislature and the governor are doing the right thing in deciding on an average increase in teachers' salaries.

Stewardesses regain work status

Equality in employment has been restored to 1,800 women.

In the mid-1960s, United Airlines' no-marriage rule, now illegal, forced stewardesses to quit work if they married. The company wanted young, attractive, unattached stewardesses, not only to appeal to traveling businessmen, but because it believed such a job was incompatible with married life.

Furthermore, on the flights to and from Hawaii, United employed native male Hawaiians for "local" flavor. They were allowed to remain on the job if married.

Mary Sprogis was the first to object. She filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in 1966. Her action started a wave of litigation against United Airlines, and in 1980, all of the women fired by United were informed by mail of their opportunity to be reinstated as stewardesses.

Nearly all the women have said they will return to work to enjoy both career and home life. The very reasons they originally valued their jobs — money, pride in the profession and the opportunity to travel — provide an incentive to return to work. But resentment and a desire for justice also play a large part. A woman whose marriage ended in divorce feels especially wronged. And one woman who is now a college professor vows to return to the air.

These women should be applauded for taking action against employment discrimination. It is still possible to correct a wrong twenty years later, and the very determination they exhibit in reclaiming their jobs illustrates that the sting of injustice runs deep. Successfully regaining her former employment status not only is a positive step for each individual stewardess, but serves to promote women's rights toward fair treatment on the job.

Use of food irradiation eminent

WASHINGTON — When the nuclear industry has been enduring nothing but bad news, Margaret Heckler has given atom-advocates something to smile about.

Margaret Heckler, secretary of Health and Human Services? One and the same.

As chief of the agency that regulates the food and drug industries, Heckler has put the weight of her office behind an atomic substitute for the use of the much-questioned fumigant, ethylene dibromide (EDB), in food preservation. A regulatory proposal to sanction the preservation of food by radiation may not solve the nuclear power industry's problems, but the radiation process could gain public acceptance, given the alternatives.

When we talked in 1982 to a pioneer in the process, Martin Welt, president of Radiation Technology Inc., in Rockaway, N.J., food irradiation seemed something out of the old television series, "Lost in Space." Though it had received sanction from the World Health Organization and from NASA for the space-shuttle kitchen, its commercial use in America had been limited by the Food and Drug Administration to potatoes and wheat flour.

Welt's unadulterated confidence about the safety of irradiated cuisine (as well as an endorsement from Ralph Nader's Center for Science in the Public Interest) hadn't been enough to convince federal regulators that the public was ready for it on a broad scale. (Of a wide range of proposed foodstuffs, only spices have been added to the list of irradiables since 1982.)

Lately, however, EDB hysteria has given the government new insight. In doses of up to 100,000 rads, the FDA said in a proposal published last Tuesday, "(Food) irradiation does not present a safety and health risk."

Welt complains that food irradiation has received its new boost "by default." Washington, he says, is now citing studies it's possessed since 1979. He adds that a U.S. Army investigation found no unique radiolytic products, known in the trade as "urps," in chicken or bacon treated with up to 9.1 megarads, or 910 times the proposed federal limit.

But Welt should count his blessings. As he concedes, the food industry's interest in radiation stems from fears of product-liability lawsuits resulting from EDB and chemicals like it. Without the public's concern about risky additives, Margaret Heckler may never have put the zip into food zaps.

Konstantin Chernenko's appointment as general secretary of the Soviet Communist Party leaves both superpowers again under the direction of septuagenarians. Yet Eastern Europe still beats Western Europe in the old-leader department. Hoxha of Albania, for example, is 75; Zhivkov of Bulgaria, 72. Honecker of East Germany, Husak of Czechoslovakia and Kadar of Hungary are all 71.

Robert Escobar Garcia, one of six candidates for president of El Salvador, recently campaigned in Los Angeles. The retired army colonel believes that the city's Salvadoran refugee population, now estimated at 300,000, will be inclined to tell relatives back home about him — in positive terms, he hopes.

The improved health of some American automakers seems to have caused the first increase in car dealerships since 1965. Automotive News found that 20,841 dealers were in operation last Jan. 1, or 42 more than a year before. Chrysler and Ford enjoyed the most significant gains in franchises.

Nuclear weapons development and related activities would consume more than half of the $7.8 billion 1985 budget proposed by the Reagan administration for the Energy Department. The department is considering at least 17 different weapons programs.

WAITER...THERE'S AN EDB IN MY SOUP...

EDB recalls environmental conflict

One of my agronomy professors, O.W. Bidwell, once commented, "We no longer farm in an environment, we farm in an economy." I think he would agree that this extends beyond agriculture — we no longer live in an environment, we live only in an economy.

This is not true in one sense, because all human beings live in two environments, one physical and one social (of which the economy is only one part). In another sense it is sadly true because increasingly, as a society, our actions are decided only in response to economic problems. Little importance is given to problems brought on by the physical environment.

A recent example is the controversy over the pesticide ethylene dibromide (EDB). It has principally been used to control insects in stored food products and as a soil fumigant. Recently, the Environmental Protection Agency banned all but a few uses of this pesticide. Since the danger of the substance has been well established (though not completely quantified), the opposition that these measures encounter only serves to illustrate my point.

Opponents to the banning say we simply cannot afford to discontinue the use of this pesticide. EDB is necessary to maintain our "quality of life." They say that evidence of the danger of EDB is inconclusive. In support of this position they offer studies, funded of course, by the interested companies.

There is confusion over the effects of EDB, but is confusion an excuse for inaction? An article in the Feb. 15 Collegian reported, "EDB is a volatile compound which quickly decomposes." A contradictory article in the Feb. 3 issue of Science magazine said scientists discovered seven years ago that EDB was not as volatile as had been thought. One study showed that EDB persisted in wheat up to 500 parts per billion three months after fumigation. The EPA initially tried to ban it in 1977. But manufacturers and users argued that this would cost us money.

Another argument is that there are no pest-control alternatives. An EPA official put it this way,

"Without an all-out cancellation, industry wouldn't consider alternatives. Now we are cancelling and they are screaming there are no alternatives."

EDB's carcinogenic properties have been suspected for 10 years. The EPA has called it the most carcinogenic substance they have tested. It is well known that the substance quickly produces tumors in laboratory animals. The EPA estimates that exposure to EDB-treated food over a lifetime could cause cancer in three out of every 1,000 people.

What is so bad about that? In terms of total U.S. population, that translates into only 750,000 people. Yet its use is continued widely in the storage of food products.

All this points to the basic problem. Our society has been programmed to deal only with economic inputs. Our decisions are based solely on economic information. English is a rich language, but it appears that we have to talk dollars to make sense. If it makes money, it is good. If it loses money, then it is bad.

If it were found that the use of EDB actually caused us to lose money, I do not doubt that its use would stop immediately. Why can't we think in terms of "environmental" dollars? Why can't we imagine that we are incurring debts with the environment that will have to be paid back through bad health, long and hard deaths, expensive clean ups, etc.? We simply are not able to think in terms of environmental dollars.

There is the mentality that says something is not damaging to your health until you are vomiting in the streets. It is the same mentality that believes you aren't breaking the law by speeding at 70 mph — until the patrolman catches you. Then you've done wrong.

I feel the essence of the debate was captured in the Collegian's article. It quoted Robert Schoeff, professor of grain science, as saying, "We don't anticipate any problems in Kansas. They are making a mountain out of a molehill."

I interpret that statement as saying we must wait until it becomes a mountain before we act. This is called governing by crisis and cannot be considered desirable either for the economy or the environment.

Ironically, the economic argument itself does not seem to hold water. Canada banned EDB six years ago, and somehow has managed to keep afloat economically. In fact, that ban has given them a possible advantage in the international grain market; as their grain is considered "clean."

Many people seem to think that the only problem we have with the environment is the regulations. Laws simply interfere with the economy, with our "quality of life." Therefore the thing to do is to do away with regulations. Typically, the Reagan administration has slashed the EPA staff working on pesticide regulation from 128 to 20.

Why do we have such an obsession with the economy? We may reach into our pockets 20 times each day to participate in it. In contrast, we are constantly participating in the physical environment. We walk on it, breathe it, eat it — we are the physical environment. Should we have so little concern for the very material of which we are made?

President Reagan and many other people like to repeat that nothing in life is free. If they really believed that, they would recognize that quality of life is not simply synonymous with a fat bank account. It also requires a clean and healthy environment. This has its own price, and we will pay for it one way or another.

Economics real issue behind seal killings

Editor,

Re: Karra Porter's editorial, "How to protest the seal hunt," in the Feb. 22 Collegian:

How can you talk about the "big, round eyes enveloped in a mass of white," and the "blood that stains the Newfoundland snow deep red," and then try to convince us your piece is not another make-your-heart-bleed editorial? This intention was misguided. The whole issue does involve economics.

Without the seal hunt, what would these people do to make a living? Personally, I don't know the answer, but I've heard that this is their only livelihood; without it, they have little or no income. If it's possible this is true, I think I'd want to find out the facts before I try to dictate my emotional feelings to someone else half a world away.

How would we in this country feel if Europeans and Canadians wrote us millions of letters threatening economic boycotts unless we stop the slaughter of innocent cattle by men with blunt instruments? Yet many of those who will no doubt respond to your article will then stop on their way home to pick up a roast at the market, or maybe a couple of Big Macs.

It's the same story: we pay others to do our killing for us. Cattle just aren't as cute as baby seals. Cosmetic beauty wins again.

What I suggest is that all those interested in this issue use the addresses you furnished us and get some answers. Find out what the loss of this hunt would mean to the hunters and their families. Find out if, like the whales, this harvest is endangering the seals' normal populations. Let's get the facts before we decide to exercise our God-given rights as Americans to tell our neighbors how to live.

When I talked to the city engineer and the traffic department, they said that I would not be able to acquire the signs from them because they did not want extra signs "running around" the city. At no time did they mention that it was illegal for me to have a street sign. In fact, they sent me to the county to obtain the signs. It makes me wonder if it is or is not a crime to possess a sign.

Katlin gives final report to senators

Jerry Katlin, student body president and graduate in public administration, will deliver his State of the University address tonight at the Student Senate meeting. Lori Leu, Student Senate chairman and senior in pre-law, also will give a status report of the Holton Hall renovation.

The meeting is scheduled for 7 p.m. in the Union Big Eight Room.

Other Senate agenda items include commendations to Katlin and Leu for their efforts and accomplishments during the past year. A commendation also will be made to Rick Forsyth, assistant dean of the College of Architecture and Design, for his efforts to improve the college's ambassador program.

New student senators will be sworn into office at the meeting. Their first item of business will be to approve members of the 1984-85 Finance Committee.

At-large members of the committee scheduled for approval are Kathleen Daniels, junior in industrial engineering; Lisa Rosenow, sophomore in radio and television; Dan Schierling, sophomore in pre-professional business administration and Glenn Taylor, freshman in arts and sciences.

Senate members of the committee scheduled for approval are Steve Cashman, freshman in pre-professional business administration; Kay Deever, junior in pre-professional elementary education; Monte Griffin, junior in pre-professional business administration and Drew Hertel, sophomore in pre-professional business administration.

The new Senate will then take nominations for Student Senate chairman for the coming year.

House to vote on wage amendment

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Hoping to avoid a clash with the governor, members of the Kansas House agreed to a compromise Wednesday and tentatively agreed to amend a 93-year-old prevailing wage law, rather than repeal the law as many Republicans wanted.

The House gave first-round approval to a proposal to allow the state to determine minimum hourly wages for all types of skilled and unskilled labors on a county-by-county basis as a prelude to possible implementation.

The law to be amended was passed in 1891 but has never been put into effect in Kansas. Its original intent was to protect Kansas workers from employers bringing in foreign laborers to work more cheaply.

The final vote will be taken today and if passed the measure advances to the Senate for consideration.

House Speaker Mike Hayden, R-Atwood, hailed the amended bill as an acceptable compromise between the Republican-supported original version — which would have simply repealed the 19th century statute — and Gov. John Carlin's desire to implement a statewide minimum daily wage scale.

"I don't think the governor realized what he was getting into when he issued the order to implement that law," Hayden said after the measure won first-round approval. "The governor is taking a much more responsible approach by working on a reasonable compromise. Even though I don't necessarily agree with the amended bill, I'm supporting it because it's a good faith compromise."

The compromise changes several sections of the existing law but does not repeal it. It was offered by Rep. Bill Wisdom, D-Kansas City, who said the measure had the support of Carlin's staff and labor groups.

The bill would direct the Department of Human Resources to conduct wage surveys in each of the state's 105 counties and determine the prevailing hourly wage, including employee benefits, paid city and county public works projects, including all types of contract jobs.

Probably the most important provision relates to wide differences in wages paid in a particular county. If there is a wide variation in wages being paid employees for particular types of work in a county, the human resource agency would simply take the average of the wages.

The wage surveys would not be used until March 15, 1985 to give the Legislature a chance to look over the figures and give its approval.

"Mainly, this changes the definition of locality so that wages would be determined on the basis of the county where the work is to be performed, rather than surveying wages in several cities," Wisdom said of his amendment. "That gives us a broader base to work on."

Rep. Robert Frey, R-Liberal, also supported the change, saying it protected skilled and unskilled laborers, but not with excessive wages.

"We want to protect wage earners involved in crafts but we don't want an excessive wage base in the state," Frey said. "I think this is more acceptable, narrowing it down to counties."

Majority Leader Joe Hoagland, R-Overland Park, applauded the Democrats' effort as a "good faith effort at compromise that obviously has the blessing of the governor." He supported the change.

"We need to protect our local counties, and local workers, from out-of-state workers coming in and taking lower wages," said Minority Leader Marvin Barkis, D-Louisburg. "I think a fair-wage bill is reasonable and necessary."

Court's bankruptcy decision angers labor leaders

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court ruled Wednesday a failing business may escape union contract obligations by filing for bankruptcy, even if it can't prove its very survival is at stake.

The 9-0 ruling touched off an irate response from labor officials who said they will step up efforts to get help from Congress.

"We're disappointed in the decision and we will pursue a legislative remedy," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said.

The court said businesses do not have to prove to a bankruptcy judge that their survival would be at stake if they honor union agreements.

It is enough to show that a contract would be burdensome and the best interests of the business, its creditors and employees favor canceling the contract, the court said.

And the court voted 5-4 that a business may unilaterally cancel a union contract even before a court rules on its bankruptcy request.

"It's outrageous," said William Winpisinger, president of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers. "It is inconsistent with the intent of the (bankruptcy) law."

Leaders of the AFL-CIO, meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., said they will seek Congressional revision of bankruptcy laws with renewed urgency.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, D-Mass., said such a revision will be sent to the House floor as soon as possible.

The proposed changes are broader than the issue in Wednesday's ruling. In 1982 the high court ruled a key part of the current bankruptcy law is unconstitutional, and Congress has been wrestling since then to come up with a solution. Separate measures have been introduced dealing directly with abrogation of union contracts in bankruptcy proceedings.

Wednesday's case involved a small building supply company, Bildisco Manufacturing Inc. of West Orange, N.J. But the ruling is expected to have a bearing on some better-known cases.

Bildisco's lawyer, Jack Zackin, said the company "has successfully reorganized and is still in business." The court ruling "will ensure that they will continue in business," he added.

The firm declared bankruptcy in 1980 and canceled a raise it negotiated with the Teamsters Union.

Justice William Brennan, dissenting, said the firm committed an unfair labor practice by acting on its own to cancel the raise before a bankruptcy judge authorized rejection of the contract. He was joined by Justices Byron White, Thurgood Marshall and Harry Blackmun.

Toilet snatchers leave trail

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A trail of water that trickled from a stolen toilet stool led police officers to two men suspected of burglarizing an apartment Tuesday night.

Police received a call that a burglary was in progress at the apartment, but when officers arrived, there was no one inside. However, the officers noticed that a toilet stool was missing from a downstairs bathroom, and that there was a trail of water leading outside.

The officers followed the trail around the building, across the street and up to a nearby residence, police said. At that location, police said, two men with pliers, wrenches and a flashlight were taken into custody, along with the allegedly stolen commode.

Balloonists defy wind to cross lake

CHICAGO — Neophyte hot air balloonist Peggy O'Connor and her more experienced husband, Mike, defied uncooperative winds to become the first husband-wife team to soar across Lake Michigan to Michigan.

Their nine-story, orange-and-blue balloon landed after a six-hour trip Tuesday near New Buffalo, Mich., in Warren Dunes State Park. Northwest breezes blew them 15 miles south of their Benton Harbor, Mich., destination and forced O'Connor, 27, to tack back and forth to avoid a Gary, Ind., landing.

O'Connor, who owns a balloon company, and his schoolteacher wife had postponed their trip for two foggy weeks. When Tuesday dawned sunny with a 3 mph breeze, they took off.

O'Connor, with nearly 700 hours experience in hot air balloons, planned to travel at an altitude of about 10,000 feet.

Soon however, they drifted south, and O'Connor got no higher than 6,500 feet "because the higher he went, the higher the northwest winds got," said Bob Flower, tower supervisor at the Michiana Regional Airport in South Bend, Ind.

'Bubble boy' dies of heart failure

HOUSTON — David, the 12-year-old "bubble boy" who spent his entire life in sterile rooms because he had no immunity to disease, died Wednesday night at Texas Children's Hospital, spokeswoman Susannah Moore Griffin said.

Death was attributed to heart failure, Griffin said.

David's family — mother, father and 15-year-old sister — were in the room at the time, she said. The boy's family name has never been disclosed.

"The cause of the heart failure is unknown," his doctor, William T. Shearer, said in a statement released by the hospital.

David was the oldest living survivor of a condition called severe combined immune deficiency syndrome, leaving him with no immunity to disease and even ordinary bacteria could be dangerous. Until earlier this month, he had spent his entire life in a sterile plastic bubble.

Doctors gave him a transplant of treated bone marrow on Oct. 20 in hopes of providing him with immunity. But he developed diarrhea and fever and was removed from the bubble and placed in a sterile hospital room on Feb. 7 so he could adequately be treated.

Doctors said David developed graft-vs.-host disease, apparently as a result of lymphocytes from the transplant attacking his body as if it were foreign tissue.

Foreign visitors air customs complaints

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — "Immigration and Customs procedures are just awful. You must know how many people are passing (through) JFK, so why not you arrange in accordance?" the foreign visitor wrote while flying home from New York's international airport.

"Improve Immigration, Customs at San Francisco. After 11-hour flight, delays of two hours average to clear Customs, and Immigration is poor," said another departing traveler.

"It is very irritating, as a citizen of a country which allows free access of U.S. citizens to the U.K. (United Kingdom), to have all the hassle of visas..." a British visitor added.

"Why visa required for Swedish citizens when U.S. citizens can enter Sweden without visa?" echoed another European.

Complaints such as those were sprinkled throughout some 5,300 questionnaires that the government's tourism-promotion agency, the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration, collected from departing foreign visitors in late 1982.

Today, as industry and government officials work to reverse a two-year decline in the number of foreign visitors, steps are being taken to reduce such irritants, albeit more slowly than tourism interests would like.

An immigration reform bill that passed the Senate last May but is stalled in the House contains a provision for a three-year pilot program waiving visa requirements for citizens of up to eight countries whose visa-rejection rate is low and who do not require such entrance documents of Americans.

The secretary of state and attorney general would select the countries, but most presumably would be in Western Europe.

Meantime, the Justice and Treasury departments are working to speed clearances through a combination of procedures tailored to the particular needs of individual airports.

In one of the few places where good records have been kept, clearance time has been cut about in half — to an average of 30 minutes — at busy Miami International Airport while drug seizures increased by 50 percent, officials say.

At 24 airports, Justice's Immigration and Naturalization Service permits U.S. citizens returning from abroad to bypass passport inspectors, subject only to spot checks. This has shortened lines and waiting times for foreign nationals, all of whose papers must be examined, spokesman Duke Austin said.

In addition, a half-dozen airports — Los Angeles, San Francisco, Anchorage, Denver, Atlanta and Minneapolis-St. Paul — have a one-stop arrangement where a single agent inspects both documents and baggage.

Treasury's Customs Service also has adopted a European system of dual exit corridors from baggage-claim areas at eight other airports: JFK, Newark, Philadelphia, Miami, Houston, San Juan and Chicago's O'Hare.

One hallway — painted green — is used by those who have no items to declare; the other — painted red — by those who think they may have to pay duty.

John Heinrich of Customs' office of inspections said the process begins even before the formal checkpoints, with plainclothes agents mingling among arriving passengers to try to catch suspicious people off guard.

Despite those steps, Heinrich said, one "never-ending problem" has eluded solution: the tendency of airlines from abroad to arrive at a terminal at certain peak hours because of connecting flights and other scheduling concerns by the carriers.

"We continue to wrestle with peaking," Heinrich said. Meantime, he said, some part-time help is being used to ease the crush.

While the bureaucratic procedures are annoying, analysts say the state of the worldwide economy and the increasing value of the dollar over foreign currencies were the key reasons for an overall 2 percent decline in foreign tourism in 1983.

Foreigners contribute more than 6 percent to the $200 billion-a-year travel and tourism sector, whose revenues are second only to food stores among U.S. retail industries.

Canadians made up more than half of the 21.56 million foreign visitors to the United States last year, increasing their trips south of the border by 14 percent, the Travel and Tourism Administration's research director, Don Wynegar, reported recently.

But this growth was offset by a 27 percent plunge in the number of visitors from Mexico and a 12 percent drop in arrivals from overseas points.

Wynegar projects a 3 percent growth in overall foreign arrivals this year, to 22.3 million people. At the same time, nearly 25 million Americans — 400,000 more than 1983 — are expected to travel to other lands, meaning another net deficit in the trade balance.

But despite the complaints about bureaucratic procedures and other problems — high prices, troublesome taxicab drivers, a shortage of public restrooms and the like — the questionnaires elicited more good than bad impressions of America by homebound travelers.

There were many such phrases as: "A lovely holiday," "a great place to visit," "big country with a big spirit and heart" and "the American hospitality is fantastic."

Despite the efforts by government and industry to make things easier for foreign visitors, they might understandably be puzzled about how to react to one visitor's succinct impression of America: "Dallas is not funny."

Temperance leader supports bingo bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The president of Kansans for Life at Its Best, the state's temperance organization, wrote Gov. John Carlin Wednesday, urging him to sign into law a bill tightening restrictions on gambling bingo in the state.

"I understand you are receiving stacks of mail from commercial gambling promoters asking you to veto" the bill, the Rev. Richard E. Taylor Jr. of Topeka said in a letter he made public.

"If concerned citizens across the state were aware of this issue, they would flood your office with requests for your signature."

Mike Swenson, Carlin's press secretary, confirmed the governor is being inundated by telephone calls, letters and postcards from bingo players and operators of bingo parlors, demanding he veto the bill.

The governor received the measure Tuesday, Swenson said, meaning he has nine more days in which to decide whether to sign it into law.

"He has not made a final decision," Swenson said.

The day after the bill went to the governor last week, the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee introduced a new bill to remove two controversial provisions in the measure.

However, Senate President Ross Doyen has referred that measure to two Senate committees — the one which introduced it and the Ways and Means Committee on which he sits. That means it will have a tougher time reaching the full Senate.

Those protesting the bill are most upset, Swenson said, by two amendments attached late in the legislative process. One prohibits bingo parlors from operating more than three days a week, and only on alternating days, and the other forbids bingo games being conducted closer than within 1,000 feet of each other. The latter provision would ban bingo parlors from subdividing their buildings to operate games simultaneously, as they now do.

The games can be operated only by nonprofit charitable, fraternal and veterans organizations and churches, but they frequently lease space from bingo parlors, who take a cut of the proceeds.

It is the abuse of these arrangements which led to a legislative crackdown on the games, with those supporting toughening of the law contending the parlor operators are taking advantage of the nonprofit organizations by siphoning off huge profits.

There also have been reports of underworld infiltration of operation of the games.

Corporations donate gifts, funds as investment for future workers

By SUZY HILL
Collegian Reporter

K-State is among many colleges benefiting from an increase in business contributions to educational institutions.

Nationally, the Council for Financial Aid to Education (CFAE) has found corporate gifts to colleges totalled a record high of $1.3 billion in 1982.

K-State received $1,065,000 during the fiscal year of July 1, 1982, to June 30, 1983. This figure includes cash and gifts-in-kind, which are products donated by a company.

With an increase in competition in the computer industry, computer companies have been making donation deals with many schools.

According to Tom Carlin, director of communication for the KSU Foundation, the Hewlett Packard computer company donated $177,000 in equipment to the College of Engineering. Other companies such as Parker Hannifin and Kansas Power and Light helped the engineering college fund the Durland Hall project.

The remodeling of Holtz Hall, which houses the Career Planning and Placement Center, and the addition of a third floor to Shellenberger Hall were among other special campaigns supported through business contributions.

"Corporations tend to donate to programs that relate directly to their business. Since some of the companies hire K-State graduates, they want to make sure students are working on updated equipment or with equipment that their company uses."

"Since K-State is virtually the only school in the United States that provides training in baking and milling science, the Shellenberger campaign was a unique one," Carlin said.

"If that industry wants trained employees, K-State is basically the only school to produce them. So when it became apparent that K-State needed private money in addition to the state money that had been allocated, the industry responded very well."

"It is mutually beneficial — we need their support to run a top program in grain science and they need us because we provide potential employees and conduct research," Carlin said.

"There has been some benefit not only to K-State, but around the country, in that individuals, corporations and foundations know that there have been cutbacks in state funds. This has allowed us to make a more persuasive case when we approach someone for contributions," Carlin said.

For success in raising large amounts of money, volunteers and University support are needed, he said. Carlin said part of the criteria for making a fund-raising campaign successful is the need to establish long-term contacts within corporations and to concentrate on key alumni in corporations who may be interested in supporting a particular program.

"One type of contribution that is becoming increasingly important, not only here but across the nation, is the matching gift program," Carlin said.

"Through the matching gift program, corporations double or triple their employees' gifts to educational institutions. If an employee contributes $100, then a corporation may double that amount, making the entire gift amount to $300."

"Last year the matching gift program accounted for $240,000 for K-State," Carlin said.

Corporate gift giving to universities jumps 20 percent for largest single-year leap ever

By The College Press Service

NEW YORK — Thanks largely to a change in tax laws, new savvy by campus fundraisers and perhaps shrewd marketing by computer companies, corporate gifts to colleges amounted to a record high of $1.3 billion in 1982, the Council Financial Aid to Education (CFAE) has found.

While CFAE President John Haire attributed the increase to corporations' "strong commitment to education," CFAE Vice President Arthur Kammerman said new tax laws also played a large role in the increase.

"We know for one thing there was considerable increase in gifts-in-kind because of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981," he said.

The tax act allows companies to deduct more of the value of a gift as a charitable contribution. Consequently, the companies pay less in corporate taxes.

Kammerman said colleges may be benefiting from increased competition among computer makers.

Apple, IBM and Zenith, among many other computer companies, have been making deals with a number of schools to give computers to the schools and their students.

The companies get tax deductions, but also get students use to using their particular brands, an important step in securing long-term customers.

"We know there were a lot of computers given," Kammerman said. But CFAE and the Conference Board, the business information group that co-sponsored the survey of corporate gifts, could say only that computers were a significant part of the $100 million worth of equipment given to colleges.

But those numbers don't reflect the discounts and special software agreements that have become common between colleges and computer firms.

"Another reason for the increase in corporate giving is that colleges are doing a better job of selling themselves to corporations. Most colleges in the country now have promotion departments," Kammerman said.

Moreover, many smaller schools are participating in the corporate sweepstakes for the first time, forced into the race by severe budget cuts during the last few years.

Whatever the specific reasons, the 20 percent jump in corporate giving was the biggest single-year leap since 1975-1976, when the surveys began.

Haire said he is especially pleased the jump came during a year of declining corporate profits.

Wildcat forward Ben Mitchell leads the team in blocked shots with 27 after the basketball game against Iowa State University on Wednesday night.

Staff/John Sleser

Mitchell rallies performance

By JUDI WRIGHT
Staff Writer

Ben Mitchell of the men's basketball team has come a long way since last year, his first season at K-State, when he played in 20 games averaging only 3.1 points per game and 2.6 rebounds. His field goal percentage was .385 and he was .444 percent from the line.

After staying in Manhattan during the summer and participating in a weight training program with the team, Mitchell has bounced back from a poor showing in the last half of last year's season to a strong performance this year.

Currently he is shooting .531 percent from the field and is .667 percent accurate from the charity stripe.

"Ben is a great young man. He is a great kid to coach," said Head Basketball Coach Jack Hartman. "He has really improved from last year."

Mitchell has seen more playing time, as Hartman has juggled his lineup much of this year's season. Mitchell, along with Jim Roder, Tom Alfaro, Lafayette Watkins and Eddie Elder, have been the productive combination that Hartman has used lately.

These five have started in three of the last four games, helping K-State move from a Big Eight Conference cellar position, with a 1-5 record, to 4-6. This record puts the Wildcats in a Big Eight log jam for third place with five other teams.

"I like it (the third place cluster), because we were 0-4 and we fought back," Mitchell said.

Mitchell said he would even like to go on and upset a few teams, make it to Kansas City (for the Big Eight tournament) and maybe even to the NCAA tournament.

Mitchell has proved to be an aggressive defensive player in more ways than one.

In many home games he has helped to spark both the team and the crowd with a couple of powerful blocks per contest. He leads the team in blocked shots with 27 for the year.

His aggressiveness, however, often puts the 6-foot-8, 198-pound sophomore in foul trouble. He has spent more time on the bench late in the game than any other Wildcat player — fouling out six times this year.

"I think the referees in the Big Eight watch the players too closely," Mitchell said. "It seems like they call the slightest of fouls. I wish we could mix it up just a little more."

In the rest of the Big Eight games, Mitchell will be "mixing it up" with some of the best in the conference.

On Saturday, the 'Cats host their archrivals from the University of Kansas, and Mitchell will be busy with Greg Dreiling (7-foot-1, 240 pounds) and Kelly Knight (6-foot-8, 242 pounds).

On Feb. 29, K-State heads to the University of Nebraska to take on the Cornhuskers, and Mitchell will face Dave Hoppen (6-foot-11, 235 pounds). In their first meeting Feb.

4, Mitchell lead all K-State scorers with 16 points although K-State lost by one, 47-46.

Mitchell said his main goal this season and in his future at K-State is to improve his consistency.

"At the beginning of this year's season, I was really consistent in my scoring, and I'm working really hard right now to get back to that consistency," Mitchell said. "I've got to work just as hard as anyone else to keep what I have (his starting position on the team)."

Cyclones whirl past K-State

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

It was a case of too little too late.

K-State, down throughout much of the game, made a late comeback attempt but came up short against the Iowa State University Cyclones, 62-55, in Big Eight Conference action Wednesday night at Ames. The Wildcats had come within four points in the final minute.

With the loss, K-State fell to 4-7 in the conference, 12-12 overall. With the win, Iowa State is 5-6, 15-9 on the season.

The Wildcats found themselves in trouble after digging themselves a hole early. In the final two minutes

K-State fought back, whittling an eight point Iowa State lead down to four. But Cyclone forward Barry Stevens, who scored a game-high 24 points, dropped in two free throws in the final minute to kill the 'Cats' comeback attempt.

The Cyclones were in control much of the game, thanks to a first-half stretch where they pushed an 18-17 lead into a 32-21 advantage.

Stevens and teammate David Moss lead the Cyclone surge. Moss, a 6-foot-8 sophomore center, led Iowa State early, coming off the bench to score eight inside points on K-State's 3-2 zone defense.

Then Stevens, the conference's second-leading scorer going into the contest — with a 23 points per game average — took over. The 6-foot-5 junior canned 10 of his 14 first half points over a six-minute span to help the Cyclones post a 36-25 halftime lead.

Iowa State shot a red-hot 59 percent from the field in the opening half, while the 'Cats shot a frigid 35 percent. Sophomore forward Ben Mitchell and junior forward Lafayette Watkins were the lone bright spots for K-State, each pitching in eight first-half points.

The 'Cats' leading scorer, junior forward Eddie Elder, was held without a field goal in the first half

Lady 'Cats hand ISU 86-61 defeat, await rematch with KU Saturday

A five-player, double-figure scoring attack led the K-State Lady 'Cats basketball squad as it crushed the Iowa State Cyclones, 86-61, in a road contest Wednesday night at Ames.

Sophomore Sheronda Jenkins and sophomore reserve Cindy Durham added 13 points apiece to the K-State cause. Sophomore Cassandra Jones and freshman Carlisa Thomas each added 10 points to round out the double-figure scoring.

The Lady 'Cats, who are second in the conference in field goal percentage, canned 31 of 62 shots for 50 percent. Iowa State managed only 39 percent from the field, but made 21 of 27 free throws for 77.3 percent. K-State was even more impressive from the line, connecting on 24 of 29 attempts for an 82.8 percentage.

The Lady 'Cats jumped to an early lead in the contest and built a commanding 45-31 halftime lead. The Cyclones had their difficulties with a K-State zone defense, committing 29 turnovers as compared with 23 for the Lady 'Cats.

"We started out really good in the first half," Head Coach Lynn Hickey said. "We did a good job scoring (and) our zone defense worked well."

Sophomore Jennifer Jones led the K-State rebounding charge, grabbing seven caroms, as the Lady 'Cats took a slim 36-35 rebounding advantage over the Cyclones.

Tonya Burns led the Cyclones, now 4-19 overall and 0-11 in Big Eight play, with 19 points. Sophomore Rhonda Thacker added 12 points.

With 4:05 left, a Roder jumper brought K-State to within nine, 56-47. Two Elder free throws and a tip shot by junior guard Eric Watson sandwiched a free throw by ISU guard Terrance Allen to cut the Cyclone lead to 57-51. Junior guard Tom Alfaro then canned a long jumper to bring the 'Cats within four.

KU and the conference-leading University of Missouri Lady Tigers are the only teams to hand the Lady 'Cats conference losses. The Lady Jayhawks defeated K-State, 71-58, Jan. 28 at Lawrence.

Wilson, Martin to receive early releases from prison

By The Associated Press

Willie Wilson and Jerry Martin, two of four members of the 1983 Kansas City Royals serving sentences at a federal prison in Texas for cocaine convictions, were scheduled for early release Tuesday, prison officials said Wednesday.

Officials at the Federal Correctional Institution at Fort Worth, Texas, confirmed that Wilson and Martin would be released ahead of schedule, The Kansas City Times reported. The time of their release was not disclosed.

Wilson and Martin began serving 90-day sentences Dec. 5 for misdemeanor convictions of trying to obtain cocaine. Both players, who pleaded guilty to the charges in U.S. District Court in Kansas City, Kan., are being released nine days ahead of schedule because of good behavior.

Vida Blue and Willie Aikens, two other 1983 Royals serving similar sentences at the federal prison, began their sentences after Wilson and Martin and were not scheduled for release until late March and early April. Neither player has yet received time off for good behavior, prison officials said.

Martin's attorney, William Simpson, said the former Royals outfielder probably will report soon to the New York Mets' training camp to try out as a free agent.

Wilson, Aikens and Martin were suspended from baseball for one year by baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn, who allowed for a review of the suspensions May 15 by his successor. None can play in spring exhibition games, except perhaps informal intrasquad games.

Track teams set to enter indoor finale

Indoor conference action for the men's and women's track teams will come to a close this weekend as the two squads participate in the Big Eight Conference Indoor Track Championships Friday and Saturday in Lincoln, Neb.

This meet, to be held in the Bob Devaney Sports Complex on the University of Nebraska campus, marks the 56th year for the men's conference championships and the ninth year for the women. Last year, the University of Kansas captured top honors for the fourth straight year in the men's division, as did Nebraska when it ran away with the women's title. The K-State men's and women's squads finished fourth and second, respectively.

Royals' catchers battle for spot

By The Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — There are a few positions on the Kansas City Royals that likely will be filled by players who have yet to prove themselves in the major leagues. But catching isn't one of them.

"I think our catching situation is as good as anybody's in baseball," Manager Dick Howser said Wednesday. "We have the veteran (John Wathan), and we have the young guy (Don Slaught) about ready to make the move."

Howser said that during the last six weeks of last season Slaught "proved to a lot of people that he can catch number one."

"Then you have Wathan, who still feels he's the number one guy," Howser said. "I'm going to let spring training take care of that (who starts behind the plate)."

Wathan, who came to camp with a new four-year, $1.7 million contract, could be more valuable to the Royals in a utility role.

Utility defends Wolf Creek's expenses

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas Gas and Electric Co. of Wichita, the lead utility in the construction of the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant, fired back Wednesday at its detractors. A spokesman said legislative critics now want to punish the company for its farsightedness.

Who will ever invest in utilities in the future if the state of Kansas, based on hindsight, now denies the companies building Wolf Creek the opportunity to recover their full investment, James Haines, attorney for the utility, asked members of the House Energy and Natural Resources Committee.

He said the utilities proceeded with the plant using the best available projections 10-15 years ago, they have made prudent management decisions along the way, and there is no rational basis at this point to deny them the ability to make recovery on that investment.

However, Haines conceded putting all of the $2.67 million projected cost of the plant into the rate bases now would create rate increases that "won't fly." The issue is how to soften that rate shock and still allow the companies to recover their costs.

He said a five-year plan developed by KG&E to phase in the costs of Wolf Creek would add $63.3 million to the rate increases for consumers, and that KG&E could absorb that cost without going broke. But, as a matter of fairness, it should not be required to pay it, he said.

Those measures would allow the Kansas Corporation Commission the discretion of denying KG&E, Kansas City Power and Light Co. and Kansas Electric Power Cooperatives Inc. the right to put the costs of Wolf Creek in their rate bases — either all at once or under some phase-in plan — when it goes on line in the spring of 1985.

Haines suggested amendments to a bill introduced for the KCC, and opposed two other measures, one cosponsored by 46 House Democrats and Republicans. The amendments he suggested for the KCC bill would remove the commission's authority to indefinitely delay inclusion of excess capacity generation in the utilities' rate bases. They would also mandate a four-year phase-in of excess capacity portion of the plant's cost.

The committee also heard one more supporter of the bills to expand the commission's flexibility to deal with the impact of the rate increases.

Dr. Stacy Ollar Jr., pastor of Bristol Hill United Methodist Church in Shawnee and a member of the citizens' advisory committee of the Kansas City, Kan., Board of Public Utilities, severely criticized KCPL's management record in his remarks.

Ollar cited a KCC conclusion in a rate case a few years ago that KCPL's LaCygne power plant is not run efficiently.

"Now, if KCPL cannot operate a coal-fired plant with any efficiency, what assurances do we have that they can operate a nuclear plant with any efficiency?"

Haines, a native of Michigan who has worked for KG&E since 1980, responded to charges of mismanagement of the Wichita utility, which Wolf Creek opponents leveled Tuesday.

He cited reports done for the KCC in 1977 and 1980 which described KG&E as an efficient company, with loyal, dedicated employees and a commitment to keeping electrical costs low.

Haines also emphasized the unfairness of present legislative attempts to deny KG&E and the other utilities who own Wolf Creek the right to recover all their costs.

"Given the importance of adequate and reliable electric service, no one would be well served by legislation which could have the result of imperiling an electric company's financial health and, thus, its ability to raise capital for the purpose of maintaining its ability to provide service," Haines said.

Under the KG&E phase-in plan, presented last week to the Corporation Commission, the company proposes to raise its rates by $390.5 million over a five-year period, with $153.9 million going into the rate base in 1985, $55.6 million in 1986, $57.2 million in 1987, $56.2 million in 1988 and $67.5 million in 1989.

To accomplish that, Haines proposed amending the KCC bill to allow the commission to determine which portion of the Wolf Creek capacity is not needed when the plant begins operation, and deny it in the initial rate increase, but require the commission to phase the rest of the total cost in over the following four years.

Casting ads for TV series draw favorable response

By The College Press Service

LOS ANGELES — In January Jim Korris' company advertised in some 150 campus newspapers nationwide for the chance to see pictures of college women with good bodies.

"Ten years ago, I would have expected all kinds of angry people outside my office, throwing things and yelling," Korris, an executive at Universal Studios, said.

The venture was noteworthy not just for the number of women who responded — about 100 pictures a day arrived at Universal during the month — but for the almost complete absence of protest from the nation's campuses.

The ad read: "Wanted: Good Looking Coeds to appear in female roles in a new TV series 'Legmen.'"

It instructed interested women to send photos to Universal, which would keep the pictures.

Denise Kohn, managing editor of the student newspaper at North Texas State University, said the ad "was probably sexist," but it drew "no negative response" from readers when it appeared in the paper.

Kohn did run a tongue-in-cheek story about the ad because he said students at his campus found the ad humorous.

At Georgia State University, there was "no reaction, other than that of one person I know of, and she liked the idea of being in a TV show," Donna Mitchell, business manager of the Signal student newspaper, said.

Katie Lutrey, business manager of The Metropolitan at Metropolitan State College in Denver, also said she received no response to the ad.

"We kidded about it in the office, but there was no outside reaction," she said.

At Pima Community College in Arizona, Aztec Editor Russ Fortunato said he heard no complaints about the ad.

"I read the Aztec, and I didn't even notice that ad," said June Davidson, of the college's Women's Center.

Apparently the only campus in the nation that even questioned the ad was the University of Wisconsin, where the ad slipped into the Daily Cardinal by mistake.

The ad arrived in the office during a time of "great pressure," Editor Charles Mortell said, and the distracted staff failed to consider its message. When the ad appeared, four people called to ask if the Cardinal had changed its policy against publishing sexist advertising.

The Cardinal hadn't, and published an editorial apologizing for running the ad.

"On the average, Madison students are more liberal than most," Mortell said. "Their sensitivity to the issue of valuing women's worth by their bodies is something to be proud of," he said.

The feminist sensibility is "always a concern," said Harry Sherman, who helped write the ad and whose College Media Placement Service distributed it to the college press.

Sherman denied the ad insulted women.

"If it did, we would get complaints," he said. "I think it's great we don't get complaints."

"We put the ad out with a clear conscience," Korris said, who is in charge of promoting "Legmen," which is about two male college students who do the legwork for a private investigations firm.

"I suppose the ad could have read 'suprogenic' instead of 'good looking,'" he said.

Universal plans to hire as many as 20 college women per episode, mostly as walk-ons, Korris said.

He said the studio wanted fresh female faces because the Los Angeles talent pool offers mostly women who play older than they are. "Casting for young looks is a constant problem," he said.

Universal got plenty of new faces to review. About 1,000 of the applications it received were forwarded to the casting department.

Hayden proposes changes in education board

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state Board of Education ought to be on the "cutting edge" rather than the trailing edge on education issues, House Speaker Mike Hayden said Wednesday in support of his proposal to make the board an appointed body.

Hayden told the House Education Committee the state is not getting enough leadership from the Board of Education, considering the financial investment and high priority Kansas place on elementary education.

"You must listen to the hue and cry from your constituents that something needs to be done about education," Hayden said. "There isn't anything that outranks education as the No. 1 policy decision in Kansas."

"There is nothing we spend more money on than education and our investment is going to increase."

The committee took no action Wednesday on Hayden's bill, which would reduce by one the number of members on the Board of Education. It currently has 10 members and Hayden said that is too big and leaves the possibility of tie votes.

Also, Hayden's bill would clarify the board's role and make it similar to the Regents in its authority to supervise the 305 local school boards in Kansas.

But the major change would remove the selection of board members from the election process. Instead, Hayden called for the nine members to be appointed by the governor to staggered terms.

"The state Board of Education should be on the cutting edge of supervision of education, not the trailing edge," Hayden said. "We need leadership from the board and we're not getting it."

His proposal would phase in the new board members, allowing five to be elected in November and then Gov. John Carlin would appoint four members next January.

The governor would be required to select one member from each of the state's five congressional districts and at least three members with different political affiliations.

All appointees would be subject to confirmation by the Kansas Senate. Because Hayden's idea requires amending the Kansas Constitution, it needs two-thirds approval in both the House and Senate to be placed on the ballot.

Despite the difficulty in gaining two-thirds approval — 84 votes in the House and 27 in the Senate, Hayden is confident and said it's needed to protect the state's $517 million annual investment in elementary and secondary education.

"Certain educational policies need to be changed," Hayden said. "I've reviewed the constitution and after 12 years experience dealing with the state board of education, I'm convinced it does not reflect state-of-the-art management."

"I want to arm our state with modern tools and to do that we need to change our constitution."

Hayden pointed to the Kansas Board of Regents as an example of the kind of board he envisions running the Department of Education. The Regents is a nine-member panel appointed by the governor.

"I've had a lot of experience dealing with both the Board of Regents and the Board of Education in my 12 years and I've consistently found the Board of Regents is more effective articulating the concerns of higher education to the governor and Legislature than the Board of Education."

Noting preference polls which show Kansans place a higher priority on elementary and secondary education than post-high school education, Hayden said he's convinced of the need to change the state board.

Craig Grant, lobbyist for Kansas National Education Association, told the committee his group was reassessing its previous opposition to changing the education board to an appointed body. He cited deep concerns about the current structure and an idea by Hayden to allow legislators and professional educators to serve on the board.

withdrawn on Reagan's orders from Beirut to U.S. Navy ships offshore as Lebanon's government and army are battered by Syrian-backed rebels.

Reagan said his decision for a "redeployment" did not represent "surrender" or a "cut-and-run" policy of any kind. He said the Marines could be sent back into Lebanon if that would "improve the possibility of carrying out their mission."

"I don't see their mission as being over yet," he said.

He labeled as "disgraceful, frankly," speculation that Secretary of State George Shultz might resign because of the failure of American attempts to work out a solution to the Lebanese crisis.

He also said it is "fiction" that he is not in charge in his administration or waits and sits back to be told what to do by advisers. That "shows a lack of understanding of how our system works," he said.

Reagan said critics who say he is not working hard enough as president "don't know what they are talking about." He said he goes home carrying a load of reading material.

In a sharply partisan opening statement, Reagan urged Congress to act quickly to pass bills reducing federal budget deficits, allowing prayer in public schools and strengthening criminal laws.

Bipartisan talks between the White House and Congress aimed at reducing staggering budget deficits resume today and Reagan declared, "It's time to get down to business."

Asked if he feared the long Iran-Iraq war would close the strategically vital Straits of Hormuz in the Persian Gulf, he said, "There's no way that we could allow that channel to be closed."

He said the United States has a permanent naval force in the Gulf.

Renewed fighting in that war raised renewed concern this week about the chance Iran might close the vital waterway used by tankers carrying much of the West's oil supplies.

This Desk Can Reach Mach 2.

Some desk jobs are more exciting than others.

As a Navy pilot or flight officer, your desk can be a sophisticated combination of supersonic jet aircraft and advanced electronic equipment. But you can handle it. Because Navy flight training gives you the navigation, aerodynamics and other technical know-how you need.

In return, Navy aviation demands something of you as an officer: Leadership.

Your path to leadership starts with officer training that's among the most demanding in the military. It's intensive leadership and professional schooling combined with rigorous Navy flight training. And it's all geared to prepare you and other college graduates for the unique challenge of Navy aviation. The program is tough but rewarding.

One important reward for Navy officers is decision-making authority. In the air, and on the ground, you have management responsibility from the beginning. And your responsibility grows as you gain experience.

No company can give you this kind of leadership responsibility this fast. And nothing beats the sheer excitement of Navy flying.

The salary is exciting, too. Right away, you'll earn about $18,300 a year. That's better than the average corporation will pay you just out of college. And with regular Navy promotions and other pay increases, your annual salary will soar to $31,100 after four years. That's on top of a full package of benefits and privileges.

Before you settle down to an earth-bound desk job, reach for the sky. Reach for the coupon. Find out what it takes to be part of the Naval Aviation Team. You could have a desk that flies at twice the speed of sound.

Iraq disputes Iranian claim of battle win

By The Associated Press

Iran claimed its biggest victory Thursday in 3½ years of war with Iraq, saying its forces thrust 25 miles into southern Iraq and cut the Baghdad-Basra highway in two places.

But Iraqi military communiques said the new Iranian offensive in the Basra region was "totally wiped out with thousands of (Iranian) bodies left on the battlefield."

The Iraqi communiques said Tehran had claimed victory to divert public attention in Iran from the crushing of its offensives and its huge losses.

The communiques were monitored in Nicosia, Cyprus. Foreign correspondents are not allowed near the battlefield, and the conflicting claims could not be independently verified.

Iran said its forces captured two towns along the Iraqi highway — Al Qurnah and Al Uzayr. Both towns are 19 miles west of the Iran-Iraq border, with Al Qurnah at the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers.

The official Islamic Republic News Agency said that following the cutting of the highway, "Iraq lost one of its most important logistical routes." The Iranians claimed that the Iraqi 3rd Army in the Basra sector was cut off from the 4th Army, manning the border opposite Al Amarah.

The Baghdad-Basra highway is an important military objective. Iraq uses it to move troops and equipment along the southern sector of the 730-mile-long warfront.

Iran said Iraqi forces were caught by surprise as the attacking force crossed the Hur-ul Hoveizeh marshes between the border and the two towns.

The official Iraqi news agency quoted an Iraqi general as saying his troops had destroyed a number of Iranian gunboats on the marshes.

The advancing Iranians also captured 26 Iraqi villages in the region, killed or wounded more than 2,500 Iraqi troops and captured many more, the Iranian communiques claimed.

Saudi Arabian prince announces cease-fire pact

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Israeli warplanes raided targets Thursday in the hills overlooking Beirut's international airport, where U.S. Marine combat units packed up for withdrawal to ships offshore.

The air strikes, the third this week, are aimed at Palestinian guerrillas, the Israeli military command said in Tel Aviv.

In Damascus Thursday night, Saudi Arabian Prince Bandar bin Sultan announced that a new cease-fire agreement has been agreed for Lebanon and will go into effect at 11 a.m. today. He announced it at a press conference after emerging from an eight-hour meeting with Lebanese and Syrian representatives.

The prince, who has been acting as a mediator in the Lebanon crisis, said that "it is only a cease-fire agreement" and does not cover political issues.

The Israeli air raids Thursday coincided with lengthy discussions at the presidential palace over another proposed settlement of the Lebanese crisis based on scrapping the troop withdrawal agreement between Israel and Lebanon. The May 17 accord provides for security arrangements for Israel along Lebanon's southern border, and Israel believes the pact is vital.

Moslem members of the Lebanese army who refused to fight in the past three weeks of civil war began policing west Beirut on Thursday at the request of Druse and Shiite Moslem militiamen who have controlled the city for 17 days. A few soldiers carried plastic flowers in their rifle barrels and civilians greeted them with cheers. Some threw rice from balconies.

The Israeli military command said the targets of the air raid included two buildings that Tel Aviv believes were used as headquarters and staging posts by Palestinian guerrillas in the mountain town of Bhamdoun, and a 130mm artillery position outside the nearby village of Mansourieh.

The one-time Christian resort of Bhamdoun, nine miles east of Beirut, was abandoned by the local population and has been taken over by several hundred guerrillas from a half-dozen Syrian-backed factions, according to sources in Tel Aviv who declined to be identified.

Both state-run and privately owned Lebanese radio stations said four warplanes were involved in the raids. The planes bombed and strafed for five minutes, then flew south leaving clouds of smoke hanging over their targets, according to the radio reports. There was no word on casualties or damage.

It was the sixth air attack by Israel on targets in Lebanon this year, five of them on the Bhamdoun area.

Israel has warned Lebanon's Druse rebels against allowing Palestinian guerrillas to return to central Lebanon through Druse-held territories. Israeli officials say some Palestinian guerrilla factions have re-established bases in central Lebanon, but Druse leaders deny that.

Presidential hopefuls demonstrate civility

By The Associated Press

MANCHESTER, N.H. — The eight Democratic presidential candidates, debating five days before New Hampshire voters open the 1984 primary election season, showered one another with respect Thursday night in a session notable for its civility.

"I know what I'm doing," said the front-runner, former vice president Walter Mondale. "I would know what I'm doing the first day and I would take charge."

"I ask for your vote," said Sen. John Glenn, the big loser in last Monday's Iowa caucuses. "This idea that what is cast in Iowa is cast in stone, is irreversible, is nonsense."

In one of the evening's rare flashes of emotion, he said he'd endured enough ridicule of his astronaut career, and added, "I'm proud to have had some of the right stuff."

Said Sen. Alan Cranston: "If you vote for me, the people of New Hampshire will be saying they want the next president of the United States to do all a president can do to end the arms race before it ends us."

And from the surprise Iowa runner-up, Sen. Gary Hart: "I ask for the help of the people of New Hampshire in this primary."

The 90-minute League of Women Voters debate was held at St. Anselm's College and topics ranged from anti-semitism, where the Rev. Jesse Jackson said his statements had been taken out of context, to war and peace, which was cited time and again as the most important issue of the 1984 campaign.

In contrast to earlier debates, the candidates abandoned the sniping at Mondale and Glenn that party leaders feared could only help President Reagan get re-elected.

When moderator Barbara Walters of ABC News asked if some of their campaign jibes might harm the party nominee in the fall campaign against President Reagan, Mondale said, "We're going to be together. This is the sweetest primary in American history."

Their rhetoric took on a positive tone, with each of the eight outlining why voters should support him in Tuesday's New Hampshire primary, the first ballot test of the 1984 campaign.

Sen. Ernest Hollings said, "When Ronald Reagan says stay the course, he hopes the Democratic party will stay the course. He knows that if Democrats keep this reputation as big spenders and weak on defense, he can make mistakes in Lebanon" and still be re-elected.

Former Florida Gov. Reuben Askew said, "Our party must speak for the many and not the few...we have to have someone who is willing to take risks." He took one himself, repeating his opposition to the right of abortion, the only candidate on that side of the issue.

The night began with the Rev. Jesse Jackson on the defensive from questions put by Walters.

She cited remarks by Jackson that had led to suspicions that he harbored anti-Jewish views and Jackson said: "I am not anti-Semitic."

"I have been a supporter of Israel's right to exist," he said. "I am a supporter of the Palestinians right to exist also." The Washington Post had reported that Jackson referred to New York Jews as "hymies," and asked about this, Jackson said he had "no recollection of that."

"I intend to insult no one," he said.

Reagan's budget meetings inconclusive

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Negotiators from the White House and Congress held another inconclusive meeting Thursday on how to cut the government's flood of red ink while tax writers in the House and Senate took preliminary steps toward raising taxes to help trim budget deficits.

Although the talks President Reagan called to find a $100 billion "down payment" on eliminating deficits recessed to reconvene again today, it appeared that congressional leaders are shifting their attention to producing a deficit reduction package within Congress.

In the talks at the Executive Office Building next door to the White House, congressional Democrats pressed administration officials to come up with a formal response to a proposal for a "stretch-out" of military spending that would slow the president's military buildup by a year.

"If that is not an acceptable procedure, it may be necessary, of course, to find alternate means of achieving the necessary reductions to bring down these wholly unacceptable deficits," said Majority Leader Jim Wright, D-Texas, who represented House Democrats at the talks.

Democrats also asked that Pentagon officials present "a series of priorities" specifying what defense items they wanted if Congress would provide only a limited amount of money. Wright said the purpose is to find out just what programs the Pentagon really considers important.

While there was virtually no progress in the talks, there was plenty of partisan bickering over what to do and who is to blame for the red ink. Republicans emerged from the talks complaining that the Democrats were being represented only by "errand boys" — Wright — instead of key committee chairmen, such as Rep. Dan Rostenkowski, D-Ill., chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

As the negotiators were meeting, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., went before the media on Capitol Hill to say he thought the talks were "set up" to fail. "I truly believed that from the moment the president called me" to propose the negotiations, he said.

"I think, to be perfectly truthful, that we're going to get something done. I don't think we're going to get it done through the efforts of the White House, I think we're going to get it done through the efforts of elected legislators," he said.

And those legislators were at work on both sides of Capitol Hill.

The Senate Finance Committee, unable to agree on any specific tax increases, reiterated its intention to cut spending $1 for each $1 of higher taxes — a package totaling about $100 billion over three years. That decision, made on a 15-5 vote, assumes that other committees will approve other spending cuts as well.

The panel gave preliminary approval to a series of spending cuts in Medicare and Medicaid that would save in the neighborhood of $10 billion over three years.

Meanwhile, Democrats, who control the House Ways and Means Committee, agreed the panel will write a bill next week that would raise taxes about $51 billion over three years.

The federal deficit is projected at $180.4 billion in the budget Reagan submitted to Congress for fiscal 1985.

Also, Rudolph G. Penner, director of the Congressional Budget Office, told the House Armed Services Committee that the administration's budget understates weapons costs by $94 billion over the next five years.

However, Penner took sharp issue with claims that high defense spending has a disproportionately adverse effect on the economy.

In other congressional action Thursday:

— John Stemple, a deputy assistant secretary of defense, told the House Foreign Affairs subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East that the performance of the Lebanese armed forces "has given us cause for concern, as it has given you cause for concern."

He said the Pentagon estimated the Lebanese government forces at 13,000 to 14,000 men, with the 8th brigade at the key mountain town of Souk al-Gharb "probably the best brigade in the army."

Industry mix slows state's economic recovery

By DAVID BEVENS
Staff Writer

The Kansas economy is on an upswing since the sharp downturn it suffered in the spring 1982. This year the state's economy is expected to expand to pre-recession levels.

"Personal income will expand at an 8.3 percent pace to total $32.4 billion (in 1984). Unemployment is expected to increase 1.8 percent," states the "Kansas Economic Report," released this month.

"So far, we (Kansas) are still not growing at the (economic recovery) rate of the national average," said Jarvin Emerson, professor of economics and co-author of the report.

Kansas' slow recovery pace is caused by the industry mix in the state, he said, adding that it has a limited range of high technological industries when compared with the number of manufacturers of non-durable goods, such as farm products.

States like Kansas whose main industries produce non-durable goods are not recovering as rapidly as states with high technology companies and defense contracts because the United States has a limited market for non-durable goods, Emerson said. The strength of the dollar also is reducing world trade, which slows the entire economy, particularly those economies with non-durable good industries, he said.

According to the report, "the strength of the dollar has made U.S. exports less attractive and imports more attractive. Further, the U.S. economy has been growing more rapidly than most of the rest of the world, resulting in a disproportionate increase in imports by the United States."

The trade deficit, caused by more imports than exports, reached $8.97 billion for the month of October 1983 and $70 billion for the year. This is the highest it has ever been in history, the report said.

Although Kansas is below the national recovery rate average, it is faring well compared to other states.

"The state's economy is still doing a lot better than many states. We've been doing better than other states in the plains region," Emerson said.

Minnesota and Michigan are recovering more rapidly because of the amount of industry in those states. Oil-producing states such as Oklahoma are recovering poorly, he said.

"We have substantial overproduction of petroleum products. Energy-producing states, which were booming, are now suffering," Emerson said. Other states, such as Iowa, Nebraska, South Dakota and North Dakota also are recovering slowly.

Emerson is one of three economists, the other two from Wichita State University and the University of Kansas, who prepared the annual economic report. The Kansas Department of Administration, the Department of Revenue and the revenue department's Legislative Research Division also were involved in preparing the report.

"We work on it to some extent throughout the year. The real push comes in November and December," Emerson said. This is because economic figures aren't available until then, he said.

Emerson wrote four of the five chapters of the 1984 report. He has been involved in preparing the annual reports for the past 17 years.

Blood donations fall below 1983 levels

By JAY BAUMANN
Collegian Reporter

Members of the K-State community have been rolling up their sleeves this week to donate blood in the Union Ballrooms.

K-State is the largest donor institution in the Wichita Regional Red Cross Blood Center, which includes all of Kansas (except Kansas City) and parts of Oklahoma, and it reported a record donation last semester of 1,747 pints.

"The bloodmobile donations are coming along slower this semester than last semester," said Karen Van Meter, senior in finance and student co-chairman of Circle K. Circle K has sponsored the bloodmobile here for the last 21 years.

Bloodmobile workers do not reject many people from donating blood.

"Colds and flus are the main reasons that people get rejected. We also have a handout that contains the other reasons why a person may be rejected. Even if you had a cold last week, if you feel good the day you come in to donate, you will probably be accepted," Van Meter said.

"If a person is rejected this time, we hope they will try again next semester," she said.

On Tuesday, 401 pints were donated; on Wednesday, 434 pints; and on Thursday, 397 pints were given.

Although the total for last semester was 1,747 pints, last February the four-day total of blood received was 1,500 pints.

As of Thursday evening, 1,232 pints have been donated. The bloodmobile is still accepting donations today.

"This is still respectable and way above the goal the Red Cross sets for us (for the third day of a four-day blood drive). Last semester was so good," Van Meter said.

K-State's goal this semester is 1,400 pints. Next fall the Red Cross will raise the goal to 1,600 pints.

"The Red Cross is proud of K-State because it is the largest donor and is the most well-organized and well-run bloodmobile in Kansas," she said.

One benefit the bloodmobile provides to K-State is entitlement.

"This semester we are focusing attention on entitlement. We have found that many people in the University community do not realize that, because of this bloodmobile, everyone associated with the University is entitled to receive blood without the responsibility of replacing it at the bloodbank.

"This includes students, faculty, staff and their families. This benefit is explained in detail on the employee entitlement cards that are distributed each year and on the back of student fee cards," Van Meter said.

Because of entitlement, more than 20,000 people are eligible to receive blood although only approximately 1,700 people actually donate, she said.

People who have wanted to donate but have been unable to are encouraged to give blood if they have a free hour.

"This semester we are working on the slogan, 'Donate with a Friend.' We (Circle K) do a lot of advertising, but the real success is due to word-of-mouth advertising," Van Meter said.

"If everybody brings a friend who hasn't donated before, then it (the number of donors) will keep growing. If you have somebody with you who knows what is going on, you can be scared together," she said.

Volunteer workers also are an integral part of a successful bloodmobile collection.

"Workers are of great importance, too. If you work around the people who donate blood, then you can get a feel for the place. You may then want to donate blood later," she said.

"The first time (giving blood) is always the hardest. After that, people will usually donate again, and that's encouraged," Van Meter said.

Survey disputes prospective teacher shortage

By The College Press Service

FORT WORTH, Texas — The much-anticipated teacher shortage of the future may not come to pass, a just-released study suggests.

About one of every 10 of the nation's college-bound high school juniors and seniors is considering entering the teaching profession, the survey of some 4,300 students found.

Given enrollment projections and estimates of how many teachers will be leaving the field, John Mangieri, dean of Texas Christian University's education school and co-author of the study, said, "We're going to have to have 12 to 14 percent of the high school population enter teaching."

The study, which Mangieri conducted with University of South Carolina professor Richard Kemper, found only about 9 percent of the high school students are "very interested" in becoming teachers.

"Where the study gets somewhat optimistic is that 24 percent of the students said they were 'somewhat interested,'" Mangieri said. "Well, what does 'somewhat interested' mean? I don't know. But if some of those kids enter the profession, we may well have an adequate supply of teachers."

Of the people currently in college, only one of 20 plans to become a teacher.

A March 1983 study by the American Association of Colleges for Teachers Education predicted schools will be able to fill only 96 percent of their vacancies by 1985, and 80 percent by 1990.

Mangieri contended that the most important factor in attracting more students to the profession is offering higher starting salaries.

The current average starting teacher salary is $13,000 to $14,000 a year.

He is designing a study now to find out just how much schools would have to offer to attract more teachers.

Study reviews need for volunteer service

By The College Press Service

WASHINGTON — Coming on the heels of predictions that some sort of military draft or national service obligation will be imposed on all students in the next few years, a Washington group has released the results of a three-year study suggesting the United States already has a national service system.

"Our unique contribution to the continuing debate on the subject is our assertion that the United States operates a de facto system of national service already," said Meryl Maneker of the Youth Policy Institute (YPI), a seven-year-old agency of the Robert F. Kennedy Memorial that monitors youth-oriented federal programs and reports.

The armed forces, Peace Corps, VISTA and state-run conservation corps involve some 1.2 million young people, Maneker said.

Maneker and co-authors Jonathan Foley and Jeffrey Lee Schwartz said they foresee revamping the current system into a more comprehensive, but still voluntary, system that would encompass all youths.

In recent months, many public figures — from Henry Kissinger to Massachusetts Institute of Technology head David Saxon — have called for starting a national youth service program under which all 18-year-olds would have to devote two years of service to the country.

An 18-year-old could choose between serving in the armed forces, as a volunteer in hospitals or nursing homes, in the Peace Corps or with other human services agencies.

Under the Saxon plan, 18-year-olds would earn educational benefits in return for their service.

The YPI, however, found the skeleton for such a system already exists.

"We first have to make legislators recognize the existence of our current system," Maneker said.

Even after the system is coordinated and expanded, the YPI suggests it remain voluntary.

"We have to recognize budget constraints," Maneker said. "A compulsory system would cost about $24 billion, so it can't be considered. Besides, the public would be less hostile to a voluntary system."

The public apparently is becoming more hostile to a return to a traditional military draft, however.

Only 30 percent of the population favors a peacetime draft, an October 1983 survey by the University of Chicago's National Opinion Research Center found.

A year before, the center's poll found 44 percent in favor of a peacetime draft.

Nonetheless, Selective Service spokesman Donald Eberly last month predicted there probably will be some sort of mandatory conscription by 1990, although he believes it will be for a national service system that includes civilian alternatives.

The YPI study found that a majority of the nation's youth would choose military service even though there would be civilian alternatives.

Senators name 2 chairman candidates

By LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

Mark Jones, junior in pre-design professions, and Tracy Turner, junior in economics, have been nominated for the position of Student Senate chairman for the 1984-85 term.

The nominations were taken from the floor Thursday night at the first meeting of new senators. A new chairman will be selected to replace outgoing chairman Lori Leu, senior in pre-law. More candidates may be nominated prior to the vote next Thursday.

The new Senate approved a resolution commending Rick Forsyth, assistant dean of the College of Architecture and Design, for implementation of the college's ambassador program.

Outgoing senators also met Thursday night and discussed accomplishments of the past year.

A resolution commending Lori Leu, Senate chairman, and Jerry Katlin, student body president, for outstanding work was unanimously approved.

Katlin, graduate in public administration, gave a State of the University report. Communication helped make the past year a success for student government, he said.

"The key to our successful year was the way in which our student concerns were handled," he said. "By utilizing established University channels, students have been heard."

A number of issues arose in the past year showing the importance of communication, Katlin said. One of these was Senate consideration of a resolution supporting the Solomon Amendment.

"One of the most important lessons learned during the consideration and veto of the Solomon Amendment was that senators must be responsive to the concerns of their constituencies," he said. "The vote on Thursday night is not something to be taken lightly."

The outgoing Senate showed a strong sense of fiscal responsibility, Katlin said. This responsibility was shown by Senate's encouragement of groups seeking new funding sources rather than requesting funding from the student activity fee, Katlin said.

Student government's success also was due to students' awareness of the needs of the University, Katlin said. Passage of the academic support fee demonstrates this awareness, and students should help determine how the money is allocated, he said.

"Students have a strong voice in how this money is allocated through an advisory board," he said. "Recent concern over the inadequacy of the library hours showed student input in the process. We have been successful in negotiating alternatives to make the library more useful to students."

Senators heard a progress report on Holton Hall renovation. The renovation was approved by the Board of Regents at their May meeting. No specific plans have been made for the renovation, but a fund of $95,973 has been collected from the Student Services Support fee to begin work, Leu said.

Concerts need not disappear

Some may blame outgoing Union Program Council Adviser Barbara Burke for problems with securing successful concerts, but the lost revenue wasn't entirely her fault.

Actually, there are many reasons why some of the more recent concerts failed. Most have to do with the fact that K-State lacks adequate facilities for staging such shows.

For concert promoters to bring big-name groups to campus, schedules must be flexible and seating adequate. While Ahearn Field House is a fine, old facility, it is too small for the kind of group the fickle campus public desires. Even if the most popular groups could be persuaded to play Ahearn, the schedule would have to be arranged around basketball season. That has made having big names here an impossibility.

To keep having concerts, a spirit of cooperation is needed among UPC, the Department of Athletics and University Facilities.

A major hang-up seems to be the wooden basketball court in Ahearn. Once the floor is laid down for the season, officials, citing expense, refuse to take it up for concerts. If a solid concert schedule that would turn a profit could be established, UPC could afford to have the floor taken up periodically to accommodate concerts, as long as the mighty hand of athletics helps instead of hinders.

Some thought also might be given to scheduling a concert or two a year in KSU Stadium. This might be another way to attract top performers and would certainly be a positive public relations move because of the number of non-University spectators it would draw.

At any rate, it must be acknowledged that Burke tried. Other UPC programs, which serve the campus on more of a day-to-day basis than concerts, prospered under her direction.

While the only evidence current students will see of the coliseum is a fee assessment, officials must remember when the time comes that students, by and large, paid for the project. Student Senate and UPC should not stand idly by and let the same thing happen with the coliseum that has happened with Ahearn.

Concerts are far from dead at K-State. All it takes to preserve a worthwhile program is patience and cooperation in sharing facilities. There ought to be enough of both if people keep trying.

Lee White, for the editorial board

Analysis leads to deficit debacle

New analysis by congressional economists indicates that not only is President Reagan's projected fiscal 1985 budget deficit $12 billion too low, but by the end of the decade the deficit could balloon billions of dollars higher than what is now predicted.

Reagan predicts that the deficit will be $123 billion by 1989. New analysis by the Congressional Budget Office estimates the deficit to be $248 billion by the end of the decade. The CBO said optimistic predictions for economic recovery led the administration astray in its calculations.

Administration officials and legislators are set to begin talks about reducing the deficit, but now congressional Democrats say they will not negotiate until the administration proposes cuts in the Pentagon budget to help alleviate the deficit.

Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, however, said Tuesday before Congress that cuts in the defense budget would be "dangerously wrong," and said he would not cooperate with Congress to help trim his department's budget.

Congressional leaders informed Weinberger the defense budget would be cut by half, and asked for his advice in helping reduce Pentagon spending. Instead of agreeing, Weinberger argued that America must develop nuclear warheads comparable to what the Soviet Union could produce.

Rep. Timothy E. Wirth, D-Colo., asked Weinberger if $25 billion to research a nuclear missile defense system was "foolish and provocative." The secretary replied that if the Soviet Union were to produce such defenses first, "we would be subjected to all the nuclear blackmail (the Soviets) would care to apply."

Weinberger sounds convinced the survival of the country depends on spending billions on nuclear buildup. This country doesn't need more nuclear arms. Most Americans realize this. It is unfortunate that some don't occupy positions of power and influence in federal government.

City commuting full of hazards

My biceps are bulging. The intensity of the program has raised my pulse rate to Olympian proportions.

But optimal physical conditioning is not the only outstanding achievement I've acquired in this gem of exercise programs; psychological endurance and character building also are part of the package.

Move over, Jane Fonda. You're a wimp, Arnold Schwarzenegger. I'm tough, I'm primed, I'm a female Herschel Walker — I'm a commuter.

For those of you who drive two blocks for a loaf of bread, let me digress briefly and explain just what a commuter is. A commuter is a physically fit, mentally hardened, somewhat pathetic individual who relies entirely on bus, cab and subway drivers to take her where she hopes to go.

I soon realized that becoming dependent on an assortment of others to transport me has its disadvantages.

Would every cab driver want to "come and see me sometime?" Was my three-month tour to consist primarily of waiting at bus stops?

Almost.

That Friday night in Georgetown (when I was teased about being from Kansas) was a demoralizing prelude to the strange and humiliating commuting experiences that have since followed.

The subway doesn't go into Georgetown, as we found out. So we walked two miles in the rain. I had on four-inch heels.

Are you getting a feel for this?

Anticipation of a quiet, expensive dinner in an exclusive Georgetown cafe made the first half of the sojourn bearable. Indigestion from overindulging and increased precipitation made the return trip miserable.

The subway ride to the nearest bus stop was a welcome reprieve. Standing in the rain waiting for the bus wasn't — especially when we discovered it wasn't scheduled to arrive for another hour.

Tired, wet, and frivolous, the four of us had a simultaneous inspiration to seize a taxi. After I saw the final fare, the thought occurred to me to seize the driver.

But this saturated episode was benign compared to the mortifying workout I experienced when I committed the simple act of purchasing too many groceries.

Mom always told me to grab every bargain in the store, but Mom never told me how to carry 40 pounds of bargains a mile — especially not uphill across a suburban four-lane highway during rush hour.

So there I was, staggering under two sacks of vegetable soup (three for a dollar), lettuce (three for a dollar), apples, milk, grapefruit, bananas and eggs.

One sack was in a box (in an attempt to create a semblance of effective conveyance), the other stacked on top of it — lying against my head, so that I had to completely turn at a 90 degree angle to see if the speeding traffic I heard was heading in my direction.

Managing to maneuver the burden (and myself) out of the aim of crazed Friday evening motorists, I began the painful ascent up the hill to the apartment complex.

Here my luck ran out. At the intersection of six lanes, I suddenly lost control of the situation and dropped all — in view of hundreds of passing (and snickering) motorists.

I lost my sophistication and pride at the corner of South Van Dorn and the entrance to Oakwood Garden Apartments in Alexandria, Va., on Friday, Feb. 10.

While chasing rolling heads of lettuce and unleashed apples down the sidewalk, several words came to mind — and I uttered, muttered and sputtered them repeatedly during the remainder of the journey to my apartment.

Teetering painfully through the parking lot, I suddenly realized I was losing the use of my arms. Falling into the apartment building, I found that my hands were losing their flex.

Terrified that paralysis would set in before I reached the elevator, I breathed a "Hail Mary" between my other articulations.

Finally able to drop the cargo — which had somehow managed to increase in weight to approximately 120 pounds — inside the elevator, I agonizingly forced my fingers to grip the edge of the grocery box and dragged it down the hall to my door.

"—," I said for the twelfth time, as I realized that my entire upper torso was in as much pain as it had been the time I took it snow skiing.

Throwing the perishable items into the refrigerator, I rushed to get ready for the Lakers-Bullets game, only to find I could hardly open my makeup cases.

Bodily sensation returned sometime during the third quarter.

But this intense, though unplanned, workout had its benefits.

When a group of us humped off the wrong bus carrying bags and suitcases home from a weekend excursion to New York City, I didn't flinch at the upcoming ordeal like the others.

Flexing my newly acquired brawn, I took off my three-inch heels, grabbed my luggage, and marched bravely ahead, depositing my bags on the apartment floor without so much as a trace of discomfort after the two-mile walk.

Supercilious, vigorous, and strong, I went across the street to buy groceries.

Let's show off our purple pride

Saturday's game in Ahearn Field House against the University of Kansas is an important one because it puts both K-State and its students in the spotlight.

K-State is very proud of its excellence in athletic sportsmanship. Many times the school has been praised and honored for its spirit at athletic events, both home and away.

As fans we can show our support without being unsportsmanlike to the officials or opposing team. All we need to do is stay behind our 'Cats!

With a winning record like we have against the 'Hawks, the tradition of competition between K-State and KU is a proud one. Did you know that since the Big Eight Conference began, our record against KU is 37 victories to only 27 defeats? Did you know that Coach Jack Hartman is 21-14 against KU and 11-3 at games in Ahearn? This is something to be proud of.

Besides winning the game, it is just as important for K-State fans to be winners too. Wildcat fan support is a source of pride, and at the KU game, we can make it known throughout the state that K-State is a place of FANTASTIC FANS.

Help me, along with the cheerleaders and pep band, in supporting our team. Reading newspapers when the KU's starting lineup is announced is fine, but please don't throw the papers on the court. And remember, signs and banners do not allow others to watch the game. Purple is beautiful — let's wear all we have.

K-State is lucky to have such a great tradition and winning record. Join me in showing our opponents they are welcome in Wildcat country. Let's let the 'Hawks know they can come to K-State to play the Wildcats anytime.

See you Saturday! Go K-State!

Nudity in dance aesthetically pleasing...

Editor,

Re: Jolene Johnson's letter, "Nudity in dance 'immoral,'" in the Feb. 22 Collegian:

Johnson regarded Pilobolus Dance Theatre's use of nudity to depict two women giving birth as immoral; I personally found it refreshing that the human body could be viewed in a purely aesthetic sense without the usual sexual connotations attached.

I wondered if it was the context within which the nudity appeared that Johnson found objectionable. I hope that this is not the case, since the presence of the men was very effective in illustrating human birth — a subject healthily viewed as an affirmation of God and the sanctity of life.

If it was not the context she found immoral, but rather the fact that the human form was viewed in the absence of concealing adornment, I am left in confusion as to why this should constitute immorality.

This particular dance depicted a normal and necessary part of human life, and did not include anything that could in any way be misconstrued to show human degradation or violence. I am sincerely interested in knowing if anyone can offer a rational, logical basis by which to judge this immoral. Johnson?

Editor,

Re: Jolene Johnson's letter, "Nudity in dance 'immoral,'" in the Feb. 22 Collegian:

Linking the national debt to nudity is probably one of the most esoteric arguments I've heard in years! I wonder if those who objected to the nude dance sequence presented as a PART of Pilobolus' dance program bothered to attend the performance.

Like Johnson's letter objecting to tax dollars being spent to support this "immoral" activity, I also object. I object to my tax dollars being spent on the ever-increasing arsenal of nuclear destruction. I would gladly give up the dollars of those who object to artistic freedom if I can be assured that none of my tax dollars go to support the "war machine," and are instead funneled to support the starving arts in this country.

It sounds like some people want to make all the choices for all the people all of the time.

By the way, who did put that fig leaf on Michelangelo's "David?"

Lady 'Cats need support

Editor,

There needs to be more student body participation at the Lady 'Cats basketball games. The team's record thus far is 18-5 overall and 8-2 in Big Eight play. There are two big games coming up against the University of Kansas and the University of Missouri. These may be the two biggest games of the season, and I feel that student participation is needed. The Lady 'Cats are a nationally ranked team and deserve more support!

Carlin backs denial of plant's rate hike

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin said Thursday it is imperative that the 1984 Legislature give the Corporation Commission "explicit authority" to deny rate increases to pay the cost of that portion of the Wolf Creek nuclear plant's generating capacity it finds is not needed.

It was the most definitive statement yet on Carlin's position on Wolf Creek, although one of his aides, former state Rep. John Myers went before the House Energy and Natural Resources Committee Tuesday to outline the governor's stand on what should be done to ease the impact on consumers of the Wolf Creek plant, due to begin operation in a little more than a year.

The governor's statement came in his monthly column written for the state's 257 daily and weekly newspapers. It was mailed Thursday, and the governor's office made copies of the Carlin statement available to the media at the Capitol as well.

"I feel strongly that legislation must be enacted this session to ensure that the Kansas Corporation Commission has explicit authority to protect consumers against the cost of generating capacity they do not need and cannot afford," Carlin said.

"The legislation must make clear the commission's authority to determine excess capacity, to exclude all or some portion of that capacity from the rate base of the responsible electric utilities — whether or not it represents a fraction of a generating plant — and to make accompanying adjustments to revenue requirements of the utilities."

The House committee has three bills under study, and heard testimony on them during a three-day period this week.

All three would permit the Corporation Commission to deny inclusion in the utilities' rate bases any portion of the Wolf Creek plant it considered excess capacity.

James Haines, an attorney for Kansas Gas and Electric Co., Wichita, the lead utility building Wolf Creek, suggested amendments to one of the bills in his appearance Wednesday. One of those amendments would require the KCC to determine what portion of the plant is excess capacity and then allow the utilities to phase in those costs over a four-year period after instituting the rest of the costs immediately.

It is essential the Legislature act this session, Carlin said in his newspaper column, because the KCC doesn't have the authority it now needs "to balance the guarantees demanded by the utilities against the legitimate consumer objections to charges for excess capacity."

"It is not for us to determine how much of the Wolf Creek plant represents unneeded capacity; that is a question for the commission to hear and decide upon the evidence," the governor wrote.

"What is clear, however, is that absent any new law the commission may have no legal choice but to include all of the plant."

"The associated rate increase would, by Kansas Gas and Electric Co. computations, exceed 80 percent."

FBI finds paper chase inconclusive

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department said Thursday it had been unable to discover in an eight-month investigation how Ronald Reagan's presidential campaign obtained former President Jimmy Carter's briefing papers in 1980, but said it "uncovered no credible evidence that the transfer violated any criminal law."

The department also said it had found no evidence of "any plan or conspiracy by Reagan election officials to obtain the Carter briefing materials or any other confidential, internal Carter documents."

The department concluded there were no government documents among the briefing materials and that the Reagan camp never had the final version of Carter's briefing materials for his crucial Oct. 28, 1980, debate with Reagan.

But FBI agents reviewing thousands of documents in the files of Reagan campaign officials did find other documents "identified as internal documents of the Carter White House or the Carter campaign."

But the FBI found no evidence of theft or criminal misappropriation of these documents. "In most instances the material in question had been widely disseminated to the press or others and were obtained through wholly proper channels," the department said.

In other cases, it was impossible to determine how these documents were obtained "due to the professed lack of memory or knowledge on the part of those in possession of the documents," the department said.

In neither these documents nor in the briefing materials was there any classified information, the department said.

The department said the FBI interviewed more than 220 people, including President Reagan and high officials of both campaigns.

Film shows merger of man, wilderness

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Review

"Never Cry Wolf" is a retelling of the experiences of one of Canada's best-known writers — Farley Mowat. When the Canadian government decided that it needed to know more about why the caribou population was dwindling, Mowat was the volunteer sent into the Canadian Yukon to see if there was a link between the timber wolf and the caribou scarcity. Director Carol Ballard's dramatization of Mowat's reminiscences begins as the young Mowat is dropped off on the middle of a frozen lake.

In a wonderfully comedic scene, Mowat pulls open his supply crates to find that the bulk of gradually able to take advantage of the help given him, once he is willing to come out of his sleeping bag to search for food. Mowat then begins to adjust to his environment, and, after much searching, even discovers the timber wolves he was sent to study.

Director Ballard supplies many memorable scenes as Mowat learns to survive. There is a bone-chilling plunge through the ice into the freezing waters of a lake. There also is a terrifying scene where Mowat's initial fear of the wolves takes the form of a dream in which he is hunted down. After he sets up camp beside a wolf den, there is a brilliantly realized scene where Mowat downs cup after cup of tea and then marks off the boundaries of his camp by using the same technique employed by wolves.

This last scene is a very good one in the film because, through this action, Mowat is initiated into the environment. The wolves accept his markings and allow him that territory he has marked off. Not all of his methods for survival are this ingenious, however. When he can't understand if the wolves can actually live solely off of the only food he has seen them eat — mice — he plans to restrict his diet to mice, and thus provide definite evidence that a carnivore, namely the wolf, could survive on such a diet.

The crucial scene in the film is when the caribou return to the tundra and take Mowat by surprise as he lies naked, sunning. In a brilliant scene, the wolves appear and begin stalking the caribou herd. Mowat joins the wolves and stalks the caribou in a wondrous return to a primal state. At this point, the transformation of Mowat is complete. He is no longer the writer-cum-scientist studying the environment; he has become an active part of the world, living as if he were any other creature that naturally called the tundra its home.

Ballard has supplied the film with a very vivid texture that is sure to survive in the memory long after having seen the film. As he proved in "The Black Stallion," Ballard is a master of utilizing photography to its fullest in a manner that is neither pretentious or sentimental. "Never Cry Wolf" is a quantum leap forward for Disney studios. Ballard supplies exactly the type of filming that the studio used to excel in in the 1950s — a style that has become strangely estranged from the studio in the past quarter century. "Never Cry Wolf," like "The Black Stallion," has a timelessness that will allow it to transcend age barriers and be enjoyed just as much by elementary school children as by adults.

his supplies consists of cans of asparagus and hundreds of light bulbs. But the seriousness of the situation sets in as Mowat is just as ill-equipped in his own knowledge of survival in the Yukon as he was with supplies.

Ballard films the scene with a great feel for the desperation of Mowat, but at the same time, he allows the absurdity of the situation to come through. Mowat was in a practically no-win fight for survival; only his young impetuousness was responsible for putting him into such a role where he was so ill-equipped to deal mentally or physically with the forces around him.

Immediately Mowat begins to panic, failing to make any real use of his time before giving way to desperation. As the wolves he was sent to study begin to appear, licking their chops at the sight of him, one of the most important themes in the film is introduced. It is introduced by the appearance of Mowat's savior — an elderly eskimo who is well-attuned to survival in the Yukon. He takes the miserable Mowat and gives him a start by building him a shelter and providing crude implements for survival. The eskimo then disappears as quickly as he had appeared — setting forth the theme of mystical interrelatedness between man and nature. Mowat is Graduating artists to exhibit best work

By DENISE WILLSON
Collegian Reporter

Twenty-eight bachelor of fine arts students will present pieces of art that represent their best work this spring to fulfill a degree requirement.

The exhibits will run beginning today through April 30 in McCain Auditorium, the Art Building, Ambury Gallery, the Union Art Gallery, Farrell Library and Diebler Gallery.

The first exhibit will be shown in McCain beginning today through March 10.

According to Rosella Ogg, art instructor in charge of the exhibits, McCain is a good place to exhibit the work because it offers access to student audiences as well as the Manhattan community.

McCain also offers an added benefit to the students whose work is exhibited there in that the pieces are secured by a wiring system.

The students must present their pieces in a professional fashion, Ogg said. This includes setting up the show, doing their own publicity, attaching a name label to and framing each piece.

It is an expensive project for students, Ogg said, but the project has added advantages. In addition to fulfilling graduation requirements, students can use the prepared pieces in portfolios to present to potential employers.

Those exhibiting work in the McCain exhibit have an advantage over those who exhibit later, because the early time element leaves more time to present these pieces to employers, Ogg said.

The McCain exhibit features work by Cynthia Ditzler, Gina Doyle, Tim McNamara, Tom Hubbard, Todd Meyers and Brenda Shevlin, seniors in fine arts.

Ditzler will show nine pieces, including a silkscreen piece, a painting and graphics work. Much of her work is done in Gothic style.

McNamara will show approximately eight drawings in two series. The first series will be black and white pencil, while the second series will implement colored patterns and shapes. With the exception of one drawing, McNamara created the pieces expressly for the exhibit because he "wanted to show something new," he said. The one piece was completed two years ago, but he said he liked the piece and wanted to exhibit it. From that piece he developed several others in the exhibit.

Doyle and Hubbard each will show eight airbrushed pieces employing various techniques.

Doyle also will show a watercolor, a drawing and a graphics piece. She worked on the pieces for two years and created one piece, an airbrush of two toucans, expressly for the show.

Hubbard will include two printed pieces along with his airbrush design.

The various pieces accumulated over the years, Hubbard said. These are the "cream of the crop of the portfolio," he said.

Meyers will show eight to 10 pieces, most of which are graphic designs and illustrations. He also will include several lithographs.

Shevlin will show nine pieces: five black and white graphics, one painting and three drawings. Most of her pieces were completed one to two years ago. She did two ink drawings specifically for the show.

Each of the group members commended the others on the participation involved in their group. They said the show was fun to develop, but involved a lot of work.

"It's a good experience," Shevlin said. "It makes you polish up your work and present it to the public."

The first exhibit will include an invitational reception March 4 for faculty, parents and guests.

The second exhibition is scheduled to begin March 19 in McCain.

Theater troupe delivers Britten's farcical opera

The K-State Opera Theatre will kick off its 1984 season March 1-3 with Benjamin Britten's comic opera, "Albert Herring" in McCain Auditorium.

Tickets for "Albert Herring" are $4.50 for the public and $3.50 for students and senior citizens. They are available at McCain box office.

The opera, first performed in 1946 in Glyndebourne, England, begins when village officials meet to choose the annual May Queen. Yet, every girl suggested is accused of an immoral act. The city superintendent, played by Glen Hughes, junior in music education, solves the problem by proposing a May King — the virtuous, good-as-gold Albert Herring, portrayed by Brent Weber, senior in music education.

Herring proceeds through the ceremony, but a latent rebellion is aroused in him by a liberal dose of rum put in his lemonade by Sid and Nancy, (J.V. Heffel, senior in applied music, and Kathy Pfister, sophomore in music, respectively).

young lovers whom Albert secretly envies. Mysteriously, the hero of the day disappears with only his crushed orange-blossom wreath left behind. In the midst of the ensuing deathwatch for him, Albert reappears to disconcert the mourners and to assert his emancipation. With a kiss from Nancy as his reward, Albert gaily flings the offending orange-blossom wreath out amongst the audience to conclude his dilemma.

John Culshaw, producer of the recorded version of "Albert Herring," described the opera as "a comedy, not a farce." Further, it is a social comedy whose characters fall into lower- and upper-class categories.

Co-produced by K-State's departments of Music and Speech, "Albert Herring" will be directed by Tomas C. Hernandez, assistant professor of speech. Stage manager is Cindy Baker, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education. Jerry R. Langenkamp, professor of music, will be the vocal director as Ralph Winkler, associate professor of music, conducts the chamber orchestra.

In the K-State production, Hernandez changed the opera's time period from Britten's original 19th century set to 1913, based on a book by Virginia Cowles, "1913: An End and A Beginning."

Britten, an English composer, conductor and pianist, received honors from many British and foreign universities. The success of his 1945 hit, "Peter Grimes," led to his title as the most gifted music dramatist England had produced since Purcell. He became a Companion of Honor in 1962, a member of the Order of Merit in 1965, and was named the first musician to become a life peer in 1976.

Lindsborg group's 'Messiah' to be performed in Topeka

For the first time since 1945, the Bethany College Oratorio Society Chorus and Orchestra will present their rendition of Handel's "Messiah" in a city other than Lindsborg.

The chorus and orchestra will perform in Topeka at 2:30 p.m. April 29 at Municipal Auditorium. The show is sponsored by the Friends of Hospice of Topeka.

The 470-member chorus and orchestra will perform as usual on Palm Sunday and Easter Sunday in Lindsborg.

"Messiah" performances usually sell out in Lindsborg by Feb. 15, according to John J. Fernstrom, who heads special events for the Friends of Hospice. Topekan who usually travel to Lindsborg for the event may now see it in Topeka.

Proceeds from the performance will be used to support Hospice's volunteer program. Funds are needed to train volunteers and continue educational programs for Hospice volunteers.

Tickets, which cost $8, are currently available in several Topeka locations. Tickets also may be requested by sending a self-addressed, stamped envelope and check to: Topeka Hospice Headquarters, 1522 W. 8th, Topeka, Kan. 66606.

Disney introduces new film company

Walt Disney pictures has announced it will release some future films under a new company name, Touchstone Films, while it will continue to produce and release motion pictures under the Walt Disney Pictures title.

"Splash," opening nationally March 9, will be the first film to carry the Touchstone logo.

Under the Walt Disney Pictures label, the company will continue to produce live-action and animated feature films, according to Barry Glasser, national publicity director for the company.

"With Touchstone we are making a very clear distinction between classical, customary Disney family entertainment and our diversification into a wider spectrum of films," said Ron Miller, president and chief executive officer of Walt Disney Productions.

"The name Walt Disney Pictures on a production will signal that the film is designed as family entertainment, while the Touchstone name will identify those films appealing to other segments of the audience," Miller said. "In effect, Disney is now the only studio to have its own self-imposed, in-house rating system to guide parents in the selection of motion picture viewing for their families.

"The same standards which have always governed Disney films will continue to be maintained as we expand our filmmaking activities," he said.

Berger said the Touchstone label will "give the company the flexibility to explore wider opportunities in filmmaking, reaching out to the new generation of teenage and young adult audiences that make up the majority of the movie-going public."

"We want to explore current challenges in creative filmmaking," he said.

"The logical course to take was a second label with another identification that would avoid misleading and confusing our audience while we protect the value of the Disney image," Berger said.

An added incentive for a second label alternative exists, according to Berger.

"With broader options of acceptability of film scripts, we are confident that we will attract the top creative talent in the industry."

Rio can't be blamed

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

No, don't "Blame It On Rio," blame it on Stanley Donen and Larry Gelbart. These are the people really responsible for this very disappointing film. It's especially disappointing for Gelbart — one of the major contributors for "M*A*S*H" — after having had success with "Tootsie." Stanley Donen, who has given us such classic 1950s musicals as "On The Town" and "Singin' In The Rain," has been increasingly unable to make any films in the past decade that show any of the sophistication of his earlier work.

Review

In "Blame It On Rio," an attempt has been made to create the absurdity of a French sex farce. The results, though, are more of a wet dream than they are a sex farce, with the temptress being a sex-hungry American teenage girl who looks as if she just stepped out of the pages of "Playboy." Maybe the person most at fault for this film is the person who cast Michelle Johnson as the female lead. While she is definitely quite beautiful, she definitely can't act. Not a single movement she makes or word she speaks rings true. She is quite good at pouting and pursing her lips, but that is about all. She is given ample time to display her body on screen, taking her shirt off more often than Richard Gere or Matt Dillon.

The film revolves around the character she seduces — her father's best friend. When the fathers each bring along their college-age daughters on a trip to Rio de Janeiro, the stage is set for much partner switching.

Michael Caine is the father who is seduced and then falls in love with her. The plot is complicated, though, by her father who thinks she is still a virgin. She breaks down and tells daddy that she "did it" with someone. Her father, played by Joseph Bologna, tries to get her to confess who was responsible for "forcing" himself upon her. In the only true comic highlight of the film, Caine, having overheard the conversation, struggles to pack his bag and get out of the house before she reveals his name. Caine is very adept at the physical humor offered in this scene. It's a pity that he wasn't given more opportunities like this one. Most of the time, he must simply act embarrassed as she stokes his knee beneath the dinner table or bares her chest in front of him.

There is so little wit in the film that it is destined to fall flat. The dialogue is all quite trite and uninteresting. The plot is just a rehashing of the male menopausal fantasy. Along the way, director Donen utilizes the Rio scenery to its fullest, but his travelogue camera style is notable only for its lack of imagination.

Original '007' wins Harvard honor

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — Actor Sean Connery, the original agent "007" of James Bond movies, was presented a curly wig and the traditional pudding pot at Harvard on Wednesday as the Hasty Pudding Theatrical's Man of the Year recipient.

"This is the first time I've been in Boston and I'm thrilled to be going with hair," the balding Connery said.

"If I had been educated here at Harvard, I would have made an intelligent speech. But since I left school at 13 and since we're running about 15 minutes late, I'll just say thank you very much indeed."

Connery also was presented with a dart board bearing a photo of Roger Moore, the other James Bond.

Hope accepts Citadel's invitation

CHARLESTON, S.C. — President Reagan couldn't make it, so comedian Bob Hope will be the speaker for this May's commencement exercises at The Citadel, officials at the military school announced Thursday.

"The reason President Reagan is not available is the proximity of May 12 to the Republican National Convention and because of his recent visit to South Carolina in September of 1983," Col. Ben Legare, school spokesman, said.

"Bob Hope, in his letter, said it would be nice to see the two great Americans again — Gen. Mark Clark and Gen. William Westmoreland," Legare said.

Clark commanded the 5th Army which liberated Italy in World War II, while Westmoreland commanded American troops in Vietnam. Clark is president emeritus of The Citadel.

Thatcher to keep trip business-like

LONDON — Mark Thatcher, British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's 30-year-old son, left London for New York on Thursday, but he wouldn't say if he planned to see his Texas girlfriend while in the United States.

"I'm going out on business, not pleasure," he told reporters before boarding an 11:00 a.m. flight at London's Heathrow Airport.

Thatcher, a race car driver, said he'd be traveling across the United States as a representative of Lotus automakers.

Karen Fortson, a 24-year-old oil millionaire's daughter from Fort Worth, spent the past weekend with Thatcher and his family at Chequers, the prime minister's country retreat.

Oldest medalist criticizes training

PHILADELPHIA — Abel Kiviat, the oldest living U.S. Olympic medal winner at age 91, has a word for the kind of training young runners put themselves through these days.

"Ridiculous," said the silver medalist in the 1,500 meters race at the 1912 Summer Games in Stockholm.

"You've got kids in high school running five, six miles a day before breakfast. I didn't run five miles in a month."

Kiviat made the comment Wednesday at the 61st annual convention of the American Alliance for Health, Physical Education, Recreation and Dance.

The year Kiviat won the silver medal, he worked as a traveling salesman, selling class rings at high schools and colleges throughout New Jersey.

"I didn't train every day," he said. "Making a living was very important."

Officer's murder causes controversy

New Yorkers question parole system

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Officer Thomas P. Ruotolo, one week away from transfer to a desk job, was gunned down while investigating a report of a stolen moped. Police quickly nabbed their suspect — a convicted killer who had remained on parole despite two arrests and another jail term.

The case has engulfed New York's criminal justice system in controversy, with the 15-member parole board, the practice of plea-bargaining and the entire system itself coming under fire.

Almost all the public figures who leaped — or were dragged — into the fray agree the system should be changed, but disagree on how. Suggestions range from doing away with parole entirely to strengthening the present system to make supervision of parolees more effective.

Gov. Mario Cuomo has ordered Lawrence T. Kurlander, the state's criminal justice coordinator, to find out why George Agosto was out on parole when he allegedly killed Ruotolo outside a South Bronx gas station Feb. 14.

Two other police officers were wounded in the shootout. Agosto was arrested at a hospital where he was being treated for gunshot wounds.

Agosto, 24, was paroled in September 1982 after serving three years and five months of a 5-15 year sentence for manslaughter.

He was arrested in January 1983 on charges of possession of a loaded gun and driving a motor vehicle without a license, but those charges were dismissed. He was arrested again on July 5, 1983, and served three months after being convicted of criminal mischief, but remained on parole.

The debate heated up Monday, when an officer was wounded by four men who burst into a drug stakeout in Harlem. Two of the suspects in that shooting were parolees, and two were on probation, police said.

The governor, who said the Ruotolo case is indicative of a widespread failure in the criminal justice system, nominated a new parole board chairman on Wednesday.

The nominee, Ramon Rodriguez, executive director of the state Division of Youth, said one of his major goals would be to insure "adequate supervision for parolees. People have a right to feel safe."

Edward Hammock, who has been chairman since 1976, implied through spokesman Paul Young that he had been made a scapegoat, saying the Agosto case was "unfortunately presented as a direct reflection on my abilities. I resent such suggestions. They're not true."

Hammock blamed a lax parole officer and supervisor for the failure to revoke Agosto's parole.

Hammock also said he had sent Kurlander numerous letters about board understaffing, poor morale and caseloads that have increased from about 42 for most officers in 1978 to 90 today.

Kurlander was attending a conference in California on Thursday and could not be reached for comment.

Young laid the blame on plea bargaining, saying the controversy would be a "moot point" if Agosto had been given consecutive instead of concurrent sentences. At the time of the manslaughter conviction, Agosto was serving a term of up to four years for attempted robbery. Normally Agosto would have had to serve five years on the manslaughter conviction before being eligible for parole, but he was given credit for time served for attempted robbery.

"If (Bronx District Attorney) Mario Merola or the judges want to give the courthouse away, fine. Sentencing isn't our job," said Young.

Replied Merola: "The present system calls for plea bargaining. That's no answer for him not doing his job."

Deputy Police Commissioner Wilhelmina Holliday pointed to herself, saying she was "devastated" to learn that she was one of the board members who paroled Agosto. She also charged there was a "breakdown in supervision" after Agosto's release.

In New York, a criminal sentenced to 5-10 years can get out of prison by: completing the full term; getting parole after serving at least five years; or earning conditional release, receiving up to a third of the maximum sentence off for good behavior.

According to Young, 2.9 percent of the 26,213 state parolees last year were sent back to prison for "renewed criminal activity;" another 7 percent were reincarcerated for such rule violations as associating with known criminals.

Of the 138,000 felony arrests in New York in 1983, 472 of them were of parolees, "less than one-half of 1 percent," he said, adding that the board turns down 68 percent of the first-time parole applications.

Michael Bell, executive vice president of the New York State Parole Officers Association, said parole is evoked automatically when a parolee is convicted of a new crime. But Hammock said the board was never informed of the criminal mischief conviction by the parole officer, who has not been identified.

New York City Mayor Edward Koch and Police Commissioner Benjamin Ward have said the parole system should be abolished in favor of conditional release.

Cuomo advocates changes in the system, but not "a total abolition" of the parole board, said spokesman Gary Fryer.

Fryer said the governor wants the Legislature to approve determinate sentencing for certain violent crimes, thereby reducing the number of cases before the parole board.

Forward Jennifer Jones will lead the Lady 'Cats into a traditional battle between K-State and the University of Kansas on Saturday at 2 p.m. in Ahearn Field House.

K-State to battle arch-rival 'Hawks

By HUEY COUNTS
Sports Editor

One of the biggest basketball rivalries in the Big Eight Conference will get underway once again at 7:05 p.m. Saturday as the University of Kansas Jayhawks and K-State Wildcats square off at Ahearn Field House.

In the first meeting between the teams this season, the Jayhawks grabbed a 65-54 victory, ending a five-game winning skein for the 'Cats over the 'Hawks. KU out-rebounded the 'Cats, 39-26, and shot a higher percentage from the field — 49 percent compared to K-State's 36 percent.

Carl Henry paces the KU attack with a 16.8 points-per-game average while shooting 57 percent from the field. Kelly Knight leads the Jayhawks in rebounding with 6.9 boards per contest while scoring at a clip of 10.8 points per game.

The Wildcats will counter with 6-foot-9 center Eddie Elder, who leads the team in scoring (14.0) and rebounding (7.7), and Tom Alfaro, who fired in 80 points in the last four league contests — three of them victories — and whose scoring average of 11.3 ranks second on the squad.

This year's KU and K-State basketball squads have no and little chance of winning the conference title, respectively. The Wildcats are 4-7 and completely out of the title hunt, while KU's 92-82 loss to the conference-leading University of Oklahoma virtually eliminated the Jayhawks, currently 7-4, from any title hopes. The Sooners would have to lose all three of their remaining conference contests and KU would have to win their three just to get a tie.

The rivalry goes back to the 1906-1907 season when KU stopped the Wildcats 54-39 in Lawrence in their first meeting, but K-State bounced back with a 29-25 victory at home.

The head coach for the Jayhawks, who went 12-7 that season, was Dr. James Naismith. Naismith is best known as the "Father of Basketball." Mike Ahearn was the coach of the 3-6 Wildcats in those initial meetings. The building the Wildcats currently play basketball in is named after him.

Many great players have competed for the two squads over the years. Probably the most well-known player to come out of KU is Wilt Chamberlain. Chamberlain is one of six Jayhawk basketball players officially recognized by the National Collegiate Athletic Association as having been named an All-American twice (1957-1956). Other two-time All-Americans include Jo Jo White (1968-1969) and Clyde Lovelette (1951-1952).

The Jayhawks' most recent All-American was Darnell Valentine, who received the honor in 1981.

The Wildcats have had their own share of top-notch basketball players. Dick Knostman (1952-1953), Jack Parr (1957-1958) and Bob Boozer (1958-1959) were two-time All-Americans for K-State. Former Wildcats' guard Rolando Blackman grabbed All-American honors for his 1981 performance.

KU is the owner or shareholder of 37 Big Six, Big Seven and Big Eight titles, and K-State owns or shares 17.

Bavasi denies Angels started Aikens on drug

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Willie Aikens' claim that two former California Angels teammates got him started on cocaine as a rookie in the major leagues has been discounted by E.J. "Buzzie" Bavasi, executive vice president of the Angels.

"I don't believe it," Bavasi told The Kansas City Times in an interview concerning claims Aikens made in a recent interview with The Toronto Star.

"At that time, he couldn't buy much on $16,000," Bavasi said in reference to the major-league minimum salary in 1979. "I think he's rationalizing and trying to blame someone else for his own mistake."

"I think he's doing a con job on somebody. I had no inkling of it, nor did our doctors. No one shows you how to do that. You do it on your own. It is a disease that is self-inflicted," Bavasi said in the interview published today in the Times.

Aikens, who is serving a three-month federal prison term on a misdemeanor charge of trying to obtain cocaine, told the Toronto newspaper that two Angels teammates beckoned to him from behind a half-open door while he was walking down a hotel

But since the conference expanded to eight teams in 1959, the Wildcats have won or shared 10 championships, followed by KU's seven.

KU's last title was in 1978, which followed K-State's most recent title in 1977.

The Jayhawks hold a 119-81 series advantage, but trail at Ahearn by a 22-13 margin. KU's last win in Manhattan was a 48-46 decision in 1980. Wildcat Head Coach Jack Hartman is 20-16 against the Hawks with an 11-3 record at Ahearn.

hallway in 1979.

Aikens said the players, whom he refused to identify, asked whether he would like to try some great stuff. He said he would and added that later "I felt pretty good."

Aikens, 29, is one of four members of the 1983 Kansas City Royals given three-month sentences last year on the cocaine charges. Outfielders Willie Wilson and Jerry Martin were released from prison Thursday, but Aikens and pitcher Vida Blue are still serving time.

Only Wilson remains with the Royals. Aikens was traded to the Toronto Blue Jays, Martin was released and plans to try out with the New York Mets and Blue was released.

Aikens said he used drugs a few times after being traded to the Royals in 1980 but laid off drugs for most of the next two years. It was in October 1982, Aikens told the Toronto Star, that the vicious drug-use cycle began when he met a cocaine supplier. "It was free and it was good stuff," he said.

Aikens said he settled into a routine during that winter where he was using cocaine two or three times a week. "I didn't have to worry about going up and hitting a little white baseball," he said.

"I did weird things. Hitting, playing in the field — there were things that happened I felt happened because of the night before. I'm trying to be honest. I've learned I have to be honest," Aikens told the Toronto Star.

Aikens said in the Toronto Star interview that he attended a drug rehabilitation program in Baltimore before reporting to prison because he thought it might sway the court in his favor.

"I thought maybe the judge wouldn't give me a jail term. But he didn't even look at that. What I went there for, it didn't do. But the program did something else a lot more important. It gave me a chance to see myself again," Aikens said.

the nation with a 22.7 scoring average. Adkins, who averages 19 points per Big Eight contest, picked apart the K-State defense in the two squads' earlier meeting, canning a game-high 29 points.

K-State will hope for stronger inside play and will look to leading scorer and rebounder Angie Bonner for assistance. Bonner averages 14.6 points and 7.0 rebounds per Big Eight contest, and scored 15 points and grabbed nine rebounds in the Lady 'Cats' previous loss to KU.

Being a Marine Corps Officer can open the door to opportunities you may have thought were beyond your reach. It helped Marine Officer Charles Bolden become a NASA astronaut. And if you're willing to make the commitment, it could help you also. You can get started while you're in college with our undergraduate officer commissioning program. You could take advantage of getting:

- $100 a month while in school
- Freshmen and Sophomores train during two six-week summer sessions each paying more than $1100
- Juniors train in one ten-week summer session and earn more than $1900

■ Free civilian flying lessons

■ A starting salary of more than $17,000

Immediately upon graduation you could become a Marine Officer. It's your choice. Maybe you're the kind of man we're looking for.

U.S. ship retaliates after attack on jet

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — The U.S. Marines pulled out of Beirut on Sunday and an hour later the battleship New Jersey turned its big guns on Syrian anti-aircraft gunners that had fired on a U.S. reconnaissance jet.

The jet was not hit and no Syrian casualties were reported in the fire from the New Jersey's 16-inch guns, the largest on any ship in the world.

Fighting between the Moslems and Christians kept up all day along the "green line" that divides Beirut and police said 13 people were killed and 47 wounded. The fighting has mounted steadily since Friday's short-lived Saudi-mediated cease-fire.

The evacuation of about 1,000 Marines began just after midnight Sunday and was completed in about 12 hours, with the front-line combat companies Echo and Fox being taxed out by helicopter.

The last of the Marines' amphibious personnel carriers rolled into the Mediterranean surf at 12:27 p.m. with Staff Sgt. Jerry Elokovich, 32, of Toledo, Ohio, waving from atop the vehicle.

The Beirut airport positions the Marines vacated were divided up quickly between the Lebanese army and Moslem militiamen, with the key airport positions going to the army. The militiamen raised their green flag over the western perimeter of the airport base and also claimed part of the coastal highway.

With the Marines, the Italians and the British gone, only a 1,500-member French contingent is left of the Multinational Force in Beirut. It is deployed along the green line.

About 100 Marines remain to guard the U.S. Embassy offices on Beirut's northern coastline, and 80 U.S. Army advisers and seven staff members remain at the Lebanese Defense Ministry.

As the Marines were pulling out, Syrian anti-aircraft fire forced a U.S. reconnaissance jet to fly back to sea. The New Jersey responded with shelling of Syrian positions in the Metn mountains northeast of Beirut.

A military spokesman in Damascus said there were no Syrian casualties.

The New Jersey fired "over 10 rounds," said U.S. Army Col. Ed

McDonald, 46, of Rochester, N.Y. Western reporters also saw the battleship firing what appeared to be its five-inch guns. The Christian "Voice of Lebanon" said two American ships fired 49 shells at Syrian missiles.

It was the first time since Feb. 8 that the U.S. Navy had fired its biggest guns. On Saturday night, the USS Caron fired more than 70 rounds of its five-inch guns in response to what a Marine spokesman said was anti-government militia fire on Beirut.

The New Jersey began firing 63 minutes after the last Marine amphibious personnel carrier moved out toward Navy warships lying off the coast.

The Marines were happy to be leaving.

"All these people want us to do is go home," said Gunnery Sgt. Michael McGilveray, 32, of Montgomery, Ala.

Marine Brig. Gen. James R. Joy, 48, of Conception, Miss., who is in command of the remaining Americans, said some positions at the airport had been turned over to the Lebanese army.

At the airport terminal, a senior Lebanese security official who asked to remain anonymous said the facility and nearby Marine positions were being guarded by the 3rd and 6th Brigades.

The 6th Brigade and part of the 3rd, dominated by Shiite Moslems, are only nominally under the control of President Amin Gemayel's government. On Feb. 6, they laid down their guns when the Shiite Amal seized control of west Beirut.

The official also said Shiite and Druse officials were observing arrangements for Lebanese army security at the airport.

There was no progress in diplomatic efforts Sunday, but the Lebanese-born Saudi mediator, Rafik Hariri, was due back in Beirut to try to reinstate the cease-fire.

In a Beirut news conference, Amal leader Nabih Berri rejected demands from the Israeli occupation army in southern Lebanon for security guarantees. The Israelis are being attacked daily by militant Shiites in the south.

"The wolf is demanding protection from the sheep after this sheep turned into a tiger," he said. "If Israel insists on staying in the south, there won't be any security for the Galilee," Israel's northern region.

Patrons panic as tear gas fills local bar

Seven people were treated and released at hospitals after someone set off a tear gas grenade in a crowded Aggieville bar after Saturday night's basketball game between K-State and the University of Kansas.

Hospital officials refused to release the names of those injured in the 11 p.m. incident at Kite's Bar and Grille, 619 N. 12th. About $1,000 damage to the bar was caused when customers stampeded toward exits.

No arrests have been made and police have no suspects, a Riley County Police Department records clerk said Sunday.

Brad Hedrick, manager of Kite's and senior in accounting and architecture, said there were more than 200 people in the bar when the grenade was set off near the men's restroom.

"It was utter panic," Hedrick said. "Tables and booths were turned over. People were climbing over the tables to get out as soon as they could. People couldn't breathe. They couldn't see. They just panicked," Hedrick said.

He said none of the employees saw anybody set the grenade off.

The management initially assessed the damage to be more than $1,000. This amount didn't include the plastic beer cups and food from the bar's grill that will be thrown away because they were contaminated by the gas.

The management of Kite's was making efforts to sanitize the bar Sunday afternoon. Hedrick said health and fire department officials would be called in to assist with the sanitation process. He said he didn't know if the work would be completed in time for Kite's to be open Monday.

Saturday was the final night that Terry Ray, owner of Ray Enterprises, had official ownership of Kite's.

Ray said Sunday that he had no more knowledge of the incident than police did. He said the repairs would be "taken care of."

The incident follows several similar pranks in recent months. On Oct. 16, 1983, a military eye irritant bomb was thrown into hallway at the Sigma Chi fraternity house, causing three members to be hospitalized. A grenade simulator was placed in the mailbox of the Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity Jan. 6 and caused extensive damage. Two weeks ago, several people were hospitalized after teargas was placed in a Lawrence nightclub.

Hart predicts second place in primary

By The Associated Press

CONCORD, N.H. — Sen. Gary Hart, buoyed by a poll pointing to a surge in New Hampshire, predicted Sunday that he will take second place in the state's lead-off primary and emerge as front-runner Walter Mondale's prime challenger for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Sen. John Glenn, seen for a year as Mondale's principal rival, was less than certain that he can turn back Hart's challenge. "I think we can," he said as he and several other contenders campaigned via network television interview programs.

Two days before the primary, all the polls and all the pundits agreed — Mondale will win Tuesday.

Sen. Ernest Hollings said that if the former vice president can claim a convincing enough triumph, "It's not only going to be the first primary, it's going to be the last." Mondale spent most of the day campaigning in Maine and Vermont, leaving New Hampshire to the efforts of a large, labor-backed campaign organization.

That organization had 600 volunteers contacting voters in their homes across the state and mailing out thousands of mock invitations to vote Tuesday.

There were similar, if smaller, last-minute canvassing efforts by other candidates.

As the first primary state, New Hampshire gave Mondale a chance to add to his strong victory in last Monday's Iowa caucuses and solidify his claim as the Democratic front-runner.

For some of his pursuers, it represented a chance to emerge from the pack as the main alternative to the front-runner in later primary and caucus states.

A new poll by The Washington Post and ABC said Mondale had the support of 38 percent of the voters, compared with 24 percent for Hart and 14 percent for Glenn.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson got 7 percent; former Sen. George McGovern, 6 percent; Hollings, 4 percent; Sen. Alan Cranston, 1 percent; and former Florida Gov. Reubin Askew, less than 1 percent.

The polling took place from Wednesday to Friday in a sample of more than 5,000 people. The results were derived from information from 351 voters most likely to vote in the Democratic primary.

Interviewed on CBS-TV's "Face the Nation" Sunday, Hart said, "I think I'll eventually win some primaries and I think it will be fairly soon."

"I will win this nomination. I'm absolutely sure," said Hart, who finished a surprise second in the Iowa caucuses.

As for New Hampshire, he said, "I believe we'll come in second. We're competing with Sen. Glenn, of course, who's much better known and has much more money."

Glenn, who finished fifth in the Iowa caucuses, was hoping to get back his undisputed claim as Mondale's principal challenger.

Asked if he could defeat Hart, he replied, "I think we can. I think things are going very well in New Hampshire."

Glenn said he is in the race to stay no matter what happens Tuesday.

"When you get into something for principle, you don't just drop out the first time there happens to be a negative poll," he said on the NBC-TV program "Meet the Press."

There were suggestions earlier in the week that some of the contenders would be forced to drop out by a poor finish in New Hampshire, but all insisted they are ready for the next round after Tuesday.

Cranston, interviewed after Hart, said, "We take the campaign from week to week. Right now it's New Hampshire, next week it's Maine, and we will see where we are."

University surpasses blood donation goal

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

The bloodmobile left K-State on Friday with less blood than last semester. Nevertheless, the total collection surpassed the goal of 1,400 units set by the Red Cross.

A total of 1,624 units of blood were donated during the drive, which took place Tuesday through Friday last week, said Lea Ruggles, chairman of the K-State bloodmobile, which is the largest donating institution in its region. Last semester the total was 1,747 units, while last spring semester the total was 1,500 units. Circle K has sponsored the bloodmobile at K-State for the past 21 years.

Gary Nelson, volunteer public relations director for the Riley County Bloodmobile, said K-State fulfilled 101 percent of the goal set by the Wichita Region Red Cross for the 1982-1983 fiscal year with a total donation of 2,820 units of whole blood. The rest of the Manhattan area, donating 785 units, fulfilled only 87 percent of the Wichita center's goal during that period, he said.

A total of 2,155 units and derivatives were brought back into Manhattan hospitals during that time, Nelson said. These units were separated into 1,845 units of red blood cells, 269 units of whole blood and 41 units of fresh frozen platelets.

Speakers outline policy for sexual harassment complaints

By KARRA PORTER
Staff Writer

Despite some problems implementing K-State's sexual harassment policy, which was distributed last October, Affirmative Action Director Dorothy Thompson is optimistic about the policy's chances for success.

Thompson and Jane Rowlett, associate director of Affirmative Action, discussed the new policy Friday as part of the Focus on Women Series. The series is sponsored by the Women's Studies Program and the Women's Resource Center.

Although many of the questions raised at the meeting concerned shortcomings in the harassment policy, Thompson said she hopes it will bring about an improvement in the problem of sexual harassment at K-State.

The number of complaints filed with Affirmative Action since the implementation of the policy has not risen much, and Thompson said she does not foresee any "flood" of complaints.

Affirmative Action hears an average of one complaint a month, all from women. None of the complaints has been unfounded, Thompson said.

"I would hope the dissemination of the policy would result in fewer and fewer complaints, because once people know more about sexual harassment, once they know what the University's policy is, I would expect to see some changes in behavior," she said.

Whether the policy is actually accomplishing that is impossible to judge, said Thompson, who was chairman of the committee which developed the policy. The final product, a three-page policy statement, was distributed by K-State President Duane Aker to University administrative officials last October.

The reason behind a formal policy against sexual harassment is the University's position that, in addition to being illegal, "such actions violate not only the dignity of the individual, but also the integrity of the University as an institution of learning," Thompson said.

Sexual harassment can generally be divided into two categories: "gender," which involves debasement of a person solely on the basis of his or her sex; and "sexual," which is a more sexually-oriented personal harassment.

Examples of sexual harassment cited in Affirmative Action educational material include instructors who make sexist jokes in class; a group of men who "encourage" a woman to participate in conversations which contain degrading remarks; and persons who demand sexual favors from subordinates in order for the victim to receive educational assistance or retain his or her job.

Thompson said the committee spent several months trying to come up with a policy which was legally sound and applicable to the University environment.

The first part of the policy defines sexual harassment as any behavior which, through inappropriate sexual content or disparagement of members of one sex, interferes with an individual's work or learning environment.

The policy introduction presents the negative effects of sexual harassment. The rest of the policy is devoted to guidelines for resolving complaints.

As part of the educational campaign suggested by the committee, department heads and other administrators are required to discuss the policy at meetings, Thompson said.

Problems have arisen, however, when some department heads and administrators have expressed opposition to the policy or treated the meetings lightly, she said.

Thompson said she believes the support of the deans will influence uncooperative administrators, but "additional measures" may be needed in the future to ensure a good understanding of the policy and cooperation from departments.

'Hay-Veyor' wins national award

The "Hay-Veyor," a machine that gathers and moves field windrows, has won a national award for agricultural engineering students at K-State.

The machine took second prize in the annual design contest of the American Society of Agricultural Engineers. It was developed by the students in a machinery design class taught by G.E. Fairbanks, now professor emeritus of agricultural engineering.

The Hay-Veyor was designed to move a windrow to a new location and fluff it up for faster drying. The machine also can be used to combine two windrows to make baling easier.

Windrows are long, narrow rows of raked-up hay or other vegetation that has been mowed down and left to dry. The vegetation in the windrows is later baled and used for feed.

Members of the team that developed the Hay-Veyor were Mark Eilert, recent graduate in agricultural engineering; Naomi Regier, graduate in agricultural engineering; Dennis Schmidt, senior in agricultural engineering and Robert Tedford, senior in agricultural engineering.

Trumpet, bell choirs to perform

The K-State Brass and Bells annual performance is scheduled for 8 p.m. Tuesday in the Danforth Chapel Auditorium.

The Brass and Bells consists of the K-State trumpet choir directed by Paul Shull, associate professor of music, and The Rhapsody Ringers, a bell choir directed by Joan Shull, Manhattan resident.

Most of the performers are college students. The bell choir usually performs at the First United Methodist Church, 612 Poyntz Ave., and is not a part of the K-State music department.

There will be no admission charge for the performance.

Four sororities pledge 23 women

In a recent, limited, informal rushing period, four K-State sororities pledged 23 women.

There were 43 women registered for the rushing period. The purpose of the spring rush primarily was to fill house vacancies.

Alpha Chi Omega pledged five women, Alpha Delta Pi pledged five women, Kappa Delta pledged seven women and Sigma Sigma Sigma pledged six women.

K-State's formal rush will be August 15-20.

Research directory lists scientists

K-State is among 140 universities, corporate laboratories and other research institutions represented in the "1984 Reporters' Guide to Key Research Activities in Science and Engineering."

The annual directory is compiled by the American Association for the Advancement of Science. It is a continuing AAAS effort to call attention to institutions where key scientific work is being done.

The directory is distributed to science journalists throughout the country and will be made available to the more than 500 reporters expected to cover the AAAS annual meeting in May in New York City.

The K-State researchers listed in the directory are:

Bikram Gill, associate professor of plant pathology, for research in wild wheat chromosomes; Curtis Kastner, associate professor of animal science, for hot boning of meat; Horst Leipold, professor of pathology, for animal birth defects; Mark Schrock, assistant professor of agricultural engineering, for computerized tractors; and Wayne Rohrer, professor of sociology and anthropology, for research on the quality of life in rural areas.

Postmasters establish cancer fund

The Postmasters of Kansas have established a "Don Marrs Cancer Research Fund" at K-State to honor Marrs, a letter carrier from Ohio and cancer victim.

The donations are to be used to support cancer research and educational programs in the K-State Center for Basic Cancer Research.

Marrs, 45, met many Kansas postal employees during his 1981 cross-country walk to raise money for cancer research. Marrs began his trek in Carlyle, Ill. and walked 2,100 miles to San Francisco. His journey took him through southern Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma, northern Texas, Colorado, Utah, Nevada and California. Along the way he spoke with cancer patients and concerned citizens, raising $1 million for cancer research.

Since completing his 94-day walk, Marrs has returned to work as a letter carrier. He has spoken to both state and national conventions of the postmasters, as well as to many other groups.

Photojournalists return to speak at colloquium

By SHARI SAIA
Contributing Writer

Two prominent photojournalists will visit K-State as guest speakers for a Department of Journalism and Mass Communications colloquium on Wednesday.

Presentations will be given by Gary Haynes of the Philadelphia Inquirer and Pete Souza of the White House photographic staff. Both men attended K-State as undergraduate or graduate students and worked on the Collegian staff.

Haynes, a 1957 graduate of K-State, is currently assistant managing editor and director of photography at the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Haynes worked for United Press International for about 10 years, and from 1961 to 1964 covered such events as civil rights activities, Apollo and Mercury National Aeronautics and Space Administration missions, Olympic Games in Tokyo and Mexico, presidential inaugurations, the 1964 invasion of the Dominican Republic and the enrollment of James Meredith as the first black attending the University of Mississippi.

Many of Haynes' photographs were published in the book titled "Four Days," which recounts the days in Washington, D.C. immediately following the assassination of President John F. Kennedy.

Souza attended K-State from fall 1977 to spring 1979 as a graduate student after doing his undergraduate work in Boston. He was a graduate teaching assistant for photography in the journalism department.

He then worked as a photographer for the Hutchinson News for one year, the Chautau Tribune for one year and the Chicago Sun Times for one and a half years before going to the White House in June 1983.

Souza currently travels with President Reagan and takes photographs for Reagan's library. His work is not done for publication, although the wire services sometimes use outstanding photographs.

Everyone is invited to attend the colloquium sessions, which will be held in Kedzie 106.

The colloquium will begin with a reception from 1:30 to 3:30 p.m.

At 5 p.m. Haynes will give a presentation about the Philadelphia Inquirer's photographers' recent travels and work.

At 7 p.m. Souza will show and discuss work he has done as a member of the White House photography staff.

A discussion of contemporary trends in photojournalism will be held at 8 p.m. by the two photographers.

Low student interest causes cancellation of holiday trips

By STEVE SWAFFORD
Collegian Reporter

Thoughts of vacations and travel race through the minds of students across the nation at the mere mention of the words "spring break."

Many colleges and universities have travel committees which organize trips for students to take during school vacations, but travel advisers at universities across the state report that while some trips are selling well, others have had to be cancelled because of lack of interest and steep competition.

"We have only had to cancel one trip this year and that was the East Coast trip," Sylvia Scott, Union Program Council travel adviser at K-State, said. She said the reason for the cancellation was lack of interest.

Washburn University has had to cancel two skiing trips and a cruise trip this year because of competition and costs.

"Student participation is low and the competition is high from travel agencies," said Duke Divine, Memorial Union activities director at Washburn.

Divine said he was more upset about the cancellation of the cruise than the cancellation of the ski trip because of the wide availability of organized skiing trips.

"There must have been 40 trips in the Topeka area for skiing and only one of them was successful—it was saturated," Divine said. Shocker Mountain Ski School, which was based at Wichita State University, was the successful trip.

"Competition has been keen to student interest, which has been the biggest problem," said Julie Hillstrom, travel chairman for the University of Kansas.

Hillstrom said the KU travel committee had to cancel a $340 Fort Lauderdale, Fla., spring break trip. The two trips offered during the break for KU students are to South Padre Island, Texas, for $310 and Winter Park, Colo., for $335.

KU also offered a trip during Christmas break to Steamboat Springs, Colo., for $299, $79 higher than the trip offered by the Fort Hays State University travel committee during intercession.

"We had competition for students from travel agencies, but we just combatted them with more publicity on what we had to offer that they didn't," David Brown, student activities director at Fort Hays State, said.

When Brown began working at Fort Hays State five years ago there was no travel program.

"My first year here we had a ski trip and a Padre trip. We had 12 people go skiing and 14 go to Padre. This year we had 36 go to Steamboat over Christmas and 80 students are going to Padre over spring break," Brown said.

Students at Fort Hays State are paying $175 to go to Padre Island, excluding transportation, and paid $220 during Christmas break to ski at Steamboat Springs.

The travel committee at K-State planned five trips for the 1983-84 academic year. A $323 skiing trip to Aspen, Colo., during Christmas break and a $37 mini-trip to the Blue Grass Festival in Winfield both broke even. A spring break trip to Daytona Beach, Fla., is going to cost $245 for eight days, and a Caribbean cruise is scheduled for May 13-20 for $850. The fifth trip was the East Coast trip, which was cancelled.

"Response is better this year than in the past few years," Scott said. "The sun trips are easier to plan because people want to just lay in the sun."

The K-State Travel Committee does not try to make a profit from the trips.

"We are most concerned with offering a service to the students, but we have to maintain our budget," Scott said.

Any profit the committee makes helps it finance promotion for the trips.

Scott attributes the success of the program at K-State to the attitude of the students who volunteer their time to work for the travel committee.

"The students are great. I couldn't do it without their enthusiasm and motivation," Scott said.

Campus scouts entertain 900 girls

United States Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, Elizabeth Dole, Barbara Walters and Sally Ride all have something in common with nearly 900 girls who visited K-State Saturday.

They all are or have been members of the Girl Scouts of America.

The K-State Campus Scouts sponsored Saturday's event, which played host to scouts from the Topeka-based Kaw Valley Council.

The girls ranged from fourth grade students to high school seniors and represented the Junior, Cadet and Senior levels of the scouting program.

Their K-State visit began with a tour of the football stadium, followed by a look at the campus and a planetarium presentation in Cardwell Hall.

Pam Fitzsimmons, president of Campus Scouts and senior in journalism and mass communications; Charles Hein, director of communications; the Kappa Pickers and "Hero" the robot were featured in a program for the scouts in the Union Little Theater.

Saturday afternoon the scouts were treated to a basketball contest between the Lady 'Cats and the University of Kansas Lady Jayhawks. After a 71-63 Lady 'Cats victory, members of the two teams and Willie Wildcat signed autographs for the girls.

Fitzsimmons said the purpose of the event was twofold.

"First, fourth grade is an impressionable age. They (girls) are beginning to think about career plans and about coming to K-State to college." She said the visit offered the girls exposure to the University.

She also said Campus Scouts is the only group of its kind in the region, and the visit provides a good opportunity for it to recruit the older girls if they decide to attend college here.

Political standoff delays funding of highway construction projects

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Interstate highway projects are on the verge of shutting down, and state and federal officials warn the entire construction season may be lost, because of a political standoff in Congress blocking release of $5 billion in road money.

The dispute over a bill to release the money has raged since October. Sources say it has become a struggle between House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., and the Reagan administration.

A dozen governors will discuss the crisis today with Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole and most of them, in Washington for a winter meeting, plan trips to the Capitol to pressure local congressmen.

But Indiana Gov. Robert Orr, head of the National Governors' Association's transportation committee, said the money may be locked up another three to six months, which he called "disastrous."

By law, Congress must approve an Interstate Cost Estimate before federal money for interstate construction can be distributed. Once routine, this year it is engulfed in pork-barrel politics, focusing on a project to expand a key leg of highway in central Boston.

The Federal Highway Administration opposes a Massachusetts plan to put the elevated Boston Central Artery underground as part of the interstate program. O'Neill wants language assuring that the 15-year, $1.9 billion project to be part of the nationwide system, be included in the overall cost estimate legislation. State officials say the project already was included, but the administration dropped it.

"The speaker is determined to preserve the state's interest," an aide to O'Neill said.

The administration, while saying the need for releasing the federal funds is urgent, threatens to veto any bill including any "unnecessary special-interest provisions."

Industry sources as well as both state and federal officials said the issue has gone beyond one involving highways and building them.

One congressional source, friendly to O'Neill's position, said the matter is now a political standoff in the eyes of the Reagan camp.

One highway lobbyist, asking not to be identified by name, called the issue one that is putting O'Neill's reputation on the line while the White House would like to embarrass him. "The speaker has to show Massachusetts that he can deliver," the lobbyist said.

Complicating the matter is the very nature of Congress.

While some state officials say the administration has hinted it might agree to the Boston project, other members of Congress — Republicans and Democrats — warn if that project is included they will push to get their pet road projects in the legislation as well.

If the Massachusetts project is declared eligible for interstate money, argues Federal Highway Administrator Ray Barnhart, many other projects would have to be made eligible as well.

"ACTUALLY, STANDING TALL ISN'T ALL IT'S CRACKED UP TO BE...."

'Prank' has severe consequences

Saturday night a tear gas grenade was tossed into Kite's Bar and Grille. More than $1,000 damage was sustained and several people hospitalized as a direct result of the incident.

In recent months there has been an increase of pranks involving tear gas and other military weapons. A military eye irritant bomb was thrown into the Sigma Chi fraternity house Oct. 16, 1983, causing several fraternity members to be hospitalized. Extensive damage resulted when a grenade simulator was thrown into the mailbox of the Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity Jan. 6. Two weeks ago, a Lawrence nightclub was victimized with tear gas, and several patrons were hospitalized as a result.

These incidents raise the question of what direction college "pranks" are heading. Is this a harmless prank that will come to pass as did such fads as swallowing goldfish, streaking and dryer riding? Or is this something that is much more serious, and should be prosecuted to the full extent of the law?

This is no harmless practical college joke, but something that merits serious prosecution so that it can be stopped before it becomes a regular weekend occurrence.

The monetary damage to the business alone is enough to make this "prank" a felony. But what is more serious is the injuries caused to the patrons of the bar, and the injuries that might have occurred.

Brad Hedrick, Kite's manager, said more than 200 people were in the bar at the time of the explosion. "Utter panic" ensued, he said, and the bar was cleared within 20 seconds.

How can we forget that several people were trampled to death at The Who concert in Cincinnati when, in similar panic, the crowd rushed to get the best seats?

Fortunately, no one was hurt seriously at Kite's, but the possibilities of serious injury is one consideration the pranksters obviously ignored.

These are the kind of irresponsible people who fail to stop and think about the consequences of such a prank to the victims, the business or even themselves.

MX deployment delay denied

Democratic Govs. Ed Herschler of Wyoming and Bob Kerrey of Nebraska publicly requested a delay for one year of the scheduled deployment of MX missiles in their states.

An official said last week the Reagan administration denied the request.

The governors said the extra year is necessary to prepare for the impact on the environment of both states caused by installing 100 nuclear missiles at Warren Air Force Base, which lies in both states.

The administration is unwilling to change plans for deployment. They said "steadiness of purpose" is paramount in planning nuclear strategy because it produces the best results.

Herschler and Kerrey suggested the delay would signal restraint on the part of the United States in building a nuclear arsenal, a positive indication of a possibility for peace.

"Such a delay would not have a positive effect" in prompting peace talks with the Soviets, the administration argued. The Soviets continued to build bombers after President Jimmy Carter cancelled the B1 bomber program, which the administration believes indicates Soviet unwillingness to cooperate with delays.

But, strategically speaking, how costly would it be to allow a delay of only one year in the deployment of 100 missiles? Measured relatively against the sheer size of America's nuclear arsenal, 100 missiles is nothing but a drop in the bucket.

Furthermore, how important is such a delay to the overall scheme of arms talks? Would the Soviets even notice if 100 missiles weren't in their place as scheduled? And would the delay in installing the MX missiles afford them much opportunity to escalate the arms race?

The governors have the best interests of their states in mind. Even considering the Reagan administration's indifference to environmental concerns, a one-year delay in deploying 100 missiles should not be too much to ask.

David's life has lesson for all

The "bubble boy" is free. David, whose last name was never released to the public, died Wednesday night. He died after leaving his "bubble" for treatment of vomiting and diarrhea which were the result of a bone marrow transplant.

David was buried Saturday in Conroe, Texas. His gift to the world, however, will live through time.

David, 12, had been the oldest survivor of a condition known as severe immune deficiency syndrome, the Associated Press reported. Because otherwise harmless germs could prove fatal, he was placed in a plastic, sterile world at birth.

Then, largely through the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, scientific advancements allowed David to live. Astronauts had to have pure air which was free of any bacteria or other "bugs" which could hamper their health. Astronauts also needed space suits which would protect them from the elements as well as any unfriendly germs.

Because of the space-age technology, David survived.

He grew up in a bubble, unable to touch his parents or family. He apparently accepted this as part of his fate, a fate which included having a wall of sterile plastic around him for most of his life.

David was able to go outside his bubble, but only with the aid of a space suit developed by NASA. It wasn't the same as being "normal," but it was a beginning of things to hope for in the future.

David, by many accounts, was a bright individual. He grew up in front of cameras and probing doctors, yet managed to remain personable.

Some believed David seemed like an adult.

"He was around adults all of the time," one doctor said. "He was never talked down to and he learned to speak as an adult."

I've thought about many things, but I never really thought about what it would be like to have to live in an isolated environment. I'm not sure I could do it.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

Apparently, life in a bubble for David was not to be forever.

A new bone marrow transplant technique was developed in Boston. It was experimental, but had worked in a few cases. It also was dangerous.

David and his family requested that he be treated with the new technique. His sister donated the bone marrow. On Oct. 20, David received new hope of joining the "normal" world.

He appeared to be doing well, but his health began to decline in January. He became sick for the first time. He became so sick he had to be removed from his bubble to be treated.

On Feb. 7 David helped remove the seal which separated his world of germ-free isolation from the outside world. He entered our world of germs and bacteria. He kissed his mother for the first time. David touched his family and doctors without gloves — and vice versa.

He finally got his wish to be free. Unfortunately, it would only last for two weeks.

Did the family have any regrets about its decision to proceed with the bone marrow transplant? The Rev. Laurence Connelley, David's family priest and leader of the Sacred Heart Roman Catholic Church in Conroe, addressed this question at David's funeral.

"You must remember, David is the one who pushed for this," Connelley said.

I nominate David for Time magazine's "Man of the Year" award.

It took great courage for him to allow himself to be treated for a disease which has no cure. It also took great courage for David to allow himself to be treated like a zoo animal, letting reporters and doctors gawk and probe at him.

It must have been hard for him to live in his isolated environment, deprived of things we take for granted — the feel of wet grass on bare feet, a cat curled up on a lap, swimming in a cool lake on a hot summer day. David's dream was to run barefoot through grass. It never happened.

David's death, however tragic it may be, may help others. Doctors have learned a lot from David. It was possible to keep someone alive in a sterile environment for 12 years. By learning how he died, doctors may be able to treat future IDS patients with new techniques which could cure patients.

David taught us about the human spirit. He could have given up his dream and existed as a freak. He could have tried to break out of his bubble.

He kept up his spirit and let things happen as they occurred. Connelley summed up David's attitude at the funeral.

"Anyone can live in a bubble, but he was alive in the bubble," the priest said. "He took life by the horns...and lived with both guns blazing."

David's family also deserves to be recognized for its efforts to make his life as normal as possible. It wasn't easy, but the family did a good job in making David feel he was normal — with a few exceptions.

I don't know if there are anymore Davids out there. Others have suffered from IDS, but none have lived as long as he did. They haven't received the publicity David did, but they are there, hoping for a cure which could allow them to run barefoot through wet grass.

These IDS sufferers hope David's life and death can lead to a cure. So do I. I also hope we learn from David that the human spirit, no matter how burdened, cannot be crushed.

God bless you, David.

Nudity in dance exalts body as art form...

Editor,
Re: Jolene Johnson's letter, "Nudity in dance 'immoral,'" in the Feb. 22 Collegian:

Ms. Johnson was annoyed at the concept of a nude performance at a tax-funded institution. She expressed the view that Pilobolus was immoral. She neglected to recognize the purpose behind the dancers performing nude, though. Pilobolus' intentions didn't lie in portraying the nude body as a sexual form. Instead, they used nudity to convey an idea, a concept.

I have to wonder if Johnson even saw the presentation. I can't understand how anyone could see the show and be left with such negative feelings about the use of nudity. Pilobolus dealt with the nudity tastefully, artfully and effectively.

The human body is, undisputedly, the epitome of artistic composition. Nothing in nature possesses the smooth lines and efficient grace of the human body. The concept of nudity being dirty or "immoral," as Johnson puts it, is unjustifiable. It is not the body that commits moral sin, it is the mind, and the way in which an individual chooses to display the body.

The line between the immorality of a stripper thrilling an audience and the moral acceptability of Pilobolus' use of exposure is not a fine line at all. A stripper arouses lust in the audience; the dance company merely tries to express the beauty of the human body and its movements. Pilobolus was very successful.

Humor abuse

Editor,
I find it in poor taste to run a front page picture of students selling hats that say "Nuke KU" when so much unrest exists in the world concerning nuclear arms.

Although it may be seen as a humorous attempt to promote spirit at the University of Kansas vs. K-State basketball game, it is an unfeeling way in which to increase involvement in athletic competition.

Some do not find it humorous to suggest that we should "nuke" our rivals, whether it be in athletic competition or in an actual international conflict. Nuclear arms are not practical jokes we can dismiss. They are real and much closer than many of us, including Haymaker Hall staff, choose to believe.

Anne Graue
senior in English

The person who considers Pilobolus' performance immoral is the person who would turn away from Michelangelo's David, a marble sculpture depicting the Biblical hero in the nude. The great artists hold nudes above all else for subject matter; Michelangelo, da Vinci, Dali and all of the masters looked on the body as the most challenging, most pure subject to represent in their works.

Dance takes the beauty of the canvas or marble and adds the artistry of movement, nothing more. How is it the same work of art in another medium should suddenly become immoral?

Pilobolus advertised their intentions in playbills, newspaper ads and the performance program. Certainly all of this frankness was designed to discourage the attendance of anyone who would be offended by the unveiling of a human body.

Pilobolus tours the nation with one audience in mind — the sophisticated and the mature who recognize the fine arts for what they are: fine art. We have to decide for ourselves whether or not we belong to this distinct class of people. Do you, Johnson?

...should be least of worries

Editor,
Re: Jolene Johnson's letter, "Nudity in dance 'immoral,'" in the Feb. 22 Collegian:

Johnson felt that "nude dancing" was immoral and should not be supported by tax dollars. She ended her letter with the question "I wonder how many more immoral, totally unnecessary activities my tax dollars are being spent on."

I am in complete sympathy with her objection to the government spending our money on immoral activities. However, I think her priorities are a bit confused. Nude dancing seems pretty tame and inconsequential compared to some of the other things our government sponsors in our name.

For example, our government supports a number of authoritarian regimes around the world for no better reason than that they claim to be anti-communist. By any moral or humanitarian criteria, our support of the El Salvador government, for example, is indefensible. Is El Salvador a government by and for the people? Would any of us wish to live under such a regime? If we did, what would we think of the morality of a foreign government which supported those in power?

I have seen Pilobolus perform on several occasions and personally feel that it is one of the most innovative and exciting of dance companies. What bothered me about Johnson's letter, however, was not her negative opinion of Pilobolus. What did disturb me was her preoccupation with the morality of dancing naked when there are so many more important and difficult moral problems which deserve our attention.

Caby promotes racquetball

Editor,

I am responding to an article which was published not long ago in the Collegian advocating the winnings of a K-State racquetball player in a recent tournament. This player may or may not have deserved the praise deemed from the article. My concern is that there is someone who is undeniably worthy of recognition for his racquetball talents and his contributions to the sport.

This person who merits attention has not only promoted racquetball for more than four years in Manhattan, but is also responsible for organizing the K-State racquetball team. He has won numerous tournaments in and around Manhattan and has placed second or third in a countless number of others. He has encouraged many amateur players and has assisted several veteran players at K-State. He has volunteered his time and energy to anyone who has desired help with his game.

I am referring to Glen Caby. I am truly disappointed that his promotion of racquetball has gone unnoticed. His efforts have made racquetball at K-State a success, and I applaud him.

Governors offer budget cuts for military to reduce deficit

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger told a skeptical group of the nation's governors Sunday that defense spending does not contribute materially to the federal deficit.

But the governors offered a plan to cut $60 billion from the military over five years to cut the red ink by nearly two-thirds.

Weinberger made a strong defense of the entire range of Reagan administration military policies on the opening day of the National Governors' Association winter meeting. He was the first Pentagon chief to meet with the governors in 22 years.

Virginia Gov. Charles Robb, a Democrat, said not a great deal has changed in the past two decades: "The names of the weapons systems have changed. But two things remain the same. The major threat is still the Soviet Union and the major problem is money."

Weinberger dismissed criticisms of the economic impact of defense spending, saying it is in part responsible for the economic recovery.

"One of the reasons for the bouyancy of the economy is the acquisitions and the (Pentagon) programs we have had," he said.

But his arguments did not get a warm reception.

"I must say I am terribly frustrated," said Wisconsin Gov. Anthony Earl, a Democrat. "You, like all other spokespersons for other parts of the budget, say the deficit may be a problem but our part of it is not part of the problem. No matter that defense spending may create jobs, so long as we are borrowing to do it, it is part of the problem."

Earl then attacked the idea that America needs massive new weapons for national security. "I frankly can't accept the premise that we jeopardize national security unless we spend every dollar that has been proposed by your department," he told Weinberger.

The executive committee of the governors group later approved a plan that would cut the federal deficit by almost two-thirds in 1989 through a combination of spending cuts and tax increases.

All the governors will vote Tuesday on the plan, which includes deferring indexing of income tax rates to reflect inflation and freezing cost-of-living adjustments in most federal benefit programs.

Using Congressional Budget Office figures, the plan would reduce the fiscal 1989 red ink from a projected $308 billion to $120 billion.

From 1985 to 1989 the plan would cut $60 billion from Reagan's defense plans, and $115 billion more out of other federal programs. Spending on interest on the federal debt would be cut $68 billion.

Proposed tax increases would raise an extra $243 billion in the period, thus rolling back part of Reagan's tax cuts for the last three years. But there was no specific suggestion how to raise taxes.

A national proposal to curb acid rain was also on the governors' agenda, which would be the first time the group has actually called for action on the problem.

Trying to balance the competing demands of the Midwest, whose industrial pollution is blamed for acid rain, and the Northeast, where much of it falls, the governors would start a 13-year program that would cost an estimated $3.6 billion a year. But just where that money would come from was not specified.

The Red Cross' goal for next fall will be 1,600 pints. In an effort to have a maximum number of donors, Ruggles said there is a possibility of rescheduling next spring's bloodmobile so it will not interfere with exams.

"We've been discussing that (rescheduling) and that's a possibility we've been looking into," Ruggles said. "We run into problems with spring break if we move the schedule up one or two weeks. If we move it back some, it's so soon after the start of the semester it's difficult to get the sign up sheets to the various living groups and take care of some of the other arrangements."

The Wichita Region Red Cross supplies blood to 140 hospitals in 100 Kansas counties and 17 counties in Oklahoma.

"There are 140 hospitals in our region," Kalen Larson, public relations director of the Wichita Region Red Cross, said. "We supply all their needs. In order to do that, we use three bloodmobile units five days a week. The need for blood is continuous and doesn't take a vacation."

Larson said the Wichita Region Red Cross boasts a very low outdate rate of blood. Donated blood has a shelf life of 35 days. If blood hasn't been used during that period, she said, national standards say the blood has to be destroyed.

With an average annual donation of 97,000 units, Larson said the outdate rate is 2 percent.

"We don't outdate much blood," she said. "In blood banking, that's considered very good."

Larson said a person need not fear being refused blood if they need it, even if the person has never donated.

"If somebody needs blood, they'll get it no matter what," Larson said. "Rich and poor alike, any race, if you need blood you'll get it."

She said since blood is a donation, the Red Cross doesn't charge for blood, but it does operate on a cost recovery system. The special plastic bags the blood is collected in cost $10 to $15 each, and other costs are incurred through various equipment, transportation, testing and a professional medical staff.

A processing fee is passed on to the hospital to recover these costs. The hospitals in turn pass the cost on to the patient, but Larson said medical insurance usually covers this cost.

Because of the University community's contribution to the bloodmobile, students, faculty, staff and their families are entitled to receive blood without responsibility of replacing it at the bloodbank. This entitlement is explained on the back of student fee cards and employee entitlement cards.

Resistance to the policy by a department could pose problems for a person who files a complaint, Thompson said.

Complaints can be filed either with the appropriate administrator or the Affirmative Action office. The two departments then discuss the complaint and determine if the behavior is harassment.

If so, the next step is a meeting with the accused person to discuss the allegations. As outlined in the policy, the administrators then decide whether harassment has occurred and what penalties should be assessed.

Thompson said her office and the administrators develop conclusions separately and try to develop a joint resolution of the complaint.

The most common type of harassment reported to Affirmative Action, Rowlett said, stems from the ignorance of the person causing the problem, rather than maliciousness.

Thompson said the most common type of harassment is one of ignorance, but added that her office hears different types of cases.

"There's a lot of variation, everything from people who tell sexist jokes in the course of instruction to some outright propositions," she said.

Official sanctions which can be imposed against proven harassers range from an administrative scolding to dismissal.

The most harsh penalty ever imposed by Affirmative Action, however, has been "a strong letter of admonishment," Thompson said adding that the letter does not sound like a very tough punishment, but the office hasn't had any repeats.

No complaints have been appealed, Thompson said. She said she can only assume the complainants have been satisfied with the outcome.

Many victims do not file complaints, fearing retaliation.

"Even if a complaint turns out to be only a matter of different perceptions, people don't like to have a complaint lodged, and there can be retaliation," she said.

Any act of retaliation is a violation of the policy and probably of the law, Thompson said.

Perhaps the biggest problem currently with the policy, she said, is that it has not been adequately disseminated to students.

She said there is some feeling that students are victimized more than University employees, and it is important for them to be aware of the policy.

Tests reveal higher dioxin content in samples from ghost town's soil

By The Associated Press

TIMES BEACH, Mo. — Preliminary tests of soil in this ghost town have found a concentration of the highly toxic chemical dioxin nearly four times stronger than previously known.

Dioxin levels range up to 1,200 parts per billion in the soil, according to an unpublished Environmental Protection Agency computer printout of 540 samples taken from city roads, ditches, wells, and area homes. The printout was obtained by The Associated Press.

"The results have been validated, which means that the lab's procedures have been checked," an EPA chemist who asked not to be identified told the AP.

Previously, the EPA had said the contamination at Times Beach was up to 330 parts per billion. The chemist said he believed the new figure was from a new test, not re-evaluation of an old one.

The Centers for Disease Control says dioxin at levels over 1 ppb may be dangerous to people. It said the government would buy out Times Beach because of the dangers of dioxin, a contaminant in oil that was sprayed on roads to keep dust down. It was the first time the government has bought out a town because of such contamination.

Only six families out of an original 2,400 people remain, living amid rutted streets, rusting cars and orange pennants that mark the spots where dioxin samples were taken.

Only one of about 500 samples had dioxin levels of 1,200 ppb, the chemist said.

"I'm sure that if there's 1,200 parts per billion down there, health problems are sure to turn up," said Times Beach Mayor Marilyn Leistner. "I was even concerned about 50 parts per billion."

A new government study due to be released in March has found that dioxin-contaminated dirt is more toxic to animals than many experts had anticipated, St. Louis Post-Dispatch has reported.

In the study, rats and guinea pigs were fed contaminated dirt from Times Beach and another dioxin-tainted area in Missouri. The guinea pigs died and the chemical changed the liver chemistry in rats.

Researchers at the National Institutes of Environmental Health Sciences in North Carolina, who did the study, say it indicates but fails to prove dioxin in soil is a health hazard to humans.

Keeping the day all in the family

GRAND FORKS, N.D. — Sandi Fickenscher won't have trouble remembering the birthdays of her husband and two children, but she will need a cake big enough to fit three names.

Kevin Michael Fickenscher II entered the world Feb. 23. That's the same date his sister, Kylene, arrived three years ago. And the same date their father was born 33 years ago.

"I'm just happy," Fickenscher said from her bed in The United Hospital Friday. "It's a very special thing to have your children on your husband's birthday."

To make the event all the sweeter, Dr. Kevin Fickenscher, a family practitioner and director of the Office of Rural Health at the University of North Dakota, was able to deliver his own son.

Another shared birthday will only add to the annual celebration, Fickenscher said.

"There's always been one large cake with both names on it. Now we'll just have a bigger cake with three names on it," she said. Where does her birthday fit in?

"May 9," she said, "all by itself."

Semester project: lose weight

TACOMA, Wash. — The University of Puget Sound freshman class may be receiving too "well rounded" an education, so President Philip Phibbs and members of the faculty have challenged the class to a weight-loss contest.

The winner will be the group with the greatest average loss of poundage at the end of the semester in May, when the 204 freshmen and more than 40 faculty members will be weighed again and the average weights of both groups compared.

"Students who have been growing during their high school years find that their metabolism has changed," said Phibbs. "Their growth has slowed and their study hours have reduced the amount of time they might have otherwise spent in exercise."

Phibbs, himself an avid jogger, started the contest about five years ago as a way to promote physical fitness.

Freshmen accepted his challenge once before, several years ago, but the faculty edged out the freshmen by five pounds.

"Only once before has the challenge been accepted," Phibbs said. "The students have either been too cowardly or too hungry."

Stunt explodes in singer's face

NEW YORK — Rock singer Ozzy Osbourne's condition remained "stable and satisfactory" Sunday as he underwent treatment for pieces of glass that lodged in his throat after a mirror exploded during a London videotape session.

Louis Rodriguez, administrator at Mount Sinai Hospital in Manhattan, said the singer has requested that no further information be released.

Osbourne was brought to Mount Sinai Thursday night after flying from London where the accident occurred.

The incident occurred during taping of a videotape for his new song, "So Tired," when some planned special effects went awry.

His publicist, Mike Jensen, said a mirror shattered as planned, but a safety shield meant to protect the singer was missing and bits of glass lodged in his throat.

Teen suicides have 'contagious effect'

By The Associated Press

PELHAM, N.Y. — Two were reported to have had trouble at school, little was known about the third, the fourth was the son of a village fire chief, and the fifth was a college sophomore.

Five separate lives all ended in apparent suicides that have parents and officials in the suburbs north of New York City concerned about the "contagious effect" of teen-age suicides.

Teen-age suicide has become a "devastating public health problem," says Dr. Susan Blumenthal, head of the Suicide Research Unit of the National Institutes for Mental Health.

The tragedy is "almost all adolescent suicides can be prevented," she said. "They're just not talking to anyone or getting support."

Keeping lines of communication open, offering support, taking suicide threats seriously and seeking help are preventive steps suggested by Eugene Aronowitz, commissioner of Mental Health for Westchester County.

He spoke two days after the body of Christopher Ruggiero, 17, was found hanging by a bathrobe sash in his bedroom closet Tuesday morning. He was the youngest of seven children of Pelham Fire Chief Louis Ruggiero.

Police chief Anthony Quatrone said Friday there was "no suspicion of foul play." He could not explain why the youth apparently tied the sash to his neck and a metal bar. The medical examiner has not issued a final ruling.

At Ruggiero's funeral, the Rev. Philip Murphy called the death "accidental...because he was looking forward to so many things."

On Friday, the body of 19-year-old Arnold Caputo, a Fordham University sophomore, was found at his family's Mount Vernon home. Police spokesman Charles Oliver said the body, apparently hanging from attic steps, was found by Caputo's mother.

A friend of Caputo, Effir Samios, 18, said Sunday he was cheerful, quiet, an avid guitarist who was "doing amazing in college." She called him "the one person I never would think would have done it," but noted that peer pressures trouble many of her friends. "A lot of kids around these towns...are depressed."

Last week's deaths followed the Feb. 16 shotgun suicide of James Pellechi, 18, in his home in North Tarrytown.

On Valentine's Day, Justin Spoonhour, 14, was found hanging from a tree near his home in neighboring Putnam County and 10 days earlier, Robert DeLaValiere, 13, was found hanging from a tree in his hometown of Peekskill.

For Westchester, a suburban county of almost 867,000 with good schools and a small-town atmosphere just a train ride from Manhattan, the deaths aroused concern.

Unlike an apparent series of teen suicides that took seven young lives in Plano, Texas, a suburb of Dallas, over the last year, the suicides here were miles and circumstances apart.

"Each one is different," Aronowitz said. "There aren't a sufficient number for a pattern." He said it was the "contagious effect" that concerned him.

Teens are "susceptible to influence," and once one suicide is publicized, "it gains notoriety" as a solution to a youth who is despondent over any variety of problems, Aronowitz said.

Spoonhour and DeLaValiere were said to have had some trouble at school. But "it was general problems most teen-agers have," said one official.

Aronowitz last week alerted parents and teens of the county's services, including a 24-hour suicide hotline and mobile crisis intervention units, in existence for over five years.

Nationwide, there were 5,100 teen suicides in 1982, down from 5,200 the year before, according to the National Center for Health Statistics. Figures for last year were not yet available.

In Westchester, there were four teen suicides in 1982. Figures are incomplete for 1983, but the suicides of two North Salem seniors three weeks apart last spring prompted officials to set up workshops for teens and parents.

Reporters stage mock attack to test base's preparedness

By The Associated Press

WILMINGTON, Del. — Camp Lejeune, the North Carolina home base of the U.S. Marine contingent off the coast of Lebanon, is virtually unprotected against the kind of terrorist attack that killed 241 troops in Beirut, a newspaper report says.

The Wilmington Morning Star said Monday its reporters entered the base without passes through gates routinely open to traffic. The reporters, driving two vans laden with empty boxes to simulate explosives, were unchallenged entering the base or while on it, the newspaper said.

"We were aware of the plan from the early stages," said Maj. Gen. Alfred M. Gray Jr. commander of the 2nd Division from which the Marine peacekeeping force was chosen. He said the information came from military intelligence as well as FBI, state and local law enforcement officials. Gray said there are security measures on the base which are not apparent and that the Marines did not want to invest the time, money and manpower to counter something that was not an actual threat to the base.

Memories of store remain alive in minds of owner, patrons

Two regular customers leave Keller's Superette after a short visit during their daily walk.

An era in Manhattan's history is ending. The last of the "mom and pop" corner grocery stores is closing and taking with it the friendly feeling of welcome that every customer felt when he shopped there or just stopped by to chat.

Richard Keller, owner of Keller's Superette at 1030 Colorado, has decided 38 years in the grocery business is long enough. He said he plans to close the store and enjoy some of life's simple pleasures.

"I've got lots of things to do," he said, and he's not exaggerating.

With three daughters, all out of town, he and his wife Evelyn have some traveling to do. Keller said he plans on fishing with friends. He also is active with church groups.

Keller became involved in the grocery business upon his return from Japan in February 1946. At that time, the corner grocery was called Lumb's Grocery and was owned by Ray Lumb. Keller went to work for him, and in March of the same year, he bought half of the store and its name became Lumb and Keller Grocery. A photograph of Lumb's Grocery reveals a grocery not unlike the one that stands today.

The store was one of hundreds of little grocery stores and filling stations that sat on what was called the "Golden Belt Highway" during the 1930s and 1940s. It ran coast-to-coast through what is now Colorado Street.

Keller said the highway was given that name because all the telephone poles along the road had black and white stripes painted on them. The road took many twists and turns, and it was easy to accidentally leave the highway and find oneself on another road. If a driver noticed he was not seeing any more black and white telephone poles, he knew he was no longer on the highway.

This store and about 30 others in the Manhattan area were part of the series of grocery stores on the highway. The road eventually became Kansas Highway 40 and is now part of Interstate 70. Usually the stores were small groceries with gasoline stations and what Keller called "comfort stations," much the way Lumb's and later Lumb and Keller's was.

Most of them closed many years ago, but Keller's continued to do business.

Although the store will close sometime this spring, Keller, as well as his neighborhood customers, have memories they said they will never forget.

Back when penny candy really cost a penny, Keller's did a large trade with children on their way to school.

"When we'd open up in the morning, there would be a crowd of children waiting outside," he said.

Many of those children grew up with Keller's. Some of them went to school, got married and moved away. The neighborhood has changed and trade at the store changed with it, but not completely.

Keller said he remembers watching James Akin, now associate director of the Career Planning and Placement Center, grow up in the neighborhood. He used to stop in for the candy and soda pop, too. Akin later went to work for Keller.

Keller's was not just another store on the corner, though.

"We used to butcher our own meat here. We had as good of meat as there was in town," Keller said.

Children stopping to buy "penny candy" as they walk to and from school have always been an enjoyable part of Keller's grocery business throughout his 38-year career.

He may have been right. A former University professor used to frequent the store for this reason, Keller said. Keller's made its own hamburger, too, and the professor's wife would shop there because her children would not eat anything but "Keller burgers."

Don Little, who has been the mail carrier for Keller's Superette for more than four years, said he also has fond memories. He and Keller have become friends through Little's daily stops at the store.

The U.S. Postal Service used to have a mailbox on the corner in front of the store.

"When they took that (the mailbox) down, he put up a little cardboard box so his customers could put their mail in there. That's just something he's done for the people," Little said.

In the more than four years that he has been stopping at the store, Little said he has never seen Keller become angry. He said even when the store was broken into, Keller just took it in stride.

"He's known for his sense of humor and his generosity. He always has a smile," he said.

His route will continue to be the same, but one stop will be different. Little said he will definitely miss Keller's.

"I'll be in the same area, he just won't be there," he said.

The closing of the store is the result of plans made last fall. Keller said he agreed to sign a contract to sell the building with a buyer if the buyer could get the land rezoned for construction of multiple dwellings. The zoning did not go through, but Keller decided it was time to close anyway.

He said he already has plans for the building. He hopes to remodel and convert it into a duplex. Keller said he also plans to use the lot behind the store for another duplex and either rent or sell them. If his plans work out, the project will be finished by this summer, he said.

Keller's patrons have not yet retired him to a rocking chair on his front porch just because he's leaving his 38-year business.

As Little said, "He's not retiring. He's just going to be doing different things."

Owner-operator, Richard Keller

In late spring, Keller will close his doors for the last time.

Keller displays a photograph of what the combination gas station-grocery store—"comfort station" looked like in 1946.

Regular customers stop by to visit with Keller more than to do their shopping.

Aviators urge use of military airfields

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A few years ago, Edwin Colodny, chairman of USAir, offered an idea for easing the pressure on Washington's crowded National Airport — shift some of the traffic, especially the small private planes, to underused Andrews Air Force Base.

But the suggestion in a speech to an aviation group died almost as it was uttered. If it had not, the Pentagon would have been ready to shoot it down with its biggest guns, say government and private aviation experts.

As congestion at many civilian airports increases, the military stands as determined as ever to block any widespread use of its facilities by commercial or private pilots, even though the Federal Aviation Administration long has urged such a move as a way to save tens of millions of dollars.

"This is an ongoing struggle between the Department of Transportation and the Department of Defense," says Steve Bassett, a spokesman for the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association, which would like many of the military airfields opened up to its members.

Over the past three decades more than 150 military fields have been closed and many are being used by civilian pilots today. But only about 10 percent of the country's 233 active military fields — many of them operating far under capacity — are open to civilians, usually with severe restrictions.

In a report by the Defense and Transportation departments soon to be sent to Congress, the Pentagon again prevails, according to government sources knowledgeable about the report. Of 25 additional facilities examined for possible joint use, "less than five" are given a favorable recommendation and some of those are being phased out for military use anyway, one source said.

Congress two years ago said it wanted the two departments to submit a plan to make military airfields available for other users "to the maximum extent compatible with national defense requirements," saying such a move would avoid the need to spend millions on new airports.

The FAA suggested several years ago that at least 50 military facilities might be suitable for joint civilian use to avoid the need for more civilian airports.

Those who advocate civilian use of more military fields argue the facilities were constructed at taxpayer expense and should be made available unless it can be demonstrated that civilian planes would jeopardize the military's mission or pose a safety problem.

Among the facilities that long have been eyed by private pilots are military airfields near major cities, including Los Angeles, San Francisco, Chicago, New Orleans, New York and Boston. But in each case the Pentagon has been firmly opposed to opening the facilities.

In a few cases the aviation community has succeeded.

The city of Houston has been trying to get nearby Ellington Air Force Base for civilian use for eight years. The Pentagon recently agreed to sell the airfield to the city, which plans to open it to small, private planes in July to take some pressure off the region's two major airports.

Ironically, an Air National Guard unit will still use the airfield, now paying the city for the privilege.

"Joint use can contribute significantly to resolving capacity problems in major hub cities and enhance the safety and efficiency of air traffic near those cities," says John H. Winant, president of National Business Aircraft Association.

But the Pentagon says each case must be decided independently. It argues that in many cases the civilian use of military airfields would conflict with the military's mission, cause unneeded headaches for local commanders and anger civilians living near the facility who oppose the influx of private aircraft.

Nevertheless, say industry and government officials, the issue is unlikely to go away.

"The (airport) reliever need is steadily increasing and as (the airlines) turn around economically there's going to be even more pressure" to open more military airfields for civilian traffic, says Richard Dinning, a vice president at USAir and director of an industry group studying the need for reliever airports.

UPC seeks comedians for University contest

Acts are still being sought for Friday's "2nd Biennial K-State Laff-Off," a contest in which University comedians will compete for cash prizes, said Jim Divine, junior in history and member of the UPC Coffeehouse Committee, sponsor of the event.

The contest is open to K-State students, faculty and staff only. Acts can be performed only as a solo or duo and can last no longer than 10 minutes or less than eight minutes.

The three top contestants in the event will receive $75, $50 and $25 respectively.

Applications are available in the Union Activities Center and are due Wednesday.

Master of Ceremonies for the "Laff-Off" will be Robert York, a professional juggler and comedian from Oklahoma, said Roger Garfoot, senior in electrical engineering and coordinator of the event with Divine.

York has been a professional juggler for seven years and is reportedly the only juggler alive able to juggle 10 balls at once.

In his shows, York combines juggling with comedy, illusions and impersonations, Garfoot said.

Tickets for the show, which cost $2, will be available at the door. The "Laff-Off" will be held in conjunction with UPC's "Late Nite With the K-State Union," a schedule of activities set to run in the Union until 2 a.m. Friday.

Henry's shot downs Wildcats, 63-61 OSU topples to Missouri in overtime

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

Before a sellout throng of 11,220 at Ahearn Field House on Saturday night, K-State demonstrated how a team can play near-perfect basketball, yet still come out with a loss.

Despite 56 percent shooting from the field by the Wildcats and only five turnovers, none in the second half, the University of Kansas Jayhawks played two points better in winning the 202nd meeting of the intrastate arch-rivals, 63-61.

It was an off-balance jumper from the corner by the 'Hawks' Carl Henry with 3 seconds remaining that gave KU its margin of victory.

After the 'Hawks' held the ball the last 2½ minutes of the contest, Henry received a pass and tried to drive down the baseline around K-State junior Eddie Elder. Elder managed to cut off Henry's drive, forcing him to take a jumper behind the basket from the corner. With Elder draped all over him, the 6-foot-5 senior swished the shot, giving the Jayhawks their second straight win over the 'Cats and their eighth Big Eight Conference win against four losses.

"I kind of figured they'd go to Henry," Elder said. "They doubled it up. (KU senior Kelly) Knight set up a pick for him. I was guarding Knight and figured Henry would pop out, and sure enough he did."

"I thought I put enough pressure on him by forcing him to the baseline, and he hit a tough shot. I tried to distract him, but I didn't want to foul him," Elder said.

The loss all but killed K-State's chances for a first division Big Eight finish, dropping its conference record to 4-8 and overall record to 12-13 for the season. Against the Jayhawks, the 'Cats ran into a team playing their best basketball of the year.

"It was a heck of a basketball game," K-State Head Coach Jack Hartman said. "I was proud of my kids, they played their tails off. KU played extremely well — and they have been — and we anticipated that they would (play well)."

And play well they did. The 'Hawks shot 54 percent from the field, 61 percent in the second half and committed just six turnovers. The difference in the game may have been at the free-throw line, where the 'Hawks were a perfect 11 for 11 while K-State was 7 out of 9 from the charity stripe.

"It was a hell of a game, wasn't it?" KU Head Coach Larry Brown said. "Both teams played so well. It was a great first half, and neither team lost it in the second. Both teams played so well under pressure."

Although Hartman wouldn't say the game was the best-played K-State-KU contest in his 14 years as coach, he said he was impressed by the high level of play by both teams.

"I don't see how the game could have been much better played," he said. "Both teams shot it well — we shot 56 percent and they shot 54 percent — and both teams shot well from the line."

The first half was a tight battle, with 10 ties and two lead changes. The 'Cats jumped out to an early 6-0 lead on two jumpers by junior guard Tom Alfaro and an Elder basket. But the 'Hawks fought back and took their first lead, 9-8, on two charity tosses by Knight with 14:42 left.

An 18-foot jumper by sophomore forward Ben Mitchell helped the 'Cats regain the lead, 22-20, with 7:50 left. While K-State grabbed its biggest at 30-26, the 'Hawks were able to knot the score at 32-32 at halftime — thanks to a pair of freebies by KU center Greg Dreiling.

Following intermission, the Jayhawks quickly broke ahead on a jumper from the top of the key by freshman guard Mark Turgeon and two Dreiling free throws, which gave the 'Hawks a four-point advantage. But the 'Cats stayed close, and an Elder jumper knotted the score once again at 38-38.

The 'Cats took their first lead of the second half, 44-43, on a three-point play by junior forward Lafayette Watkins. After K-State steadily increased its lead to five, 58-53, with 6:06 left, KU then made its final run.

A jumper by sophomore guard Calvin Thompson cut the 'Cats' margin lead to three. After Watkins hit one of two free throws, a Knight follow-shot brought the 'Hawks to within two. Thompson then completed the comeback, canning a 15-footer to knot the score at 59-all.

Baskets by K-State's Mitchell and KU's Henry brought the score to 61-all. Then with K-State having possession following a Henry miss, Alfaro missed a long-range jump shot, setting up KU's last-second heroics.

"We didn't handle that last possession as well as we would have liked," Hartman said. "I wanted the kids to go down and see if they could get a shot on the transition, and if the defense got back, we were going to call time out. Instead, we took a hurried shot."

"In that situation we've got to know that we've got to get a good shot out of it."

Despite KU's successful last-second shot, Hartman said his team played well in the situation.

"I didn't want to give them a chance to go to the line to score. I wanted them to earn it. They did a good job in an emergency situation. Henry was falling off balance, but he got good hand action on the shot."

Women bounce Lady Jayhawks, 81-63

By VIKKI WATSON

Revenge is sweet.

And revenge is what the K-State Lady 'Cats got Saturday as they slapped a 81-63 defeat on the University of Kansas Lady Jayhawks in a Big Eight Conference basketball contest at Ahearn Field House.

The Lady 'Cats avenged an earlier 71-58 loss at the hands of the arch-rival Lady 'Hawks on Jan. 28 — a game in which KU center Vickie Adkins picked apart the K-State zone defense for 29 points.

But this time around the scoring spotlight belonged to K-State's Angie Bonner, who hit 11 of 13 field goals and 10 of 12 free throws for a career-high 32 points. Bonner, along with sophomore Cassandra Jones, also led all players with seven rebounds.

"Angie had a great game," said Head Coach Lynn Hickey, whose No. 11-ranked squad improves to 20-5 overall and 10-2 in the Big Eight Conference. "She did everything she could possibly do and did a lot of things on the defensive end, too. She deserved a great game like that."

While Hickey was praising Bonner's performance, Bonner was quick to praise the performance of her teammates.

"We worked so hard in practice, and finally we just executed in the game," Bonner said. "I was really psyched up to beat KU. They double-teamed all night, but I still got my shot."

While Bonner was making her mark offensively, a much-improved K-State 3-2 zone defense was putting the clamp on Adkins, holding the 6-foot-1 sophomore to only three points and three caroms in the contest. Adkins was averaging 17.6 points and 10.5 rebounds prior to Saturday's game.

The K-State defense also limited KU's Angie Snider — the Big Eight's leading scorer with a 21.7 average — to only 12 points. Snider connected for 18 points in the squads' earlier meeting at Lawrence.

"We really had been working to cut off the middle on our zone," Hickey said. "We really concentrated on staying in front of the post people."

The Lady 'Cats never trailed in the contest as sophomore Jennifer Jones scored K-State's first four points and teamed with Bonner to score nine of the Lady 'Cats' first 11 points to help K-State jump to an 11-4 advantage.

KU fought back to within two points, 14-12, as Lady 'Cats turnovers began to take their toll. Both squads then had offensive difficulties; neither team could manage more than two points in the next eight minutes of play. But it was Cassandra Jones who finally picked up K-State offensively, hitting an inside bucket off an offensive rebound and connecting on a three-point play to help the Lady 'Cats move out to a 22-16 lead.

A fast-break offense enabled K-State to lead by as many as 12 points in the first half of play. A steal by KU's Valerie Quarles and inside bucket with three seconds remaining cut the Lady 'Cats' edge to 32-22 at the half.

K-State held its 10-point lead in the opening moments of the second half until KU began a short-lived scoring run with 16:33 remaining. Junior Barbara Adkins hit two close-range baskets and Quarles added five points as KU closed the gap to 42-38.

Bonner quickly returned the favor, however, completing a three-point play off a Cassandra Jones assist. The Lady 'Cats then utilized their fast-break attack, reeling off 13 straight points to take a commanding 57-38 lead at the 9:32 mark.

"We were constantly trying to make a run at them," said KU Head Coach Marion Washington, who is now 11-20 against K-State. "But of

Pihl captures award for top performance

Three first-place finishes by Deb Pihl enabled the K-State women's track team to capture second place in the Big Eight Conference Indoor Track Championships on Friday and Saturday in Lincoln, Neb. K-State's men's team, slowed by injuries, could manage only 43 points for sixth place, with top finishes by Mike Bradley and Andy Gillam.

Winning the gold medal in the 1,000-yard run and the mile run, in addition to anchoring the two-mile relay championship team earned Pihl the Most Valuable Women's Competitor award.

Pihl crossed the finish line in 2:29.79 to set both a Bob Devaney Sports Center and a Big Eight record in the 1000-yard run. The old record was set in 1981 by Iowa State University's Diane Vetter with a time of 2:30.84.

Forty minutes later, Pihl won her second gold medal for the meet when she captured first place in the mile run with a time of 4:47.02.

But Pihl didn't stop with just two gold medals. The two-mile relay team, which consists of Pihl, Lisa Sandel, Anne Stadler and Lauretta Miller, established a sports center and conference record with a time of 8:49.83, which erased the old mark of 8:58.04 set in 1981.

The women also gained team points from second-place performances by Pinkie Suggs in the shot put, Rita Graves in the high jump, Donna King in the 300-yard dash, Jacque Struckoff in the two-mile run (finishing in 10:03.58 for a school record) and Besty Silzer in the three-mile run.

Third-place finishes for the women went to Stadler in the 880-yard run (running a school-record time of 2:10.29) and Michelle Maxey in the 600-yard run.

"I'm thrilled with our performance. We hoped Pinkie and Rita would win, but it took outstanding efforts to beat them," K-State Head Track Coach Steve Miller said. "We couldn't have done better on the track though. We brought 13 girls and set four school records."

For the men, Bradley defended his title in the 600-yard run, crossing the finish line in 1:09.19 for a gold medal. Bradley won this event last year with a record-setting finish of 1:08.89.

Gillam heaved the shot 59-feet-5½, for another first-place finish.

K-State men's squad had no second-place finishers, but were helped with third-place showings by Bryan Carroll in the two-mile run and the K-State distance medley team comprised of Jack McDonald, Ray Mosier, Darryl Bonds and Mike Rogers.

"It's hard for me to be too disappointed," Miller said. "We've always been good in the field events, but this year, injuries hurt us."

The University of Nebraska ran away with the women's title with 167 total points followed by K-State and the University of Missouri with 94 and 65½, respectively. In the men's race, Iowa State University nabbed top team honors with 143 points while Missouri placed second with 93 and Nebraska came in third with 81.

Ron Jones scored on a driving layup with two seconds left in the second overtime Sunday, lifting Missouri to a 65-64 victory over Oklahoma State.

Jones, who led the Tigers with 16 points, was fouled on the play and missed the free throw. Oklahoma State rebounded and called time out but a length-of-the-floor pass by Charles Williams went out of bounds at the other end, sealing the victory for Missouri.

The Tigers played their first game without Malcolm Thomas, the team's leading scorer and rebounder, who was dismissed from the squad for insubordination.

The Tigers, four-time defending Big Eight champions, snapped a three-game home losing streak, hiked their record to 16-11 overall and escaped the conference cellar with a 5-7 log.

The teams ended regulation tied at 61-61 when Oklahoma State missed a shot at the buzzer. In the first overtime, Missouri won the tip and held the ball the entire period, waiting for one shot. With eight seconds remaining, Prince Bridges put up a jumper that fell short and was rebounded by Oklahoma State.

Blake Wortham had 13 points for Missouri, Bridges had 12 and Greg Cavener 10.

The top scorer for Oklahoma State was Joe Atkinson with 22 points. Williams had nine.

In other college action Sunday, Tyrone Corbin, Dallas Comegys and Kenny Patterson led a second-half rally that carried DePaul's fifth-ranked Blue Demons to a 73-63 victory over Louisville.

With DePaul trailing by four points going into the second half, Comegys, a freshman, scored eight of the Blue Demons' first 10 points to put the home club in front 42-38.

Louisville battled back to take a 45-44 lead but a pair of free throws by Comegys midway in the period put the Blue Demons ahead to stay. Steals and scores by Corbin and Patterson helped pad the lead to 59-51 with a little more than three minutes to play.

Corbin and Comegys led DePaul with 19 points each and Patterson finished with 10. Lancaster Gordon, who scored 17 points in the first half, paced Louisville with 19 points and Milt Wagner added 14.

DePaul jumped to an early 10-4 lead but Louisville, led by Wagner and Gordon, outscored the Blue Demons 16-3 in one stretch to take a 20-13 lead.

fine performances by Mitchell and Alfaro. Alfaro led K-State scorers for the sixth straight game, scoring 23 points on 11 of 17 shooting from the field. fensively we were struggling from the perimeter. They are known for their fast break, and most of those points were from our turnovers."

KU found itself down by as many as 25 points when the game got rough and emotional on the court. Barbara Adkins drew a technical foul for pushing with 7:36 remaining, and Vickie Adkins and Snider both fouled out as KU could get no closer than 15 points.

"The game was too rough, too physical," Hickey said of the contest where 47 fouls were whistled and 30 K-State turnovers were committed. "KU is very intimidating. If you react back to it, they have you in their pocket. This time we did a better job of just keeping our mind on the game."

K-State closed out its scoring with the aid of its fast break as Bonner and sophomore Sheronda Jenkins hit layups and sophomore Tina Dixon connected on a three-point play for the 81-63 victory.

Dixon ended the contest in double

"This was one of our better games," Mitchell said. "But it's not a great game if you don't come out with a W (win)."

Elder also scored in double-figures for the 'Cats with 10 points.

The Jayhawks were led by Thompson's 14 points, while Henry added 12 and Dreiling chipped in with 10.

The 'Cats look to regroup in the final week of the regular season with a road game at the University of Nebraska on Tuesday night and a home contest against the University of Missouri on Saturday afternoon.

figures, scoring 11 points and also pulling down five rebounds. Five-foot-6 Cassandra Jones, who contributed eight points, grabbed seven rebounds, made six steals and dished out nine assists. Bonner tied K-State's high in the steals category, grabbing eight.

The Lady 'Cats continued its hot shooting performance of the field, shooting 61 percent from the field and connecting on 21 of 28 free throws for 75 percent. KU managed 43.4 percent from the field and 58.6 from the line.

Snider led KU's rebounding attack with five boards, but it was K-State winning the team battle, grabbing 32 rebounds to KU's 29.

Quarles, who played only 19 minutes of the contest, led KU's scoring with 17 points. Barbara Adkins followed with 15, while Snider added 12.

K-State next travels to Lincoln on Tuesday for a road contest with the University of Nebraska Lady 'Huskers. The Lady 'Cats then return home on Saturday for their regular season finale, facing a possible conference championship showdown with Missouri.

Outlaws stop Rozier in USFL opener

By The Associated Press

Stymied for three quarters by misuses and miserable weather, the Oklahoma Outlaws used a 12-yard pass play from Doug Williams to Derek Hughes to win their first United States Football League game, 7-3, over the Pittsburgh Maulers on Sunday.

In other season openers in the USFL, the Philadelphia Stars topped the Memphis Showboats, 17-9; the Arizona Wranglers, 17-9; the Oakland Invaders, 35-7; the New Orleans Breakers edged the San Antonio Gunslingers, 13-10; and the Jacksonville Bulls trounced the Washington Redskins, 53-14.

The Maulers' Mike Rozier, making his professional debut after winning the Heisman Trophy at Nebraska, finished with 16 carries for 72 yards.

The game was played in a steady downpour with gusty winds and a wind chill near 20. Officials said 11,638 people attended the game. There were 4,300 no-shows for the season-opening game between the two USFL expansion clubs.

Three first-half Outlaw drives were halted by fumbles.

Kicker Mickey Barilla put the Maulers out front with a 32-yard field goal with 8 seconds left in the first half.

The Outlaws had not penetrated Pittsburgh territory until embarking on an 8-play, 80-yard scoring drive. Stu Crum added the extra point with 13:33 left in the fourth quarter.

Williams, who completed 9 of 22 passes for 57 yards and one interception, found Hughes headed for the right corner of the end zone after fullback Sidney Thornton set up the score with a 34-yard dash. Thornton with 66 yards.

Quarterback Chuck Fusina hit tight end Steve Folsom with a 42-yard scoring pass early in the fourth quarter to lead the Stars to victory over the Showboats.

Fusina tied the score at 9-9 by hitting Folsom on a short crossing pattern at the Showboats' 35-yard line and Folsom broke to the sidelines and ran untouched to the Memphis end zone with 10:25 left in the game. The extra point by David Trout put the Stars ahead.

The game drew a crowd of 28,098 fans.

Fusina drove the Stars, who lost last season's USFL title game to the Michigan Panthers, 72 yards in only four plays after Philadelphia had fallen behind 9-3 on Showboats placekicker Alan Duncan's third field goal of the contest.

Fusina set up the Stars' second touchdown with a 38-yard scamper to the Memphis 8-yard line, and running back Kelvin Bryant scored from 4 yards out two plays later with only 52 seconds left in the contest.

After a 3-3 standoff in the first half, the Showboats built a six-point edge on a 23-yard field goal by Duncan in the third quarter and a 28-yard Duncan three-pointer early in the fourth quarter.

Philadelphia's only points of the half came when Trout connected from 23 yards out with 7:07 remaining in the second quarter.

The Showboats lost a chance for the lead when running back Leonard Williams dropped a pass from Walter Lewis in the Stars end zone.

But the Showboats gained a 3-3 standoff when Duncan followed with

Duncan's three-pointer was set up by linebacker Bill Rowe, who intercepted a Fusina pass at the Philadelphia 24.

Tim Spencer, Kevin Long and Doug Dennison all scored on short runs, and Greg Landry threw two touchdown passes as the Wranglers were victorious.

Arizona set a league record by sacking Oakland quarterback Fred Besana 11 times. Besana was sacked 71 times last season, which set a pro football record.

A crowd of 29,176 watched the regionally televised game at 70,021-seat Sun Devil Stadium.

The Wranglers led 14-7 at halftime after Landry found wide receiver Waymon Buggs on a crossing pattern with 1:53 left in the second quarter.

Oakland had tied the game 7-7 with 2:51 remaining in the first period when Besana fired a 5-yard scoring strike to Ron Smith.

Long's 14-yard run gave Arizona a 7-0 lead 5:50 into the first quarter. Spencer capped a 10-play, 84-yard Wrangler drive by bulging over from 6 yards out for a 21-7 lead with 3:00 left in the third quarter.

Eight seconds into the fourth period, Landry lofted a 72-yarder to Lenny Willis to make it 28-7.

Dennison closed out the scoring on his 9-yard touchdown run with 1:55 left.

Quarterback Johnnie Walton heaved a 40-yard touchdown pass to Frank Lockett in the fourth quarter as New Orleans downed the Gunslingers, 13-10.

About 18,000 people turned out to see the expansion Gunslingers play the Breakers, who were based in Boston last year.

San Antonio tried to tie the game with 2:26 remaining, but Nick Mike-Mayer's 34-yard field goal attempt went wide to the right in the gusting wind.

The Breakers had muffed the extra point on Lockett's touchdown when the snap flew over kicker Tim Mazzetti's head.

The Gunslingers took a 10-7 lead into the fourth quarter, thanks to San Antonio defensive back Peter Raeford, who ran a fumbled kickoff return in for a second-quarter touchdown and intercepted two deflected passes, including one on his own 1-yard line in the third quarter.

The Breakers scored on their first possession of the game when fullback Mark Schellen dove 1 yard into the end zone to cap a 82-yard, 11-play drive.

The Gunslingers didn't cross the 50-yard line until their third possession, with a drive that started on their own 1.

Quarterback Rick Neuheisel then moved San Antonio downfield by completing seven of nine passes. He bounced one off wide receiver Rodney Parker's hand in the end zone.

Walton completed 17 of 26 passes for 243 yards and one touchdown. He was intercepted twice. Neuheisel was 16 of 26 for 174 yards, no touchdowns and no interceptions.

Matt Robinson passed for 299 yards, including three touchdowns, to lead expansion Jacksonville over the Redskins.

The Bulls set a league scoring record as Robinson connected on 15 of 26 passes before a crowd of 49,392.

Groups discuss phase-in of utility increases

Committee endorses bill to ease consumer rate increases

Rates may jump 78 percent

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A strong bipartisan effort by House members to ease the rate shock electricity consumers will feel when Wolf Creek nuclear plant begins operation next year gathered momentum Monday when the House Energy and Natural Resources Committee endorsed the group's bill.

The measure was sent to the House floor with a recommendation that it be passed, after it was amended by Rep. Ron Fox, R-Prairie Village, to satisfy some concerns the Kansas Corporation Commission had about its original provisions.

The key provision still in the bill would prohibit the KCC from allowing utilities which have excess power, once their plants are completed, to pass the interest charges on that excess capacity portion of the plants on to consumers as long as it wasn't needed.

Once the extra capacity was needed, the utilities would be allowed to recover the cost of the rest of the plant, but they could never charge off to their customers the carrying charges on the "excess capacity" portion of their debt if the commission declared it was "imprudently" built, as a result of poor management decisions.

Another key provision in the bill would have it apply to all utilities and all common carriers, such as pipeline companies, and not just to the utilities building Wolf Creek.

Rep. David Heinemann, R-Garden City, the committee chairman, said House Speaker Mike Hayden plans to have the bill debated in the House on Thursday.

The bill may provide the sharpest debate of the 1984 session, as legislators sympathetic to the three utilities which own Wolf Creek try to amend the bill to make it more palatable to the utilities, while lawmakers with an eye on voter concern over the coming rate hikes fight for restrictions on what costs they can pass on to consumers.

Those utilities are Kansas Gas and Electric Co. of Wichita, Kansas City Power & Light Co. and Kansas Electric Power Cooperative Inc.

Rate increase estimates by the utilities and the Corporation Commission range from 50 percent initially up to 234 percent if there is a 10-year phase-in of all the costs.

Only three of the 21 members of the House Energy and Natural Resources Committee asked to be recorded as voting against the bill which was endorsed. They are Reps. Keith Farrar, R-Hugoton; Anita Niles, R-Lebo, and Jim Patterson, R-Independence.

The test vote came on an amendment proposed by Farrar not to allow the commission to consider inefficient operation of utility plants as a factor in denying carrying charges on debts.

Nine committee members supported Farrar and 11 voted against him on a show of hands. Heinemann did not vote.

Jerry Coonrod, lobbyist for KG&E, admitted, "We're a little disappointed" by the committee's action, but added, "After we look at it...I'm sure there will be some amendments we'll suggest" when the bill comes up for debate Thursday on the House floor.

Coonrod said KG&E had solid support on the committee last week for its proposed amendments to a committee bill introduced for the KCC. That's the bill everybody thought would be the measure coming out of the committee.

However, that support apparently waned and the bipartisan group of 46 House members who introduced the rival bill had its way on the committee Monday.

Heinemann said Speaker Hayden agreed to run the bipartisan group's bill rather than the committee bill because of strong feelings expressed by the Republicans who put their names on the bill.

Brian Moline, chief attorney for the KCC, said while the amended bipartisan bill wasn't exactly what the commission wanted, "It has solved all the problems we raised, and we can live with it."

The commission's main objections are it wants the authority to deny carrying charges on the excess capacity part of the cost of utility plants to be discretionary rather than mandatory, and it doesn't want the bill to apply to anything but electric generating plants.

Fox said the amendments he got the committee to adopt "basically broaden the bill."

Farrar argued the KCC-backed bill was the one which should go to the House for debate, but admitted Fox' amendments made the bipartisan measure "a lot better than the way it was introduced."

Under the bill:

— When a new utility facility goes into operation, the KCC will determine which of the plant's capacity is needed and which is excess. It also will determine whether the excess capacity resulted from poor management decisions.

— If the KCC determines a portion of the plant to be excess capacity and attributes that access to "imprudent" management decisions, it could deny putting that portion in the utility's rate base. The commission could allow the utility to phase in the portion of the plant that was needed at that point, and the utility could include those carrying charges in its rate base.

— On the excess capacity portion deemed the result of poor decisions, the utility could not include the costs in its rate base, nor could it ever recover its finance charges for carrying that part of its debt. However, if the KCC later determined the plant's remaining capacity was needed, it could go into the rate base, or be phased in. Carrying charges on any phase-in once the excess capacity was needed could be passed on to consumers.

TOPEKA — Rates for the three utilities building the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant would increase from 60 percent to 138 percent if the costs of the $2.7 billion project are phased in over four years, according to estimates by the Kansas Corporation Commission.

In a report released Monday, state utility regulators projected the effect on rates of several phase-in plans involving the power plant which is under construction near Burlington in east-central Kansas.

The estimates are the first by the state utility regulatory agency on what would happen to rates if the costs of the plant are charged to customers over a period of years.

The plant, which is scheduled to begin operation in February 1985, is a joint project of Kansas Gas and Electric Co. of Wichita, Kansas City Power & Light Co. and a group of 25 rural electric cooperatives, the Kansas Electric Power Cooperative Inc.

KG&E has proposed a five-year phase-in of Wolf Creek costs and says it would cause a 95 percent increase in rates over that period. The utility estimates rates would jump 83.7 percent if the costs of the plant were charged to customers all at once.

The commission based its projections on three different phase-in plans.

The first calls for inclusion of one-half of plant costs in rates the first year and the remainder in equal installments over the next three years. Under this plan rates would increase 137 percent for KG&E, 104 percent for KCPL and 60 percent for KEPCo.

The second plan calls for phasing in the plant costs in equal installments of 25 percent over four years. Under it, rates would increase 138 percent for KG&E, 104 percent for KCPL and 60 percent for KEPCo.

The final plan calls for a 10-year phase-in and would result in rate increases of 234 percent for KG&E, 166 percent for KCPL and 65 percent for KEPCo. If Wolf Creek costs are passed along to customers all at one time, rates would increase 88 percent for KG&E, 79 percent for KCPL and 58 percent for KEPCo, according to the KCC.

In all of the projections, the KCC assumed that the plant would begin operation in the first half of 1985 and its price tag would remain $2.67 billion.

In addition, the KCC's estimate does not include the projected costs of decommissioning the nuclear power plant at the end of its 30-year lifespan or other expenses such as higher insurance costs and security measures.

KG&E has projected its share of decommissioning costs at $128 million and included those in its rate projections.

Consultant encourages separate city hospitals

By TOM HARMS
Contributing Writer

Boards of Trustees of both local hospitals have delayed action on the findings of a consultant firm hired to "examine models for maximum feasible collaboration" between the two until each can further examine the study.

Strategic Management Services, Inc., of Shawnee Mission, hired jointly by the hospitals, recommended that the two hospitals not pursue merger plans, but continue to serve Manhattan individually.

In recent years, hospital officials have considered merging the institutions, but have faced controversy over several issues, including services the new hospital would provide.

According to the report, "a single organization to operate both hospitals, as suggested by earlier studies, clashes with the strongly held and unique values of the two hospitals."

"Both hospital owners serve important and strongly held values," the report concluded. "Each hospital provides valuable, needed and desired services to the people of Manhattan. Many opportunities to further serve the community exist."

John Norton, The St. Mary Hospital board chairman, said his board appointed a committee Friday to further study the recommendations of the consulting firm. The committee is to report back to the board at its next regular meeting in March.

In their Monday meeting, Memorial Hospital board members expressed disappointment with the vagueness of the findings and wanted to delay action until they could study the circumstances that determined the firm's recommendations.

The Memorial board set a meeting for March 5 to discuss a more in-depth report that has been requested from the consulting firm. Board members also approved an "educational forum" to be conducted soon after a decision has been made whether to accept the findings.

Board Chairman Colleen Van Nostran said this forum would serve the purpose of "informing all agencies affected by the board's decision. This would include anyone directly or indirectly affected by health services of Memorial Hospital."

Memorial Administrator Anne Renz said the forum would allow the board to meet with the "consumer of our product. By meeting with them, we will be better able to fashion our services to fit the wishes of the community."

Although hospital officials were not surprised by the firm's recommendations, Renz said she had been "hopeful" that a collaboration between the two hospitals could be reached.

Norton said the recommendations were "what everyone had expected. Nothing new or revealing was proposed — basically the facts that have come up in the past."

Strategic Management Services was hired by both hospitals six weeks ago at a total cost of $30,000, which was divided equally.

The firm interviewed community, church, hospital and medical leaders concerning their perception of the situation and examined past attempts to link the hospitals.

Explosion sinks U.S. ship; 6 crewmen die, 2 missing

By The Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — The tanker American Eagle, its side torn by a fatal explosion a day before, sank Monday as it waited for a tow in the gale-whipped Gulf of Mexico, killing at least one crewmember, the Coast Guard said.

Two other crewmen were presumed drowned and two were missing.

Twenty crewmen were rescued when the 661-foot tanker went down at 5:40 p.m. about 180 miles southwest of New Orleans, Petty Officer Gary Starks said.

Sunday's explosion and Monday's sinking brought the known or suspected death toll to at least six, not including the two missing men.

Three crewmen were killed and three others were injured Sunday in the unexplained explosion. The blast left the tanker dead in the water.

Starks said the ship's bow was still sticking out of the water, creating a navigational hazard in an area where visibility was poor.

"It could possibly endanger some of the rigs. We have cutters en route to make sure everything is safe," he said.

The tanker went down as a tugboat was sailing from Port Arthur, Texas, to tow the ship to Galveston, Texas, Starks said.

"The weather is pretty bad out there — there are 16-foot seas, 40 knot winds and low visibility," Starks said. "The ship broke up from the weather, tossing and turning out there."

He said the injured, some suffering from hypothermia, would be flown to hospitals.

A helicopter was on hand, and the Coast Guard was sending a second as well as the cutter Valiant to help search for the missing crewmen.

The explosion, about 5 p.m. Sunday, tore open the right side of the ship above its waterline. Coast Guard photos taken from the rescue copter showed a large tear, twisted railings near the bow, a toppled boom and what looked like a spare propeller teetering near the side. The ship's decks did not look scorched, and there were no other apparent signs of fire.

The identities of those killed Sunday were withheld by the ship's New York-based agent, American Foreign Steamship Corp., pending the notification of relatives.

Those injured Sunday were evacuated to New Orleans hospitals.

Iraqi warplanes raid oil tankers to 'punish' Iran

By The Associated Press

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Iraqi warplanes on Monday attacked oil tankers anchored near Iran's vital oil export terminal on Kharg Island in the Persian Gulf, Eghdad radio reported.

"Today is the first day of a blockade that we have decided to impose in this area, which we had already declared as a restricted military zone," said a broadcast Iraqi military communique.

Iraq did not say how much damage the attacks inflicted, and there was no immediate confirmation of the attacks from Iran. In Washington, State Department spokeswoman Diane Kelly said the attacks hadn't been confirmed, but "we don't have any reason to doubt" them. U.S. officials said they didn't think Iraq would attack the oil terminal itself or other nations' ships.

An Iraqi military spokesman warned "all oil tankers and ships against approaching Kharg and against dealing with the Iranian regime which exports crime and chaos to all states of the world." Kharg is Iran's main terminal for oil exports in the gulf region.

In the 3½-year-old war, Iran and Iraq often issue conflicting battle claims. Most reports cannot be verified because Western reporters are rarely allowed into the war zone.

Iraq released neither the number nor the nationality of the tankers it said it attacked, and did not mention casualties.

Iraq has often threatened to attack Kharg Island, 130 miles southeast of Iraq, to prevent Iran from exporting oil. As recently as late January, Iraq threatened to fire on any ship sailing into Kharg.

Iran has countered those Iraqi threats by pledging to close the strategic Strait of Hormuz, the gulf's only access to the open sea. An estimated 20 percent of the non-communist world's oil passes through the strait.

The raid was "to punish the Iranian regime for attacking our people and our territories," a military spokesman said on Iraqi TV. "We will continue our attacks until the enemy halts its aggression and agrees to abide by the U.N. Security Council resolutions" that seek an end to the war and free navigation in the region.

Industry experts in Nicosia believe Iran exports most of its daily output of 2.4 millions barrels of oil through the Kharg terminal and through the port of Bushehr, lower down on the gulf coast.

Politics, environment to be lecture topic

Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., is scheduled to speak at 7 p.m. April 17 in the Union Little Theatre.

Slattery will speak on the topic "Interaction of Politics and the Environment," Robert Robel, professor of biology, said.

His visit is being sponsored by the K-State student chapter of The Wildlife Society, of which Robel is faculty adviser.

The speech will be open to the public, Robel said.

Campus news briefs

Speakers to discuss Soviet leader

The Soviet Union and its new leader, Konstantin Chernenko, will be topic of the "Let's Talk About It" program at noon Thursday at the Union Catskeller. The series is sponsored by the Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee.

Joseph Hajda, professor of political science, and Robert Baumann, temporary assistant professor of history, will speak. The "Let's Talk About It" series is presented bi-weekly. The talks are free and open to the general public.

Art faculty arrange Minnesota trip

Faculty of the Department of Art are planning a three-day trip to Minneapolis, Minn., April 5-7 to visit the exhibits at the Walker Art Gallery and other sites.

The itinerary includes visits to exhibits of Chinese and contemporary American art, sculpture and photography. A stop at the Swedish American Institute to view "Images on Wool" by graphic artist Kirsten Sunderlund also is planned.

Works by contemporary painter Jim Dine and photographer Aaron Siskind also will be on display in Minneapolis at that time.

Cost of the trip is $95, which includes round trip bus transportation and hotel accommodations. The deadline to register is Thursday.

Zoology professor to give seminar

Carl D. Johnson, professor of zoology from the University of Wisconsin-Madison, is scheduled to speak at 4 p.m. Friday in Ackert 221.

He will discuss "The Molecular Anatomy of Neurotransmitters and Their Function in the Nematode."

Johnson received his doctorate degree in 1976 from the California Institute of Technology. During his graduate studies he developed an analysis method now widely used to measure enzymes associated with neurotransmission. This technique has been used to measure many different enzymes.

Johnson has been localizing neurotransmitters to individual cells of nematodes to understand the complete contribution of neurotransmitters to behavior. His current interests focus on determining the number of genes responsible for the production of the enzyme, acetylcholinesterase.

Three backpacking trips offered

Students have the choice of three Grand Canyon backpacking trips during spring break, March 10-17.

The 20-mile Kaibab trail takes four days and three nights and costs $37.

The Grandview and Hermit trails, both about 40 miles long, take five or six days. The cost is $47.

The charges include meals on the trail, camping fees, park permits, general cooking equipment, and trail and road maps.

Transportation to the Grand Canyon will be organized at a meeting at 7 p.m. Thursday in Union 209.

The trips are sponsored by the Union Program Council's Outdoor Recreation Committee.

Committee organizes rafting trip

The Union Program Council Outdoor Recreation Committee is coordinating a whitewater rafting trip in West Virginia to be taken in May at the end of the spring semester.

The trip will take place in the Appalachian Mountains, on the New River Gorge National River. Participants will spend three days on the river, May 15-17.

The cost of the trip is $189, and may be made in two payments. It includes all supplies, meals and trips guides.

An informational meeting is scheduled for 7 p.m. March 6.

Students may begin signing up now from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m. in the Union Activities Center. The general public may sign up beginning March 8.

Professor returns from Taiwan

Do Sup Chung, professor of agricultural engineering, has returned from Taiwan where he participated in a symposium on post-harvest technology of agricultural produce in the Republic of China.

Chung was one of six international experts invited to participate in the meeting, sponsored by the National Academy of Sciences and the China Committee for Scientific and Scholarly Cooperation with the United States.

Chung was chairman of a session on a grain and moderated the session on vegetables and fruits, meat and milk products and fish. He also presented a paper on grain post-harvest problems in developing countries.

State's officials question adoption laws

By The Associated Press

COLUMBIA, S.C. — A woman's claim that she sold her baby daughter for $3,500 has focused attention on the lack of laws barring child selling in South Carolina and loopholes in adoption regulations, and may lead to tougher new laws.

In part because of the legal climate, the state has become known as an easy place to find a child to adopt. Several newspapers in the state have long accepted classified advertisements from couples — many of them affluent people from out of state — seeking adoptive children.

Kathy Jennings, an assistant Greenville County solicitor who specializes in cases involving children, said it is "impossible" to know how common baby selling is in the state because so many adoptions are arranged privately through a doctor or lawyer, with no state involvement other than a judge's approval.

The issue gained public attention last month when Mary Elizabeth Andrews told police in the Greenville County town of Simpsonville that she had sold her 22-month-old daughter. She then filed a complaint against Bill and Betty Griggs to get the child back.

The Griggses had begun private adoption proceedings and claim Andrews, 29, signed the child over voluntarily without any payment.

The girl has been placed in protective custody until a court decides where she will go. The Griggses abandoned their adoption plans because of the publicity.

The case prompted Greenville Solicitor William B. Traxler Jr. to investigate state laws on adoption.

"We were unable to find a law in South Carolina that prohibits the outright sale of children," Traxler said.

"There is no law that prevents it," said Francis Lewis, executive director of the South Carolina Children's Bureau, a state adoption agency.

Adoptions must be approved at a family court hearing, but there's no requirement that the state Department of Social Services or Children's Bureau be involved, he said.

Under a bill introduced in the state Legislature last week by State Rep. David Wilkins, "no person may request or accept any fee, compensation or any other thing of value as consideration for relinquishing the custody of a child for adoption." However, medical expenses or fees for services involved in the adoption could be reimbursed. Violation would be a felony carrying a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and $10,000 in fines.

Wilkins predicted easy passage, saying: "Who's going to stand up and say they are for selling babies?"

In 1982, the last year for which state figures were available, 1,826 children were adopted in South Carolina, 450 of them by non-residents. Public and private adoption agencies placed only 390 of those children.

Lewis said an independent adoption costs about $7,500, compared to $2,200 at his agency.

Hospitals

This information was then compared to national and Midwest trends in health care.

Norton said the St. Mary board hasn't made any proposals for the hospital in anticipation of its committee's decision, but the Memorial board approved a plan in which, if the consulting firm's recommendation is approved, the board will ask the county's permission to allow the hospital to go through corporate restructuring.

Under this plan, Memorial Hospital would become Memorial Hospital Association, Inc., Van Nostran said. A board of trustees would be appointed by the county — as required by state law — to oversee the hospital's facilities. In addition, a board of directors would be created to manage the hospital's activities.

Van Nostran said this would require the current trustees to either resign their trusteeships to serve on the board of directors, or remain trustees and not serve as directors. Trustees now serve the same functions the two new boards would serve.

The size and rotation of the board of directors, Van Nostran said, would be ascertained when the needs of the hospital have been determined.

"I would assume that the 11 (current) trustees would be the core of the board of directors if they choose to stay," she said.

Other members would be nominated and elected by existing board members, she said.

Since the hospital would become a private business, it would fall from the public domain and would lease the facility from the county.

Although the corporate restructuring was discussed at Monday's meeting, Van Nostran said the main focus of the board still is on the March 5 meeting to discuss the consulting firm's recommendations.

Time turns to treasure for master craftsman

By CARA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

The lace curtains that hung at the bay windows filtered the sunlight into dim shapes. A composed silence, almost louder than noise, was disturbed only by the soft, repetitious voices of three clocks telling a newcomer of their keeper.

David Seay, owner and primary craftsman of the The Regulator Time Company at 121 S. Third St., is, lovingly, their keeper.

Seay leaned back in his rocking chair and stared at his living room ceiling as he told of the man who helped inspire his career.

"I met him (George Hampton) at a laundromat in Aggie. He watched the laundromat to protect it from vandalism. People always thought he was a little odd because he was so friendly," Seay said.

"I just thought he was wonderful. I would go back to the laundromat and talk to him and we became friends," Seay said.

One day, after work, Seay went to Hampton's house.

"He (Hampton) had a basement full of clocks. It was his hobby," Seay said. "The first time I walked down in his basement I heard all the clocks ticking. There was something friendly there — something more than ticking."

In the silence of the basement all the clocks sounded like rain, he said.

At the time, Seay worked as a printer at The McCall Pattern Company and had the opportunity to read as he worked.

"I read about clocks," Seay said. "Not just how they work, but also their history. I really like to delve back into the past."

"From the first time I was introduced to it (the world of clocks) by George Hampton, I never thought it was going to be a good hobby. I thought it was going to be a good business," he said.

With the idea of a clock restoration business in mind, Seay set out to become a master craftsman.

"I really taught myself how to repair clocks, though George helped me with some key questions early on," Seay said.

Eventually, Seay said he realized he could not repair all types of time pieces. So he set off to Kansas City and the Kansas City School of Watchmaking.

There Seay was certified as a master watchmaker by the American Watchmakers Institute. The certificate he received is the highest document showing that a person understands fully how timepieces work and how to repair them, he said.

"It is like a degree to let anyone know there isn't much doubt as to your ability in repairing timepieces. It shows a level of expertise," Seay said.

While Seay was learning to repair watches, he paid his way through school by repairing clocks. Then, his schooling complete, Seay was ready to start his new career.

"Originally, I thought a larger city would be better to start the business in," he said. "I may yet do that. But I had lived here for so many years that I had a good base of friends to start (the business) from, and it was home."

Initially, the business, then named The Regulator Clock Company, was started by Seay at a different location, but when he moved the business he decided to change the name.

"I started out with the name The Regulator Clock Company, and all I had was a clock business. I wanted it to grow. The (current) name has more meaning," he said.

The business has grown. Now Seay repairs timepieces of all sizes and types. Some include hydrothermographs (devices for measuring temperature and relative humidity) for K-State and watchman's clocks for Kansas City Power and Light.

He also restores tower clocks, including those in the Riley County Court House and a courthouse in Savannah, Miss.

"The Junction City manager asked me to restore a tower clock in an old theater building. I'm researching that now," Seay said. "I've just written the U.S. Patent Office for its patent so we can have wheels

David Seay, once a pattern company printer, turned his interest in clocks into a business. He is a master watchmaker who restores and sells clocks.

fabricated and any other parts we need."

Research and restoration include a variety of pursuits.

"It takes hours and hours and hours," Seay said. "Often you need to go to another town to find a parts clock (a clock with parts that will work in the clock being restored)."

Seay also has had to write and send pictures of clocks to a watchmaker institute and association and tell them of his search for a particular parts clock.

"For the Riley County tower clock, I tied myself to the clock and painted the dial (face of the clock)," Seay said. "When you are 75 to 80 feet above the ground, it really gets complicated because you have to take parts to the ground."

But size and type are not the only things that add variety to Seay's clock clientele. Some timepieces are brought from long distances to have the specialist set them straight. Seay even makes housecalls.

"We've had clocks from everywhere. We just got a clock from Florida," Seay said. "(Sometimes) students go home and bring back a nice clock of mom's that doesn't run anymore."

"I think it is of real value to restore and maintain things from our past. It is wonderful to think that I am working with something that Seth Thomas (founder of the Seth Thomas Clock Co.) made in 1850. And, it was so well made it is still producing income for me today," Seay said.

Planned Playboy magazine trip causes stir

By The College Press Service

Playboy magazine will travel to Big Ten schools this spring for its annual Playmate and publicity hunt.

As is usual, some campuses have already begun to react to the projected visits of a Playboy photographer scheduled to begin in April, magazine publicist David Slayers said.

"There were rumblings on campus the day after" word of Playboy's impending visit reached Bloomington, Ind., Wendy Weyen, editor of the Indiana Daily Student, said.

Playboy has been inspiring such campus rumblings each spring since 1977, when it began concentrating on specific college conferences, recruiting women to pose for possible appearances in the magazine's September back-to-campus edition.

The results often have been incendiary, as collegians and administrators have protested Playboy's presence.

In 1979, for example, Playboy's Ivy League tour provoked many demonstrations and inspired several campus papers to refuse to run ads asking for women to pose.

"The Harvard Crimson took our ad and the money we paid, and failed to run the ad," Slayers said.

The most serious conflict erupted in 1980 at Baylor University.

Abner McCall, then Baylor's president, threatened to expel any women who posed naked for the magazine and identified themselves as Baylor students.

A Baylor Lariat editorial criticizing McCall's stance subsequently cost three student journalists their scholarships. The College Press Service later reported that the one Baylor woman who finally appeared in Playboy was allowed to graduate "quietly."

Playboy toured the Southeastern

Conference in 1981 and the Big Eight in 1982, largely without provoking anything more than mild curiosity.

In 1982, Playboy photographer David Chan attributed the calm to the "conservative" nature of the schools' students.

Last year's tour of Atlantic Coast Conference schools did elicit some protests. Maryland students succeeded in forcing actual shooting sessions to an off-campus location.

Magazine officials don't dislike such controversy. "While we don't strive to throw fuel on the fire," Slayers said, "the publicity helps. You ban the book in Boston, and guess what everybody reads?"

Reprimand of wrestler creditable

Hats off to the Cowley County district judge who dissolved the restraining order which would have permitted Eddie Borror to continue wrestling in the Class 5A state tournament last weekend.

Borror, an outstanding wrestler with two state titles and an 80-0-1 high school record behind him, was removed from the Arkansas City wrestling squad after he was seen drinking beer in a local pizza parlor, a violation of team rules.

After his removal, Borror sought a legal restraining order contending the school athletic department did not have a consistent policy regarding drinking and the no-alcohol rule under which he was kicked off the team is not part of the school's student handbook.

He also said the high school wrestling coach did not have the authority to bar him from wrestling and that he was denied due process of the law.

However, Judge Robert Bishop said Borror's constitutional rights were not violated and the decision to remove him from the team "was legitimate to instill a sense of discipline and to provide for a community image of good conduct."

Participation in high school extracurricular activities is not part of a student's right to guaranteed public education. Rather, students involved in team sports are taking advantage of a privilege — a privilege which bears a cost of some personal sacrifice.

It is unfortunate that such a quality wrestler was not able to compete in the state tournament. But after his team had been explicitly warned about the penalties for drinking just nine days earlier, the coach had no choice but to enforce his rules if he was to maintain credibility.

High school athletics is an area which can contribute much to a young person's character. Most sports require personal dedication from participants through rigorous workouts and strict team rules, such as curfew hours and prohibition of alcoholic beverages.

By adhering to team expectations, young athletes learn to put aside some personal pleasures in order to help accomplish team goals. Obedience to team rules promotes team comradery and personal discipline in meeting goals. Violating team rules undermines a fundamental purpose of high school athletic programs.

By keeping Borror from competing in the state tournament, Bishop and Borror's coach protected the integrity of the school's athletic program and the purposes for which it stands.

Mike Turner, for the editorial board

Candidates assess their chances

The race is on.

It's finally beginning to take shape. Leaders are nudging to the forefront, other contenders are falling behind and the spectators are cheering more and more loudly.

What for? The presidential primary in New Hampshire today.

The Democrats have been stumping the state for weeks, but after the Iowa caucuses last week, the eight candidates have concentrated on drumming up last-minute support.

Former Vice President Walter Mondale is expected to win, but after a second-place finish in Iowa, Sen. Gary Hart is hoping to present a challenge to Mondale.

If previous polls are any indication, most Democratic voters favor Mondale for president, with minimal support for each of the other candidates. A new poll by The Washington Post and ABC, however, proves the New Hampshire primary could have an interesting finish.

The poll credited Mondale with 38 percent of the votes, Hart with 24 percent and Sen. John Glenn with 14 percent. After Jesse Jackson's finish with 7 percent, the rest of the field was nowhere to be seen.

Hart has made a surprising surge into serious contention for the nomination, even passing Glenn in popularity. If Mondale's support falters, Hart may benefit.

Today's primary could provide an early indication of the outcome of the Democratic race for the Oval Office. It could also prove critical to the candidacies of those "also running:" former Sen. George McGovern, Sen. Ernest Hollings, Sen. Alan Cranston and former Gov. Reubin Askew of Florida. If nearly ignored in New Hampshire, they may be unable to muster further support and financial resources for upcoming primaries.

But more likely than not, New Hampshire will only be the stage for one more "dramatic," overplayed scene in a lavish show of political fortune.

Bloom County

'Land of the free' or wealthy?

Much of President Reagan's term has been filled with controversy over wealth redistribution in our society: who, for example, will pay fewer taxes, or who will no longer get government aid. Recently, however, I saw signs of something more fundamental and frightening — attempts to redistribute individual rights in this society.

The event I refer to surrounds the right to civil disobedience. In Minnesota, the North Star Legal Fund, a "conservative public interest group," has filed suit against several peace organizations and activists in the St. Paul area. They are seeking, "on behalf of the public," $500,000 to cover the expenses incurred detaining hundreds of protesters in anti-war and anti-nuclear demonstrations held during 1983.

In addition, North Star is seeking an injunction against any future civil disobedience related to the arms trade. The suit claims that civil disobedience costs taxpayers "hundreds of thousands of dollars, that more properly could have been used for legitimate social purposes and/or reducing...taxes."

The logic here is something like this: civil disobedience costs the taxpayers money, thus, we should do away with it. If we follow this logic, then why don't we do away with garbage collectors? Don't they cost us money?

However, we easily recognize that if the garbage collectors were to stop making their rounds, garbage would pile up. Garbage collection is a cost that society recognizes as necessary and therefore is willing to foot the bill.

It is more difficult to see why we need the right to dissent. Perhaps we feel we don't need this right because we do have it. Because those who would abuse our rights realize that we have this recourse, and are reluctant to "try" us. The same companies that respect our rights in this country violate those same rights of the citizens of foreign countries.

It seems that the people believe the suit are less interested in recuperating public funds than they are in limiting the future effects of civil disobedience. They want the common citizen to think, "I can't protest against that company because they may take me to court, and they have more money than I."

What really bothers me is that Honeywell, one of the targets of the demonstrators, has contributed $5,000 to North Star. Honeywell is a major military contractor, so technically our tax money is helping in the attempts to curtail our rights.

So, who cares, right? Maybe now little old ladies won't chain themselves to factory gates every day. Besides, how does civil disobedience have anything to do us? We don't have any of those freaks in Kansas.

There are important reasons why we should care. Civil disobedience is one of the few means of legal leverage that the weaker in this country have against the more powerful. If this suit is upheld, it could limit legal leverage to only those who have considerable financial or political power. It effectively takes power now held by the individual and gives it to corporations or the government itself.

I talked with a Manhattan lawyer about this. He made two points. First, just as individuals have a right to dissent, North Star has the right to dissent. They also have the right of access to the court system, ergo the North Star suit. Secondly, he said he believes this is a matter of the First Amendment (freedom of speech) and that judges in the past have leaned over backwards to protect this right. I hope so.

I would guess that this case is not likely to pass in the Minnesota court system because it is in a fairly liberal state. But what if the North Star philosophy is taken elsewhere, say Mississippi? It could go all the way to the Supreme Court.

If Reagan is re-elected, there is the strong possibility that he will get to name three or even more Supreme Court justices. Some form of this philosophy could then become the "law of the land." Perhaps it may be in a different form than that sought by North Star, but it might be a civil rights curtailment just the same. "No civil disobedience" sounds more like South Africa or the Soviet Union.

I'll bet that the people bankrolling the North Star group talk a lot about America — how great it is and how superior it is to the rest of the world. But, aside from incredible resources, the advantage we have over many other countries is that the individual has value — he or she has "inalienable" rights. I feel that these rights are very much alienable, and it is our responsibility to see that they are not alienated.

In many countries, the individual has no legal avenue for exerting leverage against more powerful people. This is one of the reasons behind anarchism ("terrorism").

The "revolution" in the "American Revolution" meant John Smith theoretically had the same rights as the king of England. Many blacks and women would agree that we have quite a way to go, but they would also agree that things were looking better in 1779 than 1776.

This lawsuit could constitute a great step backward, back to the time when the individual had no rights — back to the time when the person with the most money (power) had the most rights.

Dancers' nudity wouldn't pass in City Park

Editor,

Re: Jolene Johnson's letter, "Nudity in dance 'immoral,'" in the Feb. 22 Collegian:

One may object to spending tax dollars on "war machines," but few disagree that it is a responsibility of government to defend the country.

There has always been serious disagreement whether the government has any business supporting the arts. Disagreement will be heard more loudly if the arts continue to celebrate that which is considered by much of the population to be crude, offensive or private in nature.

We are sorry to hear there was a display on the stage of McCain Auditorium that, viewed in the city park, might have caused an ordinary citizen to call the police; or, could have gotten the performers ousted had it been in a local bar.

Manhattan has an ordinance against nudity because a majority of the people believe it is embarrassing to people of ordinary sensibilities.

It is no good to ridicule the insulted ones by disqualifying them for lack of attendance. We have never been invited to buy a ticket to view a murder; and would find the performance offensive. But who would argue our right to an opinion because we did not attend?

We are thankful for Johnson's sane letter.

In an old tale, a king is conned into spending a fortune on imaginary clothes. As the people view him at the head of a parade, expecting to see the splendid garments, they admire and envy his beautiful clothes because they have been told that only a simpleton cannot see them.

And then, a little child's voice is heard above the murmur of praise, "But the emperor has no clothes on!"

Biology not 'waste of time'

Editor,

Re: Sandra Ewan's letter, "Biology class causes frustration, resentment," in the Feb. 8 Collegian:

Biology, whether basic or advanced, is never a waste of time. We believe Dr. John Zimmerman has been unfairly criticized by Ewan. Biology, as taught at K-State, is more than just the facts — it's how the reality of the biological world

(the planet we live on) interfaces with people. Biology is something to believe in, to celebrate. Zimmerman's field natural history experience makes him qualified, even extraordinarily so, to help young people understand and appreciate the complex system of nature of which we are all part.

Mondale campaign lacks vision

CLINTON, Iowa — Walter F. Mondale strides across this state like the Jolly Green Giant. He dominates the polls, needs two planes for his news media contingent and makes appearances that are better advanced than Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower's at the Normandy beaches. Rooms for him materialize at unplanned stops, couches are moved in and reporters are told, before they get off the bus for the night, what motel rooms have been assigned — and what the breakfast special will be in the morning.

And yet...and yet there is something missing. Call it enthusiasm, call it emotion, call it anything you like. The Mondale campaign walks, talks and acts like that of the dominant front-runner. It just does not feel like one.

Instead of excitement, there is a sense of duty or obligation about this campaign. The operative word is "restore" — a word Mondale frequently uses. If elected, he will "restore" government programs eliminated or cut by President Reagan, especially those that help the aged and the poor. He will "restore" the traditional dialogue with the Soviet Union that has resulted in every recent president but Reagan reaching some sort of arms agreement. He will "restore" a sense of fairness and once again obligate the government to do the right, as well as the economical, thing.

It is all good stuff and, if you are poor, aging or out of work, wonderful to hear. But it makes Mondale the candidate of the recent past, specifically of the Carter administration, a kind of monarch in exile, waiting for the restoration.

And it pits him, should he win the Democratic nomination, against Reagan, the candidate of the nostalgic past, a man who cites his all-but-imaginary hometown of Dixon, Ill., as a model for America — a movie-set town of virtue and neighborliness whose reality most Americans fled. This is what Reagan did, choosing Pacific Palisades and Rodeo Drive over Dixon and Main Street. No matter. In a contest, the nostalgic past, which is anything you want it to be, beats the recent past, which is worse in memory than in reality.

This must have occurred to Mondale and his staff. So maybe this is just his strategy for the primaries, an attempt to unify the Democratic Party around the ideals of the recent past before he leads it on to something new and bold. The trouble is that boldness is not a Mondale attribute. His decency is matched only by his cautiousness. Unlike George McGovern, who now basks in post-Vietnam and Watergate vindication, Mondale has never known what it's like to stake out a lonely position and see the country move his way.

On Vietnam, for instance, Mondale was late in opposing the war. In an interview here, he now says that's the chief regret of his public career. But he also was among the last of the Democratic candidates to call for a Marine withdrawal from Beirut, something he says he does not regret. When it came to the Marines, Mondale says, there were so many things to consider — and there were. Because of his experience, his knowledge, he sees many trees — maybe more than the other Democratic candidate. What he sometimes cannot see is the forest.

So the Iowa campaign is one of trees. For organized labor, Mondale offers loyalty and nary a hint of disagreement. For the teachers, he has an education program. For the elderly, he vows that Social Security and Medicare shall remain inviolate. And for the farmers, he promises that once again the world will be their market. Only once, when Mondale told how the women's movement had enabled his wife, Joan, to "grow and blossom," did he seem to speak from the gut — and that, for many who heard him, is where the remark was received.

Other than that, though, the Mondale campaign is a trough from which a voter can feed. There is something here for everybody — something good, something necessary. He will help them when they are hungry, educate their children, restore and protect their jobs and comfort them in their old age. But there is something missing, too, and you can see it in the faces of the people who come to see Mondale. They walk away like shoppers in a supermarket. They will have to go somewhere else.

Philadelphia utility hires ex-mayor

PHILADELPHIA — Former Mayor Frank Rizzo has been retained as a full-time consultant on government relations and security matters by a municipally owned utility.

Rizzo will be paid $5,000 a month starting March 1 "and for the foreseeable future," James G. McKee, chief executive officer of the Philadelphia Gas Works, said in a statement Monday.

Rizzo was mayor for eight years, until 1980, after spending 28 years in the city's police department, where he rose to commissioner. He will continue to receive his $45,000-a-year pension from the city.

Rizzo was barred by the City Charter from running for a third consecutive term as mayor. Current Mayor W. Wilson Goode defeated him in last year's Democratic primary when he tried to make a comeback.

Rizzo, who has a strong law-and-order image, was sought because of "the unique combination of his knowledge of governmental affairs, his extensive police experience and his unusual knowledge of Philadelphia and its problems," McKee said.

Joanna Carson pleased with ruling

NEW YORK — Joanna Carson denies that she asked for more than $2 million a year in temporary support from entertainer Johnny Carson, whom she is divorcing.

"I think the decision that the court made was very fair," Mrs. Carson said Monday, referring to a judge's awarding her $420,000 a year last week from the "Tonight" show star, pending a final divorce settlement. The judge also gave her $2 million as her share of an equal split of the couple's liquid assets.

The press "said that I asked for $220,000 a month, and very frankly I didn't ask for $220,000 a month," Carson said on ABC's "Good Morning America."

She did not say how much she asked for, but court papers filed by her lawyers said she needed $220,000 a month to pay for clothing, security, servants, other household expenses, gifts and taxes.

Carson said she knew when she decided to end her 11-year marriage that her husband would get the sympathy.

"That public out there will forgive him anything," she said. "And indeed they should. When he comes to them at the most vulnerable time of their lives — it's dark, it's late, they could be lonely, they could be ill — they should forgive him because he makes them laugh."

Famous bandit's grandson dies

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Lawrence H. Barr, one of six grandchildren of the outlaw Jesse James, has died at the age of 81.

Barr, who lived his entire life in the Kansas City area, died Saturday at St. Joseph Hospital.

Barr had worked 38 years as a payroll accountant for Hallmark Cards Inc. at his retirement in 1968.

At a reunion of 200 members of the James family in June 1982, Barr, then 79, had said he once was ashamed of his bloodline to Jesse James.

But Barr said he had grown "older and less sensitive."

"And I know now that a lot of what they say he has done isn't true," Barr said then. "Why, back then, anytime a bank was robbed everyone would say, 'Jesse James did it!'"

Barr is survived by his wife, Thelma, a sister and a brother.

Bill may raise number of judges to 10

Case backlog hinders appeals court

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The chief judge of the Kansas Court of Appeals urged a Senate panel Monday to approve a bill to add three more judges to the seven-member court to fight a growing case backlog.

"What I am here to say is the need has arisen," said J. Richard Foth, who has been the chief judge since December 1977.

He and several representatives of legal organizations testified in support of a proposal before the Senate Judiciary Committee to expand the Court of Appeals from 7 to 10 members and increase the salaries of the judges by about $5,800 a year.

The proposal was developed by the Kansas Judicial Council as a solution to a continuing problem of case backlogs. At the end of 1983, 746 cases were pending before the Appeals Court, which was established in 1977 to hear appeals from the district courts. More than 1,000 cases were filed with the court last year.

Foth said the Appeals Court has taken steps to address the problem, including shortened opinions and special three-judge panels, but case filings have simply increased at a faster pace than the judges can dispose of them.

"We're still falling behind," Foth said.

He said delays in issuing opinions causes "disrespect" for the judicial system and eventually is "very harmful to state government."

Pat Hurley, former secretary of administration and a member of the Judicial Council committee which developed the proposal, said expansion of the Appeals Court was the only solution to the backlog problem.

"I think this is one of the major problems in state government right now," Hurley, who is now a lobbyist, said.

Moreover, he said current salaries of Appeals Court judges were too low to make the positions attractive to experienced lawyers and trial judges. A heavy workload and low salaries also has created a "serious morale problem" within the Appeals Court, Hurley added.

During his five-year tenure as secretary of administration, Hurley said, he questioned the need for adding more judges to the court and thought there were other ways to combat the case backlog. That has changed, however.

"I am now convinced...that you're going to have to increase the court today," Hurley said. "I don't think there is any other practical solution."

John Brookens, a retired district judge, spoke in favor of the bill on behalf of the Kansas Bar Association.

"I don't think there is any question the caseload merits more help over there," Brookens said.

Also supporting the proposal was Ralph Skoog, a Topeka lawyer who represented the Kansas Trial Lawyers Association.

John Myers, a policy analyst in the Budget Division, said Gov. John Carlin would be "happy" to submit an amendment to his proposed budget if the committee recommended changes in the court. He noted that the Judicial Council proposal came too late for inclusion in the governor's spending recommendations to the 1984 Legislature.

The bill before the Judiciary Committee calls for:

— Three additional judges on the court.

— Increasing annual salaries of the judges to $56,500 from the current $50,639, and the chief judge's salary to $57,500 from $51,752.

— Changing the law to make appeals of most class B felonies, such as second-degree murder, go to the Court of Appeals. Currently convictions of class A and B felonies go directly to the Supreme Court because they involve potential life sentences. The change is to free the Supreme Court to handle more complicated cases and would speed up the handling of other cases in the Appeals Court, according to Foth.

The Judicial Council made several other recommendations that are not included in the bill because they do not require statutory changes. Among those were expanding the court's central research staff, acquisition of word processing equipment and computerized research materials and raising the docket fees for Appeals Court cases from $55 to $100. Docket fees are set by the Supreme Court and the other changes only require appropriations by the Legislature, said Sen. Elwayne Pomeroy, R-Topeka, the committee chairman.

The committee did not act on the measure and no date for a vote has been scheduled.

Reagan aide returns to campaign trail

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The last two times Jim Lake spent primary day in New Hampshire, awful things happened.

In 1976, his candidate, Ronald Reagan, lost by a nose.

In 1980, Reagan fired Lake before the polls closed. And won.

This year is sure to be different. Reagan is a sure thing — he has no primary opposition in New Hampshire today. And Jim Lake is back with the Reagan campaign — after a remarkable comeback.

"I'm going to be there (in Manchester, N.H.) to make sure this campaign gets started off on the right foot," Lake said. His role will be to provide the Reagan camp's reaction to the eight-way Democratic primary contest.

James H. Lake, 46, a native of Bakersfield, Calif., began working for Reagan in 1974. But as a close ally of campaign manager John Sears in 1980, Lake became a victim of the factionalism and bitter infighting that split Reagan's campaign staff.

At 2 p.m. on Feb. 26, 1980, mid-afternoon of the New Hampshire primary, Sears got the ax. Lake had to go, too.

Reagan gave them no choice. As thousands were trudging to the polls, Reagan presented Sears and Lake with a press release that said they had resigned.

They were fired because Reagan believed Sears had presented an ultimatum to choose between Sears and Edwin Meese III, now White House counselor. But that was just the final issue in a series of frictions that seemed to Reagan to have been generated by Sears.

Lake's 1984 return is remarkable because some key Reagan aides are known for their long memories.

Sen. Paul Laxalt, R-Nev., chairman of Reagan's re-election campaign, explained in a recent telephone interview why he asked Lake to return to the campaign fold as press secretary last June.

"Each time I looked at the prospective list, I kept coming up with Jim," Laxalt said. "The more I thought about it, I thought maybe time heals some wounds — not that they were all that severe."

Laxalt approached key presidential aides and others who would be closely involved in the campaign. He recalled phrasing the question this way: "Are you still distressed with Jim Lake?" And the answer came back: "Who could be distressed with Jim Lake for very long?"

Laxalt said Lake's personality "overcomes a lot of problems. What happened in 1980 essentially was philosophical. It was not all that personal. He loyally stayed with Sears and we all understood."

Even before the overture from Laxalt, Lake had taken steps to renew his friendship with deputy White House chief of staff Michael K. Deaver, who had been forced out of the 1980 campaign by Sears several months before the firing. Lake called Deaver on Election Day, 1980, to offer congratulations, and occasionally visited with him at the White House.

But there still was some repair work to do with Lyn Nofziger, former White House political director and an unpaid consultant to the campaign who had once warned that Sears was preparing to get rid of all Reagan's old associates. So Nofziger and Lake went to lunch and buried the hatchet.

Assured that the campaign hierarchy would "treat me in an open, forthright manner," Lake took a paid leave from his job as a consultant to a Washington law firm. He works in the campaign as a full-time volunteer.

This time around, he believes, the hardball infighting may lessen because most people on Reagan's campaign staff remember the bad times. However, Lake and Laxalt agreed that such internecine warfare was probably inevitable in a presidential campaign.

"You bring together highly intelligent, aggressive men and women with egos and personal motivations from a variety of disciplines and experiences in a concentrated time to go for the biggest game in town," Lake said in an interview at Reagan campaign headquarters.

"It would be an absolute miracle if there were not strained feelings," he said. "Reagan permitted the thing in 1980. But he finally had to do something. It was beyond the stage of letting it go on. And I was relieved that he did something, though I had another option in mind."

So far this year, Laxalt said, "it's so harmonious it's dull."

But then, the outlook right now for Reagan's re-election is considered rosy.

"You never know," Laxalt said. "When times get tough, the finger pointing starts."

Carlin chides Regan for farm remarks

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Gov. John Carlin on Monday criticized Treasury Secretary Donald Regan as insensitive for remarks Regan reportedly made about the financial plight of farmers during a meeting with governors.

During a morning White House session with top Reagan administration officials, Regan said it was not the government's responsibility to take care of farmers who were in severe financial trouble because of high interest rates, according to several of the governors present.

"He said in essence that things are actually much better out on the farm," Carlin said later, adding that the secretary regarded the hardship faced by some farmers as "just part of something that has to happen from time to time."

Regan told the governors that high interest rates were not as harmful to farmers as has been believed because they are able to deduct interest paid from their income and therefore reduce the federal taxes they pay, the governors reported.

"To a farmer that's not making any money and not paying any taxes, that kind of help is of absolutely no value," Carlin said. He added that the farm plight is far more serious than Regan is aware of.

"It's not the typical cyclical problem," said the Democratic governor. "It's to the point where the financial community is about ready to bail out...Interest rates are dramatically affecting, and in a very negative way, the farmers of this country."

Carlin said Regan's remarks were "insensitive" and "showed a lack of understanding of what's going on" in rural America.

A spokesman for Regan, who spoke only if not identified by name, said Regan was only trying to point out that the government cannot be responsible for the financial problems of any business owner — farmer or otherwise — who gets too deeply into debt.

Carlin's comments came in an interview after a session of the National Governors Association's agriculture committee at which a policy position he drafted last year was adopted.

The policy calls in broad terms for a more long-term approach to the formulation of U.S. farm policy, saying past policy has been characterized by efforts to solve immediate problems with no regard for the solutions' future effects.

To bring about a long-range approach, Carlin said, a "quasi-independent" body should be created at the federal level to come up with a stable plan for a sound agricultural economy.

Carlin, who takes over the NGA as chairman in July, also said he heard little new at the White House on the nation's most serious domestic problem, the budget deficit. It will be up to Congress to take the first step toward reducing red-ink spending, he said, and the current $100 billion "down payment" proposal now under consideration is "not nearly enough."

On the political scene, Carlin, who was an early backer of Sen. John Glenn for the Democratic presidential nomination, said he would not back down from that support simply because Glenn had done poorly in the Iowa caucuses, the first test of strength for the candidates.

"I don't intend to ever rethink my enthusiasm for John Glenn," Carlin said. But he added, "The reality is that he just has to do better."

College learns of scandal after hiring professor

By The College Press Service

After going through normal procedures, the University of South Florida routinely hired Stanley DeRusha as its new band director in December.

But a month later, USF officials found they had hired a man who left his last job — as Michigan State University's band director — under a cloud of administrative suspicion that he had sexually harassed some MSU women.

USF officials discovered the suspicions by accident, and last week, DeRusha sued MSU for allegedly letting word of the sexual harassment charges reach USF.

In what appears to be the biggest controversy surrounding the way colleges hire faculty members since last year's Paul Crafton caper — in which a professor taught at six colleges under six names, without the other schools knowing about it — the DeRusha case has left DeRusha and USF officials feeling like victims, confused the women who originally filed the harassment charges and put MSU administrators in full retreat.

At the controversy's center is a secret agreement between DeRusha and MSU.

DeRusha agreed to leave the school without suing over what he saw as MSU's unjust denial of tenure to him.

The university agreed to drop the six charges of sexual harassment against DeRusha and guaranteed no one else would find out about them, according to court documents.

MSU also agreed to pay DeRusha $50,000 to conclude the matter.

As the agreement demanded, MSU never told MSU about the charges then pending against DeRusha while USF officials were deciding whether to hire DeRusha, Steven Wenzel, USF's vice president for employee relations, said.

Wenzel is now openly annoyed by MSU's "expunging" of certain sections of DeRusha's employment file, and the fact that MSU still won't talk to him about it.

"They take the position that they can't release any information under Michigan law," Wenzel said. "Especially with the lawsuit, nobody's saying anything."

Most of the other concerned parties — DeRusha, his attorney, and MSU lawyer Leland Carr — have stopped talking to the press since DeRusha filed suit in Grand Rapids, Mich., on Feb. 13.

DeRusha contends MSU violated the agreement by letting word of its existence out, and that the school exposed him to "public scorn, humiliation and ridicule."

He's asking for $3 million in damages.

Word of the agreement apparently became public because "nobody ever bothered to tell the six women who charged (DeRusha) with sexual harassment" that they should keep quiet, or that their copies of a university investigation into the charges were confidential, said Renee Villeneuve, city editor of the State News, the student newspaper that subsequently discovered the pact.

One of the women called the paper in December, asking why DeRusha was still on campus even after the school's investigatory panel had recommended the band director's dismissal, Villeneuve said.

In fact, MSU lawyer Carr apparently neglected to tell the investigatory panel itself — which went on to find DeRusha guilty of 14 counts of sexual harassment — and some MSU trustees about the payments and pact.

"As a trustee," Peter Fletcher said, "I learned of the payments in the newspaper. I feel some responsibility for this, yet I didn't know it happened."

"I do not appreciate being in the position of having people call me asking responsibility in pawing off some fornicator, and I don't know what they're talking about," he said.

But the administration, Villeneuve said, "felt if his case (was public) it would make the school look bad. If they kept it quiet forever, no one would know. They just wanted him out of the state, so they paid him off to go away."

"Originally," said C. Patric Larowe, a MSU economics professor who knows DeRusha well, "it was a cheap way for MSU to avoid a lawsuit over the harassment charges themselves."

"DeRusha said he could prove his innocence," Larowe said, but DeRusha's attorney Joseph Reid supposedly convinced him to sign the secret agreement.

Involved in a court fight, Larowe said DeRusha "wouldn't be able to conduct the symphony, and he wouldn't be able to use his talents for two years. It would just be better to leave."

USF, however, feels it just would have been better to have known.

"Under those circumstances, a university can't always protect itself," Wenzel said. "If employment records are incomplete, applicants 'can obviously get through the most stringent screening processes. You can never be sure of what you're getting.'"

"As far as I know, he is teaching his classes and performing his usual functions," said Dr. Dan Holsenbeck of USF's public information office.

Meanwhile, MSU has 90 days to answer DeRusha's suit in court.

Plans contribute to honeymoon success

By DIANE KERSTING
Collegian Reporter

If planned carefully, a honeymoon can do for a wedding what the icing does for a cake.

WEDDINGS

Traditionally, the groom has been responsible for making all honeymoon arrangements — choosing the destination, purchasing tickets and making reservations. But local travel agents said many couples now are coming in to get ideas so they can make those decisions together.

Thea Garvin, a local travel agent, said Orlando, Fla., currently seems to be the most popular honeymoon location, but added that Hawaii, Colorado and the Ozarks in southern Missouri are favorites also.

"The people who plan in advance get more selection compared to those who come in and are getting married this weekend," Garvin said.

Advanced planning is more likely to ensure not only that the couple gets what they want from a honeymoon, but also may provide a better chance for taking advantage of travel bargains.

After deciding how much to spend on a honeymoon and agreeing on the location of the trip, the next step is to view a wide range of travel information.

Travel agencies usually offer special rates and package deals for honeymoon budgets, Garvin said. In addition, agencies are usually able to recommend side trips, little-known places of interest and fine restaurants.

Another local travel consultant, Nancy Dailey, cited Hawaii as currently the most popular place for honeymooners. Several different "special" packages are being offered, such as a two-island (Oahu and Maui) trip for $724 per person.

The package includes round trip air and land fare and hotel accommodations for seven nights. There also is a one-island package with an ocean-front hotel for $537 per person.

Jamaica is another popular choice of newlyweds, Dailey said.

"The nicest place is Runaway Bay," she said. "It's $509 per person round trip and includes tips, meals, airfare and a hotel with a superior view for seven nights. For three nights at this same hotel it's only $329."

"It (price) all depends on the hotel, because the airfare would all be the same," Dailey said. "You can stay on one island for as cheap as $489. This includes your land (travel) and airfare and accommodations for seven nights. Then, we also have a deluxe package, which is the most expensive, for $957."

All prices are subject to change, she said.

For those who don't have the time or the money to go very far from home, the "hotels on the Country Club Plaza in Kansas City, Mo., offer special honeymoon packages that usually consist of a bottle of champagne, dinner, breakfast served in the room, free drinks and tips, for about $75 to $90 per room for one night," Dailey said.

Wedding day plans, details require months of thought

By DIANE KERSTING
Collegian Reporter

Marriage ceremonies are one of the most meaningful and memorable traditions in American culture, and people spend months in preparation to ensure that the day is a special one.

WEDDINGS

According to bridal magazines and wedding guidebooks, a formal wedding takes at least six months to plan. The first step is deciding what type of ceremony it will be — formal, semiformal or informal. This is usually determined by the number of guests, the apparel of the wedding party and the time of day the ceremony will take place.

Establishing a budget and deciding who will pay for what is the next step.

The wedding date and time should be set as soon as possible and approved by the church, and the reception must be arranged. Guest lists can also be started, a bridal gown selected and bridesmaids' dresses ordered.

Brides' also should begin a bridal registry at stores which carry household items to indicate their gift preferences for family and friends.

Don Carrel, owner of a local retail store with a bridal registry, said a trend has developed in bride's selecting "more practical gifts as opposed to expensive china and things like this. For one thing, the prices are too high, but also, people are just more practical today. They aren't as formal," he said.

"Many brides don't realize that they can register at more than one place. They need to register at several places, wherever there are things they like," Carrel said.

Registering should be done at least two to four months in advance of the wedding.

The groom also should begin planning at least six months in advance. One of his responsibilities is to order and purchase the bride's rings. Yellow gold and diamonds are the most popular, David Duerfeldt, jeweler, said.

The most popular style is the wedding solitaire, one major stone set up on the band to show off the diamond, he said.

Duerfeldt said he has noted an increase in popularity of little diamonds to offset the major stone and matching sets with the man's ring being dressier or having small diamonds.

Wedding guidebooks suggest that three months before the wedding, invitations and announcements should be ordered, a photographer selected, music and reception details planned, honeymoon reservations made, flowers ordered and groom and groomsmen's attire ordered. One month in advance, invitations should be sent, formal pictures taken and gifts for attendants selected.

Accommodations for guests and plans for the rehearsal dinner need at least two months of prior planning to assure reservations.

The wedding cake and reception menu must be ordered, seating arrangements made, announcements sent to the newspaper and a marriage license obtained within two weeks of the wedding so that the week before can be spent confirming plans and tending to last minute details.

Tony Jurich, professor of family and child development and co-clinical director of marriage and family therapy at the Family Center, said he believes modern weddings are more flexible than their traditional counterparts.

Time alters wedding ceremonies

Today's weddings are a blend of traditions and new twists, according to Tony Jurich, professor of family and child development and co-clinical director of marriage and family therapy at the Family Center.

WEDDINGS

"Boundaries of what is formal are breaking down to include more variety. Weddings used to be very tight, now we're just introducing some flexibility into them," Jurich said.

The aspects of marital ceremonies that have remained fairly stable throughout the years are "certain requirements that are mandatory in terms of state," Jurich said.

Today's ceremonies are traditional in that the bride and groom marry each other, pledging a promise; a priest, rabbi or minister acts as a witness; and the couple exchanges vows of some kind along with a token of love, usually rings, he said.

New twists in ceremonies include writing personal vows; taking advantage of the changes in the liturgy of religions and choosing Bible passages to be read; and wearing bridal pantsuits and men's suits that can be worn more than once are frequently substituted for veils and tuxedos.

Other format changes in ceremonies allow congregation participation in the repeating of vows, reading Bible passages and singing, Jurich said.

Having attended many types of weddings, including one at the Tuttle Creek Reservoir overlook, Jurich said he believes non-traditional ceremonies are more common among Kansas students than among those in other areas of the country.

College students are more willing to explore alternatives because they generally have a higher education, he said. In addition, the Midwest is not as tradition-oriented as some areas.

"There's still a lot of that frontier spirit (here)," he said.

"A state doesn't care (how weddings are performed) as long as a license is obtained, the person who performs the ceremony is licensed by the state, the proper number of witnesses are present — two, typically speaking — and the state's rules and regulations, such as the three-day waiting period, are followed," he said.

Regardless of whether it is celebrated in a traditional or non-traditional manner, marriage is still a "legal document and contract that is binding for life — unless it's undone by legal process," Jurich said.

Tuition may increase at state junior colleges

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A proposal to raise student tuition at community colleges by 20 percent was tentatively approved on voice vote by the House Monday.

The House will take final action on the measure today. If passed, it will go to the Senate for its consideration.

Current law allows community colleges to charge students between $10 and $15 for tuition. The proposal would allow community colleges to set tuition between $12 and $18.

Rep. David Louis, R-Shawnee, proposed an unsuccessful amendment which would have eliminated the upper limit community colleges can charge students for tuition.

The House voted 73-27 against the amendment.

In other business, the House tentatively approved a measure which would require insurance companies to compensate family members of an automobile insurance policy holder for pain and suffering.

"I would like to send a message to the Senate that we want this family exclusion removed from automobile insurance policies," said Rep. Marvin Barkis, D-Louisburg, who proposed removing the family exclusion.

Most automobile insurance policies do not allow family members to be compensated for pain and suffering incurred as the result of an automobile accident, Barkis said.

The House voted 58-53 for the amendment.

Marriage requires license in each state

By DIANE KERSTING
Collegian Reporter

Whether a bride and groom exchange vows in an elaborate cathedral or under a canopy in the backyard; dressed in lace and silk or jeans and T-shirts, all must have a marriage license in their possession.

Such a license is legal recognition that a couple has become man and wife. Although all states require this document, detailed regulations vary from state to state.

In Riley County, the process for obtaining a marriage license begins when the bride and groom-to-be apply at the annex of the District Court clerk's office, Riley County District Court Clerk Joyce Chalkley, said.

Both partners need not be present to complete the one-page marriage registration form, which contains personal data of each applicant.

After filling out an application, there is a three-day waiting period before the license is issued, Chalkley said. When the license is issued, the applicants must print their full legal names and ages on an affidavit and take an oath, swearing all the submitted information is correct.

For the license to be granted, neither party can currently have another spouse, be divorced within the past 30 days or be related to each other in any degrees prohibited by law — parent and child, grandparent and grandchild, brother and sister of whole or half blood, uncle and niece, aunt and nephew or first cousins, Chalkley said.

The state of Kansas eliminated the requirement for blood tests about a year ago, she said.

A deputy clerk and notary public sign and stamp the license with the court seal and collect the $17 cash fee.

If either applicant is under the age of 18, the process is not quite as simple, Chalkley said.

For 17-year-olds, 30 days of counseling by a clergyman or professional counselor is required, while 90 days is required for younger people. Also, written permission from both parents is mandatory before anyone under age 18 will be issued a license, she said.

In addition, there are two basic areas in which a couple must make contacts with the business and legal worlds when preparing for marriage — securing a legally qualified person to officiate the ceremony and making necessary business changes.

Any judge or minister with recorded credentials in a Kansas court is allowed to perform the marriage ceremony. In Riley County, civil ceremonies are held after 5 p.m. Monday through Friday in the courtroom. The judge does not perform ceremonies in homes.

Changes with respect to marital status, legal name and residential address also must be made, Chalkley said. These include employer records, social security cards, insurance policies, passports and visas, driver's license, voter registration, bank accounts, club memberships, subscriptions and post office listings.

It's a 'Thriller' for Jackson: 12 Grammy nominations

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Michael Jackson's singing, writing, producing and talking could break Grammy records Tuesday night at the National Academy of Recording Arts & Sciences 26th annual award presentations.

Jackson, 25, got an unprecedented 12 nominations from the academy's nearly 6,000 voting members last month, but he can win no more than 10 Grammys since he was twice nominated in two areas. Still, he seems poised to break the record five Grammys by an artist in one year.

Plans for the three-hour Grammy show, to be shown on CBS, include patter by emcee John Denver and performances by such artists as cast members from Broadway's "La Cage Aux Folles," Chuck Berry, Wynton Marsalis and the Oak Ridge Boys.

Eleven of Jackson's nominations resulted from his "Thriller" LP; the 12th was for children's recording for narrating the album version of "E.T. The Extra-Terrestrial."

Several artists share the five Grammys-in-a-year record, including Henry Mancini, Roger

Miller, Paul Simon, the Bee Gees and Quincy Jones, Jackson's co-producer on "Thriller."

A Jackson sweep is not a bad bet in three of the record academy's Big Four categories: record, album and song of the year. Those and the best new artist area are the only ones all academy members vote on.

"Thriller," which has sold 25 million copies worldwide to become the best-selling LP ever, should be a shoo-in for album of the year.

"Beat It" also seems likely to take record of the year. But if academy members were inclined to give someone else a chance, "Every Breath You Take" by the Police would seem to have the edge over Irene Cara's "Flashdance...What a Feeling," Michael Sembello's "Maniac" and Lionel Richie's "All Night Long (All Night)."

The new song of the year category is a little trickier, since Jackson's "Beat It" is up against his "Billie Jean." A split vote could conceivably give the win to "Every Breath You Take," "Maniac" or "All Night Long." In the best new artist, Culture Club is favored over Eurythmics.

KCPL issued a statement Monday saying it "strongly disagrees" with the estimate of a 79 percent rate increase if Wolf Creek costs were passed along to customers at one time.

Joe Kramer, a KCPL spokesman, said the company estimates an increase of "around 50 percent" for a one-time charge from Wolf Creek. However, KCPL has proposed a four-year phase-in, charging customers for half of plant costs initially and then passing the remainder along in equal installments over three years.

KG&E and KCPL each own 47 percent of the Wolf Creek plant and KEPCo owns 6 percent. Combined, the three utilities serve about 440,000 customers in Kansas.

The rate projections were prepared by the KCC at the request of Rep. Ken Grotewiel, D-Wichita.

"The data should be considered as a tool for the analysis of the relative impact of various phase-in periods and not as an indicator of anticipated rate increases attributable to the plant," Robert Fillmore, a KCC attorney, said in a letter to Grotewiel explaining the projections.

Lobbyist protests job favoritism

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Spouses, children or parents of state officials and employees should not be given preferential treatment when seeking state jobs or promotions, a Senate committee was told Monday.

But Jo Ann Klesath, lobbyist for the Kansas Association of Public Employees, told the Senate Elections Committee she knew of two cases where that happened.

An administrator in one state agency married his secretary and then wanted to give her a promotion, Klesath said. Her organization protested the administrator's action and the promotion did not go through.

In another case, an administrator's son was put on the day shift, Klesath said, although most employees start out on the second or third shift and work their way up to the day shift.

Klesath said she supported a bill before the committee which would prohibit nepotism in state jobs. However, she asked the bill be changed to apply only to classified employees and be expanded to regulate promotions.

The measure, requested by the Kansas Public Disclosure Commission, would prohibit state officials or employees from hiring or using the influence of their positions to bring about the hiring of their spouses, children or parents for a state job.

A few committee members said they thought the measure was too broad.

"I take that to mean no state employee could call another state employee and say 'My wife needs a job — do you have any?'" said Sen. Michael Johnston, D-Parsons.

And Sen. Joseph Norvell, D-Hays, said he did not know who would be hurt by a legislator hiring his wife as his secretary if she was the best person qualified for the job.

The committee took no action on the measure, nor did it act on several governmental ethics bills brought before the panel.

One ethics bill would give the Public Disclosure Commission power to issue subpoenas when it is investigating allegations of misconduct against state officials and employees.

Janet Williams, spokeswoman for the commission, said the commission now is only allowed to issue subpoenas when it has found "probable cause" to investigate a complaint.

However, she said, probable cause is sometimes hard to establish if the commission cannot get access to certain documents and records.

Norvell objected to the commission's request saying it would be "devastating" to grant subpoena power without requiring a finding of probable cause.

Depression:

Blues may indicate serious illness

By LAURIE SHEPHERD
Collegian Reporter

People often feel sad and blue. But being down in the dumps consistently for more than a week may be more than just a case of the blues. It may be an indication of the most common emotional disorder, depression.

Sarah (not her real name), a part-time student, considered herself a manic-depressive person, an individual classified as having long periods of depression followed by a recovery period of normalcy as well as extreme euphoria. Dr. Daniel Martin, associate professor of student health at Lafene Student Health Center, said,

"I could feel it (a depressive mood) coming on. I'd think of my personal problems and just let them build bigger and bigger until my eating habits would change, my school work would begin to suffer and I'd constantly cry. It seemed like there was nothing anyone could say to make me feel better about myself or my problems. My mother and I were never very close, so I couldn't turn to her. It's something you think you have to deal with yourself, yet you can't cope with the pressure. I felt a terribly strong feeling of no self-worth and would later have thoughts of suicide," Sarah said.

According to the National Institute of Mental Health, depression is a serious disease which will affect 40 million Americans in their lifetimes. It is estimated that 8 million people (two-thirds of them women) will seek treatment for their depression. Seventy-five percent of the people who commit suicide are in fact depressed.

Many times when depression is an unrecognizable state, it not only causes personal misery, but disrupts families and ruins careers, Martin said.

Mild forms of depression are likely to go unnoticed by family and friends. For example, occasional sleeplessness or loss of appetite are symptoms of mild depression, but they can be interpreted as character faults, Martin said.

Martin said that recently, depression has led to suicide in such instances as a shy teenager taking an overdose after being jilted by his high school sweetheart or a college student giving up due to indecision and consecutive failings, resulting in the feeling of total self-worthlessness.

Depressive illness is not a physically definable problem that can be found or confirmed by laboratory tests or x-rays. Rather, it is a combination of symptoms — physical, emotional and behavioral. Among major symptoms of depression are constant feelings of sadness that don't seem to go away, loss or increase of appetite, sleep disturbances, sudden loss of interest in normally pleasurable activities and difficulty in performing normally simple tasks, Martin said.

"It's all a matter of a biochemical imbalance within the nervous system called organic depression," he said.

Inside nerve cells, messages are conducted by electricity, which can cause the release of hormones that diffuse into other cells.

"These hormones break down too fast and must be destroyed. Medication, not to be confused with tranquilizers, prove to be very effective by slowing down the hormonal breakdown," Martin said. It is this unusually fast breakdown of hormones which causes depression, he said.

It becomes obvious that the individual needs help when the symptoms of depression become so severe that he is unable to work, won't get out of bed in the morning or has crying spells for no reason, Martin said.

It is especially important to the college-age population to realize, as they begin to take on life's pressures and become affected by them, that there is treatment available upon recognition of these symptoms, said Thomas Coleman, director of mental health at Lafene Student Health Center.

Coleman said students' responses to developmental crises such as leaving home, deciding what to do with a long-term relationship upon graduation and making career choices are situations that spur depression.

He said that he has observed stages of depression involving K-State students. The first is for the freshman leaving home for the first time.

"They begin to take on new responsibilities, values and challenges. This can often be a traumatic change for them," Coleman said.

He said this first stage accounts for one of the two highest usage peaks at the clinic.

"The fall brings a period of transition and adjustments that all students, not just freshmen, have to face," Coleman said. After the students have adjusted, made friends and settled themselves, there is an increase of depression cases near midterm examination periods, he said.

The second time that many students seek counseling and treatment for their depression is during the spring semester.

"The end of a college career brings decisions of what to do with a relationship or career. Not having consolidated plans for a future both interpersonally and professionally can cause prolonged unhappiness," Coleman said.

Sarah explained that an unhappy childhood is the basis for her bouts of depression. "Ever since grade school I had convinced myself that I was not quite as good as the rest of my classmates. For some reason, I had a notion that I was inferior. I guess that was a label that stuck with me the rest of the way through school. Grade school and high school are such impressionable stages for kids. Since then I've basically been a loner, drifting through school not caring if I had close friends or not."

Sarah was one of those shy teenagers who was jilted by her high school sweetheart. She said that her most severe mood changes began when she started reflecting back on the failed relationship.

"I began taking all different kinds of pills. Different colors, sizes and shapes — I just didn't care anymore. Deep down I knew it wasn't right, but I doubted my reason for living and just gave in. I felt like not one person cared, so why should I?"

After the attempt failed, she began seeing a counselor once a week for about a year. By this time Sarah was attending K-State and was involved in campus activities. She also was gaining friends and confidence in herself. She had a boyfriend whom she dated for more than a year, but then the relationship began to falter.

Sarah said that after attempts to salvage the relationship, she thought it best to end it to prevent getting hurt again.

She said that for two weeks she did not go to classes, but sat in her room and cried. She lost her appetite and was beginning to lose weight rapidly. She became "paranoid" of her roommates and family.

"We knew something was wrong, but we didn't know how we could help," Sarah's mother said. "We convinced her to come home, to get away from school for the weekend. We'd seen her depressed before, but the night it (her emotional break down) occurred, she went crazy."

"She screamed and cried when we tried to talk about her ex-boyfriend or missing school. Then her whole body trembled, and she fainted. We didn't know what else to do but take her to the hospital."

Sarah was diagnosed as being severely depressed. She received treatment at Lafene for two and a half weeks before being transferred to a mental hospital, where she received full-time care.

Martin said that the most important thing for people to understand is that severe depression is not any person's fault.

"It doesn't help to tell yourself, 'You'll feel better,' or 'Pull yourself together,' because it just doesn't happen by yourself. The depressed person can be reassured that he is suffering from the most treatable condition in psychiatry," Martin said.

The biggest part family members and friends can play in the treatment of a depressed person is to firmly urge him to seek help, Martin said. They should also feel free to acknowledge their own feelings of depression or helplessness. The reassurance helps take away the feeling of being further depressed about being depressed, and feeling guilty about being a burden on others, he said.

Martin said treatment of major depressive disorders such as manic-depression most often includes medication. Manic-depression usually respond to the tricyclic antidepressants (named for their three-ringed molecular structure) or to the MAO (monamine oxidase) inhibitors. The MAO inhibitors usually are prescribed only when the tricyclics have proved to be ineffective or when the person is suffering from severe anxiety, fears and phobias, Martin said.

The treatment should also include some sort of counseling, he added.

Another form of treatment is the electroconvulsive (or electroshock) therapy, which is rarely used except in extreme cases of severe depression, Martin said. It has been used with good effects and is considered one of the best treatments for suicidal patients, he said.

A patient receiving electroconvulsive therapy can come into the doctor's office in street clothes. The patient is given a quick-acting anesthetic and a muscle relaxant. A low-amperage electric current is applied to the temples for a second or less. The patient sleeps through the procedure and remembers nothing of it when he awakens. The only side effect reported from this type of treatment is temporary, minor forgetfulness.

Treating lesser depressive disorders depends on the patient's symptoms. A depression caused by an unsettling event or an unsatisfactory life-situation is called demoralization. The demoralized patient has some symptoms of depression, including a feeling of helplessness and hopelessness and being totally unable to cope, Martin said.

The major difference between demoralization and severe depression is the demoralized individual's ability to experience pleasure. In some cases, demoralization turns into severe depression and is then usually treated with medication. Counseling is used most often to treat cases of demoralization to help the patient to learn to deal with real-life problems as well as his condition, Martin said.

One of the most common major depressive disorders is called chronic-depression. Almost everyone knows a chronic-depressive, a person who won't try because of fear of failure, or who only sees the dark sides of things, Martin said.

Illustration by John Sleezer

As treatments are being diagnosed, more are being researched. Blood tests to diagnose depression are still being investigated and have proven successful. Researchers are investigating the relationships of hormones, as well as nutrition, on moods and depression.

Intensive studies are being done on the brain chemicals that affect mood. Researchers and public health officials are studying new ways of dealing with major and minor depressive disorders. These range from family therapy to informal self-help groups.

Sarah is now at home again. She has chosen to go to school part-time and work for a year.

"If a person is depressed, the best advice I could ever give is to seek treatment or help. There is always someone who will listen, someone who knows what you're going through and can help," she said.

Weight training key to basketball success

By JUDI WRIGHT
Staff Writer

The past stereotype of basketball players being 6-foot-5 and weighing 180 pounds with long arms, boney elbows and knobby knees is gradually fading. It is being replaced by images of more muscular players thanks to an increased interest in weight training.

For the past 10 years, weight training for basketball is becoming a necessity for those who wish to continue competing in college basketball.

The University of Oklahoma began its weight training program because the players "were tired of getting pushed around," Head Coach Billy Tubbs said.

"In order to compete successfully at the major college level, you've got to emphasize some type of consistent weight training and conditioning program," Tubbs said. "The stronger and better shape your players are in, the better are your chances for success on the court."

Under the supervision of Head Strength Coach Russ Ball, the University of Missouri is now in its sixth year of basketball weight training. Ball said one of Missouri's reasons for starting its program was the importance of weight training in the Big Eight Conference.

"The Big Eight is a very physical conference, and because of this, weight training is essential," Ball said. "When the program first started (at Missouri), the players weren't really into it and they didn't understand the benefits. But now they see the program as very important in present-day basketball."

In addition to coaches, basketball players themselves have found that weight training isn't just for football players anymore.

Eddie Elder has participated in K-State's weight training program and has increased his size and strength, enabling him to compete better against his taller opponents.

"The program has helped me physically, which is obvious. I've gained strength as well as weight," the 6-foot-9, 203 pound forward said.

"But, it (the weight training program) also builds you up for a game as far as confidence is concerned."

All-American Wayman Tisdale from Oklahoma said he agrees with Elder on what weight training can do for an athlete.

"Building up your body by lifting weights just makes you that much stronger, especially in the upper body," Tisdale, a 6-foot-9, 240-pound center, said. "And when you feel stronger, you have a little more confidence out on the floor."

Ball said he has found weight training to improve the players' confidence and overall performance.

"If they (the players) feel like they're stronger, then they're not afraid to really fight for that rebound or drive for a layup," Ball said.

But, Bill Dunn, head strength coach at the University of Virginia, is quick to point out that weight training isn't the only thing that makes a basketball player.

"You can't create basketball players in the weight room," Dunn said. "You just take the areas like strength, agility, speed and hand-eye coordination and work to improve them."

Russ Reiderer, strength coach at K-State, who said he agrees with Dunn's logic, said, "The program doesn't make a weak player great, but it makes a great player that much better."

"If you can improve all these components (mentioned by Dunn) they (the basketball players) are going to become better basketball players, and in general, good athletes," Reiderer said.

Boyd Eppley, head strength coach for the University of Nebraska and past president of the National Strength Coaches Association, said the key to a successful weight training program is the head coach and his commitment to the program.

It's the end of the road for K-State's Lady 'Cats basketball squad.

It's not the end of the season, but simply the end of regular-season road contests as the Lady 'Cats face the University of Nebraska Lady 'Huskies at 5:15 p.m. today at Lincoln.

It will be the first of K-State's last two games of conference play as the Lady 'Cats gear up for a league title battle with the University of Missouri. The Lady Tigers lead the conference with a 12-1 record, followed closely by K-State's 10-2 mark.

The Lady 'Cats are coming off a 81-63 victory over the arch rival University of Kansas Lady Jayhawks on Saturday and will be looking for their sixth consecutive win. The team's last defeat was a 66-62 loss to Missouri on Feb. 8.

K-State soundly defeated the Lady 'Huskies 95-75 in a home contest Feb. 4, but Head Coach Lynn Hickey is quick to not underestimate Nebraska's winning trademark — its quickness.

"This is our last road game. We have to remember that the season isn't over until the last game is played," she said. "Even though we beat them last time, we'll have to be careful not to get into a running game with them. We need to utilize our size and to control the tempo."

And when it comes to size and inside play, count on junior Angie Bonner to lead the way for K-State. The 6-foot-1 center, who has been averaging 15 points per Big Eight outing, hit 11 of 13 field goals and 10 of 12 free throws for a career high 32 points in the Lady 'Cats win over Kansas.

Men cagers to tangle with Nebraska

The K-State men's basketball team will attempt to bounce back from a heart-breaking 63-61 loss to the University of Kansas on Saturday when they travel to Lincoln for a 7:35 p.m. contest today against the University of Nebraska.

The game had originally been set for Wednesday, but was moved up one day to accommodate a schedule change made by the University of Oklahoma. The Sooners will meet the University of Nevada-Las Vegas on Saturday, and as a result, the Nebraska-OU game set for Saturday was moved to Thursday. To avoid back-to-back games, the 'Huskies game with K-State was moved.

The Wildcats lost to KU when a shot by the Jayhawks' Carl Henry, who was being guarded tightly by the 'Cats Eddie Elder, swished a 15-foot baseline jumper for Kansas' final margin of victory.

"It was a desperation shot obviously," said Coach Jack Hartman. "We defended it extremely well."

K-State is currently 4-8 in the Big Eight Conference and 12-13 overall. Nebraska is coming off a 75-67 home victory over the University of Colorado. The victory was only the second in six home conference games for the Cornhuskers. The team has stayed in the battle for a top-division finish by winning four of six road games. The 'Huskies are now 6-6 in conference action and 16-9 overall.

The 'Huskies are led by 6-foot-4 senior Stan Cloudy and 6-foot-11 Dave Hoppen. The pair connected on 21 of 29 shots between them against the Buffaloes as Hoppen made 11 of 15 and Cloudy was 10 of 14.

Tom Alfaro continues to hold the hot hand for the Wildcats. He led K-State in scoring in the last six games and is averaging more than 14 points per game in Big Eight play.

Alfaro scored 23 against the Jayhawks, and Ben Mitchell chipped in 18. Elder was the only other Wildcat in double figures, tallying 10 points.

In the first meeting between the two squads, Ronnie Smith hit a follow shot off a Cloudy miss to give Nebraska a 47-46 win. Cloudy led the 'Huskies with 14 points and Hoppen added 10. Ben Mitchell was the only Wildcat in double figures as he scored 16, and Elder pulled down a game-high six rebounds.

"They have been playing excellent basketball lately," said Hartman, referring to Nebraska's team. "They look like they have a good shot at an upper-division berth, and I'm sure they'll play harder against us with that on the line."

Spikers sign Indiana star

Mary Kinsey, a standout volleyball player from Mount Vernon, Ind., has signed a letter of intent to attend K-State.

The 5-foot-9 outside hitter won eight letters while participating in basketball and volleyball at Mount Vernon High School, which also uses the Wildcat mascot. She was all-conference three times and was chosen for the Indiana Coaches' All-State team her junior and senior years.

As a senior, Kinsey led Mount Vernon to a tie for the league championship with 248 spikes, 113 service aces, 76 blocks and 53 defensive saves. In her three-year career at Mount Vernon, the Wildcats posted a record of 72-9.

"I'm delighted that Mary will attend Kansas State," volleyball Coach Scott Nelson said. "She has been our top recruit all along and I'm sure she'll make an immediate impact on our team."

Kinsey chose K-State over the University of Missouri, Southern Illinois University, the University of Kentucky, the University of Florida, Wichita State University and the University of Indiana.

"I think that list gives you an idea of the kind of player she is," Nelson said. "We're very much looking forward to her arrival."

Kinsey will major in English after earning a 3.3 grade point average in high school.

Hart musters upset in New Hampshire race

By The Associated Press

CONCORD, N.H. — Sen. Gary Hart upset Walter Mondale Tuesday in the lead-off New Hampshire primary, stripping Mondale's credentials as undisputed front-runner and leaving six other rivals to struggle for survival in the Democratic presidential race.

"Many people thought, including the front-runner, that this campaign would be over tonight," a jubilant Hart told supporters in Manchester. "This campaign just begins tonight."

Mondale was heavily favored but his lead faded over the weekend.

Hart wasn't ready to claim front-runner status, but drew cheers when he declared: "Tonight we buried the label 'darkhorse.'" He was picking up 41 percent of the vote, to 28 percent for Mondale. John Glenn was a far-away third.

Mondale congratulated Hart, said, "Sometimes a cold shower is good for you," and speculated that voters "didn't want the debate to end." Glenn said the results here "pierced that balloon of inevitability" that Mondale would win the nomination.

Mondale remained confident, saying "I have won one, I have lost one. I am ready to contest every primary."

Hart's margin stunned even his staff. He carried more than 75 cities and towns, far more than Mondale.

He held the lead in Manchester, a city with a large union vote that Mondale hoped to claim for his own.

Worse for Mondale was that since 1952, no one has even won the presidency while losing his party primary here.

Glenn was running third. Others

Mondale takes second place on the ballot included Sens. Alan Cranston and Ernest Hollings, former Sen. George McGovern, the Rev. Jesse Jackson and former Florida Gov. Reubin Askew.

President Reagan was without serious opposition on the Republican ballot, and even picked up 3,828 write-in votes in the Democratic contest.

Of the also-rans, only Cranston and Agnew declined to say they would continue their campaigns. Cranston scheduled a news conference for early Wednesday and aides spread word that he is determined to seek a new term in the Senate.

Glenn conceded disappointment but he said Hart was "more limited in the South," where the next set of primaries are scheduled March 13.

Turnout was lower than expected because of stormy weather. In reports from 283 of the state's 298 precincts, 94 percent of the total, the Democratic totals were:

Hart, 35,067 votes, or 40 percent.
Mondale, 24,809, or 29 percent.
Glenn, 10,889, 12 percent.
McGovern, 5,060, 6 percent.
Jackson, 4,796, 6 percent.
Hollings, 3,261, 4 percent.
Cranston, 1,983, 2 percent.
Askew, 934, 1 percent.
In the competition for delegates,

Hart led for 11 and Mondale for 7. Mondale kept the lead, including delegates already chosen from outside New Hampshire. He had or led for 125, with 18 for Hart and 17 for Glenn.

It was another in a long line of New Hampshire primary surprises — and the second for Hart. In 1972 he engineered McGovern's strong showing that propelled McGovern to the nomination.

The only clues to Hart's victory were pre-election polls with Mondale losing ground and Hart gaining. Hart campaigned in near obscurity for over a year, but gained momentum with a surprising if distant No. 2 finish behind Mondale in the Iowa caucuses Feb. 20.

A CBS News-New York Times poll with no real gauge sentiment in New Hampshire put Mondale well ahead of the field on a nationwide basis.

Besides the political capital to be won, at stake were 12 delegates to the Democratic National Convention, a tiny fraction of the 3,933 choosing the party nominee in San Francisco in July. Those 12 will elect 10 more in April, completing the state's 22 delegates.

First-in-the-nation primaries have become almost a cottage industry here, and this year was no exception. Since 1952 no one has been elected president who didn't first win the New Hampshire primary.

The candidates began to arrive more than 18 months ago, and the first political organizers moved in well over a year ago.

Reagan and all eight Democrats got federal matching funds, and so were limited to spending about $400,000 for votes.

Syrians report summit may begin in 48 hours

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A Syrian-Lebanese summit will be held within 48 hours to find a way to end the violence in Lebanon, the Syrian news agency said Tuesday. There were new reports that President Amin Gemayel was ready to announce cancellation of Lebanon's pact with Israel as a concession to Syria.

Government sources in Lebanon had said the summit might begin this weekend. But SANA, the official Syrian news agency, said Gemayel will visit Damascus "within the next 48 hours" for talks with President Hafez Assad of Syria.

Assad has demanded that the U.S.-arranged May 17 agreement be abrogated before he will receive Gemayel, and one government source said: "The agreement is finished, but the time for declaring its abrogation has yet to be set."

There have been numerous reports that Gemayel would annul the accord with Israel, but he has delayed action because of objections by some of his Christian allies who want the agreement to remain in force.

At the United Nations in New York, France called for a cease-fire throughout Lebanon and proposed U.N. troops monitor the truce in the Beirut area. The Security Council was expected to vote on the measure Wednesday.

And in Washington, a senior U.S. official said special Middle East envoy Donald Rumsfeld was expected to resign after one more trip to the troubled region and return to private business. The official, who requested anonymity, said Rumsfeld was frustrated by the failure to resolve the crisis in Lebanon in ways favorable to the United States.

Lebanese sources, who asked not to be identified, said the government was awaiting the return to Beirut from Riyadh of Saudi mediator Rafik Hariri. He is to accompany two Lebanese envoys — probably Foreign Minister Elie Salem and presidential adviser Jean Obeid — to Damascus today to prepare for Gemayel's first visit to Syria since he assumed power in September 1982.

The agreement calls for Israel and Syria to withdraw their forces from Lebanon simultaneously. The agreement has never gone into effect because Syria has refused to pull its troops out of Lebanon.

The diplomatic efforts were accompanied by more battles between Christian and Moslem militiamen in Beirut and in hilltops overlooking the capital.

Heavy artillery, rocket and machine-gun fire continued along the "green line" dividing Beirut into Christian and Moslem sectors, and police said six people were killed and 13 were wounded.

Guerrillas fired on an Israeli army patrol in southern Lebanon, and the Israeli military command said in Tel Aviv that two soldiers were killed.

In Jerusalem, two grenades exploded in the doorway of a store on the main shopping street, injuring 21 people. Two Palestinian groups backed by Syria claimed responsibility for the attack.

Druse militiamen outside U.S. Embassy offices on west Beirut's seaford exchanged gunfire with a speedboat offshore. Witnesses said the boat also fired on a U.S. helicopter, but apparently did not hit it.

In Amman, PLO leader Yasser Arafat visited units of the Palestine Liberation Army and told about 800 men he had come to Jordan seeking a formula for "the liberation" of Jerusalem and the Israeli-occupied territories.

Arafat has been conducting talks with King Hussein on working out a joint negotiating strategy on the question of Israeli-occupied Arab territory.

High court ruling forbids aid cuts despite biases against women

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court, dealing a major setback to women's rights groups, ruled Tuesday that the federal government may not cut off all aid to a college because of illegal sex discrimination in a particular program.

By a 6-3 vote, the court handed the Reagan administration a legal victory and dealt women's rights groups what they described as a major defeat.

"Institutions that are discriminating will be allowed to get federal dollars, and that has not happened in our country before," said Bernice Resnick Sandler, executive director of the Project on the Status and Education of Women. The group is a clearinghouse for information on issues of concern to women.

The court decision gave a narrow interpretation to a section of a 1972 federal law banning sex discrimination at colleges that receive federal aid.

The justices said the law mandates that if sex discrimination exists in a program that receives federal aid, funds be cut off only for the program — not for the college as a whole.

The case started off as an obscure dispute between the Education Department and tiny Grove City College in Grove City, Pa.

The administration, incensing women's rights groups, argued in a legal document filed with the Supreme Court that a college should not face a cut-off in all federal aid based on discrimination in one program.

The only federal aid that Grove City, a private, co-educational liberal arts college, receives from Washington is in the form of federal grants to its students.

The college refused to comply with a federal request for certain paperwork, although it has never been accused of practicing discrimination and is on record as opposing discrimination based on sex or race.

The college 70 miles north of Pittsburgh was founded in 1876. Affiliated with the Presbyterian Church, the college pictured itself as the victim of bureaucratic meddling.

"Apparently, the issue is still a live one before the American public as to whether a truly independent institution can exist in America today," said college President Charles MacKenzie, calling the decision as a "partial victory" and a "partial defeat."

"We want to be truly independent of government control," he said. "Therefore we don't expect to sign a form, but will certainly continue to practice non-discrimination in all of our programs as we have in the past. We hope ... to be able to raise private money to replace the federal money" that students get as government grants.

The Supreme Court said Tuesday that the only program at Grove City which is covered by the federal requirement is the college's own financial aid program.

In his opinion for the court, Justice Byron R. White said the receipt of the federal grants "by some of Grove City's students does not trigger institution-wide coverage" under the federal act.

The court ruled that the college must provide the paperwork sought by the government because student grants are a form of federal aid.

Women's rights advocates say the narrow interpretation jeopardizes efforts to eliminate sex discrimination in a variety of college programs.

In other decisions, the Supreme Court made it easier for handicapped workers to win on-the-job discrimination suits against employers that receive federal aid. The court ruled, 9-0, in a case against the Conrail Corp. that a worker may prevail without proving that the federal aid received by the employer is designed primarily to promote employment.

Pari-mutuel betting backers to rally at noon in Topeka

By MIKE TURNER
Government Editor

Up to 1,000 supporters of pari-mutuel gambling are expected to gather at noon today on the south steps of the Kansas Capitol in their uphill effort to bring legalized betting on horse races to the state.

Kansans for Pari-Mutuel, which is promoting the rally and a constitutional amendment to legalize gambling on horse races, issued a statement Tuesday claiming a recent poll showed the vast majority of Kansans would like to vote on the pari-mutuel question.

Jonathan Small, Topeka attorney and lobbyist for Kansans for Pari-Mutuel, said the telephone poll was conducted by Jayhawk Consulting Services Inc. in Shawnee Mission during the early part of the 1984 session.

Small said the sample revealed that 78 percent of the population would like the opportunity to vote on the issue. If given the opportunity, 49 percent said they would vote for the measure. Of those remaining, 33 percent said they would vote against pari-mutuel betting and 18 percent were undecided.

For voters to decide the issue, a pari-mutuel amendment would have to be placed on the ballot this November. For any constitutional amendment to appear on the ballot, the proposal must receive a two-thirds majority vote in both houses of the Kansas Legislature.

Senate President Ross Doyen, R-Concordia, said he does not think the proposal would receive the 27 votes in the Senate necessary for placement on the ballot. Last year, only 19 senators voted for a similar resolution. House Speaker Mike Hayden, R-Atwood, said he thinks the pari-mutuel resolution will fall "far, far short" of the 84 required votes in the House.

Small said he thinks recent polls conducted in the state can make the difference in the proposal's success with the Legislature this year. Pari-Mutuel backers are more optimistic this year because many polls and petitions show Kansans want to vote on this, he said.

Small also said the revenue pari-mutuel betting could generate is becoming an important issue.

He said a study by Dr. William Terrell, professor of economics at Wichita State University, concluded that legalized pari-mutuel betting would produce $32 million in direct and indirect tax revenues annually for the state treasury.

The study also showed that race tracks would create 9,830 new jobs and would generate about $194 million annually in new personal income in the state.

Small said 34 states currently have legalized pari-mutuel gambling, including Colorado, Oklahoma and Nebraska. "There lies no logical reason why the Legislature should postpone a chance to vote for such an opportunity in Kansas," he said.

An indication of the proposal's difficulties in the Legislature is the fact that Hayden referred it to both the Federal and State Affairs Committee and the Calendar and Printing Committee. Normally, bills are assigned to only one committee.

Rep. Robert Miller, R-Wellington and chairman of the Federal and State Affairs Committee, said a hearing date has not yet been established for the proposal, but would be likely to be scheduled in mid-March. If the proposal is passed by the Federal and State Affairs Committee, it will then be taken up by the Calendar and Printing Committee before being sent to the House floor.

Small said Kansans for Pari-Mutuel is led by Marvin Bastian of Wichita and has supporters across the state, but particularly in Wichita, Kansas City, Salina, Hays and Dodge City. The opposition to pari-mutuel betting is led by Rev. Richard Taylor Jr., who heads Kansans for Life at its Best!

Bloodmobile winners announced

Goodnow Hall, Smurthwaite Cooperative House and the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity have been named the living group winners in the bloodmobile donation competition Tuesday through Thursday.

Goodnow won for large residence halls and Smurthwaite won for small halls.

Phi Gamma Delta won the greek division.

Totals were based on the number of blood donors and the number of volunteer workers compared to the total number in the living group.

This is the second consecutive semester these three living groups have won these awards.

Rifle team wins first place overall

The K-State Rifle Team took top honors in overall shooting at the Camp Perry Indoor Rifle Match held at Kemper Military Academy, Mo., this weekend.

Andrew Vikman, freshman in geology, and John Griswold, freshman in architectural engineering, were high shooters for the team. Each scored 536 out of a possible 600 points. Vikman also placed third in the prone shooting category (lying down) and Griswold secured third place in overall shooting.

Team members were required to shoot from the prone, kneeling and standing positions to qualify for a possible team total of 2,400 points. The K-State team shot 2,096 overall.

The next match for the team is the Big Eight Match scheduled to take place at K-State March 30 through April 2.

Auction to raise scholarship funds

The Rho chapter of Phi Delta Gamma, a national graduate women's fraternity, is sponsoring a salad supper and silent auction at 6:30 p.m. March 8 at the First Baptist Church, 2121 Blue Hills Road.

The proceeds will be added to the scholarship funds the chapter makes available to graduate women. Price for the supper is $2. The supper and auction are open to the public.

Following the supper and auction, Cornelia Flora, professor of sociology, is to speak on "Women in South America."

Reservations can be made by calling Phi Delta Gamma.

Gifts provide general scholarships

Gifts totaling $30,000 have been received from a Wichita couple to provide general scholarship assistance to K-State students.

Interest generated by the gift from Raymond and Hazel Davis of Wichita will fund tuition and books for one or more students during each academic year. Scholarship recipients must have a minimum 3.0 grade point average and be working to provide a portion of their support while attending college.

Raymond Davis died in February 1984 shortly after the scholarship agreement was finalized. He was graduated from K-State with a degree in agriculture in 1927 and spent his working life in government service.

Faculty member publishes book

A new book, "The AIA Gold Medal," just published by McGraw-Hill by William Miller, associate professor of architecture, includes a biographical sketch of Alvar Aalto, prominent Finnish architect. Aalto, the most important Finnish architect of the 20th century, is among the architects awarded the gold medal of the American Institute of Architects since the prize was established early this century.

Campus bids farewell to Bidwell

Orville Bidwell, professor of agronomy, will retire this summer. He pioneered numerical classification of soils by electronic computer in the early 1960s and mapped many acres of Kansas soils for the Kansas Agricultural Station as its soil-survey leader.

Bidwell prepared the Geary County soil-survey report, the first Kansas report containing printed aerial photographs in place of colored planimetric maps. Now 82 Kansas counties have these reports, published in book form by the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Soil Conservation Service.

Bidwell started the K-State soils team and has been its coach since its beginning in 1958. The soils team had the best record in the seven-team region during Bidwell's tenure as coach.

Bidwell has earned many awards and honors. He was named Outstanding Academic Adviser in the College of Agriculture in 1981 and is the author or co-author of more than 60 publications.

He was the first recipient of the Outstanding Faculty Award of the Natural Resource Management Club in 1976. In 1983 he completed a two-year term as chairman of the 2,000-member American Registry of Certified Professionals in Agronomy, Crops and Soils.

Bidwell received his bachelor's degree from Oberlin College in sociology and earned two degrees from Ohio State University, a bachelor's in agriculture in 1942 and a doctorate degree in agronomy in 1949.

U-LearN Line

A note: In the Feb. 21 U-LearN column, it was suggested that while traveling in Mexico one should only consume bottled liquids, including water. It should be clarified that the safest water is brought with you from the United States. Water bottled in Mexico may or may not be contaminated. Remember that every individual is different. Some travelers will become ill from bottled water, some won't. The only way to be sure is to take water with you or don't drink water at all. The chance you want to take is entirely up to you.

Why is it so hard to get out of a housing contract?

In a sense, the Department of Housing is a landlord, and, like any other landlord, needs a commitment from the tenant for a said period of time. University housing is budgeted for a certain percentage of occupancy and is not a subsidized operation. If students were allowed to break dorm contracts for just any reason, it would increase the operating costs, and this increase could be passed along to the other residents.

The policy concerning contracts also prevents the housing office from being used by students who may, for example, move into the dorm because it's convenient and then continue looking for an apartment.

A contract can be broken if a student leaves the University. There also is a Contract Review Board to which students may take special cases. The board, which is made up of students and faculty who make the final decision, offers the student an opportunity to break a contract that a landlord would not provide for a tenant.

What is the College Work-Study program?

College Work-Study is a program designed to help students earn part of their education expenses. The federal government pays for 80 percent of the salary while the rest is made up by the employing department on campus.

To apply for eligibility, a student must fill out an ACT Family Financial Statement and a Kansas Data Form. The information on these two forms allows the Office of Student Financial Assistance to rank all applicants according to their need.

This ranking determines the amount a student may earn on work-study.

After the awarding process is complete, each student is sent an award letter listing all types of financial aid given and the amounts. This form must be signed and returned to the financial aid office in order for the student to receive his aid.

A student must be enrolled in at least seven semester hours (six hours for graduate students) during the fall or spring and a minimum of three hours during the summer session, while holding a work-study position.

Some job openings are listed on the job board in the Union, but it is the responsibility of the hiring department to advertise job openings.

Man scuffles with intruder during apartment check

A Manhattan man who went to check on remodeling at an apartment on the city's west side Tuesday afternoon battled with an intruder who had apparently been hiding in an attic.

Kelly Hearn, 1416 Beechwood Circle, entered an apartment at 1013 Gardenway about 2 p.m. Tuesday and was struck by the man, who was described in Riley County Police Department reports as a white male in his late teens to early 20s with brown hair wearing blue jeans and a military jacket.

Hearn, who apparently wasn't seriously injured in the incident, fought back by hitting the man in the back with a pipe, according to the report. The suspect fled the area on foot in the direction of Wildcat Creek, the report stated.

Police searched the area, but failed to find the man, the report stated. Hospitals were notified that the suspect may seek treatment for a back injury.

Senator seeks gas price law extension

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Senate's Democratic leader urged a committee on Tuesday to extend for another year a 1983 law which froze the price of natural gas produced and sold in Kansas.

Senate Minority Leader Jack Steiner, D-Kansas City, Kan., appeared before the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee in support of a measure to continue the price freeze through 1985.

"If this committee — or the Legislature — can pass a bill which saves money on Kansas heating and light bills, then I say let's pass the bill now and worry about the exact amount of the total savings later," said Steiner.

The law is to expire at the end of this year. It affects a limited number of Kansans — about one out of every six residential gas customers or about 110,000 out of the more than 660,000 gas users in the state.

The biggest advantage goes to those served by Kansas Power and Light Co.'s main line gas system, which supplies about 106 communities in the state including Manhattan, Junction City, McPherson, Great Bend, Pratt, Abilene and Salina.

Steiner presented estimates by KPL that indicated its gas customers would save about $9.4 million in 1985 if the bill was enacted.

In addition, some utilities buy gas from KPL to fuel generators at electrical power plants.

"I submit to you that the fact that not everyone agrees on the exact amount of total savings — or the fact that this bill won't help every single consumer — doesn't mean we should sit on our hands and do nothing," said Steiner.

Roger McCoy, president of the Kansas Independent Oil and Gas Association, opposed the bill, saying its passage would be a "grave injustice to the producers of intrastate gas."

McCoy argued that a continued price freeze would discourage gas production, resulting in less tax revenue to state and local governments. In addition, he said it would force producers to dedicate their gas serves to interstate customers rather than Kansas users.

"To extend price controls at this time...would send a clear message to Kansas natural gas producers and business in general, that Kansas is not a good place to do business," said McCoy.

"The losers would be the Kansas economy and the citizens of Kansas."

The committee did not act on the proposal.

House approves measure for children's safety seats

Members of the Kansas House of Representatives gave tentative approval Tuesday to a measure which would create a $10 fine for drivers who do not provide child safety seats for children four years old and under riding in the front seat of an automobile.

Under provisions of the bill, however, the $10 fine could be voided with the proof of purchase of a safety seat between the time of the violation and the established court date.

Rep. Jessie Branson, D-Lawrence, said car accidents are the primary killer and cause of severe injuries among young children. None of the 39 young victims of car crashes in Kansas last year had safety seats.

Current law states parents must protect children under two years of age with child safety seats, but the law does not provide any means of enforcement.

There are currently 44 states with laws regarding child safety seats for automobiles, Branson said. Kansas is one of only three states without penalties for violators of the law, she said.

Rep. Arthur Douville, R-Overland Park, said he opposes the bill because it establishes a standard of care for parents and could be used for claiming negligence among parents who did not have a safety seat for their children.

Referring to a bill the House passed Monday which would require insurance companies to offer liability coverage for family members wishing to sue each other for pain and suffering incurred in automobile accidents, Douville said passing the safety seat measure would invite even more family suits.

"A mother could sue her husband for their child and receive money which would be set aside in a fund until the child reached the age of majority (legal age)," he said. "If they (the parents) know the insurance company will pay for that fund, then they don't have any incentive not to sue."

The House approved the measure on a voice vote.

Universities may disregard state's tuition freeze request

By The College Press Service

LANSING, Mich. — Some state colleges now say they probably won't take Gov. James Blanchard's proposal to hold tuition down for the 1984-85 school year.

Officials at the state's two largest campuses — the University of Michigan and Michigan State University — said the deal would cost them thousands of dollars each.

Last month, Blanchard offered to increase state funding for Michigan's 14 public colleges and universities if the schools agreed to freeze tuition at current levels.

The campuses have raised tuition an aggregate 85 percent during the last five years, the governor's office found.

Now it appears many of the schools will raise tuition again instead of holding out for more state money.

MU officials also say they have more to gain by raising tuition than by getting the extra 10 percent in state funding.

Western Michigan University officials maintain "an optimistic wait-and-see attitude" towards Blanchard's proposed trade-off, WMU spokesman Michael Matthews said.

They're still looking at the cost-benefit factors of the proposal and won't decide whether to take Blanchard's offer for several months.

"Some schools want to have their cake and eat it too," said Blanchard aide Richard Cole.

"Some universities are saying this is really a great alternative to pricing their students out of the market," he said, "and other institutions believe they're more financially strapped, and that raising tuition is not going to lose them future students."

Cole said he expects the state legislature to approve the trade offer anyway in the next 30 to 45 days. After that, schools will inform the governor if they will accept the proposal.

Leap day legends begin with saints

By DAVID BEVINS
Staff Writer

As the ancients say wisely,
Have a care o'th'main chance,
And look before you ere you leap;
For as you sow ye are like to reap.
— Samuel Butler (1600-1680)

Today is leap day — a day added to the Gregorian Calendar to correct the defect resulting from the calendar year being shorter than the astronomical year. It is a birthday that comes only every four years, and it is a day when women traditionally can propose to men.

The tradition dates back to the fifth century.

"Legend says that one day, St. Bridget approached St. Patrick. She claimed that the women of the land were extremely upset. They felt that the conventions of holy matrimony were totally unjust. They resented the fact that only men could propose marriage," according to an article in a bridal publication.

The story says that St. Patrick agreed to designate one day every seven years on which women could propose. But St. Bridget demanded a day every four years. St. Patrick agreed, and the day was placed on Feb. 29.

"Legend also states that St. Bridget herself was quite enamored of St. Patrick. He sensed this, but he was a dedicated priest, and marriage was out of the question. He presented her with a silk gown as a consolation gift," the article stated. From this incident stems the custom of offering a silk gown to a woman who has been turned down, the article stated.

But there are other versions of how women came to propose to men on leap day.

"Leap year has long been associated with the tradition of having spinsters propose to bachelors rather than await proposals of marriage from them."

"In old Scotland, Parliament even went as far as to pass a law forbidding any man to turn down a girl who proposed to him on leap year. If he did decline the proposal, he was fined a hefty sum," according to "The Book of Days."

For some people, the day is special for other reasons.

"Other times, when it's not every four years, I have to use fractions," joked 12-year-old (or is it 3-year-old?) Jason Wittwer of Manhattan. Wittwer was born Feb. 29, 1972.

During ordinary years, Wittwer celebrates his birthday "just any day. But around that time," he said.

Wittwer said his birthdays are similar every year. For this leap year birthday, Wittwer plans on having two parties.

"I have to have a party with Grandma and Grandpa on Wednesday. But I'm going to have my other party on Friday night," he said.

Wittwer said the only other person with a leap day birthday he has ever heard of was a contestant on a game show.

Famous people who have shared the Feb. 29 birthday include composer Gioacchino Rossini (1792-1868); hero of the French and Indian War, Louis Joseph de Montcalm (1712-1759); English astronomer Charles Pritchard (1808-1893); and Czech poet Josef Svatoopluk Machar (1864-?).

Harassment awareness necessary

Sexual harassment is no stranger to K-State, but many people on campus — especially students — may not know this. As Office of Affirmative Action Director Dorothy Thompson said last week, the new University sexual harassment policy hasn't been adequately disseminated to students.

Students have not been sufficiently informed of the sexual harassment policy, although Thompson said tentative plans were made last semester to publish the policy in the Collegian. This was to be the only means of informing the student body of the policy, but no further action has been taken.

Publishing the policy would undoubtedly increase student awareness of sexual harassment, but it also is important that people know this happens at K-State. As with rape, people who have not been personally affected may not realize there is a problem.

One way to inform people would be to publish periodic accounts of harassment complaints filed with Affirmative Action, either as monthly summaries of complaints filed or fictionalized accounts based on actual cases. Because of the right of privacy, such accounts could be printed without identifying the persons involved by name or department and without specific information which could jeopardize the resolution of the case.

Thompson opposes any discussion of specific cases which her office receives.

Complaints are personnel matters, she said, and Affirmative Action does not provide the same legal protections as a court of law. Even without publishing specifics, others could still identify those involved, she said, and women may become more reluctant to file a complaint.

The fact remains, however, that sexual harassment is a violation of the law and of University policy. In addition, it disrupts working and learning environments which the policy was designed to protect.

The right to privacy vs. the public's right to know is always a sticky issue. Printing reasonably "vague" accounts, as in rape cases, is not an infringement of privacy but a reporting of fact.

The fact is, a complaint alleging this kind of behavior has been filed, nothing more. It is unlikely that readers of the accounts would be able to guess who was involved unless they already had prior knowledge or suspicion of the activity.

Because of Thompson's opposition, it's unlikely the Collegian will be printing accounts of harassment complaints in the near future. Her intentions are well-meant, but perhaps not in the best interests of all concerned. The Collegian and Affirmative Action should develop a cooperative relationship to effectively encourage awareness of sexual harassment and inform the campus community of the established means of redress.

World government offers solution

One of Benjamin Franklin's famous sayings held that there was a "place for everything, and everything in its place." Accordingly, then, there is a time and a place for wisdom and a time for common sense. Wisdom is the luxury of scholars; common sense, the tool of the common man. Wisdom is the product of deliberation; common sense is born from the marriage of survival and necessity. Now is the time for common sense.

Millions of our number suffer needlessly from the ravages of starvation and malnutrition. A default by the less developed countries on the $700 billion they owe the industrialized nations would undermine the Western banking system and trigger a worldwide depression, the worst in history. Most importantly, global thermonuclear armageddon threatens our survival.

Common sense tells us that our patchwork solutions alone can no longer adequately deal with these international dilemmas and hope to succeed.

Clearly, for us, it is either universal law or universal destruction. Federated, mankind could eliminate the threat of nuclear war, end our selfish and foolish pursuit of hoarding our existing resources and begin bringing about a more equitable distribution of the world's food supply.

World government is an idea whose time has come.

Today the world's superpowers have the equivalent in firepower of 1 million Hiroshima-size bombs in their arsenals — nearly one megaton per person. Furthermore, under the nation-state system, the only recourse for conflict is to fight or surrender a system which is ripe with anarchy and catastrophe. Is it logical to assume that these mountains of weapons will not be used?

Common sense tells us that the use of war to resolve disputes among nations will extract a price far beyond what the world can afford to pay. Dead no longer means the death of a soldier in London or Stalingrad. Dead now means extinction; putting mankind in the same empty void occupied by the carrier pigeon; doing away with Plato, Jesus and Einstein and all the unborn generations expected to follow us.

BRAD RUSSELL
Guest Columnist

Some means must be found to avoid military confrontations, and only world government can effectively police nuclear control. The question is not whether world government is necessary, but whether it can be achieved.

Unfortunately, many objections can and have been raised about the feasibility of international rule. Some people point to the inherent risk of despotism which adheres to the concept. It is also mentioned that world government is unrealistic under current circumstances. The ideological differences between the United States and the Soviet Union will never enable them to forget their disagreements and realize their similarities. And perhaps the greatest difficulty is uniting the diverse social systems that have evolved throughout the globe.

As for the potential of tyrants controlling the world, Einstein perhaps put it best: "Do I fear the tyranny of world government? Of course I do. But I fear still more the coming of another war."

Secondly, the world military force would be considerably smaller than the combined armies of current nation-states, and its only task would be to intervene in situations where police forces could not keep order.

As to the feasibility of making a jump from the nation-state to a single world-state, mankind has made similar jumps before — in response to the discovery of fire, the development of agriculture and the advent of the Industrial Revolution.

Certainly ending the threat of nuclear holocaust calls for a similar social change. Although a world without war and hatred may seem inconceivable, an animal as intelligent as man should be able, with time, effort and education, to suppress these tendencies.

The problem of blending the world's various social forms is more formidable, but not impossible. Since World War II, the primitive inhabitants of New Guinea have produced ordained Catholic priests and computer programmers. In fact, both socialism and capitalism are currently on the brink of some fundamental changes.

Soviet-styled socialism cannot survive unless it begins to decentralize its economy and encourage greater popular participation. Capitalism will flounder unless it moves toward a more directly planned economy and distributes its wealth more equitably.

Inter-ethnic friendships and marriages, migration of displaced people and telecommunications are beginning to reveal our common heritage. We are slowly unmasking the facade of nationalism and ethnocentricity. As soon as we recognize our shared characteristics, we will realize that we are all inhabitants, not of one city, not of one nation, but of one globe. And if we are slow in achieving our goal, we have at least given future generations a reprieve and an opportunity to finish our work.

World government is not a pipedream — it is a necessity. We must begin today, to thaw our frozen minds and recognize that a common sense solution does exist.

We must begin today, so that it may never be said of our generation that history misplaced its trust with us or the hope humanity had in us was unfounded. We had eyes and couldn't see. We had ears and couldn't hear. We had minds but failed to think. And in our greed and senseless selfishness, we destroyed ourselves and our future. Our only legacy was our stupidity.

(Editor's Note: Brad Russell is a junior in pre-law.)

Engineering prospects accelerate

Good news for engineering students: the Bureau of Labor Statistics predicts 600,000 new engineering jobs will be available by 1995.

But, according to an article by Columbia University faculty member Steven S. Ross, the bureau's estimate is double what it should be.

Computer, telecommunication and aerospace career opportunities for engineers have skyrocketed in the past few years, Ross said. There are now 1.4 million to 1.5 million engineers in the United States.

Turnover in the field due to retirement or change of vocation leaves openings for 45,000 new engineers each year. Although 75,000 students graduate with engineering degrees annually, the growth of new jobs in the field makes up for the 30,000 difference.

Compounded yearly, this growth will create only slightly more than 300,000 new engineering jobs by 1995, Ross said, instead of the 600,000 the bureau predicted.

Nevertheless, some recent engineering graduates have had difficulty finding a job after graduation. As salaries in the field continue to rise, Ross said, some companies are rewriting job descriptions to fill positions with lower-paid workers.

What does this mean for today's engineering students? In light of increasing job competition for promising positions, employers will place an increased premium on academic excellence.

Debate arises over lost workdays

WASHINGTON — Are the health and safety of American workers better today than when Ronald Reagan took office? Thorne Auchter, head of the federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration, says they are. But many of the 80 million Americans whom OSHA protects may have cause to wonder.

Auchter cites as proof of his tenure's success a continuing decrease in the average number of work days lost due to occupational injuries. The national average dropped from 5.9 work days per 100 workers in 1979 to 4.7 at last count.

Auchter also cites OSHA's efforts to issue new or revised rules on hazardous substances, including final actions on an emergency temporary standard for asbestos and a "right-to-know" labeling requirement for dangerous chemicals handled on the job.

"We can say that the information we have says we're going in the right direction," Auchter said. "And nobody has information that says we're going in the wrong direction."

In workplace safety, however, the uncertainty remains whether Auchter's policy of cooperation with employers is responsible for the reduction in lost-workday-case rates. Auchter, who has tried to soften OSHA's image as a quick-strike police force, claims that reduced inspections in some workplaces have enabled OSHA to focus on statistically more hazardous sites.

MAXWELL GLEN

Yet his critics charge that the agency's practice of "programmed" inspections, under which OSHA inspectors only investigate job sites with an above-average lost-workday case rate, ignores situations where accidents are waiting to happen. Moreover, since 1981, OSHA has sharply reduced its number of citations and penalties; it also has referred only two cases to the Justice Department or criminal action. Auchter can claim accurately that court decisions have hampered OSHA's ability to move more quickly on certain health standards.

But despite hundreds of dangerous workplace chemicals, Auchter's OSHA has not added one new substance to the list of those for which it requires maximum exposure levels. The emergency temporary standard for asbestos, in fact, came only after Auchter had stopped all work on a pre-Reagan asbestos proposal. OSHA's right-to-know rule was expedited in part by pressure from industry, which complained that state and local laws were too stringent.

Auchter may claim that the record stands in his favor. And his critics might not have sufficient statistical evidence to prove otherwise. But as Gerald Ford's OSHA chief, Morton Corn, contends, a pro-business OSHA violates the very essence of the agency's congressional mandate. Inevitably, workers will bear the brunt of that switch in emphasis.

The suicide rate among nurses is 50 percent higher than the national average for working women, according to findings cited in a recent issue of the Journal of Occupational Medicine.

Seal hunt involves more than economics

Editor,

Re: Dan Mulhern's letter, "Economics real issue behind seal killings," in the Feb. 23 Collegian.

How could anyone make a statement comparing the slaughter of cattle for food and the slaughter of seals for pelts? We do not go into a herd of cattle trapped on an island and bash in their skulls. We do not rip away the hide and leave the flesh to rot on the shorelines, and we do not kill only the young because of the color and beauty of their pelts.

Yes, bashing in their skulls in one swift swing is usually a quick death, but what are the reasons behind it? To feed the hungry? To assure the survival of the species? To rid the populace of a dangerous infestation? No! To make lovely furs for the rich to adorn themselves with.

As for his comment about economics, give me a break. The baby seal massacre goes on only during a few choice weeks in the spring when the weather permits access to the seals' refuge. The prime time is when the seal's fur is still its lovely white.

The reason is not economics but the high prices paid for the furs — so high hunters may sit back and wait for a new season and a new herd of young seals to slaughter. Surely these companies could help find a better means of earning an income, if indeed this is the sole reason these men partake in the seal massacre.

Here in the United States if a person is cruel or inhumane to an animal, law officials can confiscate the animal and fine the lawbreaker; if an organization is inhumane to animals in the name of research, law officials may require the use of more humane tactics.

I think if Dan did some research on his own of the facts about these hunters and the seals they prey upon, perhaps his feelings would change. From his response, I doubt it.

Poor humor

Editor,

Re: Anne Graue's letter, "Humor abuse," in the Feb. 27 Collegian.

I, too, was rather disturbed after viewing the Collegian's front page picture of "Nuke KU" hats being sold last week. Not because of the front page depiction, but because the inventors of the logo should have considered it more seriously.

Although it is all in fun and most people associated with the University realize the enormous complexity of such a comment, what about the hundreds of other people who will see the hats? Young children are quite impressionable and simplistic.

Most people take nuclear conflict quite seriously and wish to prevent it. What are "educated" K-State students doing about it?

Greek Week under covered

Editor,

I feel an explanation is in order as to why Greek Week was not covered more extensively by the Collegian. Greeks constitute 20 percent of the population at K-State, involving approximately 3,000 people. The 4,500 students living in the residence halls receive year-long coverage for almost every move made by the Association of Residence Halls, from a carnival to Spring Fling.

The one week out of the entire year that's ours, "Greek Week," planned for over six months by seven committees, goes practically unnoticed by the school newspaper — supposedly dedicated to covering events important to students.

Greek Follies sold out 1,800 seats. Over 300 people were in the cast and thousands of hours were spent working on it, but there was no coverage whatsoever.

Greeks are 20 percent of K-State. We're not asking for 20 percent of the newspaper every day — but is it too much to ask for a few articles and maybe some pictures?

'Thriller' wins award as year's top record

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Michael Jackson's "Thriller" won best album of the year and the 25-year-old superstar's hit song, "Beat It," was named record of the year at Tuesday's Grammy ceremony. He had been nominated for a record 12 prizes in 10 categories.

Jackson also took six other awards, including pop vocalist.

The British rock singer Sting and his group The Police captured four prizes, including the laurel for group rock performance for the LP "Synchronicity."

Jackson won three Grammy awards in a prebroadcast ceremony — rock male vocal, rhythm and blues male vocal and R&B song — in his quest for a record 10 prizes in the industry's most prestigious competition.

"Beat It" picked up the rock award and "Billie Jean" scored the R&B prizes for Jackson. Both were No. 1 hits from the record $25 million-selling album.

Pat Benatar won the best rock female performance Grammy for the fourth straight year. In other pre-camera presentations, Sting won a rock instrumental Grammy for the title track to his "Brimstone & Treacle" film soundtrack.

Duran picked up the best video short form award for their video single "Girls On Film — Hungry Like The Wolf."

Jackson's three Grammys at a pre-broadcast presentation set the stage for an unprecedented sweep of the 25th annual awards presentation by the National Academy of Recording Arts & Sciences.

Jackson had a record 12 nominations in 10 categories, including the top three: record, album and new song of the year. He was twice nominated in two categories: new song of the year and rhythm & blues song.

The 25-year-old superstar declined to perform during the televised awards ceremony, but told the show's producers he would be in the audience.

Other top nominees were Jackson's co-producer on "Thriller," Quincy Jones, with six; Michael Sembello and Lionel Richie with five each; and The Police, conductor Sir Georg Solti, violinist Itzhak Perlman and trumpet virtuoso Wynton Marsalis.

Jackson's album "Thriller" has sold more than 25 million copies to become the best-selling album in history.

Currently, Roger Miller holds the record for most Grammys won in a single year. He won six in 1966, most of them for his smash single "King of the Road."

Songwriter Henry Mancini has won 20 Grammys during his career, more than anyone else. The lineup featured such top stars as Linda Ronstadt, Donna Summer, Irene Cara, Sheena Easton, Bonnie Tyler, Eurythmics, Big Country, Oak Ridge Boys, Marsalis, gospel singers Phil Driscoll and Albertina Walker, and Chuck Berry, who also was named a recipient of a special Lifetime Achievement Grammy.

Grammy winners were determined by balloting among nearly 6,000 members of the record academy in seven chapters nationwide. Members include recording artists, song writers, musicians, producers and technicians.

To be eligible, nominated records had to be released for sale between Oct. 1, 1982, and Sept. 30, 1983.

The academy earlier this year announced five new entrants into its Hall of Fame — records that were released before the Grammys were established in 1958.

This year's Hall of Fame winners: Frank Sinatra's "In the Wee Small Hours" (1955); Walter Huston's vocal interpretation of Kurt Weill's "September Song" (1938); composer Heitor Villa-Lobos conducting his own work, "Bachianas Brasileiras No. 5 — Aria" (1945); the Woody Herman Orchestra's "Four Brothers" (1948) and Fats Waller's piano solo of his famous song "Ain't Misbehavin'" (1929).

'Tender Mercies' merits 5 nominations

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

It was something of a surprise when it was announced that "Tender Mercies" had received five Academy Award nominations; very seldom do small films get much recognition come award time. Usually they are glossed over in favor of big-budget Hollywood films that have had success at the box office.

Review

"Tender Mercies" couldn't be forgotten, though, because of the sheer brilliance of Robert Duvall's performance. There is also a very insightful script by Horton Foote; a delicate, underplayed performance by Tess Harper; and the quiet, somber images provided by Australian director Bruce Beresford.

As the film opens, Mac Sledge (Robert Duvall) is stranded at a roadside motel by the members of his country music band. He has neither money nor anywhere to go, so he asks the hotel's owner, a young Vietnam widow, if he might do some work to pay his bill.

Throughout the scene, Duvall conveys a sense that there is much more on the line than simply earning money to pay a bill. Mac is a man who is constantly hiding from his past. He was at one time a great country singer. Through a drinking habit, he lost nearly everything of importance to him, including his family. Now he is trying to re-establish himself, setting up a new lifestyle that has little to do with his previous career. The young widow, Rosa Lee (Tess Harper), is his hope for renewal.

"Tender Mercies" then takes an unusual turn by dispensing with the courtship scenes and jumping directly to after Mac and Rosa are married. A typical American-made film would have pondered over the courtship, showing in great detail every moment that brought the two closer together. Instead, screenwriter Foote realized that the scenes after the marriage would have much greater importance.

A key moment in the film is provided when a van pulls up at the gas pumps and five men stumble out. They look around nervously as if they are casing the joint. When Rosa Lee begins filling the van's gas tank, the men circle around her, and just when it looks like we may be in for some gratuitous violence, the men confess that they are admirers of Mac's. Their leader says, "We just wanted to pay our respects."

It is no mistake that Mac uses language more suited for a funeral. At another time he even says to his wife, "Don't feel sorry for me Rosa Lee, I'm not dead." But part of himself he has put to rest — a part of him that was responsible for Mac Sledge the star. That Mac Sledge never achieved the respect he now desires and searches for. But Mac can't live the rest of his life hiding from his past image, something which he discovers when a reporter hunts him down and throws a barrage of questions at him. Mac quickly refuses to answer anything and storms away.

Tess Harper's performance has gone largely unnoticed in most reviews, but she is one of the main reasons for the success of the film.

When Mac steps on stage at the local club to sing a new song, or when he is playing catch with Rosa's young boy, it's her face that gives the scene an entirely different dimension. She conveys not just the smiling face of a happy wife; she conveys a knowledge in her husband, knowing that he is being reborn as she watches him.

The theme of rebirth is very important in the film. It quite literally takes the form of a baptism in a rural Baptist church. When the church first appears, the audience isn't quite sure how to respond. They see a jowly cheeked choir leader bouncing up and down as he sings and a lanky preacher in an ill-fitting suit. At first it might appear as if these people are being ridiculed, but as the film progresses they grow in stature. Although they might lack refined tastes, they are shown to have an innate knowledge of what's important in life. And as the preacher baptizes Mac, one can't help but wonder if we haven't all lost something very important in our struggles to become sophisticated.

Ultimately though, it's Duvall's performance that has made "Tender Mercies" more than just another small film that has gone unnoticed. He gives the role a coarse, weather-beaten aura that is very genuine. He becomes Mac Sledge with such an ease that all of his past performances are instantly forgotten and there is no doubt that Robert Duvall is Mac Sledge. But what's more, he is able to give the character such depth that we can understand these people with simple lifestyles with a clarity that has never been possible before.

University for Man develops from idea

By TOM SCHULTES
Collegian Reporter

Directly east of campus on Thurston Street there stands a reddish-brown brick house with an angular-sided addition and wooden porch leading to a large, unpaved parking lot.

Instead of grass, the lawn surrounding the structure is comprised of mulched patches, divided plots, raised growing beds, and trellises for towering plants.

It is the University for Man residence.

Many changes, both physical and psychological, took place before UFM reached its current at 1221 Thurston St.

UFM began as an idea in 1967. Sue Maes, instructor of continuing education and director of UFM, was a K-State student then and part of the group which conceived the idea.

"It was a committee of faculty, students and townspeople that started it," she said. "It was the times. It was questioning the relevance of education. You saw this a lot on campuses. More questions were asked like, 'How do you get timely issues into college classes?'"

The first project of the committee was a seminar titled "Toward the Year 2000," in which faculty members and community professionals talked about the future of their respective fields.

After this project's success, the committee approached the Student Governing Association and secured funding for its first catalog.

The catalog described a total of seven classes which were taught by volunteers, as they are today.

In spring 1968, UFM was born.

The first offices for UFM were in Denison Hall, with Maes serving as the assistant coordinator under a work-study program.

UFM kept the Denison office for about nine months, until a national conference for approximately 250 nationwide "free university" programs was held in Manhattan.

The UFM offices were moved to the Baptist Campus Center during summer 1969, Maes said. "We were there for a good two or three years. We just outgrew that space," she said.

During its first years, UFM used any rooms available for classrooms, including campus rooms and religious centers.

"In the late 1960s we went from an era of high activism with the race and war issues, and they (the students) took that activist energy and channeled it into a tremendous volunteer effort, then paralleled it with the environmental issues," she said. "We had a six-week series on environmental issues. We filled the biggest hall in Cardwell (Hall) every night for nearly six weeks.

"Self-actualization, which some people called micro-labs, was the next movement," Maes said. "They weren't as heavy as encounter groups, though. Some of the side issues were women's issues and the draft.

"Then suddenly we watched things start settling down. Then they (UFM participants) wanted to know how to do things for themselves. The do-it-for-me, skills, crafts type of mentality that bit us," Maes said, adding that the class emphasis later focused on money issues.

"The students wanted to know how to invest their money or how to buy a house," she said.

The UFM house was originally the Straube Scholarship House, which was scheduled to be closed because of expenses, Maes said. It was then owned by the KSU Foundation.

"For three years we leased it," Maes said. "But then, about three years ago, the National Rural Finance Development Corporation and the Union National Bank (of Manhattan) gave us loans, so now we are buying the property."

This evolving of classes and priorities has led to the UFM class structure of today.

Nearly 16 years after the committee conceived the idea, five catalogs are published each year offering almost 1,000 classes to about 10,000 participants annually.

"The next catalog, due to be released March 18, will offer approximately 100 classes for the mid-spring semester," Neil Schanker, class coordinator for UFM said. "The last catalog had about 280 classes listed, which is pretty close to average."

Two new items were featured in the last catalog.

For the first time, 12 classes taught by Junction City-area residents were offered in Junction City. Students also could register in Junction City for the first time.

Also new from UFM were professional seminar workshops.

"For the first time, we contracted with professional individuals to hold workshops," said Julie Coates, director of campus and community programs. "These are in-depth workshops aimed at providing a more comprehensive exposure to a subject than the usual introductory type of class."

UFM inspires local, national programs

By TOM SCHULTES
Collegian Reporter

The University For Man has inspired more than just catalogs and class schedules. Several local and nationwide programs have been modeled after UFM.

"People graduating from K-State, residents and professors who have moved out of the area have written back asking, 'Can you get me any information on how to start a UFM here?'" said Sue Maes, instructor of continuing education and director of UFM.

The result of these inquiries is the UFM Outreach Program.

This program was initially funded by grants from VISTA (Volunteers in Service to America) and the Department of Education.

"After four years of proving ourselves, state Representative Jim Braden (now of Clay Center) pushed legislation through for community education that provided Community Resource Program grants through the supervision of the Kansas Department of Economic Development, which sub-contracts to UFM," Maes said.

UFM has a goal to introduce its program to six new Kansas towns each year. After three years of UFM assistance, the towns are expected to support their own programs. But, UFM does not stop at the Kansas borders.

In 1980, UFM began work in four other states to extend rural community education.

Kentucky's Cooperative Extension Service has been trained in UFM procedures to introduce to its client counties the concepts of free rural-area training.

In Oklahoma, librarians were chosen for program training "due to their high visibility and general knowledge of the community," Maes said.

K-State graduates living in Missouri, particularly rural areas, were sent information to introduce the idea.

The first adopted program, in St.

James, Mo., offered 15 classes to more than 200 participants, according to an annual report of the outreach program.

The report stated that in De Smet, S.D., a joint effort by the city and Huron College resulted in an initial 196 students in 12 classes.

What is proving to be one of the most popular UFM programs in Kansas is the "Hidden Places" program directed by Adam Rome.

"My idea was that there are a lot of places where you can still see and touch, even taste history in Kansas," Rome said.

About 30 people from different areas were contacted to get their ideas about historical places in Kansas.

"After about two months work, we received a grant from the Kansas Commission for Humanities," Rome said.

Rome then picked the seven "best examples of places to feature in a series of radio programs and newspaper articles, as well as a booklet that is to be published," he said.

Also planned are general lectures by Rome, as well as lectures by scholars regarding specific sites.

The seven places chosen were the Cimarron National Grasslands at Elkhart, the Crow's Nest in Halstead, the Ladies Lounge in Hope, the Stone-Man rock formation in Penokee, and the Mexican Fiesta in Chanute. Closer to Manhattan are the Brown Grand Opera House in Concordia and Sumner School in Topeka.

Rome said he did not expect the extensive publicity his program has generated.

"I guess that it was good luck intelligently worked on," he said.

The good luck began when Rome was researching the Ellinwood Tunnels and a reporter from the Kansas City Times, who happened to be working on the same story, later contacted Rome. This led to a front page article in the Times concerning "Hidden Places".

For the Manhattan area, KSAC will air the program at 1:30 p.m. on Fridays beginning April 20.

"The idea of it is that there are examples (of history) and to encourage people to go out and see them for themselves," Rome said. "There's a greater variety of things than people think — battle sites, churches, schools. We look for places people wouldn't think of as being historic."

UFM also sponsors the "Lou Douglas Lectures on Public Affairs" series, coordinated this year by UFM staff member Pat Killian.

The lecture series, now in its fifth year, was established to honor the late Louis H. Douglas, former K-State professor of political science, scholar, and political leader who was instrumental in the legislation allowing UFM to implement its outreach program.

The current series, titled "1984: The Americas in Crisis" is sponsored by UFM in cooperation with other K-State colleges and departments, local churches, and community and civic organizations.

All Lou Douglas lectures are open to the public at no charge.

Another UFM program is the Appropriate Technology Program (ATP), begun in 1978 in conjunction with the College of Architecture and Design.

"This is a very visible part of UFM," Maes said. A grant of $50,000 from the U.S. Department of Energy and revenue sharing funds from the city of Manhattan allowed the construction of the solar- and wood-heated building on Manhattan Avenue.

This UFM program, with a grant from the Kansas State Economic Opportunity Office, maintains a five-county, low-income weatherization program providing insulation, weatherstripping, caulking and other services necessary to improve energy efficiency in homes.

A challenge grant from the Exxon Education Corp. stabilizes the financial base of the ATP.

The ATP staff also maintains the landscaping which is the "classroom" for edible landscaping classes and tours. Many organizations and classes tour the ATP facilities.

UFM offers cooperatives for area residents that allow people to work on projects that "due to financial or space limitations, they are not able to do otherwise," Maes said.

The current facilities available include a photo darkroom, potters workshop and a wood-working shop. A weaving studio is currently being built.

Another project open to area residents is the community gardens in south Manhattan. Land is available by filling out an application and returning it to Kay Sylvester, junior in horticultural therapy, who is in charge of the program as an intern. Low-income residents have first priority.

Two new grants received by UFM deal with rural communities.

The first one is to examine "the concept of disabled and handicapped persons in rural communities; how to get them out of the house and into the mainstream," Maes said. "The second grant will be used to look into the future of higher education for rural people."

How are all of these programs funded?

"Many different sources are needed," Maes said. "We have some grants, but many times they cannot be used for anything other than what they were specifically applied for. We still need money for salaries, utilities, building upkeep and all the other things."

"The Division of Continuing Education pays for part of the administrative costs, such as my position," Maes said. "The SGA gives us some monies out of their allocations, plus student activity fees (K-State students do not pay the $2 registration fee as a result of this)."

UFM generates nearly 90 percent of its funds through the SGA allowance, grants and donations, Maes said.

Bill may revamp political parties' ballot access

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A proposal to revamp the procedure by which the state recognizes minor political parties and permits them on the ballot was tentatively approved Tuesday by the Kansas Senate.

In addition, the upper legislative chamber gave first-round approval to a bill to limit the state's use of "trending factors" to value business and industrial equipment for tax purposes.

The two proposals were among 17 bills advanced to final roll call votes on Wednesday.

The election bill was prompted by a 1982 lawsuit in which a federal judge ordered the state of Kansas to grant the Libertarian Party access to the ballot.

Currently, there are six official political parties in Kansas: Republican, Democratic, Conservative, American, Libertarian and Prohibition parties. Official recognition by the state permits a political party's candidates to be listed on the ballot.

The Senate measure establishes a procedure for new political parties to gain access to the ballot and allows for parties to be dropped if they fail to receive a certain number of votes in an election.

If the bill is enacted: — Any party not recognized by the state must submit petitions signed by qualified voters totaling at least 2 percent of the total votes cast in the preceding governor's race, or 15,366 currently. The petitions must be submitted two months before the filing deadline or April 10.

A party will no longer be recognized by the state unless its nominee for president or any statewide office receives 1 percent of the total vote cast for the office in the general election.

For example, a party will be dropped after the 1984 elections unless its nominee for president or U.S. Senate receives 1 percent of the vote for the office. The seat held by Sen. Nancy Kassebaum is the only statewide office up for election this year.

In addition, a party would lose its access to the ballot if it failed to nominate a person for president or a statewide office.

The measure was approved on a voice vote after it was amended to reduce from 2 to 1 percent the provision governing continued recognition of parties. Sen. Elwayne Pomeroy, R-Topeka, offered the amendment.

Without the change, he said, the bill would be too restrictive. For instance, only the Republican and Democratic parties would have retained their official status in Kansas after the 1982 elections had the original bill been in effect.

Experts defend state wheat yields

By TERRI BAIRD
Collegian Reporter

A recent visit from a wheat grower in England has sparked controversy among farmers and researchers in Kansas.

Oliver Walston, an English wheat farmer, told farmers at a recent Kansas Farm Bureau convention they were still in the "stone age" of wheat production.

Kansas has a five-year average of 36 bushels of wheat per acre and produced a record 42 bushels per acre last year. Walston was critical of Kansas for not being able to produce the 100-bushel-per-acre record the Europeans have achieved. He and other European wheat farmers received such high yields by using heavy applications of fertilizers and chemicals.

In a recent article in the Kansas City Times, Robert Paris, second vice president of the Kansas Association of Wheat Growers, said Kansas wheat producers are not losing their edge in U.S. wheat production.

Paris said that in the United States, southern farmers are harvesting between 50 and 60 bushels per acre.

Jim Shroyer, assistant professor of extension agronomy, and Rollie Sears, assistant professor of agronomy, defended Kansas wheat growers. They said Kansas wheat growers face obstacles not confronted by growers in other parts of the world.

"One (obstacle) is simply that European wheats are grown there, not here," Shroyer said.

"If we brought European wheats to Kansas, they probably could not 'cut the mustard' here because of their lateness and their lack of winter-hardiness, drought resistance and heat resistance. In fact, European wheats have been grown here without much success, and large amounts of fertilizer would not have helped significantly," he said.

European wheats are soft types with lower protein content than U.S. wheats. Kansas wheats are hard red winter types which can conceivably produce 100 bushels per acre. However, under normal Kansas growing conditions, they will not, specialists say.

"A desirable wheat-growing environment consists of good moisture, cool nights and cool days from wheat heading to maturity in the spring," Shroyer said.

"Kansas doesn't always have such weather. Yet, K-State variety trials have produced yields in the 100-bushel range when conditions have been just right for plant growth and development," he said.

Growth from heading to maturity in Kansas is as fast here as it is anywhere in the world, Sears said. It usually takes five or six weeks compared to the eight weeks it takes for European wheat.

"Because Europe has cooler days and nights with plenty of moisture, wheats there are not rushed to maturity as they are here," he said. "Under such conditions, their soft wheats should yield 100 bushels. In 1983, the growing conditions in Kansas were as close to those in Europe as they will ever get. The results were much higher average yields and some cases of 100-bushel wheat production."

Aside from weather differences limiting yields, European farmers have price guarantees to help them pay for extra inputs that help wheat yields. U.S. wheat growers don't have that option, he said.

Soft red winter wheat production has more than tripled in the past 10 years. Production of hard red winter wheat grown in Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Oklahoma and Texas hasn't even risen by 25 percent, according to Department of Agriculture records. However, the United States still has a larger overall wheat production than European nations.

Kansas wheat yields also were defended by John Dunbar, dean of the College of Agriculture and director of the Kansas Agricultural Experiment Station.

With the help of research and new varieties of wheat, yields have been boosted from 20 bushels an acre in 1952 to 42 bushels in 1983. However, Kansas farmers have little interest in test plot data, Dunbar said.

Mike Bourne, research agronomist with the Tribune branch of the Kansas Agricultural Experiment Station, said, "We have field days twice a year. We have one in the spring and one in the fall, and it's surprising how few growers come to visit us."

Many Kansas farmers would like to see improved wheat yields, said Gerald Riley, president of the Kansas Association of Wheat Growers. However, many don't want to try something until it's proven because they don't have the money to put into it.

Farm lobbyists dispute land-assessment plan

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Lobbyists for state farm organizations disagreed Tuesday whether it is wise to implement use value appraisal of agricultural land before Kansas voters approve a constitutional amendment to insure farmland will continue to be assessed at a low rate.

Spokesmen for the Kansas Livestock Association and the Kansas Farm Bureau supported a bill before the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee which would implement a 1976 constitutional amendment to appraise agricultural land on its ability to produce income, not on its fair market value as now.

However, the lobbyist for the Kansas Farmers Union said a constitutional amendment should first be submitted to voters — one which would lock into the Kansas Constitution the present 6 percent assessed value on farmland.

Sen. Paul "Bud" Burke, R-Leawood, chairman of the committee, said the panel would vote on the bill today. It was introduced by the Senate Ways and Means Committee at the request of Senate President Ross Doyen.

"We believe this would provide only short-term pleasure for long-suffering farmers," said Ivan Wyatt, president of the Farmers Union. "What happens down the road when there are fewer and fewer farmers to protect themselves in the Legislature if it isn't in the constitution?"

"We should put in the constitution, so the rates are locked in," Wyatt said the Farmers Union would support implementation of use value appraisal on agricultural land if a constitutional amendment were submitted at the same time to insure farmland is assessed at approximately its present rate.

Dee Likes, executive vice president of the Livestock Association, and John Blythe of the Farm Bureau, both urged the committee to endorse the implementation bill for passage.

Both said demand for agricultural land from speculators and people who want "a place in the country" has artificially inflated the price of agricultural land in the state, and farmers who need the land to produce food and fiber are suffering because of those inflated values in the taxes they must pay on their land.

If land is valued on its ability to produce income rather than on those inflated values, more land will be kept in agricultural production in the future, they told the committee.

"Agricultural land is a unique commodity which doesn't fit into our current appraisal system," said Likes. "The Legislature is mounting its most serious effort yet on reappraisal, so now is the time to implement use value."

Blythe noted the use value concept wouldn't be applied in valuing agricultural land until there was statewide reappraisal, and said use value is simply a way to blunt the "abnormal inflation" in the prices being paid for farmland.

"I regard it (agricultural land) as an antique we should preserve," said Blythe. "We're not making any more of it."

Expert seeks 'radical' change in aid

Committee debates new farm bill

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The battle over the next generation of U.S. agriculture policy got off to a vigorous start Tuesday, with some experts advocating a radical change in subsidies to target them to needy farmers, and all agreeing that the cost of farm aid is out of control.

"Year in and year out, we debate target price levels while the realities in agriculture scream out for an entirely new approach," said Bob Bergland, who was agriculture secretary in the Carter administration, as the House Agriculture Committee began debate on a new four-year farm bill to replace laws that expire in 1985.

Bergland said present farm programs, which make loans or payments to farmers based solely on the size of their production, "bring windfall profits to those who clearly don't need help."

Instead, Bergland proposed a farm policy aimed at helping those in the greatest need, using income tests much like that used in the nation's welfare programs.

While he did not offer details of how the program would work, Bergland, now an official of an association of rural electric cooperatives, said it would involve a "modest" level of loan price supports for all producers together with direct payments to medium-sized and so-called "family" farms or to young farmers with heavy debt loads. There are about 500,000 such farms in the United States, accounting for 38 percent of farm commodity sales.

Programs like last year's payment-in-kind acreage-reduction effort funneled millions of dollars to large corporate farms that already have built-in tax advantages, Bergland said.

"Congress must at long last look upon farm programs as income programs to protect the interests of those in the middle."

In an interview later, Bergland called his idea "a radical departure" from current farm policy thinking, but said there is no better cost-effective way to protect U.S. food production.

"The farm program we have now passed the House by one vote (in 1981). It was supposed to have a modest cost, but it turns out it is the highest cost in history...I can't imagine a Congress continuing with this sort of a bankrupt policy."

Bergland also said the United States cannot rely on exports to solve its overproduction problems, and proposed the long-term idling of 50 million acres of the nation's most delicate farmland.

Great export potential lies in the Third World, he said, but it cannot be tapped until those countries have sound enough economies to buy food. Giving easy credit to such nations — as Bergland advocated while agriculture secretary — only leads them to the brink of insolvency, he said.

Bergland and others, including committee member Rep. Charles Stenholm, D-Texas, said any new agricultural policy must recognize that U.S. farming has become part of the world economy.

"That's irreversible, and it means that cutting the federal deficit by a few billion dollars just might be more important for farmers than raising target prices or loan rates a few cents a bushel," Stenholm said.

Among other ideas advanced before the committee was one to replace current acreage-based production-cutting programs with ones based on bushel allocations. The current program, said Rep. Dan Glickman, D-Kan., "has contributed to a 500 percent rise in farm subsidies since 1980 and has done virtually nothing to lower production."

Glickman said the price supports could be targeted, so that farmers in the lowest tier of production, say the first 10,000 bushels, would receive one level of price guarantees and those in higher tiers would receive lower levels.

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., also suggested that the United States subsidize its farm exports by giving away surplus commodities as bonuses to purchasers, and strengthen legal provisions to protect farmers against export embargoes of farm goods.

DC-10 plane misses mark in New York

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — A Scandinavian Airlines DC-10 jetliner carrying 163 people overshot a runway while landing at Kennedy International Airport on Tuesday and its nose wheel came to rest in shallow water, authorities said.

Sidney J. Frigand, an information officer for the Port Authority, said there were no immediate reports of serious injuries.

Passengers were being taken off the plane and the city's Emergency Medical Service sent six ambulances and other equipment to the scene.

Frigand said the flight was arriving from Oslo and Stockholm when the accident occurred at 4:15 p.m. He said the plane overshot the runway and its nose wheel landed in Thurston Basin, a shallow pond off Rockaway Boulevard.

Dennis Feldman, a spokesman for the Federal Aviation Administration in Washington, said the airport was closed temporarily.

Record store owner's death may be related to mob ties

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A record store owner was suffocated and stuffed in the trunk of his Cadillac, but police weren't sure if the slaying was related to his past ties to organized crime.

"We haven't ruled it out," said Capt. Ron Palmer, commander of the homicide unit.

A special squad of five detectives assembled to investigate the murder of Anthony J. "Tiger" Cardarella had no suspects, Police spokesman Sgt. Jim Treese said Tuesday.

Cardarella's body was found in the trunk of his car Monday. Police had towed the car from a freight company parking lot in the river bottoms area Sunday night after receiving complaints it had been parked illegally for several days.

A preliminary autopsy by Jackson County Coroner Dr. Juanita Peterson concluded Cardarella, 57, had been suffocated, but police did not know what was used to kill him or when he died, Treese said.

The Kansas City Times quoted unidentified sources as saying Cardarella, linked to organized crime in a 1979 report of the Kansas City Crime Commission, had served as an enforcer for the mob in the past. The sources said Cardarella had tied to put distance between himself and the ruling Civella organization in recent years, and had concentrated on his record business.

SEMESTER IN SPAIN

Not just for Spanish majors only, but for everyone: beginners, "in between" students, and advanced. Put some excitement into your college career!

BEGINNER OR ADVANCED: Cost is about the same as a semester in a U.S. college $3,189. Price includes jet round trip to Seville from New York, room, board, and tuition complete. Government grants and loans may be applied towards our programs.

Live with a Spanish family, attend classes four hours a day, four days a week, four months. Earn 16 hrs. of credit (equivalent to 4 semesters taught in U.S. colleges over a two year time span). Your Spanish studies will be enhanced by opportunities not available in a U.S. classroom. Standardized tests show our students' language skills superior to students completing two year programs in U.S. Advanced courses also.

Hurry, it takes a lot of time to make all arrangements.

'Huskers hand K-State 63-56 setback

Court ruling favors Davis

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

K-State took a gamble Tuesday night — and lost.

The Wildcats, in an attempt to stop the inside scoring of the University of Nebraska's Dave Hoppen, played a sagging zone defense, collapsing around the 6-foot-11 center and hoping the Cornhuskers' perimeter shooters would not be able to hit from outside.

However, K-State's gamble fell short as the Cornhuskers, led by the outside shooting of guard David Ponce, were able to hold off the 'Cats 63-56 in Big Eight Conference basketball action at Lincoln.

The 5-foot-10 Ponce poured in 19 points, his season high, to pick up the scoring slack for Hoppen, who scored only 11 in the contest. While Hoppen, who came into the contest with a 20.3 point-per-game average, shot only twice in the first half, Ponce was scoring 10 points in the opening period to help the 'Huskers pull ahead early.

The K-State-NU contest was another of recent cases where the Wildcats seem to bring out the best in teams. Last Saturday against the University of Kansas, the Jayhawks shot 54 percent to nip the 'Cats 63-61. The 'Huskers were even hotter, however, as they burned K-State with a blistering 22 of 33 (67 percent) shooting from the floor.

And once again it was a case of the 'Cats playing well enough to win, only to come out with a loss. K-State shot 53 percent from the field and committed only nine turnovers.

The 'Huskers, with their third win in a row, moved to 7-6 in the conference and 17-9 overall. The 'Cats, with their third straight defeat, fell to 4-9 in the Big Eight and 12-14 overall.

The 'Cats fell behind early in the contest and were forced to play catch-up as the 'Huskers scored two straight baskets, both coming from Ponce outside, to post a 4-0 lead.

After K-State got on the board with baskets by junior guard Tom Alfaro and junior center Eddie Elder, the 'Huskers ran off 10 unanswered points to forge a 14-4 lead with 11 minutes remaining in the half. Leading the surge was 'Husker senior guard Eric Williams, who scored six points.

But with Hoppen stifled inside, the 'Huskers were unable to pull further ahead. Keeping the 'Cats close was Alfaro, who finished with 16 points, including eight in the first half. Since gaining a starting position seven games ago, the 6-6 junior college transfer has been the 'Cats' leading scorer in all of those games.

With NU's second-leading scorer, senior forward Stan Cloudy, forced to the bench with three early personal fouls, the 'Huskers were without much outside firepower — allowing the 'Cats to chip away at NU's early advantage.

With Alfaro working outside and Elder and sophomore forward Ben Mitchell going inside, the 'Cats were able to cut the 'Husker lead to six by halftime, 26-20.

K-State came out firing after intermission. After Mitchell blocked a Hoppen shot to start the half, sophomore guard Jim Roder puffed a jumper from the corner to cut the 'Husker margin to four. After NU's Terry Smith scored from the baseline, Alfaro connected on two free throws, and freshman forward Alex Williams added another charity to bring the 'Cats to within three, 28-25.

The 'Cats could get no closer than that until Alfaro hit from long range to make the score 33-31. With 10:22 left, Mitchell scored inside to tie the score for the first time at 39-all.

The score remained close until Nebraska made a decisive run starting with 4:19 left. After Elder scored two on a pair of free throws to make the score 47-45, Cloudy scored on a drive and drew a foul inside. Converting the charity, the play put the 'Huskers up by five with 3:28 left.

Alfaro canned another jumper again to bring the 'Cats back to within three, but buckets by Williams and Hoppen stretched the 'Husker lead to seven, 54-47, with 1:54 left.

K-State then put NU on the free-throw line, hoping to close the gap, but the 'Huskers hit nine of 11 down the stretch to offset two late baskets by sophomore reserve forward Tyrone Jackson to keep the 'Cats in the conference cellar.

Two players besides Alfaro reached double-figures for the 'Cats, as Elder scored 14 points and Mitchell added 11.

Following Ponce's 19 for the 'Huskers were Cloudy and Hoppen, who each finished with 11 points.

The 'Cats will try to snap their three-game losing skid Saturday afternoon as they host the University of Missouri Tigers in Ahearn Field House in their final regular season game. The tip-off is scheduled for 2:05 p.m.

The Tigers will be trying to rebound from a 61-60 defeat at the hands of the conference champion University of Oklahoma Sooners.

Cougars nab second spot in rankings

By The Associated Press

The University of Houston Cougars, having carved out a record 38 consecutive regular-season victories in the Southwest Conference, have clawed their way into second place in The Associated Press college basketball poll.

Houston, 25-3, rallied to edge the University of Arkansas 64-61 and replace Georgetown University, 24-3, as the runnerup to the University of North Carolina. Georgetown University, which lost to St. John's University last week, fell to fourth in the rankings behind the University of Kentucky. The Wildcats were 21-3 when the voting took place — before they lost to the University of Tennessee Monday night.

North Carolina's Tar Heels, 24-1, were a unanimous first-place selection, receiving all 62 ballots for the top spot and 1,240 points by a nationwide panel of sports writers and broadcasters.

Houston received 1,133 votes, Kentucky 1,078, Georgetown 1,072 and DePaul University, now 21-2, collected 1,015 points to remain fifth.

The University of Oklahoma moved up from eighth to sixth following victories over the University of Kansas and Iowa State University that gave the Sooners a 24-3 record.

The University of Nevada-Las Vegas remained seventh, the University of Texas-El Paso moved up one place to eighth, Tulsa University went up one to ninth and the University of Illinois, despite a 59-55 loss to Purdue University that gave the Boilermakers first place in the Big Ten Conference, held 10th place in the poll with 658 votes to 657 for 11th-place Purdue.

The rest of the Second Ten are the University of Arkansas, Washington University, Memphis State University, Duke University, Syracuse University, Wake Forest University, Temple University, University of Maryland and Oregon State University. Maryland replaced Auburn University in the rankings.

Five Lady 'Cats hit double figures in 91-76 win

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

K-State Head Coach Lynn Hickey wasn't overly pleased with the Lady 'Cats' 91-76 Big Eight Conference basketball victory over the University of Nebraska Lady 'Huskers on Tuesday in Lincoln.

It all looked good on paper: five players in double figures, 42 rebounds, a 60 percent showing from the field and a 79 percent performance at the free-throw line.

What was missing was the enthusiasm, Hickey said — the winning desire so apparent when the Lady 'Cats crushed the arch-rival University of Kansas Lady Jayhawks, 81-63, in Saturday's action at Ahearn Field House.

"We weren't ready to play," Hickey said of K-State's last regular-season road contest. "We played fair in the first half but came out and died in the second. There was no enthusiasm early in the game."

A lack of motivation could hurt the Lady 'Cats as they head into Saturday's clash at Ahearn with the conference-leading University of Missouri Lady Tigers. A win by the Lady 'Cats can assure them of a tie for the Big Eight title with MU, which has a 12-1 conference mark. The No. 11-ranked K-State squad remains in second place in the conference with a 11-2 record and a 21-5 overall mark.

Despite its problems against the Lady 'Huskers, K-State jumped to a 44-32 lead at halftime with the aid of sophomore Tina Dixon, who responded for 16 first-half points. Dixon received the starting nod over sophomore Sheronda Jenkins and ended the contest with 18 points.

But it would be Jenkins who would be the Lady 'Cats' scoring charge, hitting eight of 10 field goals and going a perfect six of six from the charity stripe for a career-high 22 points. Jenkins also added five rebounds.

It was a night for another career-high performance as freshman Sue Leiding hit 15 points and grabbed a team-high 11 rebounds in 23 minutes of play. Leiding's previous high was 14 points against the University of Oklahoma on Jan. 21.

Junior Angie Bonner and sophomore Jennifer Jones also scored in double figures, with Bonner connecting for 14 and Jones hitting for 12. Bonner and Jones were the Lady 'Cats' leading scorers in K-State's win over KU, with Bonner scoring a career-high 32 points and Jones tossing in 15.

Nebraska was led by the 21-point performance of Stacy Imming. Angie Miller tossed in 18 followed by Cathy Owen with 16 and Debra Powell with 11.

The Lady 'Huskers, who made 32 of 75 field goals for 43 percent, dropped to 16-10 overall and 6-7 in Big Eight play.

The game between K-State and MU will be the last contest of the regular season for the 'Lady Cats. The Lady Tigers defeated the Lady 'Cats 66-62 in the two squads' Feb.

8 meeting at Columbia.

Cassandra Jones and Jennifer Jones led the K-State scoring attack with 14 points apiece, while Bonner added 12. Missouri guards Sarah Campbell and Dee Dee Polk led the Lady Tigers offensively, scoring 17 and 16 points, respectively.

SAN FRANCISCO — A federal appeals court, holding that National Football League violated antitrust laws by conspiring to keep the Raiders from moving from Oakland to Los Angeles, ruled Tuesday that the NFL has no power to block any future franchise moves.

But the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, in its 2-1 decision upholding a federal court in Los Angeles, delayed deciding whether the NFL must pay the Raiders and the Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum almost $49 million in damages awarded by a jury.

Although conceding that the NFL is "a unique business organization to which it is difficult to apply antitrust rules," the three-judge panel said the lower court had correctly applied federal antitrust laws. And the appellate court said the six-woman jury had enough evidence to decide the NFL conspired to restrain trade.

The ruling was another victory for the Raiders and managing general partner Al Davis, who has worked for years to overturn NFL Rule 4.3 requiring two-thirds majority approval of the league's 28 team owners before a franchise can be moved.

In a statement issued by executive assistant Al LoCasale, Davis showed little willingness to heal his breach with the league. "We're grateful for the decision by the federal Court of Appeals. Throughout this litigation we knew we were right, that the National Football League operated in bad faith and unfair dealing."

"In fact, they have continued to act in bad faith, trying to drain us economically. The NFL has tried to maintain a cloud of uncertainty over our fans, which has hurt ticket sales and killed the building of luxury suites at the Los Angeles Coliseum. For years the NFL has used every conceivable form of harassment and roadblock to stop us from getting a valid foothold in Los Angeles."

The NFL said in a statement released in New York, "The NFL continues to believe it should have the right to decide where it does business. The league also believes it should be able, in making such decisions, to respect the loyalty of fans and communities that have supported franchises as well as Oakland did."

The statement added that without league control, professional sports would dissolve in the face of free riding and the loss of economies of scale.

Parker ready to help Reds

By The Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — For Dave Parker, 10 seasons with the Pittsburgh Pirates were both the best of times and the worst of times.

For every National League batting title there was a battery throwing incident. For every great defensive play that won three Gold Gloves there were boos from fans who called him overweight and overpaid.

Now a member of the Cincinnati Reds, he holds bittersweet memories about the Pirates and a city with a love-hate relationship.

"They can fool the fans part of the time, but not all of the time," he said. "All indications are the Pirates made a drastic mistake this time. I think it will be proven that the Reds got the best of this deal."

The Pirates will make deferred payments to Parker for 25 years under the five-year, $5 million-plus pact he signed after winning the NL Most Valuable Player Award in 1978. But they chose not to match the reported, two-year, $1.6 million deal Parker was offered by the Reds.

Parker said he signed with the Reds after one unsuccessful bargaining session with Pittsburgh: "The negotiations weren't in good faith. They weren't close at all" to the Reds' offer.

He was criticized by Pirates' third base coach Joe Lonnett last year. He said Parker got more injury-prone as his weight grew and no longer could hit the high, inside fastballs he once lashed for hits.

"What Joe Lonnett says means very little to me. He's a third base coach," Parker said. "The only comment I can make is that I've made a pretty good living by getting around on high fastballs. I've been doing something right to make the money I've made out of baseball."

"Who's supposed to get around on the high fastball? It's a pitch that's not supposed to be thrown. You're not supposed to see high fastballs. I've made a pretty good living hitting them."

Parker's brashness, his ridiculing and badgering of teammates helped foster the Pirates' "We Are Fam-alee" image in their World Series championship season in 1979. But Parker now says the "family" died and was buried when Willie Stargell retired after 1982.

"The family left when Stargell left. There was still a lot of humor, but it actually was not humor," Parker said. "A lot of it was bitter humor, meant to affect the individual."

The Pirates, except briefly, have had only two starting right fielders in the past 25 years — Roberto Clemente and Parker.

Weight training aids cage squad

By JUDI WRIGHT
Staff Writer

Basketball weight training at K-State began in 1979 under former head strength and conditioning coach Bill Allerheiligen, but the program has really emerged since Russ Reiderer took over the duties as strength coach in 1980.

"We (K-State) started because weight training was becoming more and more popular in the country," Reiderer said. "We started by talking to the coaches to find out what the needs of the basketball players were."

Reiderer, working closely with K-State men's Head Basketball Coach Jack Hartman, found that strength, the ability to jump higher, muscular and cardiovascular endurance, agility and flexibility were areas in which players could improve.

With these things in mind, Reiderer structured a program during the off-season for three days a week which involved lifting weights for 45 minutes and stretching for 12 minutes, in addition to a running workout.

From the start of organized practice in September until the first game, Reiderer changes the program to include two days of workout a week, which focuses on "refining the strength and speed that the athletes gained in the off-season program."

According to Reiderer, there is no set structure for athletic weight training.

"I set my program to meet the needs of the individual players," he said.

Hartman said that when the program began, the players were not enthusiastic about lifting weights, "but then they realized how the (weight) machines made them physically efficient."

Ben Mitchell, a starting sophomore forward for the Wildcat cage team, agreed with Hartman.

"It (weight training) helps in every sport," he said. "I feel stronger, and feeling stronger builds confidence, and confidence is part of playing well."

Hartman was first acquainted with basketball weight training in the mid-1960s when he was head mentor at the University of Southern Illinois-Carbondale.

"I was coaching Walt Frazier (who went on to professional basketball fame with the New York Knicks), and he began using the weight training program," Hartman said. "I was concerned at first, thinking maybe there would be too much muscle development, but seeing the results took away any doubt."

"From then on I became much more interested in learning about the weight training program," he said.

From his own experience, Hartman said he has found that "people don't realize that in order to get a weightlifter's body, the player has to lift constantly."

"A basketball player doesn't have that kind of time (with practices and two games a week), so this concept shouldn't be applied to basketball players," Hartman said.

Hartman said players have gained "strength, some bulk, stamina, self-discipline and the confidence factor" from participating in the weight training program.

"Weight training also gives the player a psychological edge," Hartman said, "especially under the board, where it gets physical."

"Some players need more help, so it definitely shows that weight training helps them. It helps others, but it isn't that obvious."

Hartman said he believes that as a result of basketball players who have sought out weights to improve themselves, the game has become more physical. On the other hand, he said the increased physical competition of the game has caused other smaller players to resort to working with weights to remain competitive.

Royals' shortstops even

By The Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — U.L. Washington has beaten back Onix Concepcion's challenge to his starting shortstop spot each of the past two years in the Kansas City Royals training camp.

This year may be different. "It is even right now," Royals Manager Dick Howser said Tuesday. "I think U.L. has got to get back to where he was. He didn't have a good year last year."

Washington batted only .236 last season while leading the American League in errors with 36. Concepcion hit .242 in 80 games.

Royals officials said outfielder Willie Wilson, who has been excused from spring training so far, was expected to report to the team Monday.

Trudeau to retire following 15 years of triumph, tumult

By The Associated Press

MONTREAL — Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau, whose rakish style and intimidating intellect gave Canada a prominent role on the world stage, announced Wednesday he is stepping down after more than 15 years in power.

Saying it is "time for someone else to assume this challenge," Trudeau, 64, will stay on as prime minister until his Liberal Party can hold a convention and pick a new leader, probably in May or June.

His intentions were disclosed in a letter to Iona Campagnolo, the party president.

Trudeau vaulted from obscurity to power on a wave of what was called "Trudeaumania" in April 1968, tossing witty remarks and kissing many women at every campaign stop. He has been in office ever since, except for the brief reign of Progressive Conservative Joe Clark, who beat Trudeau in May 1979 but fell from power nine months later.

With Trudeau's rating in recent public opinion polls hitting bottom and his fourth term ending, speculation about when he would resign had become almost feverish.

Aide Jacques Hudon said Trudeau reached his decision after talking Tuesday night with old friends from Montreal, his hometown.

"He told us he'd had a long walk in the blizzard last night," Hudon said. "He slept on it."

Immediately after the news reached the floor of the Toronto Stock Exchange on Wednesday, the exchange index jumped more than 10 points to 2,412.82.

Trudeau's long tenure was recognized in a statement by the U.S. State Department Wednesday in which it said, "The American people and government wish him well in his future endeavors."

Finance Minister Marc Lalonde, one of Trudeau's closest friends in politics, said the prime minister's greatest achievement had been "to keep the country together for the past 16 years in spite of the way things were going in Quebec in the 1960s." He was referring to the separatist movement in the French-speaking province of Quebec.

Lalonde said he hoped the Liberal Party would keep its tradition of alternating francophone and anglophone leaders. Trudeau grew up fluently bilingual but always considered himself a French-Canadian.

Early favorite for the Liberal leadership race is former Finance Minister John Turner, who split with Trudeau in 1975 and quit his Cabinet to set up a law practice in Toronto. Other likely candidates are Energy Minister Jean Chretien, Employment Minister John Roberts and Campagnolo.

Whoever is chosen automatically succeeds Trudeau as prime minister, and will be expected to try to put his or her mark on the government quickly. The next election must be called by February 1985.

The Progressive Conservatives, under new leader Brian Mulroney, are leading by 20 to 30 points in public opinion polls, making Mulroney a solid favorite to win an election no matter who the Liberals choose.

Norman "Doc" Fedder, professor of speech, devotes individual attention to his "special kids" at the beginning of each class period.

Professor combines theater, therapy in class

By BEVERLY MILLER
Collegian Reporter

They affectionately call him "Doc." His medicine contains large doses of enthusiasm, sincerity and generosity. All of his patients are viewed as special, yet some are considered more special than others.

The "Doc" is Norman Fedder, professor of speech. The clinic is a K-State class called Theater for Special Populations. His regular students are in curriculums such as education, speech pathology, recreation, home economics, physical education and theater. But the "special kids" are from Debra Engstrom's class for the trainable mentally handicapped (TMH) at Manhattan Middle School.

Fedder calls it developmental drama; Engstrom calls it skill development. Both agree this theater of creative dramatics and improvisation broadens the regular students' preparatory background. For the TMH youth, it heightens awareness of self in relationship to others.

Although the use of drama with special populations is a recent development, K-State has had such a class for four years. Focusing on the mentally handicapped, the Theater for Special Populations, with 10 University students enrolled, works twice a week with Engstrom's TMH pupils. The class coordinates the function of K-State as a training ground for future professionals and Manhattan Unified School District No. 383's efforts to educate and train these special children.

The Theater for Special Populations class meets at 9:30 a.m. every Tuesday and Thursday in the Purple Masque Theatre.

On one Tuesday, the day's theme of "vacation" was introduced, followed by a warm-up song and a brisk game of pretend baseball.

Following the warm-up, the large group divided into three well-balanced able/disabled rehearsal groups. Each group chose a specific type of vacation activity to dramatize — a hike, a two-team canoe race and swimming at the beach.

During rehearsal, group members tugged and pulled, placed and posed each other. They encouraged and applauded, laughed and joked. There were no frowns or ridicule. They practiced a few minutes more. Fedder then called them to order.

The class reorganized. With a signal from Fedder, the members raised their arms high, took a deep breath, called for silence, then lowering their arms, audibly breathed out. It was time for action.

Participants were jockeyed into place. With Fedder as head cheerleader, the audience clapped and shouted encouragement. Rewarding a particularly effective actor, the audience cheered and applauded; the actor beamed.

Following each performance, the special cast members were interviewed. Although they used no props, to lend more realism to the interviews the individuals were asked to "speak into a microphone," an item that looked remarkably like a kettledrum baton.

"What part did you play?" "Show us how you swam like a shark." "How did it feel to be chased by a bear?" "You were a terrific lion. Show us again how a lion roars."

The handicapped actors that could give verbal responses. Those who are basically non-verbal acted out their responses.

Vocabulary, memory, recall, emotion, interpretation, problem-solving, positive feedback, reality, imagination — creative dramatics or developmental drama emphasizes and focuses on all of these. This semi-structured setting encourages interaction between the able and the disabled; they work comfortably together. The TMH student learns to relax and everyone "lets his hair down," Fedder said.

Engstrom said she has observed other changes and improvements in her students and attributes these to their experiences in Theater for Special Populations.

"They would not have had exposure to acting without the theater class," Engstrom said. "They have learned to relax and express themselves. They have learned how to be someone else. They have more self-confidence, partly because they discovered they could do something that would entertain others."

Theater, however, involves two groups of people, the actors and the audience.

"The kids have also learned to be a better, more appreciative audience," Engstrom said. "They appreciate the ability, the time and the effort necessary to produce and present a dramatic work. Their own production, 'If You Can't Beat Them, Join Them,' presented (last spring) for the Eagle's Lodge, would never have been possible or nearly so successful without their experiences with the theater group."

Engstrom assigns much of the credit for the success of the class to Fedder and his verve.

"He combines caring and human concern with enthusiasm. Prior to the theater class, he had little knowledge and background in the subject of drama therapy or even in working with the handicapped. He has learned right along with the students," she said.

The regular students also are enthusiastically pleased with the class in general, and with Fedder in particular.

Wendy Randall, a December graduate in pre-physical therapy, summarized the opinion of most students who work with Fedder. She said he is the main reason she continued to take classes in theater and speech.

"Doc" Fedder leads the class with much enthusiasm and sincerity.

Master Teacher group to expand operations

By DAVID BEVENS
Staff Writer

The Master Teacher, a Manhattan organization geared toward improving teachers through publications and seminars, announced Wednesday the development of an intensive teacher and principal training academy.

"The natural evolution is that the academy for the training of teachers was on the drawing boards for years. The time is now right," said Robert DeBruyn, founder and president of The Master Teacher.

The Master Teacher, located in Manhattan will expand its operation in July by opening the proposed academy.

"With all the reports coming down the pike about education, everyone is saying what the problem is, but no one is offering to do anything about it. We don't agree with the reports," DeBruyn said.

The course will consist of six 40-hour-week sessions spread over a two-year period. It is offered to school districts for $3,600 per person.

DeBruyn said he believes the problem education faces today can be solved through upgrading already high-quality teachers to teach other teachers. The problem isn't in the number of hours in the school day, he said.

"They're talking about longer school days, higher standards for kids. What happens when we raise the standard and we don't help the teacher to teach all kids? Are we going to lose kids again? Sure the drop-out rate is going to go up, isn't it?" DeBruyn said.

"This teaching in the classroom is not an easy task, not when you are trying to reach every single kid. They need to learn how to be a master teacher and there is no place in the United States that has created a curriculum designed to create a master teacher," he said.

The academy will include a program specifically for principals also.

"They must become teachers of teachers," DeBruyn said. A school can have good teachers, but the school is only as good as the principal, he said.

Through his experience in industry and education, DeBruyn said he saw a need for educators to continue their education to enable them to meet the increasing demands put on them.

"I realized that schools needed an on-going program, not once or twice a year, every week. So I started a publication called The Master Teacher. Principals and superintendents buy it and give it to their teachers every week," he said of the beginning of The Master Teacher 15 years ago.

The new academy will not offer the equivalence of a master's degree similar to university programs. The hours spent will not go toward continued education credit required by Kansas, he said.

The academy will open in July and serve about 30 teachers and principals every week. The instructing staff will be made up of experts in their particular area, he said.

The Master Teacher currently employs 40 people. The head of the academy will be James M. Benjamin, who recently resigned as superintendent of schools for Manhattan Unified School District No. 383. He has worked for The Master Teacher for seven years helping to design teacher aid programs, DeBruyn said.

The Master Teacher facility has recently been enlarged. It now houses equipment needed for printing brochures and manuals.

The facility also will include an audio visual production room designed for teaching purposes.

Board passes higher fees for parking infringements

The Traffic and Parking Council approved a 50 cents increase per parking ticket in misuse fees for the 1985 fiscal year during its meeting Wednesday.

The increase would generate about $18,000 more for the 1984-1985 fiscal year, according to figures supplied by University Facilities.

University Facilities had requested the council to examine the possibilities of increasing parking registration or misuse fees to increase revenue for the department.

An increase of $3 for student and $5 for faculty/staff parking registration also was discussed. The council decided that the increase in misuse fees would be sufficient to meet the department's budgetary needs. The increase would make misuse fees $8 and $13 (for late payment), instead of the $7.50 and $12.50 fees currently charged.

The Traffic and Parking Council may investigate the possibility of future parking registration increases for the 1986 fiscal year.

"It is the concern of University Facilities and the council that we have a small fee increase, so that the costs are spread out instead of a big increase all at once," said Stuart Swartz, professor of civil engineering and faculty committee member.

The motion will now be printed, along with other changes approved earlier by the council, in the 1985 Traffic and Parking Regulations. The changes will be presented to K-State students and faculty at an open hearing later in the semester for approval.

Following the hearing, the changes will be submitted to the Board of Regents for approval. If accepted, the fee increases and other proposals will go into effect July 1, 1984.

Gemayel, Assad start negotiations

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — President Amin Gemayel met in Damascus Wednesday with Syrian President Hafez Assad for talks that could determine the future of Gemayel's government, which is facing a strong challenge from Syrian-supported rebels in Lebanon.

After the private meeting, Assad gave a banquet for Gemayel at his palace. No statements were issued on the progress of the talks.

Beirut papers said Gemayel's hurried trip emphasized his resolve to scrap Lebanon's troop withdrawal pact with Israel for a settlement with Syrian-backed Druse and Shiite Moslem opponents of his regime.

Meanwhile, U.S. Defense Secretary Casper Weinberger visited U.S. warships off Beirut and a new round of shelling hit Beirut.

In New York, the Soviet Union vetoed a French resolution in the U.N. Security Council that would have sent a U.N. peacekeeping force to Beirut to replace the multinational force provided by the United States, France, Italy and Britain. All but the French contingent of about 1,250 men have been withdrawn.

Around sundown a car bomb exploded at a 12-story apartment building near the state TV station in Beirut's Moslem sector. Three civilians were killed, including a 6-month-old baby, and up to 75 were wounded.

Police said government troops and Moslem militiamen traded sporadic mortar and rocket-propelled grenade fire across the "green line" dividing Beirut into Moslem and Christian sectors. Police said at least three civilians were killed and 11 wounded in the shelling.

Syria and its allies demand cancellation of the U.S.-brokered accord as a condition for talks with Gemayel, a Maronite Catholic, to end Lebanon's almost 9-year-old civil war. The agreement, reached May 17, provides security details to prevent Palestinian guerrillas from infiltrating southern Lebanon, thus allowing Israel to withdraw.

Gemayel is offering reforms giving Moslems equal power with Christians in a national coalition Cabinet, sources said.

Gemayel also hopes to get a commitment for Syria to withdraw its estimated 30,000 troops from northern, eastern and central Lebanon if he cancels the accord, said one source, who asked for anonymity.

Assad led a red-carpet welcome at Damascus airport for Gemayel, who arrived shortly after noon. It was his first visit there since he took office Sept. 23, 1982. A diplomatic source in Washington said Gemayel's turn to Syria came after Washington rejected his plea last week for U.S. air and naval firepower to stop further rebel advances.

But Weinberger said in Beirut there was no change in the "rules of disengagement" under which the 6th Fleet would provide fire support to the Gemayel government.

Asked about the Assad-Gemayel talks and if a possible abrogation of the May 17 agreement might change the situation, Weinberger said, "I think if it produces a cease-fire — which is supposed to be a part of every agreement — we certainly hope so."

Alumni discuss photojournalism

Two prominent photojournalists, both former K-State students, returned to campus Wednesday to share their experiences with students.

Gary Haynes, assistant managing editor and director of photography at the Philadelphia Inquirer, and Pete Souza, a White House staff photographer, spent the day with students explaining what they do in their jobs. Beginning at 4 p.m. in Kedzie 106, both photographers discussed their work experiences and answered questions.

Haynes, a 1957 K-State graduate, joined the Inquirer in 1974.

"K-State has a very good student publications department and program," Haynes said. "I am jealous of the Collegian and the Royal Purple yearbook, because when I was a student here, the newspaper was a plain tabloid and the yearbook was lifeless."

Haynes offered his observations on how photographers on professional newspapers work and gave advice to photographers seeking employment.

"What we do in the professional newspaper business is not much different from what photographers do on a college newspaper," he said.

"We judge a photographer's portfolio and their contact sheets," Haynes said. "Interpersonal skills are also very important. A person may be an excellent photographer, but he has to have a personality also."

"Four Days," a book which recounts the days immediately following the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, displays numerous photographs by Haynes.

Souza, who left K-State in 1979 after graduate studies, is one of four photographers for President Reagan who document the president's activities. He gave a slide presentation of some of his work.

Souza said he isn't limited by the Secret Service.

"We get to move around and go wherever we want," he said. "The biggest problem is that the Secret Service men are always getting into the picture and messing it up."

One of the things Souza said he likes to do most is to go to Reagan's ranch near Santa Barbara, Calif.

"It's really neat," Souza said. "Not many people, maybe a dozen, get to see him out on the ranch."

Funds sought to upgrade utility system

University Facilities is currently trying to gain funding from the Kansas Legislature to improve its energy conservation with a centralized, computerized control system, Vince Cool, associate director of University Facilities, said.

The University will not know whether it can get the funds until April, Cool said.

K-State's electrical energy is determined by two methods: the amount of energy used per kilowatt hour and by a demand charge.

The largest electrical demand is between 10 a.m. and 3 p.m., so the University is charged an additional fee based on its large demand during the peak period.

With a centralized, computerized control system, the University could economically distribute its power demand throughout a 24-hour day and therefore save money on its demand expense, Cool said.

Currently, the University has simple control systems for each building. Each costs about $2,000 to $4,000.

A single, centralized control system would cost the University from $250,000 to $500,000, Cool said.

A conservation project putting new insulation in the underground steam tunnels was completed last fall.

The project had two phases and cost more than $350,000. University Facilities replaced most of the old insulation in the underground steam tunnels.

"Doc is outgoing and fun," she said. "He gets everyone involved. He doesn't use criticism and he helps a person feel at ease with himself."

Working with the handicapped also has been a beneficial experience for Randall.

"The kids make us feel at ease, too. They are far less inhibited than we are, sometimes even rather show-offish. After a while you don't feel nearly as self-conscious; if they can do it so can you. I really appreciate this exposure to these kids. They are people, too."

Randall's sentiments are echoed by Vincent Bly, senior in education and speech, who has a background in theater.

"In theater we are taught the gestures, postures, tightness and stylized form necessary in acting. But Doc's class asks you to act out what you feel. People are encouraged to be natural and expressive. He only asks that you do the best you can. We start with the simple and go to whatever heights are possible."

"I was very nervous about this class," Bly said. "But the special kids were so natural and relaxed. This is what I want to do. I love this work with these people."

Fedder asks all his regular students to maintain a journal throughout the semester. The entries reveal some of the benefits and challenges the students have experienced in the class.

The first journal entries revealed initial feelings of uncertainty and uneasiness: "I was afraid," "I did not know what to expect," "I felt really ashamed," and "I felt excited and scared at the same time."

With few exceptions, early concerns were replaced with expressions of optimism and insight. One student wrote, "I have learned so much about myself, and maybe for the first time I understand the meaning of what it means to live."

"Maybe I have learned to be more thankful of what I have or maybe I have just learned that the mentally retarded are human beings and they have abilities, too," another student wrote.

Theater for Special Populations is only one of many drama and theater activities which occupy Fedder's sphere of interest and range of talent.

In 1983, with the aid of three students, Fedder organized a pilot K-State program called OK Theater — Older Kansan Theater. Developed with the same drama therapy ideas used with Engstrom's TMH students, OK Theater applies them to another special population, the elderly.

He also has written extensively: numerous articles on drama and religious theater, many one-act plays and a major musical — presented off-off Broadway last November with another major, full-length play currently being written. He is collecting new plays on Jewish and Christian themes to be included, under his editorship, in an anthology called "Wrestling with God."

In 1974, Fedder revived the Religious and Theater Program of the American Theatre Association and co-founded the Kansas Association for the Arts and Religious Communities. He was instrumental in the creation of the National Jewish Theatre Association, was awarded a traveling fellowship to Israel in 1982 and attended the first International Jewish Theatre Festival, also in Israel.

"I now realize there is a theme which runs through my life, a moral mandate; 'What does the Lord require of you, but to do justice and love mercy' (Micah 6:8)," Fedder said. "In one way or another I have been involved throughout my life in theater with a moral dimension — feeling more deeply and thinking more carefully about what it means to be alive, what it means to be human."

Media, environmentalists inspire image, Watt says

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — James G. Watt, who resigned as Interior Secretary last fall after making an off-color remark about the makeup of a federal commission, says most of what people heard or read about his actions during his three years in office wasn't true.

Although he blamed the press for avoiding facts about his office's actions, Watt told about 700 people Wednesday at Washburn University that environmental groups were at the root of his image problem.

Watt said he was aware that the image continues to linger of him reversing years of preservation to pave the way for commerce in the forests.

"It's a media-created image based on the partisan actions of six to 10 groups," he said.

Watt resigned in October after a national outcry over his remark about having "a black, a woman, two Jews and a cripple" on the Federal Coal Commission.

"You have to be willing to challenge the status quo in search for truth," he said. "You pay a price, oh, you pay a price, but anything that has value has a price on it."

The former Interior Secretary said he is planning a book about his years in office.

Watt's appearance was greeted by some boos and a few protesters. Some people protested the use of student money to bring Watt to Washburn, an appearance one school official said cost somewhat less than $7,500. Tickets cost $1 for students and $4 and $5 for the public.

Primary more than Hart victory

Sen. Gary Hart was the most obvious winner in Tuesday's New Hampshire primary. By capturing 41 percent of the vote, Hart proved he is a serious contender for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Walter Mondale and Sen. John Glenn were the big losers. Mondale received only 28 percent of the votes, destroying his position as the Democratic front-runner. By coming in a weak third, Glenn's chances of winning the nomination are fading into deep space.

The New Hampshire primary determines only a tiny fraction of the delegates to the Democratic National Convention in San Francisco. Only 12 delegates are selected during the primary, and those 12 elect 10 more in April. The state will have only 22 of the 3,933 delegates who will finally choose the presidential nominee.

Media exposure and political credibility are the real prizes in the New Hampshire primary. By winning on Tuesday and having a strong showing in the earlier Iowa caucuses, Hart has gained both. He is still far behind Mondale in delegate support, but most states have not yet committed delegates to any candidate.

But Hart was not the only winner. The Democratic party will also benefit.

If Mondale had won in both Iowa and New Hampshire, he would have seemed unbeatable. Most likely, Democrats in other states would vote for him because he would seem to have the best chance of defeating President Reagan.

However, Mondale might not be the popular choice of the Democratic rank-and-file. The voters in Iowa and New Hampshire are not representative of all Democrats in the nation. Hart's victory will prevent Mondale's automatic nomination.

An early party division over which candidate the Democrats should back is less damaging than a candidate without popular support. If the Democratic nominee is unpopular, Reagan or a third-party candidate will draw cross-over voters in November's general election. If the nominee is popular, building party support after the convention in July will not be difficult.

The race continues. Democrats should remember it's a long way to San Francisco. Counting votes early will make Reagan the big winner.

College ruling undermines rights

The Supreme Court has set a dangerous precedent by ruling that colleges with programs discriminating against women cannot be stripped of all federal aid, but reprimanded only by withdrawing the aid for the program in question.

The court voted 6-3 Tuesday to support one section of a 1972 federal law banning sex discrimination at colleges receiving federal aid, which dictates that funds only be cut off for the particular discriminatory program and not the entire college.

The Reagan administration scored a major legal victory in this case. Women's rights groups now face an increased challenge to secure equality between the sexes in education, especially where the current administration can exercise control.

If the Reagan administration has so much influence that it can alter discrimination practices and promote inequality, it should be checked before further damage results.

Bernice Resnick Sandler, executive director of the Project on the Status and Education of Women, said this ruling permits an unprecedented occurrence by allowing discriminating institutions to be federally funded.

What purpose is served by undermining rights to equality in education? If the administration hopes to benefit institutions of higher learning, it's taking the wrong approach. This ruling only creates antagonism whereby tradition-free thoughts and equality should exist.

Ensuring an atmosphere of equality on campuses will serve to attract competent students and professors more than will promotion, above all else, of the financial interests of colleges and universities. Such institutions need money to survive, of course, but their primary concern is education. Assuring a healthy atmosphere of equality promotes learning more so than absolute protection of financial resources.

Campaign becoming old news

Friends, are you tired of hearing about the presidential primaries and caucuses?

Have you already suffered a case of the "who-cares-about-Wally-Mondale" syndrome? Do you care if Johnny Glenn has the right stuff, the wrong stuff or the boring stuff? Does the name Gary Hart cause you to yawn and belch? Do you think Jesse Jackson is running for vice president?

Let's not forget Georgie McGovern...or shall we? Is it important to know anything about Reubin Askew or Allen Cranston? Does your waxy, yellow build-up give a hoot about Fritz Hollings? Are you secretly rooting for Ronnie Reagan to switch parties and tell Bobby Dole to get lost?

If you can answer "yes" to any of the above questions, you are not alone.

Yes, I know I am exhibiting a poor attitude. I understand there is a need for the Democratic and Republican parties to select presidential candidates. I believe in the democratic process and all the rights and responsibilities which go with selecting this country's leaders.

I just have trouble listening to some commentator announcing his network has projected a winner in a primary or caucus with something like 1.75 percent of the vote tallied. Whatever happened to "Dewey Defeats Truman?"

Let's face it — Reagan already has sewn up the Republican nomination. He carefully waited until Jan. 29 to announce his decision to run for re-election, which effectively knocked out many would-be candidates. The Republicans are basically unified behind the Reagan-Bush campaign. The big question for many Republicans is to decide who will run in 1988.

BRIAN LA RUE

The Democrats, on the other hand, are having a great brawl...er, campaign. It's the survival of the fittest.

Mondale has the labor union support and the "big-bucks" supporters. Wally's been running for president since Jan. 20, 1981 — the day Reagan took office. In my opinion, he is the guy the other Democratic candidates must catch, despite his loss to Hart in New Hampshire's primary.

Hart, who orchestrated McGovern's rise to the top of the Democratic heap in 1972, is clearly the darling of the campaign. He doesn't have the money to outspend Mondale, but he has laid the foundations for grass-roots support. His showing in the Iowa caucuses (second place) gave his campaign new life, help, support and media coverage. His victory in New Hampshire has given the Democratic race new life.

Glenn, once considered to be Mondale's main threat, is now considered by many to be out of contention for the nomination after only one caucus and one primary. Glenn has inspired many with his "right stuff" talk, but bored most others. His campaign has become more aggressive in the past week, but he first must overcome his image problem (yawn).

McGovern is the sentimental favorite. Some people have said they thought McGovern "won" the Princeton debate. McGovern's chances of winning the nomination are slim, but he could be the Democrat who unifies the party after the convention. Keep an eye on him. McGovern as a vice presidential candidate is possible.

Jackson is definitely the wild card in the Democratic deck. He has the charm and charisma which reminds me of the Kennedys during the 1960s. He probably will get more citizens registered to vote than any other candidate. Unfortunately, he has the problem of putting his foot in his mouth at the wrong time, which will cost him the opportunity to get the nomination.

Jackson admitted Sunday that he used the term "Hymie" to refer to Jews in a private conversation. He said it wasn't meant to be a derogatory remark or used "in the spirit of meanness."

The other Democratic candidates (Askew, Cranston, Hollings, etc.) are, well, unknown to many Americans. I think these candidates probably will drop out of the race now that the New Hampshire primary is over.

I'm not making any predictions about who will win. I'm willing to let the "primary season" run its course.

I say, let the pollsters do their job. Let the commentators make their predictions with 1.75 percent of the vote tallied. Just don't expect me to swallow every tidbit of information and every prediction thrown at us.

We have better things to do with our time.... Stay tuned.

Successful year for administration

Success is often difficult to measure, but after reviewing student government activities during the last year, I have little difficulty labeling the year a success.

Student concerns were effectively voiced and addressed professionally through established University channels of communication, resulting in success in several areas.

The Student Services Support Fee, passed by Student Senate in the previous term, was successfully presented to K-State President Duane Acker, who then forwarded it to the Board of Regents. Student commitment to Holton Hall services was recognized when the regents approved the $3 per semester fee.

One of the more fiscally responsible decisions Senate made was not to increase the student activity fee simply because of tight budget constraints realized during the allocation process. Senate showed fiscal responsibility in carefully analyzing the monetary requests from groups and making necessary funding cut-backs when appropriate.

Senate has encouraged additional sources of funding beyond requests from the student activity fee. A landmark example is the efforts of Lori Leu, Senate chairman and senior in pre-law, to seek funding from Easter Seals to supplement the services of the shuttle service for temporarily handicapped students.

Through an advisory board with student representation, students have had a strong voice in the allocation process of the $325,000 academic support fee, which supplements library acquisitions and provides additional computers. We also have been successful in proposing alternatives for increasing hours of library operation.

After additional planning and discussion during this administration, final approval was granted to return the University photo ID card for student, faculty and staff identification. Because Farrell Library has recently converted to a computerized access system, the ID will also feature a magnetic strip to expedite materials checkout.

Through the efforts of the Academic Affairs Committee and its chairman, Kent Barnow, senior in business administration, two major accomplishments have been achieved.

JERRY KATLIN
Guest Columnist

First, the problem with lack of preparation time between dead and finals week has been resolved. The elimination of the tentative grade policy provides an extra weekend to study before finals, an excellent solution for this recurring campaign issue.

Second, a proposal has been adopted to conduct a formal ceremony for December graduates. Beginning this year, the graduates and their families will receive the University recognition they deserve.

A committee was established to determine the best use of the Nichols Hall Art Account established by Senate in 1975. After carefully analyzing the situation, a decision was made to commission an artist to provide artwork for the lobby of Nichols Hall.

Communication highlighted the year. Tables in the Union provided information for students to voice concerns and offer suggestions for student government action. The Butten Bill, even though controversial, provided increased communication between students and their elected representatives.

Even though some disagree, Edee Dalke was a major factor in the increased visibility of student government. Her columns last semester in the Collegian encouraged discussion, always vital to effective and efficient student government. The ability to laugh at oneself is an important lesson to learn. Dalke's columns provided a black-and-white look at Senate's actions with her perception of the consequences of those actions.

Relations with regents members and legislators was another positive aspect of this term. Visits to Senate by Regent Norman Brandeberry and 67th district Rep. Joe Knopp provided discussion on the needs of higher education in Kansas. The legislative banquet in January was an excellent opportunity for students to interact with Kansas legislators and discuss issues facing the state.

Policies were changed to allow international students to receive two undergraduate degrees and allow international students enrolled in six or less credit hours the option of subscribing to the student health fee.

The closing of Smith Cooperative House proved controversial. By handling themselves professionally, utilizing University channels and rallying for student support, Smith residents guaranteed a return to their living quarters in the fall.

In the future, students must face more major decisions. Ken Heinz, junior in computer science, has presented reasonable proposals to improve campus lighting during his administration.

Another primary concern the new Senate must face is the possible restructuring of the Student Affairs division, specifically the Center for Student Development. The Student Affairs staff strongly advocates student activities and has a sincere commitment and dedication to students. This relationship must continue and other segments of the administration must be reminded of the vital role Student Affairs plays in the overall well-being of students.

Increases to the activity fee and possibly the Lafene Student Health Center fee are two important areas that must be thoroughly researched and evaluated. Senate should not get into the habit of increasing fees during a fiscal crunch. Senate must evaluate budgets and look for duplication of services to ensure the organization's activities are in the best interests of students.

Overall, the year proved successful in many areas. But issues remain for future administrations to discuss, analyze and solve.

Editor's note: Jerry Katlin, graduate in public administration, will step down as student body president March 5.

Guest parking policies unfair to residents

Editor,
I am a resident of Marlatt Hall and a member of that hall's governing board, which entitles me to a reserved parking space. During this past weekend, especially Saturday, I found it impossible to park in my reserved spot and just as hard to find a spot in the rest of the lot around Marlatt. These spaces had been taken by visitors to the hall or campus.

When I called the K-State Police

Department to find out what could be done about this situation, I was told nothing. They might come out and put a ticket on the car. BIG DEAL! Guests are excused from paying tickets anyway.

I have a few questions for the K-State Police:

Why are guests excused from paying tickets? If I went to Topeka and parked illegally, I don't think the Topeka police would excuse my parking error because I was from Manhattan.

What is the purpose of having a reserved spot if it isn't reserved?

Why do I pay $20 per year for a parking spot if someone else can take it and I am forced to park elsewhere?

The K-State Police should spend more time and pay better attention when patrolling residence hall parking lots.

Taylor wakes up to dependencies

NEW YORK — Actress Elizabeth Taylor says treatment to overcome drug dependency also made her face up to being an alcoholic, and is convinced that she has kicked both habits.

The Academy Award-winning performer left the Betty Ford Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif., on Jan. 20 after seven weeks of $130-a-day rehabilitation treatment.

She said in an interview for ABC's "Good Morning America" broadcast Wednesday that she was enjoying life and taking each day as it comes.

Worry about pill-popping drove her to seek treatment, she said, "but when I was at the center, I realized I really was an alcoholic as well. I'm a very addictive kind of person."

Taylor, 52, said she knew the time had come to seek help when she entered a hospital for tests and was so tense she had to be sedated into incoherence.

"It got to the point where I would try to say something and the thought from my brain would never reach my tongue," she said. "I was taking far too many prescription drugs. I needed sleeping pills to go to sleep every night of my life for about the last 25 years."

Her rehabilitation at the center began with carrying out garbage and hosing down a patio in the morning, she said.

Beatles to finally receive honor

LIVERPOOL, England — In a ceremony this summer, the three surviving Beatles are expected to accept the highest honor offered by the city where their group became famous, says a Liverpool official.

A city council spokesman who asked not to be identified said Wednesday that Paul McCartney and Ringo Starr had accepted the invitation to be granted the freedom of the city. The spokesman said John Lennon's widow, Yoko Ono, also has approved the posthumous award for him. Lennon was slain in New York City in 1980.

The fourth Beatle, George Harrison, is out of the country and has not yet been contacted by the council. But his agent hinted that he also would accept the honor, said the council spokesman.

Members of the Labor Party-ruled council had opposed bestowing the honor on the Beatles for 14 years because it usually goes to people who have performed good works for the city. But the council approved the award last October.

Meanwhile, a 51-foot mockup of a yellow submarine, inspired by the Beatles' song of the same name, has been anchored in this port's unused docklands as the centerpiece of a Beatles exhibit in the International Garden Festival.

Political past won't stop Fonda

NEW ORLEANS — Actress Jane Fonda made a second unexpected department store appearance Wednesday to push her line of exercise clothing and told admirers she wouldn't be intimidated by critics of her political beliefs.

"The store does not know I'm here. I'm here because I want to support my clothes," Fonda said in the lingerie department at the D.H. Holmes store. "I'm proud of my clothes and I want to support my clothes."

Store officials had called off plans for an appearance by Fonda because of what they said were hundreds of complaints about her liberal politics, many of them threatening.

Hart's New Hampshire upset revitalizes democratic battle

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gary Hart's surprise victory in the New Hampshire primary has rekindled a battle for the Democratic nomination for president, Kansas spokesmen for the three leading contenders agreed Wednesday.

"It seems to me it makes Sen. Hart not only someone who is viable, but also somebody who can win," said Kathleen Sebelius of Topeka. She has been active on behalf of the Colorado senator, who has no formal organization in this state.

"I think this means the debate will go on; it isn't over," said Richard Pinaire of Junction City, a deputy campaign chairman in Kansas for former Vice President Walter F. Mondale, who had won in the Iowa caucuses last week and had been favored in New Hampshire.

"It helps Hart the most, for sure, but certainly the fact that Hart was able to come across this strong gives hope to those who feel the party should take a close look and that it shouldn't automatically go to the vice president, who has received all the endorsements," said Gov. John Carlin, state chairman of the organization supporting Ohio Sen. John Glenn, who finished third in New Hampshire.

All three spokesmen for the leading contenders for the Democratic nomination indicated they still feel Mondale is the frontrunner, but with the race opened up because of Hart's upset in New Hampshire.

"We'll take the win," said Sebelius, daughter-in-law of the late U.S. Rep. Keith Sebelius of Norton. "It surfaces him (Hart) as somebody who can win."

"Winning one early on means it opens some money doors, and he needs the bucks to carry on campaigns simultaneously in several states, which he hasn't had."

She said Hart should also win in Wyoming and, "That should provide a lot of momentum for Super Tuesday (March 13 when nine states have primaries)."

Sebelius said Hart's campaign staff has told field supporters such as her that Hart is or will become qualified to win delegates in 95 percent of the primaries and caucuses, which counters earlier claims by Mondale supporters that Hart won't be in enough primaries to stop Mondale.

"The word from the office is that there is no way he's going to lose on technicalities," she said.

Sebelius conceded Hart had exceeded her most optimistic hopes in New Hampshire.

"We had heard early on that New Hampshire would be better than Iowa, so I thought it would be close. But I didn't expect him to win. It was significant for him to do as well as he did in Iowa (second) because it brought him back into the media focus, and in New Hampshire he proved he could win," she said.

Pinaire downplayed the significance of Hart's win in New Hampshire, citing the fact the Colorado senator won only 10 or 11 delegates to Mondale's seven or eight and that Mondale is much better organized in the nine states which have primaries week after next.

He attributed Hart's victory to a strategy of "working in rural areas" and spending more time in New Hampshire than did Mondale.

"I think the debate will go on, but that Vice President Mondale will prevail and we will have a consensus in short order," said Pinaire.

"I think Mondale will do very well in the coming primaries. Hart will make a credible showing, but he just hasn't done the (organizational) work required to get a sufficient number of delegates to win the nomination."

Carlin said Hart's margin of victory in New Hampshire "to say the least delays those who have concluded that the race is over, and probably assures us and assures many more states of the opportunity to, most importantly, participate in the process."

"Hart certainly showed that when rank and file Democrats are given the opportunity to participate in the process they're going to be independent and go the way they want to go, rather than go with the party leaders and the endorsements."

The governor said the margin of Hart's New Hampshire victory insures that the Colorado senator will make a race of it and that Glenn "has a long shot to participate in the process and really have a healthier debate."

"I think regardless of who the nominee is in July, the winner will be stronger because of that debate," Carlin concluded.

Students' choices raise county abortion rate

By LUCY REILLY
Collegian Reporter

Riley County abortion rates for women 20 to 24 years old are double the state average. According to 1982 figures from the Kansas Department of Health and Environment in Topeka, the state average abortion ratio for this age group was 149.4 abortions for every 1,000 live births. The Riley County ratio averaged 294.1 abortions for every 1,000 live births.

Local figures are higher than the state average because of the presence of K-State in the county, Kay Campbell, registered nurse at Lafemme Clinic, said.

Lafemme is a branch of the Lafene Student Health Center designated for women's health care services. Before 1977, no abortion counseling was done at the clinic.

Campbell, who has worked at Lafene for nine years, said an increase in abortions recently created the need for abortion counseling at Lafene.

"There's a continuity of care now," Campbell said.

Lafemme provides services to students who suspect pregnancy. Within the pretext of a private and confidential environment, pregnancy tests are taken at the women's request.

In 1983, 493 pregnancy tests were administered, 155 of which were positive, Dr. Robert Tout, medical director of Lafene, said.

Of the pregnant 31.4 percent, more than 90 percent had abortions, Tout said.

A pregnant woman has three options available to her, Campbell said. She can keep the child, put the child up for adoption or have an abortion. A majority of students at K-State opt for abortion.

The Lafemme staff doesn't terminate pregnancies. However, they do recommend nearby reputable clinics, Campbell said. The clinic gives students a handout on necessary abortion information pertaining to procedure, complications, risks and aftercare instructions.

"Lafemme doesn't do abortions because of a lack of surgical procedures, adequate facilities to perform abortions, an association with a hospital and physicians willing to do it," Campbell said.

The nearest abortion services to Manhattan are offered by private physicians in Salina, Junction City and Lawrence, Campbell said. Since private physicians do not usually provide counseling, Lafemme recommends clinics in Wichita and the Kansas City area.

Some clinics often are picketed by members of pro-life groups attempting to dissuade people from terminating their pregnancy, she said.

"Abortions are legal in Kansas and I try not to involve myself," Campbell said. "We (Lafemme staff) try not to let our personal ideas influence patients' decisions and let them decide for themselves. I try to be objective. My job is to tell people about the three options available, and if I don't tell the student, someone else eventually will."

Statistics show college towns have higher-than-average abortion rates because some women choose to be students instead of mothers.

Campbell, Phyllis Hammond, registered nurse and director of nursing at Lafene and one or two other Lafemme clinical nurses visit various clinics every year to maintain adequate information about each.

"Of the abortion clinics we've visited, one-third of the patients are repeat patients," Campbell said.

Many of the repeat patients haven't received adequate information about birth control. Some sexually active people assume if they don't use birth control, they're not admitting participation in any (sexual) activity, Campbell said.

"We're not necessarily encouraging sexual activity, we just want people to be aware and careful of the outcome," she said.

Costs of terminating a pregnancy in the first trimester are between $200 and $275. Abortions performed in advanced stages of pregnancy, however, can cost up to $1,800, Campbell said.

Recent trends to strengthen the education program concerning birth control have decreased the abortion rate in Kansas.

A 1980 Associated Press article said the Alan Guttmacher Institute of New York had compiled statistics stating that Kansas had the highest abortion rate in the nation. The institute's statistics showed that in 1977, 14,740 abortions were performed in Kansas. Guttmacher's 1980 statistical analysis on abortions in the state showed 13,570 abortions were performed.

Unmarried women accounted for 75 percent of the abortions in 1977. Of this number, 80 percent had received one abortion, 40 percent were teenagers and 80 percent of the abortions were administered in the first trimester, according to the institute's report.

The presence of a major university is a dominant factor in the high abortion rate in Riley County, Campbell said. Douglas County, location of the University of Kansas, and Sedgewick County, home of Wichita State University, also have high abortion figures.

According to the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, the 1982 Douglas County ratio was 604.7 abortions per every 1,000 births, and Sedgewick County's ratio was 130.8 abortions per 1,000 live births.

Thompkins County in New York, the location of Cornell University, which is of comparable size to K-State, had an abortion ratio even greater than Riley County in 1982, according to the New York Department of Health and Environment.

The department reported that the ratio of abortions to live births for women 20 to 24 years old in Thompson County is nearly 1 to 1. In 1982, 285 live births were reported compared to 284 abortions.

Nationally, the 20 to 24-year-olds are the age group with the highest abortion rate, the institute said.

Chief Counsel Thomas Marzen of Americans United for Life, Chicago, said it's common for college towns to have a higher rate of abortions.

"Women at this period (college age) in their lives are out of their original environment for a little while," Marzen said. "They aren't leading settled lives and are re-evaluating themselves and their environment. Abortion is more likely to happen."

Marzen said he thinks the national rate of abortions is staying constant. The Midwest rate is higher though, he said. Midwestern college towns are dominated by students, who prior to moving to a college town, haven't had access to abortion centers.

On the East Coast, Marzen said, large universities aren't as prevalent as in the Midwest. Smaller universities are scattered and major cities providing abortions are close. Therefore, he said, easier accessibility to abortion clinics is common.

College campuses involve accepting prevailing values of society. Students are largely disdainful of accepting these values, he said.

"It's a conformist thing. Most students are pro-abortion, not because they know why, but because it's chic and intellectually fashionable," Marzen said.

In 1980, national statistics showed that 67 percent of the women having abortions were first-time patients. Teenagers accounted for 30 percent of abortions received and 91.3 percent had abortions performed in the first trimester.

Problems can arise for patients who have had multiple abortions. Most abortions won't cause problems unless complications were involved in the pregnancy termination, Campbell said.

"After two to three abortions, problems are more prevalent in maintaining (full-term) pregnancies," she said.

Different types of terminations exist. Suction aspiration, a method using a small tube inserted into the uterus through the vaginal cavity, eliminates the fetus by suction. This process is primarily done in the initial weeks of pregnancy, Campbell said.

Dilation evacuation is a procedure by which laminaria (sterile seaweed) is inserted into the uterus. It dilates the cervix and stimulates labor if the pregnancy is advanced enough.

Saline solution also induces labor in advanced stages. Some babies live through this method, Campbell said, and it's up to the individual doctor whether to save the child or not.

"Most fetuses are not developed enough to survive a saline injection, and it's com-

Senators to choose chairman

A new Student Senate chairman will be selected at the Senate meeting tonight.

Mark Jones, junior in pre-design professions, Steve Line, senior in finance, and Tracy Turner, junior in economics, are running for the position. Nominations will be taken from the floor.

Nominations also will be taken for Senate vice chairman and Faculty Senate representative. Senators will be elected for these positions on March 8.

First reading will be held on a bill determining 1984 summer school allocations.

Groups requesting funding during tentative allocations will give five-minute presentations to Senate about their activities. These groups include: KSDB Radio, Puerto Rican Student Organization, Student Governing Association, Early Childhood Laboratory, Students for Handicapped Concerns, Legal Services, U-Learn, Consumer Relations Board, Women's Resource Center, FONE and University for Man. Student Publications, a major line item which is reviewed every three years, also will give a presentation.

The meeting will begin at 6 p.m. instead of the regular 7 p.m. meeting time in the Union Big Eight Room.

Power failure hits parts of 5 states

By The Associated Press

A major north-south Pacific Gas & Electric power transmission line failed in northern California on Wednesday night, knocking out power to parts of five Western states, authorities said.

Brief blackouts were reported to cities and towns in California, Nevada, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas, PG&E officials said.

A circuit breaker at the Round Mountain, Calif., substation about 100 miles south of the Oregon border tripped at 5:49 p.m. PST, said PG&E spokesman Clyde Walthall in Sacramento. That incident, whose cause had not been determined, triggered a series of trippings across the West, he said.

"We contacted Pacific Gas and Electric power control and they said they've lost a major transmission line between the north and the south," said R.B. Black, warning controller for the California Office of Emergency Services in Sacramento. "They are trying to equalize the load now, but they can give us no estimate when they will have the thing back up."

The blackout hit parts of San Francisco, San Diego, Oakland, Los Angeles, Tucson, Ariz., Reno, Nev., Albuquerque, N.M., Santa Fe and Taos, N.M., and El Paso, Texas, Black said.

About one-third of Las Vegas, Nev., was affected, excluding the glittering strip of casinos and the downtown area.

Parts of Utah lost power, Black said, but a Utah Power & Light spokesman said there were no blackouts in that state.

Sections of some cities were blacked out for only a few seconds, while others were out for much longer. Most areas reported that power was restored within an hour.

Abortion

parable to a premature delivery," Campbell said.

Not all physicians are willing to perform abortions after the first trimester because they aren't equipped for advanced stages of pregnancies. Advanced stages are more costly because of the higher risks involved. Time and care devoted by doctors is greater.

For non-complicated abortions performed in the first trimester, only one visit to a clinic is necessary. After the first trimester though, up to three visits may be required.

The most common method of an advanced staged abortion is the dilatation evacuation process. A patient visits a doctor and the laminaria is inserted. The next day, the woman returns to have the first laminaria removed and another is inserted. This process aids dilation of the cervix. On the final day, she returns and the abortion is performed.

Ethical considerations are entirely up to the attending physician and the patient. Each doctor decides his personal viewpoint to help the patient.

"Legally, she (the patient) has the option (for abortion)," Campbell said.

Get a happier parent in 5 easy steps.

Step 1: Clear all but one or two of your most sedate friends from the room. (We believe it's an innocent study group... the question is, would your parents believe it?)

Step 2: Wade through the pizza boxes, magazines and dirty clothes to locate the phone. (HINT: If you spot the cord, just follow it. There's generally a phone at the other end.)

Step 3: Lower volume on stereo and turn off television and radio. Bonus points if you change the record from rock to classical.

Step 4: Pick up receiver (perhaps wiping peanut butter and jelly off first?) and dial number.

Step 5: Say, "Hi Mom, it's me!"

Former ballerina hopeful leads women's team

Judge's ruling opens door for Dupree

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

Once upon a time in a not-too-distant land called St. Louis, there lived a little girl who dreamed a dream not uncommon to many other little girls her age: She wanted to be a ballerina.

Now when this young lady dreams, she dreams of power moves to the basket, free throws, a national championship and All-America honors.

That little ballerina of yesteryear is K-State's Angie Bonner — the Lady 'Cats basketball squad's leading scorer and rebounder — who does more than pirouette her way into the lane when playing against opponents in the tough Big Eight Conference.

Bonner, a 6-foot-1 center, makes her presence known under the basket, where she averages 16.2 points and 6.5 rebounds in Big Eight contests. She also was the team's top rebounder last season with a 7.4 average and placed second in scoring, averaging 16.3 points per contest.

She's coming off the highest scoring game of her career where she scored 32 points, pulled down seven rebounds and made eight steals in K-State's 81-63 romp Saturday over the arch-rival University of Kansas Lady Jayhawks. Bonner and the Lady 'Cats paid back KU for its earlier 71-68 win over K-State on Jan. 28.

"It felt great," Bonner said of her all-around performance against KU. "The crowd was great and it felt like I was back in high school."

Back in high school is where it all began for a woman who would average 30 points, 14 rebounds, four blocked shots and four steals per game during a brilliant career at St. Louis Southwest High School. She admits she hasn't always been so productive on the court.

"When I started playing, I didn't have any skills," said Bonner, who wanted to be a cheerleader during her high school years. "But my coach said, 'You know something, big girl, I'm going to work with you and make something out of you.' I just laughed at him."

Bonner spent her freshman season as a reserve for K-State standout Tammie Romstadt, but she still managed playing time in 31 games.

"My defense was horrible," said Bonner in reference to her first collegiate contest. "I had to do a lot of work on that."

Bonner worked and made great strides during last season's sophomore campaign, where she started in all 32 games, was selected to the second-team all-Big Eight squad and also was selected to the first-team all-tournament squad in the Big Eight post-season playoffs. She also was chosen to attend the 1982 National Sports Festival, where she averaged eight points and 4.8 rebounds.

Those accomplishments are just scratching the surface of Bonner's talent, said Head Coach Lynn Hickey.

"She's just so powerful and has great quickness," Hickey said. "I

By The Associated Press

A federal judge has opened the door to undergraduates seeking to play pro football, and Marcus Dupree apparently will be the first to walk through it and into the United States Football League.

In a ruling made public Wednesday, U.S. District Court Judge Laughlin Waters said the USFL rule against college underclassmen constitutes a "group boycott" in violation of antitrust law.

It came out of a suit filed by former Arizona punter Bob Boris, who sought to play in the USFL although his class had not graduated.

He sued in August, six months after USFL Commissioner Chet Simmons made an exception to the league's rule in 1983, its inaugural season, and allowed the New Jersey Generals to sign Herschel Walker, the Heisman laureate from Georgia. This year, Boris, 25, was signed by the Oklahoma Outlaws. He punted for them in Sunday's season opener.

Often last year, after Dupree had dropped out of the University of Oklahoma, Simmons said he would not allow a USFL team to sign him. Dupree later enrolled at Southern Mississippi, but when the NCAA ruled him ineligible for football this year, he dropped out again.

He is not draft-eligible until 1986. But the USFL also has a territorial draft and rights to current and former Oklahoma players belong to the Generals. Trade discussions between them and the New Orleans Breakers are under way. But Dupree acknowledged Wednesday he is a day or two away from officially signing with the Breakers.

really think Angie has proven that she's one of the great centers in the country."

The Bonner that is a "warm, sweet person with a humorous attitude," and a person who has "a lot of class about herself," is quite different when she steps on a basketball floor.

"On the court I'm vicious," Bonner said. "You have to learn to be tough. It's just part of the competition."

And Bonner's seen plenty of that competition and will see plenty more, especially when the Missouri Lady Tigers come to Ahearn Field House on Saturday. K-State must defeat MU, who beat the Lady 'Cats 66-62 on Feb. 8, if they hope to clinch a tie for the conference title.

"KU is a rival, but to me, Missouri is more of a rival," Bonner said in reference to Saturday's contest. "I just hope I can have the same state of mind, be just as fired up and have the same intensity I did in the KU game."

If the Lady 'Cats play to the potential Bonner knows they have, Missouri will be just one in a long line of teams that will suffer defeat.

"We tend to have our lapses," she said, "but if we played as a team for 40 minutes, nobody would beat us."

is similar to one used by the National Football League and the Canadian Football League.

Jay Moyer, counsel to NFL Commissioner Pete Rozelle, said the NFL would not change its rule. He stressed that Boris could be considered "an exception" since he didn't begin college until he was 21.

In his ruling on Boris's case, Waters said any immediate appeal "may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation." John L'Estrange, Boris's lawyer, said, "We are going to oppose any attempt to appeal the decision and we are continuing our preparation for the trial in September."

Asked how the order will affect professional football, L'Estrange said, "I really can't comment on that."

Boris would have finished his fourth year in college this spring, but he left in the fall of 1982 and signed with Professional Sports Management Inc., forfeiting further college eligibility.

L'Estrange said the USFL waived its eligibility rule for Boris last November, making him eligible to play this season. He signed with the Los Angeles Express, was cut and then signed by the Outlaws.

Let's see some good old sportsmanship

Teams used to win with style.

Some of the great teams of the past who won often with a certain dignity. Coach John Wooden's UCLA teams of the 1960s and early 1970s routinely captured NCAA basketball titles, yet they always showed a respect for their beaten opponents.

And when they lost they showed grace. After UCLA's 88-game winning streak was broken by Notre Dame during the 1973-1974 season, the Bruins didn't complain and act like bad sports, they just came back later that season and beat the Irish handily.

But today that sense of sportsmanship and style seems to have fallen by the wayside. Teams today show an attitude that can be termed simply as "in your face." Today it just isn't good enough to beat a team, it seems teams have to humiliate opponents along the way if they are to be successful — to gain public recognition.

I think this attitude grew up in professional wrestling. It seems whenever you flip the channels and All-Star wrestling is on, there is some big slob trying to tell the viewer how great of a person he is — the biggest, strongest, baddest wrestler in the world.

It was probably heavyweight

TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

fighter Muhammad Ali that legitimized this way of thinking into more conventional sports. Boxers in the past used some self-promotion in their careers, but that was out of the necessity to get fights and make a living. But with Ali's "I'm the greatest" slogan, he brought self-promotion into a higher form of obnoxiousness — one that caught the fancy of American society and brought about the advent of the "Me" generation of the 1970s.

Today that attitude is present in all forms of sport, college or professional — whatever the game. In this year's Super Bowl, both teams used self-aggrandizement to the hilt. The Washington Redskins had their Smurfs and Fun Bunch and the Los Angeles Raiders have for years personified the NFL's dark force, using a pillage-and-plunder outlook on the game.

In college basketball, the "in-your-face" attitude has caught on with several teams, often at the expense of sportsmanship. The University of Houston, with its Phi Slamma Jamma fraternity, showed it isn't just enough to shoot a basket to score, you have to take the ball and ram it down your opponent's throat.

And at Georgetown, the "Beast of the East," the Hoyas' center Patrick Ewing, tells people not to come drive toward his side of the floor or he'll probably knock you into the cheap seats. In a game on television recently, with Georgetown holding a big lead, the 7-foot Ewing got himself thrown out of the game after grabbing a 6-foot guard and throwing him to the floor.

However, it was the University of Oklahoma Sooners that gave the greatest exhibition of a lack of class in last Wednesday's overtime win over the University of Kansas Jayhawks.

With the Sooners holding a 10-point lead late in the overtime period, several of the Oklahoma players began taunting the KU crowd with the "We're No. 1" sign, signaling their clinching of at least a tie for the Big Eight Conference championship. The KU crowd retaliated by throwing whatever they could grab at the Oklahoma bench.

The Sooners' behavior in Lawrence wouldn't be that bad if events like these hadn't happened before with the OU team.

At Colorado, the Sooners got into fights with spectators after taunting the crowd following a close overtime win. And even the K-State fans booed the Sooners lustily following their win because of the actions of the Oklahoma players.

It's time someone reminded the "in your face" artists of the reason people play games in the first place. In the Big Eight, it's time for Commissioner Carl James to remind the Sooners of good sportsmanship by handing down reprimands for their actions at KU.

Perhaps stricter enforcement of rules won't stop bad sportsmanship, but maybe it will remind people that style, rather than self-aggrandizement, is the way true sportsmen should act.

Design project focuses on 'real world'

By BEVERLY MILLER
Collegian Reporter

To K-State architecture students, Design Weekend means intense concentration, working into the wee hours of the morning, loss of sleep and a sense of camaraderie — not unlike their usual design studio experience. But this weekend gives them something more, a taste of the "real world."

During Design Weekend, third-, fourth- and fifth-year architecture students, working with practicing architects, spend approximately four days developing hypothetical plans for a predetermined project site, Eugene Kremer, professor and head of the Department of Architecture, said.

"It brings students, faculty and practicing architects into direct working relationships to address significant civic-design problems," he said.

With five or six students to a team, each team works with a practicing architect who may act as team leader, as facilitator or just as team member. The exercise is supervised by the K-State architecture faculty and organized with the assistance of local Kansas and Missouri units of the American Institute of Architects, Kremer said.

Design Weekend was initiated during the spring semester of 1978. An early project was remodeling of the Riley County Courthouse. By 1981, the teams branched out to include other regional communities in their projects.

In that year, they studied the potential for preserving and revitalizing the central business district in Chanute. In 1982, they explored possibilities for an expansion of the Kansas City, Mo., Nelson Art Gallery-Atkins Museum. Last year, plans were developed for a five-block section of Washington Avenue near the Convention Center in St. Louis.

This year's weekend, called Design Weekend '84, began Wednesday and will continue through Sunday. It will focus on the Old Town District in Wichita. From an educational point of view, K-State instructors selected it as the most promising among several possible sites.

"The Old Town District, bounded approximately by First, Topeka, William and Mosley streets, may seem a bit rundown, but it has a lot of underlying architectural character," Carsten Jensen, assistant professor of architecture and coordinator of Design Weekend '84, said.

"The area contains old mercantile buildings, many of them built at the turn of the century. And there's an old hotel and the original Wichita railroad depot. The quality of the buildings is high — they are solidly built."

The site was especially attractive with the recent formation of the Old Town Association, a group actively promoting redevelopment of the area.

"They succeeded in getting the city to underwrite a market potential study by a national firm. The consultants made a number of suggestions which could generate excellent projects for our students," Jensen said.

"The plans the students and professionals develop will not be adopted for development," Kremer said. "Rather we would expect the plans to give the Old Town Association and the city a better idea of design options available."

The public presentation of the work designed for Wichita is scheduled for 11:30 a.m. Sunday in the lobby of the former Union Station in Old Town, Wichita. Each team gives a 15-minute presentation and is then subjected to critique by an eight-member judging team comprised of citizens, academicians and design professionals.

William Miller, associate professor of architecture who has been involved with Design Weekend for the past three years, said more than educational concerns enter into the selection of project sites.

"One of our requirements for selecting a project site is that the projects have a public service aspect — architectural or environmental problems within a community which no architect is currently addressing."

"A case in point was the Nelson project in Kansas City. The Nelson people said the museum expansion could not include the building's long, sloping south lawn, which is considered part of the building's classical image. Some teams chose to ignore this restriction and offered plans which used the area without destroying the setting or the image."

Such restrictions serve to bring a quality of reality to a project, a quality sometimes missing in the usual design studio situation.

"Design Weekend is more like going out into the community and beginning to be involved in architectural work in a manner closer to reality...even if you can't get that much done," Paul Wilhelms, a fifth-year student in architecture, said. "The projects are large, and you are to generate a lot of ideas even though each team will present only one or two."

"Besides being a good architectural opportunity, it has helped me in another way," Jonathan Knight, fifth-year student in architecture, said. "To solve the (designing) problem, I have developed the skill of thinking on my feet, so to speak."

"Last year the architect assigned to our group came by before and after work, so we worked mostly on our own. But as it turned out, we managed very well without his supervision."

The weekend activities do, however, follow the form of what both practicing architects and architectural students call a "charrette." A charrette, Wilhelms said, is a small cart which was used by 15th or 16th century Paris architectural students to carry their models and drawings to school for their final presentations. The two or three days before those presentations was a time of intense effort and concentration, and final touches were often being added as the cart was pulled through the streets.

Design charrettes may be held several times each year and focus on local design projects and problems. The last design charrette was held Feb. 11-12 and had the teams focusing their efforts on Manhattan's Sunset Park-Zoo.

Five professionals and eleven students, working in five teams, worked on plans for the underutilized, southeast corner of the zoo.

Working with Tim Vanatta, director of Parks and Recreation, the parks board of advisers and parks staff, the local chapter of architects organized the project to focus on the need for a master plan for long-range improvements.

"We were seeking an overall comprehension scheme; one which gives direction to various future projects so each would have a place in the master plan," Gene Ernst, professor of architecture and a design charrette organizer, said.

The teams worked with the actual 1984 Capital Improvements budget of $30,000 for the zoo and a recent Lions Club offer of resources and labor.

Police seek tip on thefts

Sometime between 4 p.m. Feb. 18 and 1 p.m. Feb. 19, someone stole miscellaneous items from vehicles parked at Manhattan Motors, 1826 Tuttle Creek Blvd.

Someone entered the car lot, opened the hood of a 1978 Z-28 Camaro, removed the mounting bolts and took the hood, which was dark red with a small plastic scoop. Replacement cost will exceed $500.

During the past month, there have been other incidents at the same lot such as theft of a drive shaft, the attempted theft of another drive shaft and some vandalism.

Those who have information on this or any other crime may call Crime Stoppers at 539-7777. Callers will remain anonymous and may qualify for cash rewards of up to $1,000.

Senators query Meese on prejudice, finances

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Edwin Meese, President Reagan's nominee for attorney general, came under sharp questioning Thursday from senators concerned about his commitment to ending racial discrimination and whether he would be the president's or the people's lawyer.

Partisan squabbling marked the first day of the Senate Judiciary Committee's hearing on the nomination of Meese, Reagan's counselor and close friend, to replace Attorney General William French Smith.

Meese pledged to pursue "even-handed justice and equal protection of the law for all citizens regardless of race, color, sex, creed, background or economic circumstances." Meese also said he would avoid "partisan political activity" as attorney general.

But the pledges failed to satisfy Democrats and one Republican, Sen. Charles Mathias of Maryland. They questioned Meese closely on his role in overturning an Internal Revenue Service policy against giving racially discriminatory schools tax exemptions, his personal finances, and his relations with Reagan's political supporters.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., noted the change in IRS policy, Meese's remark that some Americans join food lines because the food is free, and his opposition to government-paid lawyers for the poor.

"I'm concerned about the fairness issue," Kennedy said.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., observed that the decision to change the IRS policy came after the administration received letters from Rep. Trent Lott, R-Miss., and generated internal memos noting that the Republican 1984 campaign platform called for the change.

Biden asked whether Meese advised the president on the legal ramifications "or on a purely political basis." Meese said he just passed on recommendations from the Justice and Treasury Departments.

Chairman Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., disclosed that the Army's inspector general concluded in a classified July, 1983, report that Meese's 1981 transfer from the retired to the active Reserve violated Army rules and that he was unqualified for a 1982 promotion, but that Meese played no improper role in either decision.

Meese said in both cases: "I stated I wanted to be absolutely sure there was no favoritism or bending of the rules in my case."

Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, pointed out that in the spring of 1982 Meese was $40,000 in arrears in payments on several mortgages. Meese had missed eight payments on one mortgage and 15 payments apiece on two other mortgages. Metzenbaum read a letter showing Meese's San Diego banker did not foreclose on the three mortgages and instead offered Meese a new $21,000 fourth mortgage.

Meese said, "I didn't have any special consideration. Financial institutions try to work with clients, particularly those they have worked with for a long time and in whom they have confidence. They had ample security" in the form of his Virginia and California homes.

Meese defended loans which he had received since coming to the White House. He acknowledged that up to $80,000 in unsecured loans had come from J.R. McKean, a California accountant who was later appointed to the Postal Service Board of Governors.

Meese said he was in a White House personnel meeting which considered candidates for the job but added, "A colleague said that McKean fitted the qualification and his name was turned over. It was not my suggestion that he be appointed."

Drinking-age bill sparks campaign by campus ASK

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

In an effort to stop a bill that would raise the drinking age from 18 to 19, the Associated Students of Kansas (ASK) is organizing a student letter-writing campaign, said Brett Lambert, campus director of the organization.

Lambert, sophomore in pre-law, said the letters are crucial to keep the drinking age from being raised to 19 or 21.

"With letters and phone calls, we'll win," he said, "without them, we'll lose."

"We've been honest and sincere; we've given them (legislators) the facts. We've done everything we can do without public outcry," he said.

A fact sheet containing information about the bill and reasons why the bill should not be passed will be distributed to living groups, Lambert said. Fact sheets also will be available at the Student Governing Association office in the Union.

The fact sheet will contain the names of the representatives and senators on the committee considering the bill and their districts, he said.

"If you live in one of the districts, write to that representative," Lambert said. "If they're not from your district, then just write to the committee."

"You should just treat it like any other letter," Lambert said. "Treat them like one of your friends or your parents or whoever you want, just be honest with them."

On the fact sheet are three reasons why the bill should not be passed. The first reason is enforcement.

"There is no possible way this state can enforce the law if it passes it," Lambert said. "They (the Kansas Legislature and law enforcement agencies) can't enforce the laws they have now concerning DWI (driving while intoxicated). It will just make law-breakers of everyone."

Another argument against the bill is that people under the age of 21 will continue to drink, except they will no longer be drinking in a "controlled environment," Lambert said.

"You will take all of the alcohol out of the bars, or controlled environments, and put it in cars or homes," Lambert said. "In Michigan, where they raised the drinking age to 21, there are indications that in the near future there will be more traffic fatalities due to drunk drivers than there were before they passed the bill."

The third point in opposition to the bill regards education.

"If they pass this bill, education is kaput," Lambert said. "The state is not going to fund alcohol education and awareness programs if it's (drinking) against the law in the first place. We don't have a program to

Legislators voice approval to ease Wolf Creek rates

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas House on Thursday gave first-round approval to a bill aimed at easing the rate shock electricity consumers will feel when the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant near Burlington begins operation next year.

The bill, tentatively approved on a voice vote, gives the Kansas Corporation Commission flexibility to determine which portion of the power to be generated by the Wolf Creek plant is excess capacity and whether bad management decisions led to that excess capacity being created.

The major feature of the bill prohibits the KCC from ever passing onto ratepayers the interest charges on that portion of the generating capacity which was declared excess when the plant first came on line. Instead, the utilities would have to absorb the interest charges on that excess capacity until the power is needed.

The bill also would allow the KCC to approve a phase-in plan for gradually adding to the rate bases the $2.7 billion dollars the Faculty dispute equality of hiring plans

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

In the wake of a number of grassroots efforts to revitalize affirmative action hiring procedures, several schools are reviewing their Affirmative Action programs. But there is some disagreement as to whether K-State should do the same.

According to a recent College Press Service article, many schools are recommitting themselves to affirmative action due to the Reagan administration's "pull-back from enforcement of civil rights laws."

Dorothy Thompson, director of the K-State Affirmative Action program, said, "My feeling is we have had an ongoing affirmative action program here, and that therefore the need for revitalization is not so great, if there is any need at all."

However, Veryl Switzer, assistant vice president for student affairs and chairman of the Minority Committee for Affirmative Action, does not agree.

"I think there have been various units that have made a good faith effort to involve minority faculty and staff," Switzer said. "We (the committee) were not as effective as I wanted us to be in utilizing minority faculty and staff, particularly the teaching faculty, as well as other administrative roles."

"I'm certainly not satisfied with the progress made in utilizing minority faculty and staff in reference to the availability in the national market place," Switzer said.

There is usually a "network system" at work when recruiting applicants for a job, he said.

"You hear of a job opening up and you call your friends involving the vacancies," Switzer said. "For minorities, the network system is not effective in terms of knowing someone at another institution in another state."

The recruitment activities

Affirmative Action policy scrutinized developed by K-State Affirmative Action are designed to locate qualified minority and women candidates by contacting minority and women's caucuses, committees and professional associations, in addition to graduate schools with a significant number of minority enrollments.

Involving women and members of minority groups in the recruiting and reviewing of candidates for academic appointments is another way the program attracts minorities and women.

"I think we have recruited widely and selected carefully in our affirmative action plan."

— Dorothy Thompson

"I think we have recruited widely and selected carefully on our affirmative action plan," Thompson said. "In some areas for both (minorities and women), there are still very small supplies of individuals who have the necessary background and training required. The pools (job applicant pools) have very few blacks and Hispanics in them."

"We have certainly made some progress in various areas of employment," she said. "The progress has been better in regard to increasing the number of women employees than increasing the number of minority employees."

Linda Morse, chairman of the Committee on the Status of Women, agreed with Thompson.

"There's always room for improvement," Morse said. "Overall, the program has been successful. It's brought home to every department and employee their obligations under the laws."

"There is a lot of room for interpretation; very seldom are credentials exactly alike," Morse said. "I would hope in a situation where the credentials were very similar, they (departments) would hire the person who would most probably fulfill the affirmative action needs of the University."

Morse said although the University is not an innovator, she thinks it is on the right track.

"I think K-State is a conservative institution," Morse said. "We aren't the leaders in the whole situation. We don't stick our neck out a lot, but we do develop a good solid program."

Thompson said the program is working, but the process is slow and gradual.

"The supply of women and minorities in areas where we haven't seen them before is increasing," Thompson said. "There are more women in the pools in (the field of) agriculture and a few more minorities and women in pools in engineering and architecture and design. The pools are changing, but the change is gradual. It isn't dramatic."

Switzer said he still thinks there needs to be a greater effort to recruit minorities.

"It takes a concerted and strong commitment to do the type of recruiting required to encourage application by a larger percentage of minorities," Switzer said. "It will require a more concerted effort because of the economy. There are limited new positions being provided due to cutbacks and the state of affairs at institutions of higher learning."

"You have to compete with the marketplace," Switzer said. "If we don't continue to upgrade faculty salaries, it will make it harder to diversify the faculty and staff."

Thompson said part of the problem in recruiting minorities is the location of the school.

"Minority recruitment and retention is the biggest problem we have," Thompson said.

Switzer said that, historically, K-State's midwestern location has been viewed as a basis for failures to recruit minorities.

"I think that's a myth," Switzer said. "We have quality members at the University who are not from the Midwest and have made the transition without a lot of problems."

"I'm certainly not satisfied with the progress made in utilizing minority faculty and staff..."

— Veryl Switzer

Switzer said most of the people who leave the University leave due to promotions or upward mobility opportunities. He said there are occasions when faculty leave because the community environment is not what they may have perceived before coming here, but he said it is more noticeable in minority faculty because of their small numbers.

"I would like to see the entire University take a real strong look at the current utilization of black and Hispanic faculty," Switzer said. "If they look across the board, they'll find a consistent under-utilization of minorities by classifications."

Switzer said he thinks the Affirmative Action program at K-State needs to be updated and improved.

"I think we have to provide our own impetus in revitalizing the affirmative action concept," Switzer said. "We don't need to wait on outside agencies to dictate to us what needs to be done in-house. We need to critically review the past efforts to design a system that will be more effective in the future."

Honduran political leader to speak on democracy

Efrain Diaz, representative to the Honduran Congress and member of the Christian Democratic Party of Honduras, will present the next Lou Douglas Lecture on Public Affairs on Monday.

Diaz, an economics professor at Honduras National University, has served as undersecretary of agriculture. His lecture, "The Big Pine Operation: What It Means for Honduran Democracy," will be at 7:30 p.m. in the K-State Union Forum Hall. Admission is free.

Theme for the 1984 lecture series, sponsored by the University for Man and other campus and community department and organizations, is "The Americas in Crisis." The series will explore issues affecting the political hotbed of Central America, said Pat Killian, coordinator of the series. The first lecture, held Feb. 14, featured Sen. Nancy Kassenbaum, who headed the U.S. delegation which monitored El Salvador's 1982 elections.

Diaz received a master's degree in agricultural economics from K-State in 1969. He, his wife and son will be spending five days in Kansas, Killian said.

A dinner, also open to the public, will precede the lecture at 6 p.m. in the Union Sunflower Room. Reservations should be made at the University for Man.

Senate appoints chairman, hears plans for Nichols art

Tracy Turner, junior in economics, was elected Student Senate chairman at the Senate meeting Thursday.

Steve Line, senior in finance, and Mark Jones, junior in pre-design professions, ran against Turner for the position. Turner will be sworn in March 8.

Nominations for Senate vice chairman and Faculty Senate representative were taken. Kay Deeveer, education senator, and Lawrence Tsen, arts and sciences senator, were nominated for vice chairman. Keith Westervelt, agriculture senator, was nominated for Faculty Senate representative. Elections for these positions will be next week.

Jerry Katlin, student body president, reported on the Nichols Hall Art Committee. The committee was formed last semester to purchase artwork for Nichols.

"In 1975, Student Senate set up a $10,000 fund for Nichols Gym," he said. "The money was to be used for an art gallery which was in the original renovation plans."

The plans for the renovation now in progress do not include an art gallery, and the money is being used for an artwork for the east wall of Nichols, Katlin said.

"Brochures are being drawn up and sent out, asking artists to submit slides of their work," he said. "The committee will select the finalists, and they will submit models. The goal is to get an artist commissioned this summer."

Katlin said he thinks the artwork can be ready for the scheduled opening of Nichols in April 1985.

owners say will be spent building Wolf Creek.

A final vote is scheduled for this morning on the bill as lawmakers in the lower chamber try to find an acceptable way to limit projected massive rate increases caused by the plant starting operation next year.

Estimates of how much those rate increases would be — as projected by the KCC and two of the three utilities which own the plant — range from 50 percent initially to 234 percent if there is a 10-year phase-in of all costs.

The first-round approval came after more than three hours of debate and more than a dozen attempts to change the bill. In fact, the House flirted with a proposal by Rep. Sam Roper, D-Girard, to prohibit utility owners of the power plant from charging customers for any of the costs of the $2.7 billion plant until technology is developed for permanent disposal of nuclear waste.

However, after a three-hour recess, Republican legislators sympathetic to the three utility owners of Wolf Creek successfully launched a counterattack and gutted the nuclear waste provision as it stood. The Republicans substituted a less harsh amendment, offered by Rep. Robert Vancrum, R-Overland Park, which essentially cancelled the effect of the waste storage amendment.

Roper's amendment would effectively have prevented the plant from beginning operation because the costs of the Wolf Creek plant could not have been passed on to customers until the federal government developed a plan for permanent disposal of high-level radioactive wastes which will be generated by the plant.

The Roper amendment was accepted on a tense 80-43 vote. The vote was just 67-54 before several legislators, fearful of having their votes misinterpreted by constituents, switched and supported it.

The same switching of votes occurred later on the Vancrum amendment, which gutted Roper's work and cancelled out the waste feature. Vancrum's amendment passed 65-59, with just five Democrats joining 60 Republicans in supporting it. The original vote was 73-51 but eight Republicans, including six from the Sedgwick County delegation, changed their votes when they saw it was safe to vote against it without endangering the amendment.

Vancrum's amendment simply says the cost of the plant can be included in the rate bases if the Nuclear Regulatory Commission licenses the Wolf Creek plant to temporarily store high level radioactive waste for 20 years. The amendment essentially buys 20 years time to deal with the permanent disposal question. It means the utilities would be able to put only 20 years' worth of waste disposal costs into their rate bases.

Before adopting the Vancrum amendment, Democrats in the House forced a roll-call vote on a KCC-backed proposal which gave the commission total discretion in deciding whether interest costs on excess capacity should be included in the rate base. It failed on a 25-96 vote.

The votes on the Roper amendment and against the permissive KCC-backed bill represented a significant protest by lawmakers against what some called "the obvious mismanagement and poor decisions" made by Wolf Creek's three utility owners, Kansas Gas and Electric Co. of Wichita, Kansas City Power and Light Co. and Kansas Electric Power Cooperative Inc.

Legislators are fearful of facing voters in this year's elections with applications for massive rate increases pending before the commission. They want to be on record as doing something significant to blunt the impact of those rate hikes.

Early in the debate, the House rejected an amendment giving the Corporation Commission authority to "mothball" Wolf Creek nuclear power plant and deny charging any of its costs to consumers.

"It's a cowardly decision," Lambert said. "They think a law will solve all the problems, and it just won't."

Lambert said he also would collect the letters of students who are in favor of passing the bill.

"Even if students are for passing the bill, they can give their letters to me. I'll send them just as quickly as the other letters," he said. "I just want the students to be heard and the Legislators to know we're here and we care."

Lambert said the letters will be checked before they are sent to legislators to be sure they don't contain anything offensive. Name-calling or obscene language will be considered offensive, he said. He also said students have the right to send such letters on their own.

"I'll take an offensive letter back to the person who wrote it and tell them they cannot send it under the guise of the Associated Students of Kansas, or that they can change it," he said. "I cannot begin to explain how one irresponsible letter or comment can kill 10 years of work."

'Late Nighter' to offer entertainment variety

The Union will not lock its doors today until the wee hours of the morning so students may participate in the activities of the "Late Nighter with the K-State Union."

Union Program Council Special Events Committee has planned various events to begin at 4:30 p.m. today and continue until 2 a.m.

Among the activities will be two "Flashdance" look-a-like contests scheduled for 6:30 p.m. and 9 p.m. Winners of each contest will receive free passes for the movie of their choice this semester.

The movie "Flashdance" will be shown at 7 p.m. in Forum Hall.

Live entertainment will be provided by Robert York, a comedian and juggler at 7 p.m. in the Union Cat-skeller.

Contemporary singer and guitarist Jeff Eubanks is scheduled to perform at 9 and 11 p.m. in the Union Stateroom.

An improvisational group called "The Complex" will perform in the Stateroom, where food specials will be served by the Union Food Service.

Other activities for the night's entertainment include: moonlight bowling with purple pins, a billiards tournament and casino-type games, all of which will be run by UPC members. Winners at the "casino," persons with the most fake money by closing time, will receive prizes.

KSDB radio station will provide music throughout the night outside the Stateroom.

Beth Glendenning, chairman of Special Events Committee, said the event is a first for UPC.

"It's new, so we really don't know what to expect," Glendenning said. "I think it's something the students will want to pursue next year."

Glendenning said the late nighter is replacing a major concert this semester. Next year's committee may decide to have a concert in addition to the late nighter, or just sponsor one of the two. It depends on the success of tonight's activities and financing next year, she said.

Carlin has choice on safety bill

Governor John Carlin could soon make a big mistake that may cost lives.

Last year the Kansas Legislature set out to reduce automobile fatalities by implementing stiffer penalties for drunk driving. This year the Legislature is regressing by proposing elimination of automobile inspection laws.

The bill originated in a House committee and has been passed by both the House and Senate. It was presented Feb. 27 to Gov. Carlin, who is expected to sign the bill.

"What we have here is a sick cow. We ought to make it well or shoot it," Rep. Marvin Barkis, D-Paola, House minority leader, said in an article in the Topeka Capital-Journal.

Advocates of the bill claim the inspection law is ineffective. Some believe by eliminating the law, the government could cut down on bureaucracy and in turn save money.

"It requires nine troopers and a staff of four administrative people to operate the inspection program," said bill advocate Rep. Bob Arbuthnot, R-Haddam, a member of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Inspection stations only receive $5 of the inspection fee. This is hardly enough to defray costs, the article said.

Opponents of the bill argue the "sick cow" should be beefed up, not slaughtered. They claim the elimination of the law will increase the possibility of accidents and death.

Kansas requires cars to be inspected every time the title is transferred. Theoretically, a 1970 model might not have been inspected since its purchase.

Colorado and Missouri require automobile safety inspection every year. They are obviously proponents of safe driving.

But "conservative" Kansas is again ready to sacrifice innocent lives for the sake of saving money. Carlin, however, should seriously consider the effects of such a measure on safety in Kansas before he signs the bill.

The "sick cow" shouldn't be sacrificed. Carlin holds the power to either kill this bill or fatten the safety inspection law.

Victory depends on party unity

After disappointing finishes in the New Hampshire primary, both Sen. Alan Cranston and Sen. Ernest Hollings announced this week they would withdraw from the race for the Democratic presidential nomination.

"I know the difference between reality and dreams. I know when to dream and how to count votes," Cranston said.

"Well, nothing happened to me on the way to the White House," Hollings said when he announced his decision to withdraw.

Former Florida Gov. Reubin Askew is considering dropping out of the race also. He said he will decide today whether or not to continue his campaign.

Former Sen. George McGovern said he also will quit the race unless he finishes first or second in the Massachusetts primary March 13.

What used to be a crowded field of candidates indicates how eager the Democrats are to provide an alternative to another four years of Ronald Reagan in the White House. Cranston perfectly embodied this attitude:

"I have helped make the nuclear danger a centerpiece of the indictment against Ronald Reagan, which we Democrats will present to the American people this fall.

"I shall continue to push with all the force of my being the urgency of arms control and the defeat of Ronald Reagan," Cranston said after he announced his withdrawal. "I shall not let up the pressure on either my fellow Democrats or on our adversary in the White House."

It is discrediting, however, that such a consensus against Reagan exists among Democrats when the party cannot decide which candidate could best undermine the president's re-election chances.

In fact, the more internal conflict among Democrats continues, the less opportunity the party has to unify its forces against Reagan. And this pleases the Reagan camp. Vice President George Bush said it best:

"The more things keep churning around, the longer there is uncertainty on the other side, the better it is for us."

The long string of state primaries before the summer convention will continue to weed out the less popular candidates. But if the party fails to unify soon behind one candidate, the election will occur before the nominee can muster enough support to effectively challenge Reagan.

Paperwork hides aura of power

WASHINGTON — There are days when the glamour dies — when the menage a trois ebbs and the acidic distaste of reality is oppressive.

These are the moments when the simultaneous presence of George Schultz, Jesse Helms and Howard Baker at a committee hearing fail to impress me. For what distinguishes one person from another save different ambitions and fate's resolve?

When transcendent aspirations disintegrate, even the Capitol resembles a pre-molded, cement facsimile of grandeur.

The superpower has bared its hidden entrails — she's a paper mill. Nothing more than a mechanized secretarial cesspool staffed by over-educated, moderate-achieving bureaucratic elite.

Paper is everywhere: from the computer that regurgitates identical cliched replies to thousands of constituents; to the cutting room, where the man with the Walkman headphones, dirty t-shirt, and dejected attitude trims the computerized letters to authentic size; and on the floor of the wrapping room, where the shy clerk with the eternal cigarettes prepares the pieces to be mailed.

NANCY MALIR
Washington Correspondent

The Library of Congress is a paper warehouse, overrun by interns seeking answers to constituent mail. Each committee has a document room. Each committee staff has files upon files. And each Congressman has his own personal paper collection.

Increased knowledge and constituent awareness has created this mill. Research is the name of the game for everyone from department heads to ambitious interns. The masses want answers to Social Security questions, solutions to the Lebanese crisis and a sympathetic ear to hear their tale of woe.

If the question is general, one letter copied for hundreds is the response — hence the papercutters and mailswappers. If the query is more specific, the answer is achieved by looking for it — hence the quantity of research material.

So cut and dry. So much drudgery and processing. Yet there seems to be no alternative to mass mailings and researched responses, the content of which are soon forgotten.

There are too many constituents, too much acquired knowledge, too little time to allow for personal warmth and non-mechanized solutions.

Yet the aura high school civics books portray is there, if one has the spiritual capability of rising above the doldrum of the common and the mundane to seek it out.

This is a world apart. These Congressmen, these administrators, these bureaucrats hold power over millions. What they say, do and think affects the entire world.

And it all happens in Washington. As one professor told me before I left, "Being in Washington in this point in time is like being in Rome at the time of Caesar."

Romance has to be felt, not seen — even here.

A better solution than world government

Editor,
Re: Brad Russell's column, "World government offers solution," in the Feb. 29 Collegian:

A wise man once said, "Even with sincerity, you have to deal with reality." I must agree, world government might be something nice to have, but realistically speaking, it could and should never happen. The world in which we live has and always will be pluralistic in nature, and controlling certain world issues will not guarantee the problems of humanity will be solved.

Concerning world hunger and global thermonuclear war as a threat to survival, we must realistically ask ourselves what our country is doing to prevent such issues.

For instance, world hunger. We may say we're doing all we can to prevent such a famine, but if we are honest, we see that the United States is the most wasteful nation in the world today.

We have people who support a starving child through sponsorship, yet some of the same people are pro-abortion.

Moreover, the issue of thermonuclear war also needs to be looked at realistically. We're at a point and time in history where governments are being controlled by terrorist factions. World government could not prevent a nuclear war because we live in such a racist society. Common sense tells us this.

Russell quoted Einstein: "Do I fear the tyranny of world government? Of course I do. But I fear still more the coming of another war." I must say one of Sigmund Freud's students stated that the two basic instincts in human society are the quests for power and pleasure. Before a war can be controlled, the evil within man's heart must be controlled first. This is what will cause thermonuclear war — evil from within.

The final solution to world economic, political, social and religious issues does not lie within a world government, nor a humanistic feeling, nor the "New Age Movement," nor the antichrist. The solution this world needs is something that has remained constant in this ever-changing world for the past 2,000 years; something that can take care of the evil from within the depths of the human heart — Christ.

'Nuke KU' only a triviality

Editor,
Re: Anne Graue's letter, "Humor Abuse," in the Feb. 27 Collegian, and Laura Parker's letter, "Poor Humor," in the Feb. 29 Collegian:

I feel I am as concerned about the threat of nuclear conflict as these two women, but I fail to see the point of their criticisms. If "Nuke KU" is in poor taste, why would "Beat KU" be better when thousands of children and spouses are beat every year right here in the good ole United States?

I'm sure their intentions are right on track, but aren't we "educated" enough to not focus on the trivial? Let the slogan do what it was intended to do: not endorse the nuclear arms race, but promote K-State spirit.

Jackson could learn from example

WASHINGTON — I think sometimes of the Rev. Bailey Smith, the former president of the Southern Baptists, who once remarked that "God does not hear the prayers of a Jew." Smith was immediately denounced as anti-Semite, but cooler — and wiser — heads prevailed.

Instead of being scorned by prestigious Jews, he was adopted by them, engaged in dialogue and sent to Israel. He came out of the experience a chastised and changed man.

I am reminded of Smith because several other editors and reporters from the Washington Post and I had an hour-and-a-half meeting with the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson. The subject was the allegation that Jackson called Jews "Hymies" and New York "Hymietown."

Of the truth of this allegation there should be no doubt. Two Washington Post reporters heard him use the terms on two occasions. Nevertheless, Jackson has variously characterized the charge as "not accurate" and not something he can recall. This is the Watergate answer par excellence — the non-denial denial.

But Jackson went further. Instead of acknowledging that he made an unfortunate remark, and saying that it was a term he heard in his youth and did not know was pejorative, Jackson slipped the issue and instead tried to turn the tables on Jews.

It was they who were "hounding" him. It was they who were "attacking him." It was they who were "harassing him." It was they who had threatened him and his family. Asked who the "they" were, Jackson collapsed into vagueness. Nevertheless, he said that the campaign against him was "too orchestrated to be accidental," and he blamed Jews "in general."

RICHARD COHEN
Columnist

The sad fact is that there has been a campaign against Jackson by some Jews. One of them is the notorious Rabbi Meyer Kahane, a zealot who was even too much for former Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin. Kahane has been arrested in Israel and is an anathema to the American-Jewish community. Countless Jewish leaders have denounced him and his vitriolic and hateful campaign against Jackson.

Jackson, though, made no mention of these denunciations. Instead, he accused Jewish leaders — and the media — of a conspiracy of silence, saying that the acts and the alleged silence have produced a "climate." So far, he said, he has turned the other cheek, refused to condemn or strike back, but others are neither as patient nor as forgiving. Sooner or later, he said, someone will retaliate.

I listened to all this in disbelief. What was startling was not that a presidential candidate thought this way, but that he would talk this way. Lots of people engage in group-think. They see an individual — Jackson, Kahane — and see something else, a race, an ethnic group. To them, everyone is a representative of some group to which they were born. This is the essence of prejudice — the reason why to the white bigot the black mugger represents most blacks while the black school teacher is an exception.

In fairness to Jackson, he did not carry his argument to its ultimate conclusion. He refused to claim or cite an actual Jewish conspiracy, pointing out that there are Jews in his campaign and that, at any rate, he lacked any evidence of collusion. But he did confuse the tactics of Kahane with legitimate political criticism and concerns, stirring it all into a pot to which he affixed the label "Jew." What was clear was that Jackson was not clear. He is either a man drifting into prejudice or a man coming out of it.

This is why I think of Smith. He said that he had been shaped by where he was born and his environment. He was a small-town boy from the South, and he was big enough to admit that there were many things he did not know. Others condemned Smith for anti-Semitism. He had a better explanation. He condemned himself for ignorance.

Maybe that is the case with Jackson. He is, after all, a man who has spent his life battling for civil rights. And when he talks of the problems of women, of blacks, of Hispanics and of the handicapped, it's hard to believe that all of that could be consistent with prejudice. So I think of Smith. I only wish Jackson would think of him, too.

No end 'around the bend' on this footpath

By KATHLEEN COLE
Collegian Reporter

The designation of the North Country Trail (NCT) as the newest national scenic hiking trail in March 1980 marked the beginning of the longest continuing footpath in the United States.

When completed, the trail is expected to extend 3,200 miles from its eastern end at Crown Point, N.Y., to its farthest western point, the Lewis and Clark Historic Trail at Lake Sakakawea, N.D.

Today it is the only National Scenic Trail which is not defined by some marked geological feature. There are four other trails — the Appalachian, Pacific Crest, Continental Divide and the Ice Age trail.

The trail, which rambles through New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota and North Dakota, covers diverse landscapes, points of historic and cultural interest and scenic and recreational areas.

First mention of the trail appeared in a 1965 U.S. Forest Service study of nationwide trail systems. The name "Northern Country Trail" penned in that report was later modified to "North Country Trail" in a 1966 Department of the Interior publication which served to lay the groundwork for the passage of the National Trails System Act of 1968. It was this act that designated the Appalachian and Pacific Crest as National Scenic Trails and identified 14 other routes, the NCT among them, as possible additions to the system.

ROUTE AND KEY MAP
NORTH COUNTRY NATIONAL SCENIC TRAIL

The task of evaluating the proposed additions fell to the Bureau of Outdoor Recreation (now the National Park Service). The bureau set up committees of federal, state, and local representatives from each state to recommend possible trail routes.

Results of the groups' studies were published in a 1975 report that outlined planning guidelines for locating the trail route through each state. The report suggested incorporating segments of existing trails into the new trail when possible.

The group noted that some of the best existing trails suitable for incorporating into the NCT route were already designated snowmobile trails. Likewise, they considered the fact that much of the proposed route lay within the nation's snow belt where snowmobiling is a major winter recreational activity.

The 1975 report also proposed extending the NCT route in the east to link with the Appalachian Trail system in Vermont. However, the state of Vermont opposed the idea, citing the already heavy use of the Appalachian Trail. For that reason the proposal was altered so that the NCT would not extend beyond Crown Point, N.Y.

Originally, about 340 miles of existing trails were designated for use in the development of the proposed plan. Today, nearly 800 miles of existing trails have been identified for possible incorporation into the system, which would account for 25 percent of the route's total length.

Some of the more well-known segments of trail include parts of the Old Erie Canal and Finger Lake Trails in New York, the Glacier Ridge Trail in Pennsylvania, and the Buckeye, Miami and Erie Canal trails in Ohio. Also included are existing pathways from a variety of national and state park areas such as Michigan's Porcupine Mountains Wilderness Park, Wisconsin's Copper Falls State Park, Minnesota's Paul Bunyan State Forest and North Dakota's Sheyenne National Grasslands.

While the idea remains to incorporate as much existing trail into the NCT as possible, no existing trail can officially become part of the NCT until it is certified as such by the National Park Service.

National Scenic Trails, like the NCT, are intended to be open to travel on foot for their entire length. Therefore, all certified segments of the NCT are to be open to hiking and backpacking.

The National Trails System Act of

1968 describes National Scenic Trails as "...those extended trails so located as to provide for maximum outdoor recreation potential and for the conservation and enjoyment of the nationally significant scenic, historic, natural and cultural qualities through which such trails must pass."

Completion of the NCT is expected to take many years and will require the cooperation of a variety of federal, state and local groups.

The bulk of the use of the NCT, both now and in the future, is expected to parallel the pattern of use developed on the 2,100-mile Appalachian Trail (AT). Only about 100 people hike the entire AT each year, leaving the greatest usage to short-term hikers — day and weekenders — or those hiking for a week or two.

The North Country Trail attempts to balance the needs of the less-experienced hiker with those of the long-distance hiker. With its route located so close to major metropolitan areas, the North Country Trail offers possibilities for short-term excursions that appeal to family and weekend hikers as well as long-term hikers.

Pittsburg State installs president

PITTSBURG — Dr. Donald W. Wilson was inaugurated as the sixth president of Pittsburg State University in campus ceremonies Thursday.

Wilson was welcomed to Pittsburg State by Gov. John Carlin and John G. Montgomery, chairman of the Kansas Board of Regents.

In prepared remarks, Wilson said, "10 years of destructive infighting has not served quality or learning well" at Pittsburg State. But he said he is "committed to helping a new model of cooperative effort emerge."

Wilson said he hopes that the agreement on a new bargaining process reached with the faculty this week will ease tension on the campus.

Former state official defends nukes

ARKANSAS CITY — A former Kansas attorney general defended nuclear power as an energy source during a convocation at Cowley County Community College on Wednesday night.

Kent Frizzell, a law professor and member of the University of Tulsa's National Energy and Policy Institute, said in a Crabtree Convocation lecture that the United States cannot afford to put all of its energy eggs into one basket if it wants to be energy independent.

Frizzell, who served as attorney general from 1969-1971 and was an unsuccessful GOP nominee for governor in 1970, said nuclear power plants have a good track record for safety. He said nuclear wastes by the year 2000 could be contained in an area no larger than a football field and eight feet high — most of that from military use.

In the long run, Frizzell said, it will be cheaper to produce nuclear power than most other types of energy.

Asked about the safety of workers at nuclear power plants, he said: "Aren't you concerned with the fact that every year in this country 150 to 200 coal miners lose their lives... Aren't you concerned that hundreds of thousands receive injuries mining coal that you burn at your coal-fired plants?" he asked. "Those are statistics that we know. They occurred last year, they'll occur this year. And they'll occur next year."

Wheelchair bandit finds his legs

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A young man jumped from a wheelchair and ran when police stopped him and an accomplice during a shoplifting spree Tuesday at a Kansas City department store, police said.

Police said the 26-year-old man sprinted through a parking lot before he was caught and later charged with stealing $365 in merchandise. The second man got away.

Sgt. Ron Closterman of the fraud unit said two men entered the Jones Store Co. in the Blue Ridge Mall on the eastern edge of Kansas City about 6 p.m. Tuesday. One man handed about 10 pairs of designer jeans to the one in the wheelchair, as store detectives watched, Closterman said.

Closterman said the men rolled up the jeans and stuffed them into a pillow case, then hid the bundle under a blanket.

As they made their way to an exit, the security guards came forward. Closterman said one man ran and was chased by a guard. Another guard remained with the wheelchair-bound man.

However, Closterman said, the man suddenly jumped from the chair and ran about a quarter mile through a parking lot before being caught.

Durland Hall pendulum undergoes completion before being re-hung

When Durland Hall Phase II was dedicated in September 1983, the pendulum which hung in the atrium was not finished. After the dedication ceremonies, the pendulum was taken down to be completed and has not yet reappeared.

"The pendulum was installed in the atrium for the ceremonies, but was taken down to finish work on it," Hugh Walker, professor of mechanical engineering, said.

The pendulum, which is designed to hang from the ceiling of the three-story atrium, will swing about 1 inch above a base which is approximately 3 feet high. The bob of the pendulum, which is currently being chromed, weighs about 75 pounds, Walker said.

The pendulum is being made by Walker and Everett Haft, professor of electrical engineering.

"When the pendulum was put up for the dedication ceremonies, it just swung back and forth, not really keeping time," Walker said. "What we are working on now is to get the pendulum to gradually rotate as it swings, so it will, in effect, be keeping time. The pendulum is driven by an electric motor and is timed to keep swinging at the right speed so it will keep time."

The base of the pendulum will indicate the time, Walker said. As the pendulum slowly changes the plane upon which it is swinging, it will swing between different numbers on the base. The number it is swinging by will be the time.

The base was designed by Elliott Pujol, professor of art. Pujol said the base is more of a work of art than an engineering project.

Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering, said the pendulum has a special relationship to engineering.

"We hope it will be a beautiful piece," Rathbone said. "We hope the pendulum clock will give a special meaning to the atrium. It is a project to combine art and engineering."

Commissioners to attend national meeting

Manhattan City Commissioners Suzanne Lindamood, Rick Mann, Dave Fiser and Dr. Eugene Klingler are scheduled to attend the annual meeting of the National League of Municipalities Saturday through Tuesday in Washington, D.C..

Commissioners and city staff members from across the nation attend the convention to discuss and receive information about issues affecting city government. Manhattan also is a member of the League of Kansas Municipalities, which conducts similar meetings on the state level.

Thursday for meetings with Amtrak officials about the possibility of establishing passenger train service through Manhattan. But a December letter to the Riley County Commission from Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kan., indicates that Klingler may have to do some intense bargaining to achieve his goal.

Kassebaum, a member of the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation, wrote in response to a resolution encouraging Amtrak service in a Dec. 8 letter.

"Because of this complexity (of establishing routes) and because Amtrak and Congress are concerned with minimizing the federal tax subsidy Amtrak receives, Amtrak is moving cautiously in considering new routes," Kassebaum wrote.

"Although I support the concept of a national rail passenger service, I am most reluctant to increase the contribution of the American taxpayer to this system, especially in light of our present massive budget deficit."

Kassebaum continued that she hopes the rail service will become a self-supporting entity and promised to "continue to monitor the operations of Amtrak."

'Proposal' leaves plot unresolved

By JOHN CREGO
Collegian Reviewer

"The Proposal," a one-act play by Anton Chekhov, was presented at 11:30 a.m. Thursday in the Purple Masque Theatre as part of the Lunch Bag Theatre series.

It is a delightful comedy dealing with a young man's problems when he goes to the house of his true love to ask her father for his daughter's hand in marriage. The father, played by Jason Lopez, senior in radio and television, enthusiastically agrees to the request of the young man, played by John Winningham, junior in theater. But, he has yet to ask the young lady, who is played by Stephanie Sikes, senior in humanities.

The young man has trouble with heart palpitations that grow in severity as he and his intended quarrel.

The play ended abruptly. It left the audience hanging after an argument that never seemed to be resolved. For the most part the acting was fine, except that at times the father lost his character.

Opera fails in delivery of humor

By ANGIE SCHARNHORST
Arts and Entertainment Editor

It isn't easy to determine whether the mediocrity exhibited in the K-State Opera Theatre's production of Benjamin Britten's "Albert Herring" was due to the mediocrity of the cast, or the mediocrity of the opera itself. Upon close examination, flaws in both could have resulted in the large flaw of the production.

Britten's "comic" opera, which opened Thursday in McCain Auditorium, came across generally much less than amusing. Although the sense of comedy did begin to build during the second act, overall the show lacked the spark of characterization and the appropriate musical accompaniment to bring out the humor in the depicted situations.

This could partially be blamed on performers who did not bring out the humor in their pieces, or partially on the composer, whose music made it next to impossible to do so.

The opera tells the story of the title character, who is chosen as the village May King when it is decided that none of the village girls are virtuous enough to qualify. The situation itself has endless possibilities for humor, which were brought out somewhat in the opera's libretto, but the actual humor in the opera was lost due to performers who could not make themselves understood. Although this has been overcome by many operas and opera patrons in the case of Italian and German operas, it is inexcusable for an English-speaking audience to be unable to comprehend an English opera. Librettist Eric Crozier, who traveled from London to Manhattan to give workshops for the Flint Hills Festival of Music and to see the opera, should have been slightly embarrassed to have seen his work delivered in such a manner.

The possibility does exist that it was not just the performers who were to blame for the performance's overall lack of success. Under different circumstances, and a different score, the performers might have come across much more professionally. Pure professionalism cannot be expected from a university production, by nature of the medium as a learning experience, so some degree of roughness in the performance was expected. It might have been slightly easier for the performers to have delivered the comedy of the opera's story had Britten's score been more appropriate for the situation. Dissonance, something that Britten was noted for in his compositions, in many cases is not necessarily suitable for humor — and in this case, definitely was not.

The highlight of the performance was the second act, which featured performances by the opera's strongest characters — Albert, Sid, and Nancy (Brent Weber, senior in music education; J.V. Heffel, senior in applied music and Kathleen R. Pfister, sophomore in music). Scene one of the act was the most light-hearted of the opera, and brought out the first whole-hearted chuckle from the audience.

Unfortunately, by the time this scene arrived, several of the few attending patrons had already left the auditorium in search of something a little more amusing.

Other strong performances of the opera were from Susan Graber, senior in music education, although she has performed better in other productions, and Benjamin J. Bongers, sophomore in pre-design professions.

The scenery was simple, but adequate — no more or less elaborate than could be expected from a university production.

Although the opera did have its strong moments, they were often overshadowed by problems in the composition or problems in its delivery.

A fan of Benjamin Britten might have been a little more pleased with it.

Remake relies on predictable humor

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

"Unfaithfully Yours" is a remake of Preston Sturges' classic comedy of 1948. Dudley Moore is cast in the role originally played by Rex Harrison, and it is his best role since "Arthur." He plays an orchestra conductor who has recently married a woman half his age (Nastassia Kinski). After his agent, portrayed by Albert Brooks, misunderstands Moore and assigns a private detective to follow Kinski, the private eye turns up information that leads Moore to think that his wife is having an affair with his protegee violinist (Armand Assante) — a renowned womanizer.

The first half hour of "Unfaithfully Yours" has very little to laugh at, but director Howard Zieff provides the film with such a vintage 1940s gloss that he is able to keep the film interesting. Moore's usual outlandish antics are kept under wraps until he begins to suspect his wife's infidelity. He is then allowed his characteristic mugging and the results are often quite hilarious.

The midsection of "Unfaithfully Yours" finds Moore searching for clues that will determine his wife's lover's identity. Moore is able to supply so many laughs that the film appears very successful. Only a major flaw could destroy all the assets that the film accumulated. Unfortunately, though, snags do develop. First we are asked to believe that solely on the advice of his butler, Moore is propelled to murder his wife. Before that moment, the butler's words had little influence.

The greatest single flaw in the film — and a flaw which is fatal — is the scene where Moore plots the death of his wife while conducting a live performance of his orchestra. While the 1948 version gave this scene the preposterous, lunatic pacing of an insanely jealous husband, the remake offers only a homicidal jealousy. His scheming goes on for far too long. It becomes a well-planned, premeditated murder, and premeditated murder is definitely not funny.

None of the wild perceptions of a jealous husband are shown in his fantasizing. The only humor that can be found is through his expectations that all his plans will fall perfectly into place. This causes the audience to lose any sympathy they may have for Moore. No longer is he funny when he begins to act out his plan. Instead, he is an almost contemptible character who no longer deserves the audience's pity.

The real problem in "Unfaithfully Yours" is the screenplay. Without Moore's mugging, the film would have been only very rarely funny. The plot does contain a great many opportunities for the type of sidesplitting humor that was found in the 1948 version. Unfortunately, few twists have been taken with the plot. The jokes are all quite predictable, and thus not nearly as funny as they should have been. None of the abandonment necessary to make a farce successful can be found in the remake.

Usually when a film has been remade, the original version tends to drop out of circulation in favor of the new version with its more popular stars. Let's hope that Preston Sturges' brilliant original version doesn't get completely relegated to late-late-late movie status, because it is the version that should be seen and not this unimaginative remake.

Control of ball ensures rugby success

By RHONDA BROWN
Collegian Reporter

In 1893, an English schoolboy added a new dimension to the game of soccer by picking up the ball and running with it toward the goal. In essence, this was the birth of rugby. Rugby grew slowly. The first referees were not added to the game until 1855. In the 1870s, a quota of 15 men per side was set and is still in effect today.

Rugby spread first to the British Commonwealth, and to the rest of the world in the late 19th century. Today rugby is played in most countries under regulating bodies called Rugby Unions. These ensure that the sport is organized in a professional way, yet played by amateurs.

Rugby at K-State began in the early 1970s and has been growing ever since. In 1980 the team placed fourth at the National Collegiate Championship tournament.

"It's a running game," said Mike Patten, former K-State student and coach of the rugby team. "It's like watching an (University of) Oklahoma wishbone (in football) being run all the time."

"The object of the game is to maintain control of the ball. That's what really differentiates it from football, because the forward motion doesn't matter. It's not a game of forward motion and gaining yards," Patten said. "It's a game of ball possession."

"You do want to go forward, but not in any tangibly measured distance (such as yards)," he said. "You just want to be able to take the ball and go forward with it while maintaining possession."

In the past, the K-State team has received free air travel and motel accommodations while it was at the National Collegiate Championships, Patten said.

"That's why we strive to reach the final four — it's (free accommodations) the only thing that we really get out of rugby," he said.

Anheuser-Busch flew the team to the tournament and back and also provided the motel accommodations, Patten said.

Rugby is almost like a combination of football and soccer.

The game is played on a field that is 110 yards long and 75 yards wide with 20-yard end zones.

The game is started with a kick-off as in football, and the player with the ball may run with it, kick it or pass it to any other player either laterally or behind him.

The ball is similar to a football except that it is larger and has no laces.

Rugby also differs from football in that there is no forward passing in rugby and there is no blocking.

Scoring can be done in four ways: the try (touchdown), worth four points; the conversion, worth two points; a penalty goal, worth three points; and the dropped goal, worth three points.

When a player carries the ball across the opponent's goal line, he touches it down, scoring a try.

After the try is scored, the team may kick the ball through the goal posts for the conversion. This attempt must be made by bringing the ball straight out from where it was touched down.

"That's why when you see a rugby game and a player breaks into the open and runs across the goal line, you'll always see him run to the center of the field and put the ball down in the middle of the goal posts," Patten said.

A "scrum" is used to put the ball into play after a minor infraction — such as a player using his hands to knock the ball forward — has occurred.

The scrum is made of eight players who bind together in a huddle with the scrum from the other side (opposing team). These players interlock their bodies by wrapping their arms around each other and alternately wedging their heads between the bodies of those in front of them.

The ball is put into the middle of the scrum and the "hooker" of both teams tries to gain control of the ball.

The scrum is a kind of a "free-for-all," said Kelly Cohan, captain of the rugby team.

When a major infraction such as blocking or intentionally throwing the ball forward occurs, the team of the offender may attempt to score a penalty goal. A major infraction in rugby is equivalent to a personal foul in football, giving a yellow card to a soccer player or sending someone to the penalty box in hockey, Patten said.

When the ball is kicked forward, any player in front of the ball must make an effort to retreat behind the ball or wait for the ball to pass him before joining play. If he does join play ahead of the ball, he is off-side.

A "ruck" or a "maul" is much like a scrum. In a ruck, the rules are much like the scrum, but only the feet can be used to convey the ball out.

A ruck occurs when the ball is on the ground between two or more opposing players. If the ball is held by one or more defenders, while standing, and other teammates join in, a maul is taking place.

Another formation that is used is the "line-out." When the ball has gone into touch (out of bounds) the line-out is used to put the ball back into play.

Two parallel lines are formed. The forwards of each team line up one meter across from the other team and one meter from their own players who are in front and in back of them. The line-out starts with the first man on the five-meter line.

The team that was not responsible for the ball going out of touch gains possession of the ball. A member of its scrum throws the ball into designated jumpers. As he throws the ball, he calls out an identifying word to tell his team which jumper the ball is going to.

"You can kick the ball from anywhere on the field, but if you want to put it out of bounds on the fly (in the air) and have it brought in at that point, you have to kick it from behind the 22-meter line (a line 22 meters in front of each goal line)," Patten said. If the ball is kicked in front of the 22-meter line, it must bounce before going out of touch if it is to be brought in at that point. If it does not bounce, it goes back to the place from where it was kicked.

The reason a team would put a ball out of touch is that it is losing momentum, has a bad field position, has a great kicker, or has a great jumper and does not lose line-outs, he said.

"Kicking the ball out of bounds is a last ditch effort, because once the ball leaves a player's hands, 50 percent possession of the ball is gone," Patten said. "If you have it in your hands you have 100 percent possession."

The K-State Rugby team opens its spring season at 1:30 p.m. Saturday at Kansas City's Slope Park. The team's only home game will be March 24.

K-State to emphasize team speed in baseball opener against Baker

By DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian Reporter

When the National Collegiate Athletic Association office made a telephone call to K-State Baseball Coach Bill Hickey on Feb. 14, little did the coach know the NCAA would be giving him a gift of sorts.

The gift the he received was the notification that Cary Colbert, one of the Big Eight Conference's leading hitters a year ago, would be eligible for the 1984 spring season.

Colbert is likely to benefit the 'Cats, which begins their spring schedule at 1 p.m. today at Frank Meyers Field with a non-conference double-header against Baker University.

The twin bill with Baker will open a 49-game schedule, which includes 22 home games. Included in the home schedule are 10 double-headers and two single games.

A road swing through Texas during the week of spring break will be another highlight of the schedule. The Texas trip, which also includes a game against perennial power Oral Roberts University, will consist of 13 games in a nine-day span.

The University of Nebraska will be the first Big Eight foe for the squad. The 'Cats will travel to Lincoln to face the Cornhuskers the last weekend in March. The University of Oklahoma will be the first Big Eight team to travel to Manhattan. OU will play in a set of double-headers against the 'Cats on April 14-15.

Against a group of teams which includes nationally-ranked Oklahoma State University, OU and NU, the Colbert eligibility announcement gains added importance.

Colbert spent his freshman season at the University of Iowa, but competed in fewer than 20 percent of the games the Hawkeyes played that season. He transferred to Butler County Community College, where he was one of the team's leading hitters, before coming to K-State.

Colbert hit .403 and drove in a team-leading 27 runs during the 1983 season.

Hickey said the leadership and a powerful bat will be the biggest advantages Colbert will give the team in 1984.

"One of the most important things he gives us is leadership," Hickey said. "He can hit the ball out of the ballpark at any time, and he's going to add three or four runs a game to our total run production."

Colbert is just one of the players

Hickey is counting on this spring. The K-State coach said depth is important and that quite a few players will see playing time during the spring games. Team speed is one thing Hickey said is an area the 'Cats may utilize to surprise some people.

"We're going to play a fast game. Our kids are going to sprint to and from their positions; if they hit a ball out of the park, they are going to sprint around the bases; if they walk, they will sprint," Hickey said.

"We're going to try to run more, try to steal more. We'll hit-and-run, run-and-bunt — we are going to try to do some things," he said. "We've got some kids who can run a little bit, and that hasn't been true at K-State (in the past)."

Along with an emphasis on forming a team that the fans will enjoy, Hickey currently has two students working on promotional ideas to bring the students and faculty to the park.

"We are going to do some things that could create quite a bit of interest. We're looking into the possibility that fraternities and dormitories might be able to have some contests between games of double-headers to promote student togetherness," Hickey said.

"I know that gimmicks won't bring people out to the park for very long if you don't have a team that can score some runs, and if you don't have good weather," he said. "Last year when KU and K-State played here, there were 2,000 people at the park, but the weather was nice."

Promotion aside, Hickey said he is looking forward to the coming season.

"We might do some things if our kids believe in themselves," he said. "We've got a chance. The schedule falls in our favor, and we've got some talented kids here. Add a little fan support to that, and we'll have quite a bit of excitement."

Fantasy club to sponsor tournaments

Star Riders, K-State's science fiction and fantasy club, will sponsor "Imagicon 3" this weekend in the K-State Union.

The weekend will consist of several science fiction and fantasy game tournaments, including Dungeons and Dragons, Con and Gamma World. An array of films also will be shown throughout the weekend.

Also to be featured is an art show, sales room, and panels on subjects ranging from hard-line science fiction to fantasy. Sessions will be held by the Society of Creative Anachronism featuring computers and early European cultures.

Three science fiction authors, Lee Killough, Robin Bailey and Alison Tellure, will host a panel concerning "Women in Science Fiction" and "Science Fiction and Fantasy: Where is the Line?" Killough and Tellure also will conduct a panel called "Writing and Science Fiction Short Stories."

Killough is chief radiographer at the K-State Veterinary Hospital.

All three authors will hold separate science-fiction readings Saturday.

Some of the films that will be shown include: "Darkstar," "The Hobbit," "Wizards," "The Magic Sword," "When Worlds Collide," "Who's Out There?" "Bambi vs. Godzilla" and "Bambi's Revenge."

Cost for the Imagicon is $7.50 at the door. An extra $1 is charged if a person also wishes to participate in the Dungeons and Dragons tournament. There is a charge of $4 for those wishing to participate only in the tournament. Registration for the Con and Dungeons and Dragons tournament begins at 5 p.m. today on the Union concourse.

Soviets to vote soon for new Parliament

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — The Soviet national election "campaign" — now in full swing with major speeches — is a far cry from the competitive electioneering of the West.

It is an orderly celebration of the Communist Party, the only party that will be on Sunday's ballot when the nation votes for 1,500 deputies to the Soviet Parliament that will sit for the next five years. The two-chamber body, whose function is to approve the decisions of the party, meets twice a year for one or two days.

Outsiders still take interest in the events leading up to the preordained outcome, especially in the week preceding voting. That is when each of the top Soviet rulers — the 12 members of the Politburo — gives a major address during his one election "meeting" with the constituency the Politburo decided he would represent.

The speeches this month are being closely watched for any clues to a change in Soviet policy since Konstantin U. Chernenko became general secretary.

Chernenko will hold his constituency meeting in the Kremlin Palace of Congresses today. The nationally televised speech will be his first since Andropov's Red Square funeral on Feb. 14, and an appropriate forum for announcing any major foreign or domestic policy initiatives.

Premier Nikolai A. Tikhonov, who spoke Thursday, was the last of the 11 other Politburo members to give his election speech. The speech was carried live by Soviet national television and followed by a concert and other entertainment before the election audience at the Bolshoi Theater.

Tikhonov said Soviet disarmament proposals are aimed at reviving detente and that the Soviets seek trade and cooperation with all states. He also accused the United States of wanting to bring "economic death" to the Soviet Union but said socialism will triumph.

Tikhonov's and other speeches praised the Communist Party and proclaimed that the Soviet people showed in their mourning for Andropov that they are rallying more than ever before around the party and Chernenko.

None offered a new Soviet position in arms reduction talks or other international affairs, but there has been a marked change in tone from what Kremlin officials had been using.

Speakers focus on Soviet life following Andropov's death

By KIMBERLY STOLLE
Collegian Reporter

New Soviet Union leader Konstantin Chernenko doesn't have the experience or power bases of his predecessors, and he faces four basic problems in the near future.

These were some of the insights put forth during a presentation titled "The Soviet Union: After Andropov" presented at noon Thursday in the Union Catskeller as part of the "Let's Talk About It" series sponsored by the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee.

Joseph Hajda, professor of political science, and Robert Baumann, temporary assistant professor of history, examined the problems the Soviet Union may face and the effects of Andropov's death on East-West relations.

At age 72, Chernenko was chosen to succeed Andropov as the Soviet Union's secretary general of the Communist Party. Chernenko also was established as the chairman of the Defense Council, an institution in the Soviet Union which shapes the military policy, Hajda said.

"As we look at potential power bases, we see that he (Chernenko) just doesn't have them as compared to Andropov or Brezhnev before him," he said. "He has no military rank and no military experience as the others had."

Chernenko also lacks extensive education, high intelligence (as compared to Andropov) and skills in economical management and foreign affairs, Hajda said.

Baumann said that since Andropov's death, the Soviet Union will be faced with four challenges, including the necessity of invigorating the Soviet Union communities, strengthening the Soviet party, addressing relations with the United States and facing its long-term demographic problem.

"It seems to me that the party system needs some new blood, and it's going to be difficult to bring about a meaningful change there without tinkering with the system in a more fundamental way that the Soviets might prefer not to do. Again, this is basically a conservative, early organization, and change comes very slow to them," Baumann said.

U.S. citizens often think of the people of the Soviet Union as Russians, when actually Russians, an population group, make up a little more than 50 percent of the national population, Baumann said.

There's a definite amount of resentment against the Russians by the Soviet Union minorities due to unfair representation, he said.

"When the Soviet national team was playing the Americans (in the Winter Olympic hockey games) back in 1980, I have it on reliable authority that a good many people in Tbilisi, which is the capital of Soviet Georgia, were rooting for the American team, not the Soviet team."

"The Soviet team consisted almost entirely of Russians," Baumann said. "People of the south of the Soviet Union, such as the Georgians, make no contribution to the hockey team."

"They don't play hockey, so they see that simply as a Russian thing, and they express their feelings toward the Russians in the most direct way possible — by rooting against them in the Olympics," Baumann said.

Hajda and Baumann are planning a study tour consisting of K-State students, faculty and friends who will tour the Soviet cities of Moscow, Kiev, and Leningrad and the nation of Finland in May.

Gemayel to discard pact in return for talks

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A senior member of the Lebanese opposition announced Sunday that President Amin Gemayel will abrogate the troop withdrawal accord with Israel within hours in return for an agreement from Lebanon's feuding factions to meet in Geneva on March 12.

It was past 10 p.m. in Beirut, however, when Assem Kanso, secretary-general of the pro-Syrian Lebanese Baath Party, made his announcement. No response was expected from Gemayel before this morning.

Kanso said the meeting was attended by Druse leader Walid Jumblatt and Shiite Moslem leader Nabih Berri, who also met earlier in the day with Lebanese Prime Minister Elie Salem.

Gemayel will "announce the cancellation of the May 17 agreement within the next few hours. At the same time, a cease-fire will be announced," said Kanso. "All parties have agreed to attend Lebanese reconciliation talks in Geneva."

Jumblatt issued a statement Saturday that Gemayel must cancel the May 17, 1983, Lebanese-Israeli troop withdrawal accord by midnight or "there will be no room for any dialogue any more."

Israel radio said Sunday Lebanon told Israel this weekend it will cancel the pact and it wanted to negotiate new security arrangements for Israel's northern border. Cabinet Secretary Dan Meridor would not verify that, but did not rule out consideration of a new arrangement.

Gemayel met two hours Sunday with French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson, who said later the discussion focused on withdrawal of France's remaining 1,250 soldiers from Beirut, the last of the four-nation force. No date has been set for withdrawing the troops.

Beirut radio and local papers said Sunday Syrian President Hafez Assad promised Gemayel in Damascus last week to personally guarantee a cease-fire in Lebanon. Syria backs and supplies both Jumblatt's and Berri's anti-government forces.

Hart claims second win in Maine race

By The Associated Press

PORTLAND, Maine — Sen. Gary Hart, claiming he "may have brought a political juggernaut to its knees," narrowly won the Maine caucuses Sunday to shred Walter Mondale's lingering claim as front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination.

The Colorado senator opened brief remarks in Boston Sunday night by saluting his campaign workers, saying they had "fashioned another political miracle."

Mondale, who followed, made no reference to Maine. To avoid a second straight upset following last week's New Hampshire surprise, he juggled his campaign schedule to spend more time in Maine.

"We were outspent 10-1 and Mondale had to send his national campaign to the state to stop a slide, if he did stop it," Hart organizer Ron Briggs said as the lead was teetering between the candidates early in the counting.

Late Sunday, Mondale declined to concede defeat and said in Boston he found the results encouraging. "The net result is that we had a major contest and it is dead even. I find this encouraging."

He said he would have lost Maine by a huge margin four days ago, but things have changed because of his more aggressive attacks on Hart.

His aides predicted Mondale would catch up with Hart in the South, where three primaries are among 10 contests on the docket March 13. But they were preparing for more disappointment in the days to come. Hart expects to run strongly in Tuesday's non-binding Vermont primary and Saturday's Wyoming caucuses.

"I think it will have no effect on the South whatever. I don't think that Sen. Hart is in a position to compete with us" in the South, said top Mondale aide Mike Ford. Campaign manager Robert Beckel insisted Mondale has reversed Hart's momentum in the last two days, and predicted Mondale "will emerge from Super Tuesday as the clear delegate leader and front-runner."

Hart completed a turnaround in a state where Mondale had long been the favorite due to early and strong organization and a monopoly on endorsements.

Emotional issue of Wolf Creek clouds reasoning

By LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

The Wolf Creek nuclear power plant is such an emotional issue that the reason of the arguments is often lost, said House Speaker Mike Hayden, R-Atwood. Hayden spoke at the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce Eggs and Issues breakfast Saturday.

Many people want to see the power plant's construction stopped, Hayden said.

"When Wolf Creek goes on-line, it will precipitate a huge increase in the base rates for people in that area," he said. "People want the Legislature to intervene and stop

Hayden says nuclear power plant necessary for future construction either because they oppose nuclear power or don't want rates to go up."

Despite public outcry about rate increases, Hayden said the plant is necessary to ensure energy for the future.

"Nuclear power is a reasonable approach to provide energy for the foreseeable future," he said. "A similar plant was built in Nebraska 12 years ago. When it was built, it produced the highest-priced electricity in the area. Now it is one of the cheapest sources of power."

Although the Wolf Creek plant is predicted to produce power in excess of the area's demands, Hayden said the excess will be only temporary.

"When the older, outmoded plants are phased out, there won't be much extra energy," he said. "There probably won't be any."

The Kansas House of Representatives recently passed a measure allowing a phased increase in utility rates.

"The law says the entire cost of a power plant must go into the rate base," he said. "We had to find a course that wouldn't bankrupt the company or the consumer. We came up with a proposal that will allow a phase-in of utility rates."

A proposal to allow the Kansas Corporation Commission to determine any costs related to imprudent management and stop them from being passed to the consumer is included in the same bill. However, such determination may prove difficult.

"How does one determine imprudent management?" he said. "The KCC may find this to be an impossible task."

The Wolf Creek plant is predicted to produce electricity for 30 years. The costs of decommissioning the plant will probably be included in the rate increase facing area consumers.

"I think Wolf Creek will be functioning long beyond its expected life, but someday it will have to be dismantled. The cost of this will affect the rate base. There is no such thing as a free lunch," Hayden said.

Nuclear waste is another concern of Wolf Creek opponents. No plans for permanent disposal of wastes

Honduran professor to lecture

Efrain Diaz, representative to the Honduran Congress and member of the Christian Democratic Party of Honduras, will visit campus today to present the next Lou Douglas Lecture on Public Affairs.

Diaz, an economics professor at Honduras National University, has served as undersecretary of agriculture. His lecture, "The Big Pine Operation: What It Means for Honduras Democracy," is scheduled for 7:30 p.m. in Union Forum Hall. Admission is free.

A dinner, also open to the public, will precede the lecture at 6 p.m. in the Union Sunflower Room.

Agency passes pornography study

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A Justice Department official approved a $798,531 study to determine whether Playboy, Hustler and other more sexually explicit materials are linked to violence by juveniles, despite a staff memo that argued the project could be done for $60,000.

The study was passed without competitive bidding by Alfred Regnery, head of the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention.

The two-year study will be directed by Judith Reisman, a researcher who was hired by American University after getting tentative approval for the grant. The contract is between American and the government.

"Representative samples" of the material studied will be given to "our expert judges for analysis...a body of renowned scholars," according to Reisman's grant proposal.

Reisman said she will try to assess the role pornography plays in delinquency, sexual abuse and sexual exploitation of children. The study will not only look at material in sexually explicit magazines but in general circulation publications, including news magazines.

Reisman said the study is vital because while "we know very little about the way pornography works, we do know that the material appears to be significantly present in large bodies of violence."

She said she hopes the study can be used by police to forecast behavior of some juveniles. The police could "have a pretty educated guessimate as to what the potential for violence is," she said.

The memo reviewing the study's potential cost was written Aug. 22, 1983, by Pamela Swain, head of research, evaluation and program development for Regnery's office. The memo was made available to the Associated Press by a source familiar with the study.

"I believe this project can be accomplished in a much shorter time period, and at a considerably reduced cost..." Swain wrote.

It said the "Assessment Center Program conducts similar reviews in six to nine months for a range of $20,000 to $40,000, depending on the topic area. Since it would be desirable to increase the usual number of outside experts involved to 10 to 15 for this topic area, this may increase costs to approximately $60,000."

Regnery said the memo was based on a preliminary grant proposal that later was rewritten and Swain later "withdrew that when she realized she didn't understand what the thing was all about. If we could do it for $60,000, believe me we would."

Anne Voigt, Regnery's spokeswoman, said Swain told her she did not want to discuss the memo.

Regnery also said his agency is not required to conduct competitive bidding.

Student's father dies in rest area holdup

The father of a K-State junior in civil engineering was robbed and shot to death Friday night at a rest area near Paxico on Interstate 70.

Larry Gugler, 43, 2205 Timber Creek Dr. No. 1, the father of Cindy L. Wallis, 1620 Fairchild Ave. No. 6, was found dead in the men's restroom about 7:30 p.m. Friday, said Wabaunsee County Sheriff Marion Cox. An autopsy has been completed at a Topeka hospital, but Cox wouldn't say where the wounds were on Gugler's body.

Cox said his department is looking for a man with blond hair and a stocky build who was seen leaving the rest area in a blue Chevrolet Monte Carlo with its lights off shortly after the incident. The Kansas Highway Patrol also is investigating the shooting, which occurred near milepost 337 on I-70.

Gugler was a civilian liaison to the National Guard support facility at Fort Riley and held the rank of warrant officer in the Guard. He was apparently on his way to Kansas City, Kan., for a training exercise.

Other survivors include his wife, Judith; son, Marc, both of the home; parents Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Gugler, Junction City and one brother, Gary, San Francisco.

Funeral services are scheduled for 2 p.m. Tuesday at the First United Methodist Church. Burial is to be in the Lyons Cemetery near Woodbine. The family will receive friends from 7 to 8:30 p.m. Monday at the Cowan-Edwards-Yorgensen Funeral Home.

President's assistant to talk

A talk by Mike Johnson, assistant to K-State President Duane Acker, originally scheduled for Feb. 22 will be held at 3:30 p.m. Wednesday in Union 212.

Johnson, who is appearing under auspices of the K-State Chapter of the American Association of University Professors, will discuss actions of the Kansas Legislature, especially those related to the Board of Regents' schools and K-State.

Johnson, who served in the Kansas House of Representatives from 1975 to 1979, has been an assistant to Acker since 1979.

Study to examine water depletion

Some 3,000 residents in a six-state High Plains area are receiving questionnaires to determine public perception of the water depletion problem and to how they would like to see it handled.

Two professors are conducting a two-year study as an independent supplement to the controversial, federally-funded High Plains Ogallala Aquifer Study, released a year ago.

David Kromm, professor of geography, and Stephen White, professor and head of the Department of Geography, randomly selected names of residents in 14 countries where there is a concern about water shortages.

White, a population geographer, and Kromm, a natural resources specialist, have documented the existing laws and the groundwater management districts and agencies that operate in the six states. They are presenting this data as a list of alternative management strategies and institutional arrangements to people living in the selected counties.

They plan to question a variety of people who depend on water from the Ogallala, including city dwellers, dry land and irrigation farmers, well drillers, and farm implement dealers.

Based on their findings, the geographers will determine the public preferences and will point out regional differences of opinion. Preliminary survey results are expected to be completed this summer.

Association to give scholarships

Annie Mrozinski, president of the Manhattan branch of the American Association of University Women, announced Friday that the local branch will give two student scholarships this spring.

The two scholarships will carry a stipend of $1,000 each. These awards will serve as incentive grants for the mature students returning after a lapse of five or more years to complete undergraduate work or to do graduate studies.

The AAUW, which celebrated its centennial two years ago, was organized to help further the causes of education for women. The local branch has had a scholarship fund for 60 years, but has increased the number and size of the awards to the current level in the past three years.

Applications are available in Holton 102B from Margaret Nordin, associate director of student development.

Journalist proposes economic plan

Dick Gottschald, veteran journalist and current R.M. Seaton Visiting Professional in the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications, has proposed a new approach to economic organization in America which he believes would promote full employment and full utilization of the nation's productive capacity.

Gottschald's proposal has been submitted to the International Trade Institute at K-State for publication.

Gottschald, who has spent most of the past two years doing research on the agriculture programs in North Dakota, calls his plan "Mega-Nomics."

It is based on full agricultural production, a guaranteed purchase of agricultural surpluses and the export of finished products rather than raw materials and raw products.

Gottschald's program is based on John Naisbett's book, "Mega-Trends," in which Naisbett said America has lost its role as the leader in world economic production.

Gottschald has 30 years experience in broadcast news and management. Most recently he has been news manager for the 4X television network, Bismarck, N.D., which operates four television stations, and president of Mid-Market Media Inc., a broadcast consulting firm.

Professor testifies bill would aid consumers

By KATHY WOODWORTH
Collegian Reporter

Research and investigative pursuit have taken Richard Morse, professor of family economics, to the floor of the Kansas Legislature.

Since 1968, Morse has been researching deceptive advertising of savings institutions and has gone to testify before the Legislature to introduce the "Truth in Savings" bill.

Morse testified for the Consumer Savings Disclosure and Validation Act before the Senate Commercial and Financial Institution Subcommittee.

Morse said he is determined to get the bill passed because of concern for the consumer.

"My actions stem from a personal experience," Morse said. "I opened two identical savings accounts in a New York savings bank — each having the same interest rate. There were no transactions within the accounts, and they were both opened and closed on the same days. The interest in one account was $18.96 and was $22.04 in the other."

"I don't think that this type of thing is deliberate, but I do think it's sloppy. Furthermore, this same institution repeated its ability to make errors on these same accounts," he said.

Morse testified to the subcommittee that the bill would help consumers compare rates when shopping for savings instruments and also validate the interest paid. He said he believes it would help financial institutions compete on consumer savings rates and reduce operation costs.

A solution to overcome the confusion in advertisements of interest rates has been offered by Morse.

"My solution is based on the idea of using a daily compounded rate in easy-to-understand terms of cents per $100 per day," Morse said.

Morse said cents are easy to count, units of 100 are easy to identify and the number of days is obvious.

To support his answer to the problem, Morse said he has two testimonial statements.

"Money has use value every day," he said. "Secondly, the consumers expect to be paid interest every day, so the financial institution should expect to pay interest on all the money deposited every day."

The bill's only requirement is that this daily rate be disclosed.

"Figuring interest rates on a daily rate equivalence will not require fancy, high-priced computers," he said. "The calculations take less than 30 seconds by hand on a $20 calculator."

Tables for any rate also could be printed and given to customers as a public service so they can figure interest even without a calculator, he said.

"Truth in savings' is the name usually given to this kind of legislation, although I think a more appropriate name might be the 'apples and oranges' bill," Jack Steiner, D-Kansas City and senior officer of the bill, said. "I say 'apples and oranges' because the bill's main purpose is to help Kansas consumers separate 'apples from oranges' and make an intelligent, informed decision when choosing a savings program."

Morse said savers currently must make "apples and oranges" comparison, but under the bill, rates would use the same standard so consumers can compare similar savings plans.

Morse's belief that savings institutions should be required to provide uniform and full disclosure of their method of computing and paying interest has caused him to receive several requests for information and publications about truth in savings from newspapers such as the Boston Sun, Washington Post, Louisville Courier-Journal, and other journals and magazines.

Morse said in his testimony that the bill is not a new idea. The state of New York enacted similar legislation in 1977, and the Iowa legislature is considering a similar bill.

Wednesday is the deadline for the subcommittee to report the bill favorably to the Senate floor.

Students focus on new challenges as senate chairman change nears

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

This week marks the changing of the guard of the Student Senate chairman. Current chairman Lori Leu is being relieved by Tracy Turner, junior in economics, who was elected to the position by senators at their meeting Thursday.

"Right now I'm trying to get through my mixed feelings about leaving the position because it's been a great year," Leu said. Although expressing how much she loves Manhattan and K-State, she said she is looking forward to new challenges since being accepted at Harvard Law School.

"I think law school will be a very large challenge, a kind that I've never faced before. I'm looking forward to seeing what kind of potential I have and seeing what I can really do," she said.

"In the past year, everything I've done has been for student government, it's always been in the back of my mind. What do I have to do today? First of all, I have this meeting and this meeting and this appointment, meet with this vice president, and do this and this and this, and yes, I do have a test, but..."

"I wanted my first priority to be student government, and I made it my first priority. I didn't ignore the academics, but I found I was getting so much more, at this point, from working here," she said.

Some of the responsibilities she will be passing on to Turner include presiding over Senate meetings, putting in 25 hours a week in the student government office advising people on what things should and should not be brought up in the Senate meetings, and trying to encourage student input into student government.

"I feel like, as chairman, I was responsible for what the Senate did. I had to remain objective. If I knew a position was not being brought out and it would make a difference on an important issue, then it was my responsibility to get that out and make sure all sides of an issue were known and the decisions were responsible," she said.

"I feel like this was a year of maintenance, making sure student government continued trying to increase communication with the students and trying to make student government stronger. I hope I've set an example he (Turner) will want to follow," she said.

Turner said his next few days will consist of moving in and getting situated in his office in the Student Governing Services office. He said he doesn't expect his adjustment to be too hard because Leu was well-organized.

Turner said his immediate responsibilities will be appointing chairmen for the eight Senate standing committees and making sure things are running smoothly before the allocation process begins in April.

"Undoubtedly the most important responsibility of student government is the allocation of the student activity fee. Especially this year, it is going to be a difficult process."

"The funds are tighter because we felt an enrollment drop this year and our groups and activities are expanding and as active as ever. So there is a problem reconciling these two situations," Turner said.

A continuing issue in student government Turner said he intends to work closely with is the communication problems between students and the senators representing them.

"We've made some progress in that category, like my last term in Senate when we started the button bill. It may not have been an earth-shattering thing, but at least it was one small step we could take to be a little more visible and to let people identify who their senators are," he said.

He said the Communications Committee, a standing committee, has set up a table in the Union for students to come by and express their feelings. Another possibility for improved communications is required visitations for senators to living groups and organizations to discuss issues in Senate and to get feedback on issues.

Creating music with computers challenges engineering students

Computers are programmed for different purposes, some for complex problem-solving, others for video games.

But what happens when a computer that is programmed for complex problem-solving is used to make music? Two mechanical engineering students have been assigned the task of finding out.

Warburg Lee and Todd Vest, seniors in mechanical engineering, were assigned to the project by Subhash Sinha, associate professor of mechanical engineering.

Hewlett Packard Inc., based in Corvallis, Ore., contacted Sinha with a proposal to find new uses for the HP 87 XM model technical computer.

They are giving the students working on the project a 15C Hewlett Packard calculator.

Vest said Hewlett Packard didn't specify what topics or areas of research the project had to follow. So, Sinha selected music for the HP 87 XM.

The objective of the project is to display the computers with their new musical ability during All-University Open House March 30-31.

Lee and Vest said they have encountered several problems while trying to program the computers to play music. The main problem is synchronizing them so notes play at the correct time.

"There is a problem with response time when using six computers," Lee said.

Vest said the types of tunes that can be programmed are limited to those that do not have long, drawn-out notes. When played on the computer, classical music does not sound very symphonic, but a song like "Dueling Banjos" with its short, staccato notes sounds more authentic.

The programming of the computer to make music incorporates the tones that the computer uses as signals to the operator in other programs.

"It's going to be like an R2D2 (mechanical robot in the movie 'Star Wars') whistling in tune," Vest said. "It's not a mechanical engineering project for competition."

Computer music varies greatly from the music produced by a synthesizer. Synthesizers can vary frequency as they hold a tone, but the computer can play only one tone. It also can't go up and down a scale.

"There are two numbers (one for frequency or tone and one for time or duration) to be entered into the computer for every note," Sinha said.

Civic duty shouldn't be bought

Civic duty — these two words imply a responsibility or obligation to our government and leadership.

Active civic duty is a necessary part of a democratic government, but in our society, money is where the real action is.

People have and always will reject their civic responsibilities because of laziness, apathy or other reasons.

But paying people to do their civic duty is bad business. To reward someone for doing something which they should do anyway is an encouragement for the person not to act unless he is rewarded.

There are many examples of people refusing to do their civic duty, but there are two local examples of people being offered money to participate.

One of our civic duties is voting — voting without getting paid. During the last student body presidential election, the residence hall with the highest percentage of voter turnout received $50 from the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls.

The plan was to buy voter turnout — in other words, money was being offered to students for the simple and necessary act of performing their civic duty.

Perhaps the federal government should offer some sort of monetary incentive to the state with the highest percentage of voter turnout to encourage continued participation.

Another obvious example is Crime Stoppers. The Riley County Police Department will pay up to $1,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of a person accused of a crime.

Turning in criminals is a necessary function of society if we want to achieve justice, and money should exert no influence.

The fact that people do not want to do their civic duty in the first place is sad. But offering them money to do it is even sadder.

Iran-Iraq conflict non-negotiable

Along with the continual conflict in Lebanon, another feud has come to the fore to make headlines and stir tensions. As if there isn't enough trouble in the Middle East already, the battle between Iran and Iraq threatens to keep the region in turmoil for some time.

After years of warfare, the tension has escalated to the point of drawing international concern. Because the Iranians threaten to close the Straits of Hormuz to oil tankers if foreign countries become involved, America's energy supply is threatened.

This presents a conflict for the United States: To protect energy interests, it would seem logical to send armed forces to the Persian Gulf. But if doing so would complicate the situation, what else can be done to alleviate the threat?

Not much. Because any intervention by the United States will be regarded with suspicion and hostility by Iran, it would not be wise to try to negotiate peace in this conflict. Diplomatic moves would frustrate future foreign relations. United States military involvement would only cost lives and aggravate attempts at peace in the Middle East.

Educational approach to DUI

What do you think is sufficient punishment for someone who is caught driving under the influence of alcohol?

I thought Kansas' law was tough. A couple of days in jail, a fine and community service work for the first DUI offense is enough to keep many drunk drivers off the streets.

Apparently, a judge in Fairfax City, Va., General District Court decided Wednesday to give a DUI sentence the driver would not forget.

Judge Robert Colby, a substitute judge in Fairfax City, sentenced Kristine Guess, Fairfax City, to pay a $100 fine and view an autopsy.

That's right — Colby has sentenced Guess to view an autopsy as part of her sentence.

"My object is solely to make an indelible impression on the individual of some of the severe probable consequences to drinking and driving," Colby said.

You're damn right it will make an impression, Judge Colby. I have to wonder if forcing someone to view an autopsy will make the impression you are wanting.

Some people think Colby's unusual sentence will serve as an important lesson.

"Anything that could create a deterrent is worth trying," Marie Kunec, a member of Mothers Against Drunk Drivers, said.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

While the sentence could serve as a deterrent, there are other legal and ethical problems in requiring someone to view an autopsy as part of a sentence.

David Fudala, chairman of the legal panel for the northern Virginia chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union, questioned Colby's rationale for issuing the unusual sentence.

"I think he's restricted to jail terms or fines," Fudala said. "I question whether there will be any deterrent effect. Most people find it more peculiar than seeing it as any sort of lesson."

The ethical problem was addressed by Dr. James Beyer, medical examiner for northern Virginia. He said autopsies are normally closed to the public, and he said he will seek legal counsel before allowing anyone to view an autopsy as part of a sentence.

I congratulate Colby on his initiative and creative thinking. But I think his sentence is off-base and should be modified. As it is, I don't think it will work.

I agree with Fudala on questioning whether the sentence will be more of a curiosity than a punishment. I know I would not find the sentence a punishment. I would be interested in seeing what a coroner actually does.

I've watched "Quincy." I've watched Jack Klugman solve several crimes. I would want to know what really happens at an autopsy.

On the other hand, I can see the family of the deceased wanting privacy — including the autopsy process. I think these people would find Colby's sentence an invasion of their privacy and of no use whatsoever.

What might be useful would be a film which shows a weekend with an emergency room staff. The film could be part of a mandatory driver's education course for new drivers and DUI offenders. This would keep the curious out of autopsy rooms and it would educate more drivers than just those convicted of DUI.

Kansas has a good DUI law. Kansasans have believed in education, instead of raising the drinking age to an arbitrary number, as the key to correcting the problems of DUI. I hope judges keep enforcing the law.

Allocation of fees follows election

(Editor's note: In an effort to improve communication between student senators and their constituents, several senators will address campus concerns in a weekly column. Catherine Saylor, third-year student in veterinary medicine, represents the College of Veterinary Medicine.)

Student Senate elections are over. Once again, tree bark is visible. Union bulletin boards are nearly empty and the Collegian is a page or two thinner. Student government has started to fade from student view — fade at precisely the time it should be shining. The new Senate is about to distribute more than $750,000 that is entrusted to it every year.

The exact figure this year — $764,801.

Each student contributes $25.25 per semester to this fund through the student activity fee collected at registration. In addition to the activity fee, past senates have committed students to $115.25 per semester for such purposes as health care, Union and recreational services and stadium and coliseum bonds. In total, the financial impact of student government on students amounts to $140.50 per student per semester.

Experienced senators agree that the most glaring problem in student government is a lack of communication with students. The problem seems worse when one considers exactly how much money is collected each year. On the non-financial side, issues that affect the student body, such as dead week and sexual harassment policies, pass through Senate with little notice or comment.

We senators who plan to maintain this weekly student government column hope to provide background information, and even occasional trivia, that the Collegian reporter who must file a story within an hour of Senate adjournment is unable to do.

CATHERINE SAYLER
Guest Columnist

At the March 1 meeting, student senators elected former student body presidential candidate Tracy Turner, junior in economics, as Senate chairperson. The chairperson presides at meetings and oversees most of the campus-related activities of student government. The position pays $2,700 and is one of three SGA positions paid for from the student activity fee. The student body president receives $3,600 and the Finance Committee chairperson earns $300.

Figures released Friday afternoon give an idea of what to expect in the allocation process beginning April 10. The activity fee total of $764,801 is divided into line item groups and non-line item groups.

Line item groups receive money on a per student basis, thus their allocations fluctuate with changing enrollment. The six line item requests are:

- Associated Students of Kansas, $16,000;
- College councils, $43,829;
- Union, $360,432;
- Student Publications Inc., $90,108;
- Recreational Services, $75,090;
- Fine Arts Council, $58,500.

Two groups have requested an increase from last year: ASK from 40 cents per full-time student per semester to 50 cents, and Student Publications, from $1 per part-time student to $2.

The non-line item groups consist of about 20 smaller organizations, which together are requesting $144,103.

Total requests in the two categories run almost $24,000 over budget. In the coming weeks, the Finance Committee will decide how to cut requests by $24,000. When the allocation process begins in April, senators will decide whether to approve those cuts or redistribute them in a way they feel is more equitable.

Men also carry responsibility for abortion

Editor,

Re: "Students' choices raise county abortion rate," in the March 1 Collegian.

After having read this article, and being against abortions of convenience (which the great majority of abortions are), I began to write my normal argument dealing with the idea that choices should be made prior to conception rather than after. A typical response is that I, being male, should keep my nose out of women's control of their bodies. Believing that most women don't care what a man thinks about abortion and probably won't give my arguments serious consideration, I would like to address the fathers of the aborted.

Pro-choice is a label given those who accept abortion as a means of birth control. I believe the concept of pro-choice is quite valid, but in a totally different time frame. The time to choose is before intercourse.

I assume that at least by the time an individual gets to college, he knows about the process of conception and birth. With that assumption, every man who has sexual intercourse with a woman should have ALREADY chosen to accept responsibility for the conception of a child. Every man who takes part in the conception of a child should feel accountable for the result of that action, whether it is abortion or birth.

One cannot place the blame on a contraceptive method that failed. I have not heard of any foolproof, 100 percent effective, guaranteed-or-your-conception-reversed contraceptive. Even vasectomies can fail. Tubal pregnancies are not impossible. And one cannot place the blame entirely on women. In my thoughts, the majority, if not the total, responsibility rests with the man.

But men suffer no physical consequences of abortion. Some probably suffer no psychological consequences.

My claim is that there need be no suffering from abortions of convenience, because such abortions need not go on.

The next time you want a little fun in the sun, or the shade, or the bed, do so realizing you may be starting something that at the very least could cost you some dollars, and — in many people's eyes — could result in murder. Better yet, find something else to do.

Opera review demonstrates critical faults

Editor,

Re: "Opera fails in delivery of humor," in the March 2 Collegian.

An unfortunate characteristic of drama critics is their tendency to condemn a performance out of hand, presenting their readers an account which is exaggerated out of all recognition. Occasionally, this scathing literary style is successful, producing a result which is genuinely funny and clever; all too often, however, the critic becomes little more than a cheap glory-seeker, convinced that a position of respect in his or her community can be earned by bad-mouthing the work of others. It is all too easy to criticize, and, on an occasion such as this, critics may insult a performance to a degree that their outraged public can no longer endure, prompting a rebuttal.

I refer, of course, to the preposterous article by Arts and Entertainment Editor Angie Scharnhorst concerning the opening night of the opera "Albert Herring."

In her desire to make witty denunciations of the music of composer Benjamin Britten, Scharnhorst has unintentionally revealed the lack of preparation underlying the writing of her article. Her central theme is that the humor of the opera was supposedly obscured by the "mediocre" performance, music or both; the thought that the blame for failing to appreciate the opera's humor might rest solely with her evidently did not occur to her.

Scharnhorst's remark that librettist Eric Crozier "should have been slightly embarrassed" is simply incorrect, and, had she bothered to attend the reception afterwards, she could have spoken to the Croziers in person, thus removing any doubt.

In addition, I certainly was not aware of patrons fleeing the performance in significant numbers, "in search of something a little more amusing," as Scharnhorst suggests.

Professors research storage, use of vegetable oils as fuel

By RHONDA BROWN
Collegian Reporter

Research on the storage of vegetable oils to maintain their properties as alternate diesel fuels is being conducted by two K-State professors.

Hugh Walker, professor of mechanical engineering, and Bill Klopfenstein, associate professor of biochemistry, have studied about 25 vegetable oils from sources such as soybeans, slaughter-house waste and sunflower seeds.

The oils are stored in plastic and steel drums under several different conditions. Some are stored in the attic of Willard Hall, some are in a root cellar and some are stored outdoors, Walker said.

For each set of drums in each environment, there is one in which the esters are stored plain (without anti-oxidant) and one to which an anti-oxidant, butylated-hydroxy-toluene (BHT), has been added, Klopfenstein said. There are 12 sets of samples in the study.

Esters are chemical compounds formed by alcohol reacting with a fatty acid. Anti-oxidants prevent oxidation of the oil. Oxidation occurs when oxygen joins with the carbon change of the oil.

"Our hypotheses are that in the long run, the least change will be in the oils stored underground in a plastic tank with the BHT added, and the most change will occur in the oils that are stored in the warmer environments in a steel tank without the BHT," he said.

"Most of these seed oils are thick...more so than ordinary diesel fuel, so you have trouble getting it through the injector into the cylinder of the diesel engine," Walker said. "What we're looking at is an alcohol ester of the oil."

"This ester is about the same viscosity (thickness) as diesel fuel," he said. "As a result, you have something that is more matched to the engine without modification."

When a sample is taken from the storage sights, chemical tests are run through an engine to see if degradation of the vegetable oil can be detected, Walker said.

"Every four months, give or take a few days, we pull samples and start several (chemical) analyses," Klopfenstein said.

"The first one I do is fatty acid composition done by gastrochromotography. This test shows the separation of a compound according to its structure," he said. "That should tell us whether there's been any major change due to oxidation primarily of the unsaturated fatty acids. These are the ones oxidized most rapidly."

In another test, peroxide value is related to the change in composition and is tested for formation of oxides products of the fatty acids, Klopfenstein said. This value indicates what condition the oil is in with regard to oxidation.

"Then we also run a couple of physical tests. One of these is to determine density — how much a certain volume of material weighs. The thing here is that once the material has started to oxidize, a polymerization reaction can take place," he said.

Polymerization is a reaction in which several small molecules form one larger molecule. If this takes place, the density should change, Klopfenstein said. This reaction also is catalyzed by the presence of metal, therefore the metal drums are expected to show more change than the plastic drums.

"The fourth test that we do is viscosity — how thick is the oil and how freely does it run," Klopfenstein said. "If you have large molecules, they don't run as freely through a small diameter tube as small molecules do."

"At present, it's a little difficult to tell (which oils store the best) because we haven't seen anything significant in eight months," he said. "I've just started to take the one-year samples."

In general, the samples with the anti-oxidants in them have shown lower peroxide values, which is expected. The values are still within the margin of error, so no conclusions can be drawn yet, Klopfenstein said.

"So far there doesn't seem to be a problem with any of the oils," Walker said. "There is very little change we can detect."

Making the ester is not a difficult process and, on a small scale, some farmers have been successful in producing the fuel.

"Some farmers are set up to produce the fuel, but I would doubt that they are money ahead by doing so," Walker said.

He said he believes that if crude oil becomes more precious for things like medicine and plastics in the United States than for running diesel engines, vegetable oil may be used on a large scale as an alternative fuel.

Unless the price structure of diesel fuel changes drastically or if another oil embargo takes place, vegetable oil fuels will not be used. Vegetable oil esters are about $2.34 per gallon and diesel fuel is about $1.10 per gallon, Klopfenstein said. Until the prices are the same or close to the same, vegetable oils will not be used on a large scale.

"The price of esters could come down if they were produced on a larger scale, but their price would not drop below the price of the crop (source) they came from," he said. Recently soybean prices have been up and crude oil prices have been down.

Soviet citizens vote in elections for uncontested Parliament seats

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Soviets voted in uncontested national parliamentary elections Sunday, in a dutiful twice-a-decade endorsement of "the unshakeable unity" of the Communist Party.

Kremlin leader Konstantin Chernenko, who voted in northeastern Moscow, was shown on Soviet TV wishing election workers "great successes." He and his fur-coated wife Anna waved and smiled but said nothing to reporters outside the polling station.

The estimated 175 million eligible Soviet voters are not legally required to go to the polls, but those who don't face censure at work or school, and turnout has exceeded 90 percent for the last 40 years. Central Communist Party organs look to district organizations everywhere to mobilize the masses, and aim for a 100 percent turnout.

By noon, six hours after Moscow's polling stations opened, Tass said 90 percent of the city's eligible voters had cast their ballots.

The election is for the 1,500 members of the Supreme Soviet, who have five-year terms. The body meets twice a year, usually for a day or two in the spring and in the fall, to ratify actions taken by the 39-member Presidium, which acts in its name between sessions.

Chernenko voted in a polling station in the Krasnopresenskaya district where he reportedly lives. He dropped his ballot in the "yes" box — where all but a very few of the ballots will land.

To vote "no," Soviets must go into a booth to mark their ballot — calling attention to themselves. Write-ins invalidate the vote.

Chernenko's vote went to Soviet Premier Nikolai Tikhonov, who represents all Moscow, and to Natalya Orlova, a textile worker in her late 20s, who represents his district.

In each district across the vast nation, voters were electing two deputies, one to each of the houses of the Supreme Soviet. Not all deputies are party members — in fact, non-party members made up 28 percent of the outgoing parliament — but party endorsement is essential for every candidate.

Candidates are selected by trade unions, the young Communist League, work collectives and local party bodies and the nominations submitted to district party offices before being "endorsed" at workplaces.

There is no Soviet law barring more than one candidate for each seat, but because the nominating process is tightly controlled, no such opposition emerges on the ballot.

The two-month election "campaign" is a chance for the Communist Party to discuss its achievements and to make a show of support. It is also a chance — in this U.S. presidential election year — to take a propaganda swipe at "so-called democratic elections" there.

This week, several articles attacked the U.S. electoral process. One such piece in the youth newspaper Komsomolskaya Pravda Sunday titled "Freedom Inside Out" charged "corruption, forgeries, machinations and lies" are "constant fellow travelers" in U.S. campaigns.

But signs all over Moscow have for weeks proclaimed "the unshakeable unity of party and people" in the Soviet Union and urged people to work harder to "move forward to building socialism under the banner of Lenin, under the leadership of the Communist Party."

Pope adds visit to spring tour

ANCHORAGE, Alaska — Some quick map work by two Alaskan church officials has convinced Pope John Paul II to stop in Fairbanks on his way to Asia this spring.

The pope originally planned to stop May 2 in Anchorage for a few hours on his way to Seoul, South Korea, but a change of plans has put Fairbanks on the itinerary.

"The decision to change was a combination of a lesson in geography and the Holy Father's eagerness to visit as many different cities as possible," said Archbishop Francis Hurley of Anchorage.

Hurley said Saturday that he and Bishop Robert Whelan of Fairbanks pointed out to the papal staff that because the chartered jet will be flying the polar route, the difference in traveling time between Anchorage and Fairbanks would be only a matter of minutes.

The pope is scheduled to arrive at Fairbanks International Airport on Wednesday morning, May 2, and depart at noon. All his activities will be confined to the airport.

John Paul II drew an estimated 35,000 to a Mass in downtown Anchorage during a 1981 stopover.

Doctor wins suit against police

CHICAGO — A U.S. District Court jury has awarded $112,000 to a 38-year-old female doctor who was strip-searched by Chicago police after her arrest on a speeding ticket.

The award Friday was the largest in 10 strip-search cases filed against the city police department as a class-action suit by the American Civil Liberties Union.

The doctor, identified only as Joan W., said that after she was stopped in January 1978 and failed to make bond, she was taken to police headquarters and subjected to a strip search by a matron.

In 1979, a federal court declared unconstitutional the city policy of subjecting women arrested for traffic offenses to strip searches. The city stopped the searches that year.

Death squad threatens reporters

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — A rightist death squad threatened to kill reporters who "distort" news about El Salvador or cooperate with leftist guerrillas, a right-wing newspaper reported Thursday.

El Diario de Hoy quoted the threat from a one-paragraph statement signed by the Salvadoran Anti-Communist Command, one of four death squads that resurfaced last November after about a year of relative quiet.

"We inform radio and television journalists and those of the written press that all those reporters who cooperate with the enemies of our republic, sending dispatches that distort reality or repeating also news items that come from abroad will be executed, because what they do is confuse our people and play the game of terrorist gangs and those bands of reporters in the pay of international communism," the statement said.

It did not define "enemies of the republic."

Pedro Saravia, 35-year-old news director of the state television networks, was reported kidnapped Wednesday night. One of his employees, who asked not to be named, said several heavily armed men in green uniforms burst into Saravia's home in the working-class suburb of Soyapango, identified themselves as national guardsmen and took him away.

Texas dentist crusades for tooth, truth

By The Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO, Texas — Signs hanging on the walls of Dr. Barry Solomon's dental clinics proclaim "We cater to cowards," and a 12-foot molar armed with a smile stands guard outside one of the modest brick buildings.

Solomon and his partners have used advertising, discount coupons and word of mouth to attract some 40,000 dental patients and, in an unusual twist, offer a money-back guarantee.

An energetic, self-styled crusader for both tooth and truth, Solomon is not exactly popular with some other dentists.

He attributes the ill will to "competitive jealousy." But Dr. Neil Morgan, a member of the San Antonio District Dental Society, sums up the situation with a pithy question.

"You can't like someone who's got a $3 million lawsuit pending against you, can you?" Morgan said.

Solomon and some of his associates in the Family Dental Health Centers have filed a $3 million antitrust suit against the local dental group and the Texas Dental Association, contending they were wrongfully suspended from membership and asking reinstatement. The local group's two-year suspension of the six dentists, beginning in June 1982, made them ineligible for membership in the state group.

The suspensions, the June 1983 suit contends, were a "vindictive retaliatory scheme" intended to "kill price competition in the field of dentistry."

Now the maverick dentist is preparing for a battle that could end with his license being suspended or revoked by the Texas State Board of Dental Examiners.

The board has scheduled a May hearing on a complaint against Solomon, taking exception to his use of the words "totally preventable" in an advertisement concerning gum disease.

"He's a marketer and marketing is legal now," said Morgan, who also is secretary of the state board. "It's when he borders and walks the tightrope of legality — that's when the proper authorities walk in."

Solomon, 42, maintains that dentistry has become stodgy and is "at least 20 years behind the times."

"Very little of what I've done is innovative or new," he said. "It just hasn't been done in San Antonio. This is a new era of consumer marketing and dentistry is part of that."

Solomon's two roomy San Antonio clinics are full of offbeat touches. He has chairs in the shape of molars. Rainbow-hued signs are posted on the ceiling over some of the reclining chairs, telling white-knuckled patients: "Smile."

"We were conditioned in dental school to believe that professionals shouldn't advertise," Solomon said. "Well — why not?"

"And if you pay your hard-earned money to a dentist, why aren't you entitled to a guarantee? It's not any different than Sears, Roebuck guaranteeing their products," he said. He said he could recall redoing three people's dental work for free and refunding one woman's money for denture work.

Solomon was suspended from the local dental society in June 1982, allegedly for making false and misleading comments in a television interview.

He said his words were: "We gear our practice towards completely painless dentistry and we do something that is somewhat unusual, we completely guarantee the work to our patients' satisfaction."

He contends the society members heard only the buzzwords "painless" and "guarantee," and suspended him without fully examining the statement. The local dental society refuses to discuss the suspension, saying it is an internal matter.

A place in the local dental society is needed for American Dental Association membership, whose benefits include life and disability insurance, prestige and help in continuing education, Solomon said.

In addition, Solomon's antitrust suit says, several qualified members of his Family Dental Health Centers were refused entrance to the local group simply because of their association with him.

He says that after much argument, the dentists were offered membership on a probated basis — the probation to end "when the new issue of the Yellow Pages comes out," a reference to Solomon's heavy advertising.

On this issue, too, the local society has refused to comment. But Dr. Dan Peavy, president of the San Antonio District Dental Society, denied any vendetta against Family Dental Health Centers.

"Dr. Solomon started the suit and he can stop it," Peavy said. "We're meanwhile having to show his attorneys that there has been no restraint of trade or conspiracy against Dr. Solomon or his partners. We're proving that those accusations are false."

It was a February 1983 newspaper advertisement that prompted the state board's complaint against Solomon.

Solomon's repeated comments that most gum surgery now is unnecessary — and "almost criminal" — already had outraged many periodontists, but saying gum disease was "totally preventable" could be consumer fraud, Morgan said.

"I don't think any scientist or doctor around the world would say anything is totally preventable, except maybe polio," Morgan said. "He did not qualify his statement in any way."

Solomon counters that "in the light of today's knowledge, surgery is controversial. These guys are getting away with murder by charging a lot of money — plus, you're getting cut on."

"Nobody wants nuclear waste in their city, their county or their state," he said. "The amendment (to a bill dealing with nuclear waste disposal) says the plant can go ahead if the temporary waste storage site is approved by the federal government. If all goes as expected, the Wolf Creek storage site should be approved for 20 years."

Hayden said only temporary storage is currently needed because a federal waste site is being considered.

"We (the Legislature) believe that before or shortly after the plant goes on-line, there will be an approved federal waste site," he said. "The possibility of such a site has been under consideration. I expect it to be announced soon that a waste dump will be located in a western state."

Cattle producers learn new grading method

By TERRI BAIRD
Collegian Reporter

Cattle producers from across Kansas came to K-State on Friday to learn about research being done in the cattle industry, ask questions and learn about new products during the 71st annual Cattlemen's Day in Weber Hall.

A sorting chute provided a place for visitors to ask questions, along with booths set up around the arena for agri-businessmen to demonstrate their products. Everything from electric fence types to different kinds of ear tags were on display.

Experts in K-State beef research also spoke during the event in a presentation called "Sixty Minutes on K-State Beef Research."

K-State President Duane Acker opened the session with a short welcome. Del Allen, professor of animal science, began an informational speakers panel with a talk on electronic grading of beef.

"We started this project back in 1979 in an attempt to develop an instrument that would evaluate beef carcasses in much the same way they are currently evaluated by human graders," Allen said.

The instrument, called a Video Image Analyzer, is designed to eliminate the human error involved when a carcass is graded. About 20 percent of beef carcasses are graded wrong, Allen said.

The analyzer is a hand-held video camera linked to a computer. After two years of testing at K-State and two more years of testing by the U.S. Department of Agriculture, researchers have found it to be very reliable in predicting loin eye size and fat thickness in beef carcasses, Allen said.

In reference to the 20 percent error rate, Allen said, "It's something we need to improve. I think we're going to do it. I don't know how fast. I think it's going to be a relatively slow process for the USDA to adapt to the system."

Dave Nichols, assistant professor of animal science, spoke about sprinkling cattle during hot weather. Heat stress studies done by Nichols determined the value of sprinkling cattle.

Nichols said that most producers are more worried about what the temperature on the thermometer says instead of the effective temperature — the heating and cooling power of the environment. Temperature, humidity and the amount of solar radiation the animal is exposed to are some of the factors that influence heat stress of livestock in regard to effective temperature.

One of the alternatives to reduce heat stress is shades, which may be expensive and difficult to build big enough.

"Sprinklers can provide a relatively lower cost method of reducing heat stress," Nichols said.

In trials performed during some of the warmest Kansas months, sprinklers improved cattle weight gain by 15 percent and feed efficiency by 17 percent.

Heat stress in cattle reduces feedlot performance, increases the animal's maintenance requirement and decreases appetite. This adds up to losses for the producer, Nichols said.

One of the things that happens to animals during heat stress is that perspiration increases as the temperature increases. An increase in panting also occurs, Nichols said.

"Basically we translate this back as the animals just trying to increase the amount of evaporative loss from the inner tissues of the lungs," Nichols said. "This produces heat. It's a muscular activity, and before long we find animals that are producing heat to get rid of heat. It doesn't take you long to figure out that's a no-win situation."

The evaporation of the moisture on the cattle is of the greatest concern, he said. Some devices, such as foggers or fine mist nozzles, can be counter-productive, increasing problems because of the increase in humidity and the reduced rate of evaporation.

"If air movement is adequate and relative humidity low, sprinklers can be an inexpensive and effective way to reduce heat stress and improve overall feedlot performance,"

Nichols said.

Management and nutritional influences on calving difficulty was the topic of a presentation by Larry Corah, extension livestock specialist at K-State. He said new bull evaluation techniques can aid producers in breeding for cattle without the threat of calving difficulty.

The primary reasons for calving difficulties are thinner heifers and heifers that are born with difficulties. Larger birth weights are the main cause of these difficulties, Corah said. Heifers that need help during calving generally have calves that weigh five to eight pounds heavier than normal. The trend toward cattle with larger size and scale could be the cause of some of these problems.

Sire selection is an important criteria when the producer is trying to control birth weights while maintaining superior growth.

"The key is looking at some of these newer characteristics in sire selection and considering them to help yourself reduce calving problems. Heifer development is also important in getting around calving problems," Corah said.

Speakers for the afternoon also included Dan Upson, professor of anatomy and physiology, who discussed the use of extra label drugs and Bob Price, editor of the Western Livestock, who gave his cattle industry outlook for 1984.

Price said, "I think, all in all, we'll see 1984 as a turning point type of a year. We may not see a whole lot more dollars in our pocketbooks, but I think that 1984 will be looked back on as that year when we start to break the shroud of pessimism that has surrounded our industry for the last three or four years and start a period of some better times ahead in the industry."

Orville Sweet, executive vice president of the National Pork Producers Council in Des Moines, Iowa, spoke about "The 80s, The Turning Point for Red Meat."

Sweet, keynote speaker for the day, said that some of the problems in the cattle industry today develop because people aren't equipped to cope with them. For instance, he said, there is no curriculum in any college that teaches how to be the manager of a trade organization.

"There's only one way to learn, and that's to come through the ranks and the school of hard knocks. One thing that we learn in organizational work, and I think we learn it in the cattle business also, is that if you do anything the same way long enough, you'll eventually be doing it the wrong way. It requires a lot of bold, courageous, diplomatic leadership to bring about changes in an organization, and it requires some risk taking on the part of leadership. It's a tough job, and you have to have vision," Sweet said.

Porter Brock, 75, is a freshman at K-State. Brock returns to school after graduating from high school in 1929.

Young at heart

Full of memories

*The man I see is bent and withered
His face and shoulders from gravity bound
His walks among the trees and buildings
Seeking knowledge
where it may be found
The man I see so bent and withered
Has the grace of youth as he shuffles by His smile is warming as gallantly he holds the door
For his classmates who are young and springy
The man I see so gracefully bent
so gracefully withered what secrets could you share what wisdom do you possess
That makes your face so full from life?*
Anna Stanley

The poem is about a man named Porter Brock. He's an old guy who meant something to me when I met him; he's a guy who would make anyone happy to grow old and know they can do it with style.

Style is Brock. He looks at life as if it has many more tomorrows than yesterdays. At the age of 75, he enrolled at K-State.

"I was bored to death," said Brock, who wants to major in music. "There wasn't much for me to do in Wamego, (where he lives and commutes from) and after a friend suggested I go back to school, I decided to enroll.

"I'm a great lover of music," he said. "No one anywhere enjoys listening to music more than I do. I have a violin that I love to play."

He also takes piano lessons at McCain Auditorium. He said that when he was younger, he cut pictures of band instruments out of a catalog.

The last time Brock was a student was in 1929, when he graduated from high school. He still wears his class ring, which has worn thin with time.

"When I went to school, everybody met in the same building," he said.

He said his old school building was torn down quite a few years ago, "but they had a heck of a time doing it." Brock is kind of like that old school building; there isn't anything that's going to bring him down.

"I'm happy being on campus — around young people," Brock said.

He has taken an introduction to the library class and a poetry class at K-State.

"I enjoyed the library class very much and the poetry class, too," he said.

In the poetry class, the students wrote poems and read them to the other students, then they discussed their accomplishments. One of his classmates wrote him a poem, which appears at the beginning of this story. Brock said he loves the poem and shows it off to others.

"I'll write some poetry only when something comes to me," Brock said.

There was one poem he wrote that he showed me. It was about a lady he knows. It was about the way a lady should be, and it was written for her.

He met another lady while he was recuperating from surgery. "She became my dearest friend," he said.

The fact is, Brock likes people, especially young people.

"I love young people, I love every one of you. I'd rather be around young people than people my own age," he said.

Brock also has a diary, so to speak. "I'd never been west of Salina until I was 64," he said.

Since then he's been on many trips filled with memories of mountains and friends met along the way. These memories fill the pages of his diary. A photo album helps him keep the memories fresh.

"I write every trip down in a notebook, and keep all the pictures in my photo album right beside it," Brock said. "My favorite trip so far has taken me through Colorado and out to the Grand Canyon."

However, he said he longs to see Alaska — the wide open spaces, the unspoiled and untamed land.

"It's almost dangerous," Brock said wistfully.

Brock makes the trip across campus with violin in hand to McCain Auditorium many times during the week.

Denise Shain, junior in medical records administration, looks on as Christy Levine, junior in fashion marketing, receives a hug from Brock for serving him dinner and giving him a framed photograph of them together. Levine invited him to dinner after meeting him in the library.

Welsh pianists top list at music festival

The Flint Hills Festival of Music, which began Thursday, continues this week and will be highlighted by the workshops and concerts of Welsh pianists Richard McMahon and Martin Jones.

Compositions by Chopin, Beethoven and Liszt and the melodies of Johann Strauss' opera "Die Fledermaus" will highlight Jones' solo concert at 8 p.m. today in McCain Auditorium.

Jones trained at the Royal Academy of Music and at the Academia Chigiana in Siena, Italy. He made his London debut as a soloist in 1968. In 1971 he became pianist in residence at University College, Cardiff, Wales. He has appeared with most of the leading British orchestras and broadcasts frequently with the British Broadcasting Company (BBC).

McMahon, who joined the Cardiff faculty in 1972 after studying in Paris, also has been on the BBC many times.

McMahon and Jones will perform as a duo several times while in Manhattan for the festival.

The duo's first Manhattan performance will be at 2:30 p.m. Wednesday at Lee Elementary School.

The pianists also will perform together Friday at the Manhattan Holidome. The program includes selections by Rachmaninoff, Grieger and Gershwin.

"It is healthy to have artists of their caliber in the community," said Rod Walker, chairman of the festival planning committee and associate professor of music. "Jones and McMahon will be sharing their talent not only in their public performances, but also with K-State students in master class presentations."

Martin Mailman, professor of music at North Texas State University, will instruct composer workshops and master classes with composition students. He has been a guest conductor, composer, and lecturer at more than 70 colleges and universities. Mailman will conduct a concert at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday at Manhattan High School.

Other highlights of the festival are concerts by the K-State Wind Ensemble and a duo performance by faculty members Mary Ellen Sutton, assistant professor of music, and Craig Parker, professor of music, on the organ and trumpet, respectively.

The calendar of the remainder of the festival follows:

TODAY

Piano Master Class with Richard McMahon, 10:30 a.m., Danforth Chapel.

"The People's Choice: An Evening With Martin Jones, pianist," 8 p.m., McCain Auditorium.

TUESDAY

Well's legend results in divers' deaths

By The Associated Press

WIMBERLEY, Texas — No one knows the depth of Jacob's Well, but at least nine people have drowned trying to find out, and divers say the spring's legend may draw more victims to its pristine waters.

"It's not like any other diving spot...anywhere in Texas," said Paul Battaglia, a diving enthusiast who helped recover bodies of four of the last five victims.

The seemingly bottomless waters in a cave a week ago killed Wayne Russell, 36, a mailman from Austin. He was the second diver to drown there in the past four months. But neither the deaths nor round-the-clock patrols nor a steel grate keep divers away.

Due to publicity on the recent drownings, people around this picturesque Hill Country town expect the death count to rise.

"I think it's going to have to be closed, or opened to the public and controlled," said Dan Dibble, a diver who is critical of attempts to enter the cave and has joined in rescue attempts.

The spring is the headwaters of Cypress Creek, a stream that snakes through the hills between Austin and San Antonio. Old-time residents say the spring, whose waters remain at 66 to 70 degrees year around, is named for a man who settled in the area in the early 1800s.

A Spanish explorer is said to have first recorded the spring in the late 1700s when his party came upon a 30-foot geyser.

The area is patrolled by guards for Woodcreek Resort Properties, which owns land extending a few yards from the creek bed. Four owners of the site have tried to keep the curious away from what has been referred to as a natural "attractive nuisance." Nothing has worked.

In 1980, at the request of the owners, divers embedded a steel grate in concrete at the mouth of a tunnel that begins about 90 feet below the spring's serene surface. But others hacked away at the metal and eventually reopened the slender passageway that leads to the cave's fourth chamber and its spring, where divers say the waters are so clear that their underwater flashlights seem to shine into infinity.

The underwater passage is so narrow divers usually must temporarily remove air tanks, but from the surface the trek doesn't seem hard.

"It's too easy," said Dibble, who owns a scuba gear shop in nearby San Marcos. He ruptured his stomach in 1979 trying to rescue two drowning victims.

Russell, whose tank had been removed when his body was found, went into the cave with two Austin friends last Sunday and probably ran out of oxygen, Dibble said.

UPC names best comedian at second biennial 'Laff-Off'

Andre Kelley, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, was deemed K-State's best comedian Friday during the second biennial Laff-Off sponsored by the Union Program Council Coffeehouse Committee.

Rick Efros, graduate in education administration and foundations, came in second, and John Winningham, junior in theater, placed third during the program, which was held in the Union Cafeteria.

The contest was held in conjunction with Late Night Union events, a series of special activities which were held during the weekend. The Late Night Union was sponsored by the UPC Special Events Committee.

The Late Night Union events included a performance by Jeff Eubanks, a solo guitarist from Kansas City; a late night movie, "Bullwinkle and Friends"; a billiards tournament and a casino game.

A performance by the K-State Jazz Ensemble and K-Laires, K-State's square-dancing club also were given.

Wildcats withstand late Tiger surge, 53-47

Staff/Allen Eyston

In desperation, Missouri's Greg Cavener fouls K-State's Ben Mitchell during the final minutes of the game Saturday in Ahearn Field House. The Wildcats captured a 53-47 basketball victory by holding off a Tiger rally late in the contest.

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

In a game where the agony of defeat may have outweighed the thrill of victory, K-State held off a late University of Missouri charge Saturday to claim a 53-47 win over the Tigers in the final regular season contest of this year's Big Eight Conference season.

With the loss, the Tigers completed a riches-to-rags story. After claiming four straight conference championships, Missouri fell to the Big Eight cellar. To make matters worse, with the eighth seed in the conference post-season tournament, the Tigers are forced to travel to Norman on Tuesday to face the conference champions, the sixth-ranked Oklahoma Sooners.

"We're the only club that's been in the final four every year and we only had to go on the road one time," Missouri Coach Norm Stewart said. "It's tough, in fact in this situation it's almost impossible, but that is our opportunity, that's our challenge and that's what we have to do."

K-State's future looks somewhat brighter. The Wildcats claimed the sixth seed in the post-season tournament and will play the University of Nebraska on Tuesday in Lincoln. The 'Cats finished the regular season 5-9 in conference play and 13-14 overall.

Defense was the difference in Saturday's contest. As in K-State's 67-46 win in Columbia earlier this season, the 'Cats used a tightly packed zone defense to stop the Tigers inside. As a result, the Tigers only managed 47 points on 40 percent shooting from the floor.

Meanwhile, the 'Cats played a controlled game on the offensive end — converting 52 percent of their shots from the field.

"We played solid, played sound for the most part," K-State Coach Jack Hartman said. "Our stats show 10 turnovers, which isn't bad against a good defense."

"Missouri played well defensively, shots were hard to come by," Hartman said. "They really played well and had a good defensive strategy."

In the game's opening minutes, it looked like the Tigers' best defensive strategy was to let the 'Cats' junior Tom Alfaro shoot from outside. The 6-foot-7 guard came out cold, missing his first four shots from the floor early in the contest. But soon Alfaro's shooting arm warmed up and he led the 'Cats in scoring for the eighth straight game as he tallied 19 points.

"Tom's kind of a positive thinker," Hartman said. "As long as he can shoot, he's happy. I mean that out of admiration and respect."

"Kids who shoot that ball know they're going to miss, but they don't catalog those, they just keep on firing. You've got to grit your teeth and turn your head when you grit your teeth so they can't see you. Tom doesn't scare out; he loves to play. I'm proud of the development he's made," Hartman said.

Led by the shooting of guard Prince Bridges, the Tigers jumped out to an early lead. Bridges canned two long jumpers to help Missouri claim an 8-4 lead.

With Alfaro's early cold shooting hand, sophomore guard Jim Roder took over. After Roder hit a jumper and a layup off a feed by sophomore Ben Mitchell, and junior Eddie Elder converted two free throws, the 'Cats jumped to a 10-8 advantage and never trailed again.

"Tom came out a little cold and a couple of others weren't hitting early," Roder said. "It was a matter of time before they warmed up, but I've got my confidence up and I'm looking to score more."

With Alfaro back in shooting form — hitting six of his next seven shots to score 12 first half points — the 'Cats took out a 26-20 halftime advantage.

The 'Cats came out firing in the second half as they opened up a 12-point cushion, 36-24, with 12:46 left.

"We really came out in the second half," Hartman said. "We had good execution, shot selection and we moved away from them and got a pretty good cushion. You sit there nervously and wait to see if it will turn on you."

And turn it did. With the lead, K-State began to play tentatively. Missouri took advantage of the situation to slowly work back into the contest. A 10-foot jumper by Missouri's Cecil Estes brought the Tigers to within two, 38-36, with 4:46 remaining.

"On offense, we didn't take the shots — we were late," Roder said. "We weren't aggressive and we were looking more to run time off the clock."

"Almost every ballgame, there are momentum changes," Hartman said. "We were going along there pretty good, then Missouri catches fire and all of the sudden we've got a new ballgame, but I thought our kids did a good job of fighting them off."

Jumpers by Alfaro and Elder and a free throw by Roder helped the 'Cats re-open a six point lead, 43-37, with 2:06 left as Missouri scored only one point on a Greg Cavener free throw over the two-minute stretch.

Mitchell joined Alfaro in double figures for the 'Cats with 10 points. Sophomore forward Tyrone Jackson, in his first start of the year, provided rebounding help as he grabbed a team-high seven caroms. Roder dished out five assists and made two steals to go along with his six points.

Cavener led the Missouri effort with 15 points.

"It was our last home game and we wanted to play well," Hartman said. "Our kids' attitude has been great, they've been an outstanding group in that standpoint. I've been pleased that we've been playing well, and I don't think the losses to Nebraska and Kansas damaged us mentally."

"It's a new season," Jackson said. "I think we've got a good chance of getting to Kansas City."

Lady 'Cats hit century mark, grab share of title

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

Jennifer Jones' 10-foot jumper at the buzzer was a fitting end to the K-State-University of Missouri showdown in Saturday's basketball action at Ahearn Field House.

It would be the basket that gave Jones a career-high 33 points for the afternoon. It would be the basket that lifted the 11th-ranked Lady 'Cats into the century mark in a 100-84 win over the seventh-ranked Lady Tigers. But more importantly, that basket — along with all the rest of K-State's points — gave the Lady 'Cats a share of the Big Eight Conference regular-season championship and a first-place seeding in the Big Eight postseason tournament beginning Tuesday night.

Before a record crowd of 4,250, the Lady 'Cats avenged an earlier 66-62 defeat to MU, improved their overall record to 22-5 and ended their conference record at 12-2. MU dropped to 23-6 overall and 12-2 in league play.

"It's just a big, big win," Head Coach Lynn Hickey said. "I'd like to have the title all by ourselves, but we'll take co-champions. I'm not going to complain about that."

What would there be to complain about, especially when considering the second half of play, in which the Lady 'Cats hit a whopping 79 percent from the field and steadily pulled away from a slim 35-31 halftime lead. K-State hit 23 of 29 from the field in the second half.

Tina Dixon paced K-State's hot-handed, second-half shooting at the outset, as the 6-foot-3 sophomore connected on the Lady 'Cats first seven points. Dixon, who started for only the second time since suffering a knee injury earlier in the season, hit 11 of 15 field goals and four of eight free throws for 26 points.

But even Dixon's 26 points was overshadowed by the scoring of Jones, who hit 12 of 13 field goals and nine of 11 free throws for her 33 points. Jones had only seven points during the first half, as K-State failed to open up more than a seven-point lead. An eight-foot shot by Joni Davis gave MU a 21-20 advantage and what would be its only lead of the contest.

K-State utilized a fast-break offense and tough inside shooting to take a 53-40 lead with 14:07 remaining in the contest. Only one of K-State's first seven field goals following intermission was beyond an eight-foot range.

"We just did a better job on offense this time," said Hickey in reference to K-State's poor 36 percent field-goal showing at Columbia on Feb. 8. "We ran the ball, and we hadn't done that."

And run the Lady 'Cats did, dishing out 21 assists — 11 from Cassandra Jones — and grabbing nine steals in a contest that featured 23 MU turnovers. K-State committed 16.

"They were breaking our press very well by passing the ball and not dribbling it," MU Head Coach Joann Rutherford said. "We didn't break their press. We dribbled too much."

MU made its last scoring run of the contest beginning at the 13:58 mark, outscoring the Lady 'Cats 9-4 to cut the K-State lead to 59-51. The Lady 'Cats came right back, however, outscoring the Lady Tigers 12-6 within the next two minutes to increase their lead to 14 points with 8 minutes left to play.

K-State led by as many as 19 points as Jennifer Jones connected for 14 points in the game's last four minutes. Jones hit an inside shot with 21 seconds remaining, as well as the 10-footer at the buzzer, to close out K-State's 100-84 win.

Cassandra Jones and Angie Bonner followed Jennifer Jones and Dixon in the scoring column with 16 and 14 points, respectively.

K-State's Sheronda Jenkins dives to deflect a pass during first-half basketball action of the Lady Cats' 100-84 victory over the University of Missouri on Saturday in Ahearn Field House. The 'Cats will play Iowa State University Tuesday in the opening round of the Big Eight tournament.

Tough pitching keys double-header wins

The K-State baseball team's season got off to a fine start as the Wildcats took a pair of contests from Baker University on Friday, 7-5 and 6-2, at Frank Meyers Field. The team came back Saturday to take two more games from Baker, 4-2 and 16-1.

Todd Thamer led the Wildcats to their opening victory with a run-scoring double in the first inning and an RBI single in the second.

Doubles by Brian Bascue and Eric Gossett and a single by Scott Graves led a three-run fifth inning for the 'Cats.

Pitcher Mike Wilkerson allowed six Baker hits in the game and struck out eight in going the distance for the victory.

The 'Cats committed four errors in the opener, and only two of Baker's five runs were earned.

In Friday's second game, Bascue and Mark Goodwin had run-scoring singles in the first inning and the 'Cats were on their way to sweep of the doubleheader with their 6-2 victory.

Wildcat pitcher John Caresio allowed six hits in the second game while walking three and fanning eight.

Cary Colbert's three-run homer in the last inning gave the Wildcats a 4-2 comeback victory in the third game of the four-game series. Colbert's homer was only the second hit off Baker's losing pitcher Steve Locke. The Baker hurler struck out two and walked six.

Gerry Zimmerman picked up the win in relief for the Wildcats.

In the final game, the 'Cats jumped on Baker early, scoring 10 runs in the first two innings. The key hit was a grand slam homer by Steve Goodwin in the second inning.

Tom Myers slugged a homer in the fourth inning as the Wildcats raised their record to 4-0.

Lynn Lichter was K-State's winning pitcher, allowing two hits and striking out six.

Pairings set for Big Eight tournament

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The University of Missouri reign at the top has ended not with a whimper, but a bang.

Everybody figured that after posting four consecutive Big Eight Conference championships the Tigers probably would decline a bit this year, having lost stars Steve Stipanovich and Jon Sundvold to the first round of the professional draft.

But last place? Did anybody figure the Tigers for last place?

But last is where Norm Stewart's boys find themselves at the end of the regular season. Almost as shocking is the company the last-place Tigers are keeping. The K-State Wildcats are there, too, along with Oklahoma State University. In fact, the Wildcats pulled the Tigers into the cellar with them by beating Missouri, 53-47.

Life at the top of the Big Eight charts, in the meantime, is more exhilarating than ever, they say. Sixth-ranked and regular-season champion University of Oklahoma did what it set out a week ago to do — win all three of its remaining regular-season games, including a 78-70 victory over No. 7 University of Nevada-Las Vegas. The University of Kansas, the No. 2 team in the Big Eight, ended its regular season with a 91-70 pounding of Oklahoma State and Iowa State University notched a first-division finish by beating the University of Colorado, 70-62.

As a result, the post-season tournament picture looks like this: Oklahoma, 13-1, 27-3, will host Missouri, 5-9, 16-13, at 7:10 p.m. Tuesday night; Kansas, 9-5, 18-9, will host Oklahoma State, 5-9, 13-14, two hours later; Wednesday at 7:10 p.m., Nebraska, 7-7, 17-10, hosts K-State, 5-9, 13-14; and at 9:10 p.m., Iowa State, 6-8, 16-11, hosts Colorado 6-8, 15-12.

The first-round winners advance to the semifinals Friday night in Kansas City. The champion will be crowned Saturday night and receive the Big Eight's automatic entry in the NCAA Tournament, which will announce its bracket on Sunday.

The Sooners, now the winningest basketball team in Oklahoma history, figure to capture one of the top seeds in the NCAA Tournament if they can survive the three Big Eight tournament games.

"I think this will help us more than any other game we've played all season," said Wayne Tisdale, Oklahoma's sophomore All-American who had 21 points and nine rebounds.

Rule tightens academic requirements

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

(Editor's note: This is the first article in a two-part series about regulations regarding future changes in the academic requirements of student athletes. The second part will deal with the NCAA's satisfactory progress rule.)

Because collegiate athletics have become a multi-billion dollar operation and because of some abuses that have become known through the media, university presidents have decided they must become involved in establishing guidelines for athletic programs, Dick Elkins, K-State director of admissions, said.

Forty university presidents have introduced legislation to the National Collegiate Athletic Association, including a proposal for an admissions rule for Division I schools, including K-State, called the 2.0 Qualifier Rule.

An institution which desires to be a member of Division I must sponsor a minimum of eight varsity intercollegiate sports, including football or basketball. These programs are classified as being in Division I based on average home game attendance, according to the NCAA 1983 Convention Program.

Kathleen Hatke, legislative assistant for the NCAA, explained the 2.0 Qualifier Rule, which has some amendments scheduled to go into effect August 1, 1986.

The amendments, which were passed at the 77th NCAA convention in January 1983, changed the definition of the term "qualifier," Hatke said.

The previous rule stated that a student athlete must complete six, seven or eight semesters with a 2.0

grade point average as certified by his high school.

Now a 2.0 GPA must be completed in a core curriculum of at least 11 academic courses, including three years of English, two years of math, two years of social science and two years of natural or physical science (including at least one laboratory class if offered at the high school), Hatke said. This would be certified on the high school transcript and only affect admissions into Division I schools.

A second amendment to the Qualifier Rule states that a high school student must receive a 700 combined score on the Scholastic Aptitude Test, a two-axis test with a verbal and a math score (they are scored from 200-800, so, for example, if a student got a 300 on the verbal section, then he would have to have a 400 on the math).

The American College Test is a four-part test including math, English, social science and natural science. The composite score, which according to the amendment must be 15, is an average of the scores received on the four test sections.

The previous rule did not require a student athlete to successfully complete the ACT or the SAT, the two tests primarily used for college admissions in the United States, Elkins said.

The second amendment to the qualifier rule has drawn some opposition, he said.

"The comment was made by a representative of the NCAA at a meeting in Chicago that if that (minimum test score requirement) had been put into place four years ago, 75 percent of the black athletes in the United States would not meet that requirement," Elkins said.

Presidents of universities with primarily black student populations in the United States strongly voiced their opinion against this, saying that it is discriminatory for black students, it is unfair and is racially biased, Elkins said.

The rule will take effect in 1986, but it is likely that it will be revised before then since it is a major concern, he said.

"I personally would be disappointed if they watered down the rule," said Jim Epps, the academic counselor for K-State athletics.

"I think this is a very healthy rule that the NCAA has legislated. This is going to impose legitimate standards on high school students who aspire to be student athletes at a Division I university. This is going to force them to better prepare themselves academically so they can compete in the classroom once they get to a university.

"I strongly endorse that. I think that most academic counselors do. As a result, we're going to find better students who are also athletes.

"When we look at it, those are not terribly demanding standards to expect any student who aspires to get a college degree," Epps said.

"What this means is that not only here at K-State, but universities all across the country are going to find a lot of high school athletes not qualifying — not meeting the standards of Division I universities," Epps said.

But there are still several options available to the student-athlete with academic deficiencies. One is to study at a junior college or a small college. Another is to go to a Division I school and sit out the first year and not be eligible to practice or compete. If, after a year, the student-athlete meets the 24-hour requirement, which states that 24 credit hours must have been earned during the freshman year, he would become eligible for competition, Epps said.

One problem that arises with the 2.0 Qualifier Rule is defining what is a solid English course. Another problem is deciding who is going to certify or decide that a course in high school is equivalent to a solid math course, Elkins said.

"In high schools, there are some variable level math courses which are probably good for a student who wants to go out and balance a checkbook and go to a grocery store, but it is not the type of math that is going to help them be successful in college algebra at Kansas State University," Elkins said.

He also said he thinks a lot of pressure could be put on high schools to say that a business math course, which is learning to balance a checkbook, is a solid math course.

For example, Elkins said, suppose Manhattan High School had a star that was predicted to be an All-American Heisman Trophy winner, play three years in college and go on to be the greatest quarterback ever. Local pressure would be put on the high school to certify that the athlete had taken the required subjects, or that student wouldn't be able to fulfill the predictions, Elkins said.

Cooperstown to open doors for fielding stars

By The Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — Shortstop Pee Wee Reese and catcher Rick Ferrell, outstanding defensive players during long major league careers, were named to the Baseball Hall of Fame by the Veterans Committee Sunday.

They will be inducted in Cooperstown, N.Y., Aug. 12 with slugger Harmon Killebrew, shortstop Luis Aparicio and pitcher Don Drysdale, elected by the Baseball Writers Association of America in January.

"I'm delighted I had hoped it might happen someday, but I didn't know when," Ferrell, 78, now a consultant with the Detroit Tigers, said by phone from nearby Clearwater. "It's a great honor."

Reese played 16 years with the Dodgers in Brooklyn and Los Angeles, batting .269. He was captain of the team and leader of a club that won six National League pennants from 1947-1956.

The 65-year-old native of Ekron, Ky., led National League shortstops in double plays in 1942 and 1948 and led the league in putouts four times. He shares the World Series record seven double plays by a shortstop in a seven-game series, reaching that in 1955 and 1956.

Ferrell played for 18 years with the St. Louis Browns, Boston Red Sox and Washington, batting .281 with 28 home runs and 734 RBI. He was considered an expert handler of pitchers and caught 1,805 games, breaking Ray Schalk's AL record 1,722 games caught on July 6, 1945.

The Durham, N.C.-born Ferrell caught over 100 games for 10 years and caught more than 90 games three other seasons. He hit over .300 four times, topping that mark in 1931, 1932, 1935, 1936.

Reese was elected in his first year of eligibility by the 18-man Veterans Committee. Ferrell, who retired in 1947, has been eligible since 1972.

The breakdown of the voting was not announced. "All I can tell you is that they (Reese and Ferrell) received at least 75 percent," Ed Stack, president of the Baseball Hall of Fame, said.

Rugby club stumbles, 21-15

The K-State Rugby Club lost a tough contest against the Kansas City Blues on Saturday at Kansas City's Swope Park, 21-15.

K-State scored when Kelly Cohan, the captain of the K-State squad, blocked a Blues' kick and passed it to Al Case who took it in for the try.

Mark Mikinski scored the second try following a scrum five meters from the goal line. Cohan drove with the ball reaching the goal line before losing it, and Mikinski grabbed it in the end zone.

Bill Knopick kicked both conversions following the K-State scores.

"They were super kicks — just super," said Cohan, referring to the tough angles that Knopick had to kick from.

Knopick was injured midway through the game which "changed the momentum in their (Blues') favor," Cohan said. "But the guys played the best rugby they could," he said.

The squad will next face the University of Kansas Club Side at 1:30 p.m. Saturday at the KU Rugby Field.

Major clothing chain withdraws from mall

By LEE WHITE
Manhattan Editor

One of the two major stores set to become part of Manhattan's proposed downtown mall has been pulled out of the project, leaving uncertainty about Urban Development Action Grant (UDAG) requirements which mandate two "anchor" stores.

Mayor Wanda Fateley confirmed late Monday afternoon that The Mercantile Stores Co., parent firm of The Jones Store Co., informed mall developer Mel Roebuck last week that it had decided not to participate in the project by building a Jones Store in the mall.

Fateley said that meeting the requirement for two anchor stores is the responsibility of Roebuck's company, Forest City Enterprises, because a contract between the city and the firm calls for two major department stores to be located in the mall. There was no contract directly between the city and The Mercantile Stores Co., but rather commitment letters to satisfy Department of Housing and Urban Development requirements for the UDAG, she said.

"All the city had to rely on was the commitment," Fateley said. "What legal weight the commitment has, I don't know. If it satisfied them (HUD), what is the city to say?"

Although one major store has left the project, there is still hope of securing a Dillard's store.

"The latest word that I had was that Mel said he would be having his commitment letter going to Dillard's this week," Fateley said.

Roebuck, vice president of Cleveland-based Forest City Enterprises, couldn't be reached for comment. The person answering the telephone at The Mercantile Stores Co., Teaneck, N.J., said E.J. Sharkey, the official overseeing the company's participation in the Manhattan mall, would be out of his office until the middle of next week.

The J.C. Penney Co. Inc. apparently is still planning to build in the mall. JCP Realty, part of the J.C. Penney firm, is a 50-50 partner in downtown redevelopment with Forest City Enterprises.

Manhattan received preliminary approval of a $10 million UDAG in October 1983 after about two years of attempts to get the funding. To gain UDAG funding, a governmental unit must prove that a project is necessary and that it wouldn't be feasible without the grant.

Speaker criticizes presence of U.S. troops in Honduras

By BRAD STUCKY
Collegian Reporter

Honduras has become a militarily occupied country, not for the benefit of the people's problems, but for strategy, Efrain Diaz, Honduran Congress member and K-State graduate, said Monday at the second Lou Douglas Lecture on Public Affairs in Union Forum Hall.

Diaz, an economics professor at Honduras National University and the lone Christian Democrat representative, said the Big Pine operation in Honduras is justifying militarism while distracting from the real problems of poverty and illiteracy. The operation has provided more than 5,000 U.S. troops to train Hondurans and build new military installations to ward off potential Nicaraguan attacks.

"Honduras doesn't have a problem with Nicaragua. The United States has a problem with Nicaragua," he said.

Diaz, who was called "a kind of one-man national conscience" in a recent issue of The Nation magazine, said his country is being involved in cold war politics. The struggle against communism that the Reagan administration is fighting in Nicaragua on the Honduras border is increasingly polarizing the people and leading to violence like that in El Salvador, he said.

The Big Pine operation consists of a training center manned by 200 Green Berets, two radar stations and the construction of seven airfields for the United States. Making Honduras the center of operations, Diaz said, provides the infrastructure for sustained U.S. combat presence. This policy is decided by Honduran leaders and military and the U.S. ambassador under the direction of Reagan.

"In 1981, 80 percent of the (Honduran) voters wanted to reduce militarization, but there was no change," Diaz said. "It has been increased now, with human rights violations being justified in the cause of fighting communism."

"There is widespread poverty, which affects almost 80 percent of our people," he said. "There is almost 50 percent illiteracy, which is higher in the rural areas."

"Militarization hampers the capabilities to face the real problems of the Hondurans. Armaments are the real threat that produce instability, social inequality and the loss of human dignity," Diaz said.

He said he feels no threat sharing a common border with Nicaragua. He said it is basically not an expansionist country.

Diaz said the 1984 bilateral military agreement with the United States was justified only in appendices to the original 1954 Honduran constitution. The arms buildup was neither debated nor approved by the Honduran government.

Diaz said an overall change needs to be made to strengthen democratic principles by shifting national attention to problems of the Honduran people.

"I believe Honduras can peacefully co-exist with other countries — even the Sandinistas. However, military problems cannot solve ideological differences," he said.

U.S. Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor said in a speech Monday night at the University of Kansas that consistency is the key to stability for the Supreme Court.

Justice O'Connor details court's policies, agenda during Monday night KU talk

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer
and LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

LAWRENCE — The process of setting the U.S. Supreme Court agenda is understood by few citizens, said Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. O'Connor spoke Monday night at the University of Kansas as part of the J.A. Vickers Sr. Memorial Lecture Series.

This lack of understanding is illustrated by a recent public opinion poll which showed 77 percent of the public believes the Supreme Court could overturn any state law.

"The Supreme Court has the power only to decide questions of federal law," O'Connor said. "Most have only the haziest of ideas of what the court does."

The Supreme Court agrees to review only a small percentage of the cases referred to it. The court considers only about 150 cases each term, O'Connor said.

"Students of the court believe that is too many because of the careful consideration the cases merit," she said.

Consistency in the kinds of cases reviewed characterizes the Supreme Court, she said.

"I was somewhat surprised but reassured to find most cases considered are marked by stability," she said.

The question of civil rights is one of the few areas that has changed greatly, O'Connor said. Prior to the 1950s, the court heard few civil rights cases.

"The Brown vs. Topeka Board of Education case decided in 1954 was the catalyst to the increase in the number of (civil rights) cases," she said. "The court's decision required an end to racial segregation in public schools."

The case ranks as the most important Kansas case reviewed by the court, she said, and is one of the most significant cases in the court's history.

"Cases like Brown are extremely rare," O'Connor said. "Most cases are a steady routine of overseeing federal statutes."

Although the number of civil rights cases have increased dramatically, the number of most types of cases have remained constant during the past 30 years.

"The number of criminal cases heard by the Supreme Court was 12 a term by the 1950s," O'Connor said. "This has increased to 25 a term since the 1960s and has remained steady into the 1980s."

O'Connor attributes this stability to the fact that criminal procedure is not yet perfected.

"The continuing process of re-examination allows the laws to be developed gradually so the court can correct and refine laws. The possibility of later correction allows direction to be explored in the first place," she said.

The rate of most civil cases also has remained steady during the last 30 years. The reason civil cases have remained steady is due to disagreements between federal appeals courts, O'Connor said.

"As long as there is more than one circuit court, there is more than one view of the law," she said. "If you had two lawyers in a room, you would have three opinions."

Decreases have occurred in the number of federal tax law and immigration cases heard by the court. These laws are older and have been interpreted clearly, O'Connor said.

More cases have recently been filed affecting freedom of information. The first freedom of information case was heard in 1970, and the court has reviewed 17 such cases since.

When the agenda does change, it is frequently a response to changes in the nation's agenda.

"Justice moves slowly as we tend to arrive on the scene several years late, then we linger a while," O'Connor said.

Gemayel abrogates pact

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — President Amin Gemayel's government scrapped Lebanon's troop withdrawal pact with Israel on Monday as part of a deal with Syria designed to end the Lebanese civil war.

Gemayel held an emergency session of his Council of Ministers to announce abrogation of the U.S.-mediated pact, signed May 17.

"The council has decided to cancel this... accord, consider it null and void and alter everything that may have resulted from it," said a statement from the council, Lebanon's Cabinet.

In response, Syria was expected to guarantee its Druse and Moslem militia allies in Lebanon will support a cease-fire while Lebanese reconciliation talks resume in Switzerland.

Israel condemned the move as a capitulation to Syrian "dictates." A spokesman for President Reagan expressed "regret."

Israeli jets bombed suspected guerrilla bases at Aley near Beirut before and during the Cabinet session. In Beirut, rocket fire killed a French soldier and a gunman wounded a U.S. Marine colonel. Police said fighting among Lebanese factions along the line between Christian east and Moslem west Beirut killed two and wounded 11.

Army Col. Don McClary, a U.S. military spokesman, said the Marine colonel, whose name was withheld, was in stable condition.

A communique by the French command said the French soldier died from a rocket wound at the line between the Moslem and Christian sectors.

He was the 86th French soldier killed since the multinational force was deployed in Beirut 17 months ago. The U.S., Italian and British forces have withdrawn, leaving only 1,250 French soldiers.

French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson, on a visit to Lebanon, said the French force no longer belongs in Beirut.

"A multinational force must include at least two different forces," he said.

Reagan pushes for approval

Senate argues school prayer

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate began consideration Monday of a proposed school prayer amendment, with President Reagan pressing for approval and liberal opponents threatening to prolong the emotionally charged debate until June.

The measure is not before the House, but supporters held a round-the-clock talkathon in the House chamber in behalf of a constitutional amendment allowing voluntary prayers in public schools. Outside the Capitol, demonstrators on both sides of the issue gathered for evening rallies.

Supreme Court decisions have created "a chilling effect on the free exercise of religion in this country," Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker, R-Tenn., said in a speech urging approval of an amendment.

Sen. Lowell Weicker, R-Conn., leading the opposition, said bringing up a school prayer amendment during an election year is "playing with fire... It's not furtherance of religious freedom. It's furtherance of some political end. I don't want anyone telling me how my family, my children, are going to pray. That, in effect, is what's going on on the Senate floor."

While Baker predicted the Senate would be absorbed with the issue for perhaps two weeks, Weicker said he and other Senate opponents may keep the debate going until the first of June.

Weicker denied his tactic is a filibuster, saying he was not trying to postpone a vote indefinitely, but he vowed to give the matter a thorough airing.

"I think something that's stood on the books for 193 years certainly deserves a couple of months' worth of debate," Weicker told reporters, referring to the Constitution.

Baker said even though he was short of enough votes to halt an extended debate, "it's the best opportunity to pass this amendment that we've had" since the mid-1970s.

As debate began on this high priority among Reagan's conservative constituency — Reagan urged approval of the proposed amendment, which faces a close vote in the Senate and an uncertain fate in the House.

"Our amendment would ensure that no child be forced to recite a prayer," Reagan wrote to House Minority Leader Robert Michel, R-Ill.

The amendment, as revised by Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., chairman of the Judiciary Committee, says: "Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prohibit individual or group prayer in public schools or other public institutions. No person shall be required by the United States or by any state to participate in prayer."

The wording of the prayer would be up to each local school.

The Senate also is expected to consider rival versions providing silent prayer or a students' individual choice of a prayer.

The measure must be approved by a two-thirds vote in both House and Senate before states can ratify it. At least 38 states must approve any amendment before it becomes part of the Constitution.

The amendment's backers seek to overturn Supreme Court decisions in 1962 and 1963 barring public schools from setting aside a specific time or text for organized, officially sanctioned classroom prayers.

Journalist to lecture on Mideast

Pulitzer Prize winning journalist Loren Jenkins is scheduled to present an All-University Convocation at 10:30 a.m. Wednesday in McCain Auditorium.

Jenkins will speak on "Reagan's Policy in the Middle East." The lecture is free and open to the public.

Jenkins will conduct a question and answer session at 1 p.m. in the Union Little Theater.

A foreign correspondent for the Washington Post since 1980, Jenkins was awarded a Pulitzer Prize for his reporting of the Shatila massacre in Beirut last fall.

Jenkins also has worked for the Peace Corps in West Africa; United Press International in London, Paris and Madrid, Spain and has reported for Newsweek magazine in Spain, Lebanon, Hong Kong, South Vietnam and Italy.

Call causes evacuation of building

A bomb threat at Ackert Hall forced the evacuation of students and faculty Monday morning, K-State Police Lt. James Tubach said.

Tubach said campus police received the threat at 10:24 a.m. The telephone caller said the bomb was set to go off in 30 minutes. Evacuation was ordered by Terry Johnson, director of the Division of Biology.

A Riley County Police Department bomb expert, Billy Smith, assisted campus police in their investigation of the incident.

Students and faculty were allowed to re-enter the building after 50 minutes, when the time for the supposed explosion had expired and it was determined there was no longer any immediate danger.

Keys helps brother-in-law in campaign

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Sen. Gary Hart will win the presidency because he offers hope for the future and a clear alternative to President Reagan's "militaristic" policies abroad and "unfair" practices at home, former U.S. Rep. Martha Keys said Monday.

More and more Democrats are recognizing that Hart represents their party's best hope for defeating Reagan, and that is the reason the Colorado senator has stunned front-runner Walter Mondale in the early presidential nomination primaries and caucuses, Keys told a statehouse news conference.

"I believe very strongly Gary Hart will be the next president of the United States," said Keys, whose sister is married to Hart. "I believe he offers the clearest alternative to the voters of this nation. He is proving we can have a new kind of leadership."

She said support for Mondale, the former vice president who only a few weeks ago was viewed by the national media as having a virtual hammerlock on the Democratic nomination, is eroding rapidly and Hart is emerging as the front-runner.

Keys, 53, who now lives in Falls Church, Va., teaches and does consulting work, is taking time off to campaign for her brother-in-law. She made stops in Topeka and Wichita Monday, and will be in Manhattan today before going to Arkansas. (Keys will speak in the Union Courtyard at 11 a.m. today, followed by an open luncheon at the Ramada Inn's V.I.P. Room at noon.)

She said she will keep a non-stop pace for Hart through next Tuesday — the so-called "Super Tuesday" in the race for the Democratic nomination, when nine states will hold primaries.

While in Topeka, she met with Gov. John Carlin, who is state chairman of the campaign of Ohio Sen. John Glenn. She said she neither sought nor received any commitment from Carlin to switch to Hart if Glenn falls out of the nomination race after next Tuesday, but noted Carlin has said he is more comfortable with Hart than Mondale.

"He's committed to Sen. Glenn, of course, but I'm sure he's friendly to Sen. Hart," Keys said. "I didn't seek any commitment. We just talked Former Congresswoman Martha Keys, D-Kan., will talk to students about U.S. presidential candidate Sen. Gary Hart, D-Colo., at 11 a.m. today in the Union Courtyard.

Keys represented the 2nd District of Kansas from 1975-1979. She currently lives in Washington, D.C., and is campaigning for Hart, who is her brother-in-law.

An open luncheon will be in the VIP Room of the University Ramada Inn following the campus talk.

over these events, and I received some very good advice from Gov. Carlin."

She said the Hart campaign isn't working to lure supporters away from Glenn and Mondale at this point, but will welcome their support if their favorites fall by the wayside as the nomination campaign continues.

Keys, who represented the 2nd District of northeast Kansas in Congress in 1975-79 before being defeated by Republican Jim Jeffries in the 1978 election, predicted Hart would win one of three primaries in the South next week.

"I believe he will have at least a win in the South — Florida, Alabama or Georgia — but I wouldn't predict which one," she said. "I think we

Rape occurs in apartment by Westloop

A 25-year-old Manhattan woman was raped about 10 a.m. Sunday in her apartment near Westloop Shopping Center, Riley County Police Department officers said.

The rape occurred when the woman answered a knock at her door and was confronted by a man with a handgun who forced her back inside and raped her, police said.

The suspect, who police said threatened to shoot the woman and warned her not to call police or scream, is described as a black male, of medium height and weight, wearing a dark-colored ski mask, dark jacket, blue jeans, gloves and white tennis shoes.

The woman was treated at Irwin Army Hospital, Fort Riley, following the attack for injuries limited to the rape itself, police said.

Police have no suspects in the case and weren't able to determine how the man left the area.

Panel approves marriage license fee increase

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A proposal to increase the marriage license fee by $8 to provide funds for domestic violence programs was approved by the Senate Public Health and Welfare Committee Monday.

The bill now goes to the full Senate for debate and action.

The committee approved the measure after hearing from Sen. Wint Winter Jr., R-Lawrence, who said the funds would supplement, but not replace, the private donations, federal grants and United Way contributions which domestic violence programs now use to support their operations.

An earlier attempt to pass the bill out of committee failed.

The bill would increase marriage license fees to $18 from the current $10 and would authorize the secretary of the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services to distribute the proceeds to domestic violence programs in the state.

Elizabeth Taylor, a lobbyist for the Kansas Association of Domestic Violence Programs, estimated the measure would make $207,000 available each year to the 20 programs now operating in Kansas.

In other action, the committee killed a proposal to give guardians of terminally ill people the authority to discontinue life-sustaining procedures used to artificially prolong a person's life.

According to the Kansas Natural Death Act, people can provide for the discontinuance of life-sustaining procedures should they develop a terminal illness by putting their intent in writing.

The committee also killed a proposal to establish a Kansas hospital commission, which would have regulated hospital budgets and charges in order to keep hospital costs under control.

Sorority cries dead wolf

Members of the Gamma Phi Beta sorority, 1807 Todd Rd., cried wolf early Monday when they opened their front door to find a dead wolf on the porch.

Jean Palma, senior in management and sorority president, reported to the Riley County Police Department shortly after 7 a.m. that someone had placed the animal on the front porch of the house sometime during the night.

The animal was taken to the landfill.

Palma declined to comment about the incident.

Landon undergoes hip operation

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Theo Cobb Landon, wife of former Gov. Alfred M. Landon, underwent what her doctor said was successful surgery at Stormont-Vail Regional Medical Center Monday to replace her right hip joint.

She broke the hip last Friday night in a fall at the family home in northwest Topeka.

Mrs. Landon, 85, has been hospitalized since the fall, which occurred when she tripped on a rug on the second floor of the Landon home.

She was listed in satisfactory condition following about two hours of surgery by Dr. Robert R. Payne of Topeka.

"She's doing just fine," said Landon. "We're all very pleased and relieved."

Landon, who is 96, planned to visit his wife today or Wednesday. He said indications are she will be hospitalized several weeks.

Landon, the 1936 Republican nominee for president, broke his left hip last April and was hospitalized two months after undergoing surgery to place pins in his hip to facilitate healing of the bone. Payne also operated on Landon, who is walking normally again after a long recuperation.

U.S. Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, the Landons' daughter, was home for a speaking engagement over the weekend and visited her parents here Saturday night and Sunday.

Kissinger's NATO plan notable

Henry Kissinger's suggestion to make Europe responsible for negotiating the deployment of intermediate-range nuclear missiles in Europe deserves serious consideration.

Kissinger's plan, outlined in a special section of the March 5 issue of Time magazine, is a call for comprehensive structural reform of NATO with significant additional responsibilities to be assumed by Europe. Kissinger said such a plan is necessary to counteract growing ambivalence between the United States and its European allies regarding a sense of purpose and clear doctrine for NATO.

One portion of Kissinger's plan calls for a mixed delegation, consisting of a European chairman and an American deputy backed by a predominantly European committee, to negotiate with the Soviets regarding nuclear missiles on European soil. This suggestion stands out as something which could be done immediately to catalyze action on the stalled arms talks.

Logic claims merit in the idea of transferring negotiation responsibilities to the Europeans. For example, primarily European countries will reap the benefits or suffer the consequences of the outcome of the arms negotiations.

Also, a growing lack of cohesiveness has developed within NATO as the United States more frequently makes significant foreign policy decisions without the consultation of European allies. Recent action in the Middle East, Africa and the Caribbean Basin has prompted most European leaders to take advantage of a special opportunity to establish better relations with Third World countries by dissociating themselves from U.S. policies.

By forcing European leaders to take a more active role in assessing defensive needs and developing military strategy in protecting the Atlantic Alliance, growing neutrality and isolationism between the United States and Western Europe would be stifled significantly.

Finally, by placing the negotiation responsibilities in the hands of European leaders representing millions of people more directly concerned with nuclear destruction than the American public is, we may see a stronger effort to find a resolution to the nuclear threat.

If necessary, Europe could remove some of the recently deployed missiles as a concession to Soviet demands that all missiles be removed before arms negotiations can continue. Shifting such decisions to the Europeans would allow the United States to protect its credibility and most importantly, get the arms talks resumed.

Reagan policy more than 'bull'

I seldom run across a person who can or will defend Reagan on every issue. What I find more often is the following response: "I don't think his policies are that good, but he's decisive — even if he is wrong, at least he does something."

"He is such a great symbol," this viewpoint continues. "He 'stands tall' and never seems to stray from the path that he has selected. He made me proud to be an American again after the invasion of Grenada. It showed that America is still strong." (Never mind that that invasion was accomplished with less firepower than what we have rusting or blasting away at our own Fort Riley.)

If it is such a symbol we need in the presidency, then why not elect the Merrill Lynch bull? Talk about symbolic! Why, he would out-reagan Reagan! He could paw the ground, look belligerent and if anything bothered him, he'd automatically see red. The economy would recover (a bullish market). Can't you see the headlines? "Bull outwits Bear."

It would not matter that the bull cannot think logically, because all we need is a symbol that never changes its mind and never admits a mistake.

One of my friends thought the bull was not a good analogy because in the commercials, the bull walks through a china shop and never breaks anything. But what you don't see are the thousands of people who look for the bull to accomplish this feat. That would defeat the purpose of the commercial. Similarly, Reagan does not like to show us the glass he has broken, for example, the hundreds of lives lost uselessly in Beirut, the thousands in El Salvador.

DAN ROBISON
Collegian Columnist

But the bull cannot communicate and Reagan, the news media claims, is the "Great Communicator." Bull, I say! At what point did the ability to make a lie palatable become great communication? For example, since it was found to be politically useful, Reagan has claimed that he believes "Nuclear war is not winnable (sic)." At the same time he is pushing through a $450 billion program for first-strike capability, MX missiles and civil defense. This program is based, necessarily, on the premise that we can win a nuclear war. Reagan's lie is not that he says nuclear war is not unwinnable, but that he believes it at all.

So, who cares? He makes us feel safe. Well, that particular disparity between what Reagan says and what he does costs each U.S. citizen almost $2,000 (not to mention the increased threat of a nuclear exchange).

Federal budgets currently under proposal are expected to incur deficits of $200 billion. Reagan looks at this and declares it to be "clear economic recovery." Once again we applaud the great communicator.

Perhaps these are slight untruths, people seem to say, but we can forgive him because he has such charisma, because he is so folksy. Isn't this somewhat like smiling at a child when he is naughty, just because he is cute? If this is not the way to raise a child, why should it be the way to respond to a president?

In this light, great communication is simply the ability to tell people what they want to hear. Mussolini was a great communicator (and a bullish symbol). Hitler was a great communicator. Shouldn't we be wary of leaders whose main attribute is "great communication?"

Apparently it boils down to this: people in this country like to be told that world problems are simple, and have simple solutions. It makes them feel safer. They don't like to be told that Salvadoran peasants have minds of their own — dealing with their opinions just complicates the issue.

They don't like to be told there is more to a Russian than a Marxist trigger-finger. It is more exciting to think of them as a monolithic, evil machine whose sole reason for existence is to end the United States — and to think of Reagan as our "knight in shining armor."

The bull, like Reagan, would never admit any mistakes. In contrast, we had Carter. His shortcoming was not that he made a few mistakes, but that he admitted them — he admitted the world was more complex than a B-movie script.

So, whether Reagan is dealing with Honduras, the military budget or acid rain, his motto appears to be the same: right or wrong, America means never having to say you're sorry.

High cost for reading magazines

In an attempt to understand the role pornography plays in delinquency, sexual abuse and exploitation of children, the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention in the Department of Justice has commissioned a study of sexually explicit and other general circulation magazines.

The study will examine such magazines in an attempt to assess the link between pornography and juvenile delinquency. The director of the study, Judith Reisman, said the research is important because "We know very little about the way pornography works," but the magazines in question are known to have a significant impact on juveniles.

Cost of the study: $798,531.

This seems to be an excessive amount of money to spend looking at magazines, even if the cause is a worthy one.

According to a staff memo written Aug. 22, 1983, cost for the survey was estimated at $60,000. Pamela Swain, head of research, evaluation and program development for the office, wrote in the memo: "This project can be accomplished in a much shorter time period, and at a considerably reduced cost..."

But office head Alfred Regnery said the memo was based on a preliminary funding proposal that was later changed, and Swain withdrew the memo as inaccurate.

In addition, the cost proposal bid was accepted without competition, a requirement Regnery said his office is not required to fill.

It sounds as if the office has good intentions, but nearly $800,000 seems to be a rather hefty price to learn how Playboy, Penthouse and Hustler magazines may encourage violence among and against youngsters. And if interdepartmental contradictions are any indication, careful gauging of the study while in process by members of the press may be necessary to ensure taxpayers will get their money's worth.

Different perceptions of reality

WASHINGTON — When Maria returned from Guatemala, she told of the flies. Twice a week, sometimes more often, a helicopter circled her village and dropped plastic bags filled with flies. The bags broke when they hit the ground, and the flies escaped. The government said the flies were good for the crops. The farmers did not believe the government, and so they tried to kill the flies.

In the village, some of the people said the flies were eating the coffee-plant flowers. Others said they were not so sure. Maybe the flies were supposed to pollinate the plants.

These opinions, though, were in the minority and so, when the helicopter appeared, the farmers waited until the bags hit the ground and then set them on fire. In this way they hoped to kill most of the flies.

In the village police station, a notice was posted saying that the flies were good for crops. But the people in the village were still skeptical, and so Maria said she would go to the provincial capital to ask about the flies. Everyone told her not to go. They said she would be killed just for asking.

After all, in that very same village, men had come in a car at night and taken away a father and his son, Maria's cousins. As usual, it was not known if the men in the car were from the army or were guerrillas or were simply bandits. All that was known for sure was that the bodies of the two men were found the next morning. Since then, the car returns from time to time and drives through the town at night. No one is taken, but the people hide, because they are afraid.

Over the years Maria has gone to Guatemala several times to visit her family, and when she returns I question her. She has told me of a cousin who was beheaded in a church, relatives and friends who have simply disappeared, some who have been jailed and one who was blinded. Most of the time it is unclear just who is doing the killings, but that was not the case with the man who was blinded. He was taken by the army, and by the time his relatives came to plead for his release he had already been blinded.

RICHARD COHEN
Columnist

In "One Hundred Years of Solitude," Gabriel Garcia Marquez writes of a horde of butterflies that descended on the fictitious Colombian town of Macondo and stayed for years. It is just one fantastic episode in a book full of them, and people who know nothing about Central and South America have taken the book to be mystical and unrealistic. Then Joan Didion in her book "Salvador" set matters straight. Garcia Marquez is a realist. He happens to write about an area where, by our standards, little is realistic — certainly not death squads that kill thousands with impunity.

Up here in the land of the atomic bomb and the Good Humor man, as the old song goes, we think there is such a thing as realism. And so when it comes to Central America (or even Lebanon), we propose programs. We will support democracy, encourage elections, arm the military. We have reports and studies and proposals, and to us they are very real. They are, though, as real as Macondo's butterflies or as mysterious as the flies dropped into Maria's village.

In the end, Maria did not inquire about the flies. She told the people in the village that when she returned to America she would ask me about them. And so I had her speak with someone who knows the area well, and it turns out that for once the government is trying to do something for the people. The flies are sterile Mediterranean fruit flies, which are supposed to mate with unsterilized fruit flies, producing sterile offspring. The aim is to eradicate the fruit fly and save crops.

But after years of murder, of disappearances, of torture and beatings and grinding poverty, it is impossible for the people of Maria's village to imagine that the government would actually do something for them. Even those who wonder are afraid to ask.

So somewhere, maybe even in Washington, someone has developed a sound program to eradicate the fruit fly. He is a realist. And somewhere in Guatemala, the farmers are crouching in the bushes, waiting for the plastic bags of flies to hit the ground so they can set fire to them. They are realists, too.

An appeal for Stateroom rules

There are some students on this campus who either cannot read, need to have their eyes checked, or simply do not care.

Union administration has tried many tactics to get students not to study in the Stateroom during peak lunch hours, but it obviously is not working.

For the students who cannot read, the Union attempted to appeal to their analytical instincts by putting up a cute sign that explains the no-studying policy in both words and pictures. By using the universal code of a picture with a slash through it, one would assume even those who could not read, or whose vision was too poor to read the print at the bottom of the sign, would somehow interpret the message: Please do not study in the stateroom from 10:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m.

Dealing with students who do not care is more difficult.

Union administration has tried appealing to students' abilities to behave as adults in adhering to policies in the Stateroom. They have posted numerous signs and posters asking students not to study during peak lunch hours, and Union Governing Board has adopted the no-studying hours as policy. Union Director Walt Smith even set up hours explicitly for studying in one section of the Stateroom.

MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

The green-carpeted area in the south part of the Stateroom is to be used for studying from 1:30 p.m. to 4 p.m. These hours were provided to try to dissuade students from studying during the lunch hours, and to allow students a place to study on this campus, notorious for its sparse study space.

Union administration is aware of the problem of few study areas for students and is attempting to help correct the situation. At the same time, they are asking that students please realize the area's first and foremost purpose is as an eating area.

I must admit, I like to sit in the Stateroom, whether I am eating or not. It does offer study space. I get to see lots of my friends, and also enjoy one of my favorite pastimes — watching people.

But now I at least make an attempt not to loiter or study in there during peak lunch hours. The other day I stopped into the Stateroom to spend 15 minutes cramming for a quiz in my next class. It happened to be 11:15 a.m., but I thought, well, I won't be too much of a hassle, I'll only be here for 15 minutes.

I was wrong. I took a moment to look up from my books to see the four tables around me were all taken by students who had placed their books across each entire table so that no one could possibly share the space with them. There were people milling around everywhere, carrying trays of food, looking perturbed. I felt angry, embarrassed and guilty.

And I should have. I had become one of the students who does not care whether someone else gets a place to sit down and eat his lunch.

I can understand why students want to study in the Stateroom. But indifference to the predicament it creates for others is unfair. If you study in the Stateroom, at least try not to do so from 10:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. And don't ignore those looking for a place to sit — invite them to join you. Or, have your eyes checked.

Senator writes book on quitting

BOSTON — Sen. Paul Tsongas, who earlier this year announced he would not run for re-election because of illness, is writing a book about his decision, the Boston Herald reported Monday.

The Massachusetts Democrat said he decided to step down after being told he had a mild form of lymphatic cancer and after considering his family's reaction.

Notes that Tsongas took during the decision-making process have been transformed into a 130-page draft of the as-yet-untitled book, which has been optioned to Knopf Publishers of New York, the newspaper said.

"It's all about the whole process of the decision to leave and reflections on leaving the Senate," Tsongas said. "It was a question of telling the whole story and still retaining privacy."

He said a number of congressmen had approached him to tell him they had cancer and kept it quiet. "But if everyone who had it kept silent, I felt there was something to be said. And I wanted to try my hand at saying it," Tsongas told the Herald.

He said he also was prodded by letters he received from other cancer sufferers who felt better by just talking about their plight.

Thief strikes Elton John's party

PERTH, Australia — The wife of Elton John's songwriter was robbed of about $47,000 worth of jewels at a hotel where the entertainer's touring party was staying, officials said.

Toni Taupin, wife of Bernie Taupin of Los Angeles, left the jewels in her room at the Parmelia Hilton when she went to dinner Sunday night. Police investigators said Monday there was no sign of forced entry and nothing else was disturbed.

The jewels were taken from a leather carry-all bag. Among the 25 stolen items were rings, necklaces, earrings and pendants in gold and silver set with diamonds, rubies, sapphires and emeralds.

Patti Mostyn, John's publicist, said Mrs. Taupin was shocked by the thefts. "Toni came to Australia for Elton's wedding. She was one of the bridesmaids," she said.

The rock star was wed on Valentine's Day in Sydney to 30-year-old recording engineer Renate Blauel, who now is in London working on the musician's latest album.

Girl gets invitation to visit Austria

LOS ANGELES — A 15-year-old girl who wrote a report on Austria for her history class has been invited to visit that nation by Austrian President Rudolf Kirchschlaeger.

The president's and the schoolgirl's paths crossed Sunday at a diplomatic reception in suburban Brentwood, where Kirchschlaeger ended a five-minute speech in German to present Karen Bloore, of Santa Monica, with a letter of invitation from the Austrian government.

"Come and see me too," said the president, who is on an eight-day U.S. tour. "I'm looking forward to seeing you again."

The girl's paper, which earned an A-triple-plus from her teacher, found its way to the Austrian government after her grandfather, Austrian-born Walter Herley, sent it to an Austrian friend in a moment of pride.

Karen said she "couldn't believe" the invitation.

"I have to get a passport," Karen said, smiling. "That makes you feel important."

Sigma Sigma Sigma sorority passes chapter house plans

Members of the local chapter of the Sigma Sigma Sigma sorority and individual financiers last weekend approved plans for the proposed K-State Sigma Sigma Sigma sorority house.

The Manhattan zoning commission must approve the plans before construction bids can be taken. The house will be built on the southwest corner of Jardine Drive and Denison Avenue.

The zoning hearing will probably be in April, Lisa Ochs, junior in interior design and sorority president, said. The house could be completed as early as mid-September, depending on the weather, she said.

"We are looking forward to the new house," Ochs said. "Things are starting to fall together. It's been quite an undertaking. A lot of people don't understand just how difficult it is."

The 96 members of the sorority currently live in apartments, and freshman members live in residence halls.

The house will have two stories and will be constructed of native limestone with traditional wood siding, according to the plans. It will accommodate 60 to 65 women, with four to six women to a bedroom.

A library, chapter room, formal living room, house mother suite and a guest suite are included in the plans, along with the bathrooms, bedrooms, dining room and kitchen.

The K-State Tri-Sig chapter was colonized in fall 1981.

Efforts to acquire a house started soon after the chartering of the sorority, Peggy Flowers, Manhattan resident and chairman of the housing committee, said. The land was acquired last fall, and the sorority then approached architectural firms with the proposal for a house.

"By the first of April we will probably know more about facts or figures, but right now things are still a little up in the air," Flowers said.

The Tri-Sig housing committee interviewed three architects before deciding to have The Design Group and Brent Bowman and Associates develop plans for the house.

Rule requires athletes to progress towards major before final season

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

(Editor's note: This is the second article of a two-part series about regulations regarding future changes in the academic requirements of student-athletes. The first part dealt with the NCAA's 2.0 Qualifier Rule.)

An amendment defining satisfactory completion has been added to the National Collegiate Athletic Association's satisfactory progress rule governing the academic requirements of student-athletes.

The amendment states that a student athlete enrolled in college "shall meet the satisfactory completion requirement by maintaining a grade point average that places the student athlete in good academic standing as established by the institution for all students who are at an equivalent stage of progress toward a degree." Kathleen Hatke, legislative assistant for the NCAA, said. This addition, which was proposed at the NCAA annual convention Jan. 9-11, will go into effect Aug. 1, 1985.

The rule was also changed to state that athletes must satisfactorily complete 24 semester hours which are acceptable toward a bachelor's degree in a specific major by the start of the athlete's final season of eligibility. The rule formerly required athletes to complete 24 hours toward a degree by the final season.

Essentially the rule affects athletes after they have been in college two years, said Robert Snell, head of the Department of Civil Engineering and K-State faculty representative to the NCAA. He said the time to worry about the rule is a year in advance.

Jim Epps, academic counselor for athletics, said his job is concerned with the academic needs and well-being of all student-athletes at K-State, of which eligibility is an important part. The Academic Assistance Center counseling center measures athletes' success in three ways: remaining eligible to compete, progressing toward a degree and graduating with a degree.

The satisfactory progress rule will not affect the academic counseling program, Epps said. He said that while the center's staff does not consider it urgent that athletes declare a major their freshman year, it is important that the first two years of courses fit the requirements of any given degree.

Through the help of faculty advisers or the Academic Assistance Center, the students plan schedules which fulfill basic requirements of a specific number of hours of social science, natural science and humanities. By the athletes' junior year, Epps said he wants them to declare a major.

Richard Elkins, K-State director of admissions, said that since every course offered by the University is applicable toward some degree, it is possible for a student to take 120 or 150 semester hours of courses applicable toward some degree and still not graduate. The amendment to the satisfactory progress rule prevents such an incident from occurring, he said, since the athletes are required to take courses that apply to a certain degree.

The student who is undecided about a major could take any course applicable toward a degree until they have completed 60 hours. Then a major must be declared and the 24 hours completed each year must be in that student-athlete's major, Elkins said.

A conference can have more stringent rules than the NCAA, but it cannot have less, he said. The Big Eight Conference already has implemented the satisfactory progress rule to some extent.

In the past, the Big Eight rules were much more stringent than the NCAA's, Snell said, but now that trend will be reversed.

A study, funded by the NCAA, is being performed by the special committee on academic research, Hatke said. The results are in the process of being compiled by a research company in Virginia. Using history as a model, the NCAA is trying to determine what would have happened if the new standards had been imposed on athletes who entered college in 1977 and 1982. The survey includes a sample of colleges across the nation.

The results are due to be released to member institutions this summer, Hatke said.

The information that will be released may uncover effects of the new standards, she said, such as the example of the 75 percent of blacks who would not have been able to attend a Division I college under the new requirements of the Qualifier Rule, which requires incoming freshmen to have completed a core curriculum and maintain a 2.0 GPA.

L.A. signs former BYU star

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — The Los Angeles Express of the United States Football League scored a major coup Monday, landing Brigham Young quarterback Steve Young with a staggering $40 million contract that is the richest pact ever for an athlete.

Young, one of the most profile passers in college history, will benefit from the contract that runs for 43 years until he is 65.

A left-hander who set or tied 13 NCAA passing and total offense records while at BYU, Young had been courted by the National Football League's Cincinnati Bengals, who told him they would make him the first pick in the May 1 NFL draft. The Bengals' offer was a reported $3.5 million over five years, including a $1 million signing bonus.

The 6-foot-2, 196-pound Young said earlier he'd rather play in the NFL, but decided over the weekend to sign with the Express.

"It was a very tough decision and it came after much deliberation on my part," Young said.

A great-great-grandson of Mormon pioneer leader Brigham Young, Steve is a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and attributed part of his decision to sign with Los Angeles to his desire to aid BYU.

"I saw this as a situation where I could give back some of the things BYU had given me in the last four years," he said.

Young's contract, a source told The Associated Press, will be worth $1 million a year for the first four years and includes a $2½ million signing bonus. The life of the contract runs through the year 2027.

The complex agreement includes a $100,000 a year endorsement policy with a savings and loan company in Salt Lake City; a scholarship policy with BYU worth $183,000; and deferred payments totaling over $30 million.

Comparatively, the top total money contract in the NFL now is that of San Diego quarterback Dan Fouts, who is receiving some $6 million over six years; the richest in the National Basketball Association belongs to Los Angeles' Earvin "Magic" Johnson, $25 million for 25 years; in baseball, it's the $21 million being paid over 10 years to the New York Yankees' Dave Winfield; and in the National Hockey League, it's the $21 million, 21-year contract owned by Edmonton's Wayne Gretzky.

Young's agent, Leigh Steinberg, asked if the contract was in fact the richest ever for an athlete, replied, "It's hard to characterize contracts, but I've not seen one comparable to it."

He also said Young had an "absolutely magnificent offer sitting here," while Cincinnati's "would be an abstraction ... There's no doubt he was going to be the No. 1 pick in the NFL draft ... Still, the NFL seems to sit there as player after player signs."

While saying the money was not his prime consideration, Young grinned and added, "I hope to fix up my car and take my girlfriend out to dinner for the first time in four years."

Big Eight tourney tickets available

Tickets are available at the K-State Athletic Ticket Office for the first round of the men's Big Eight Conference postseason tournament game between the Wildcats and the University of Nebraska.

Tickets for the game, which will begin at 7:10 p.m. Wednesday at Lincoln, cost $3 each.

If the Wildcats win the first-round game, tickets will go on sale Thursday morning at the K-State ticket of-

Tisdale unanimous choice to all-conference squad

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Sophomore Wayman Tisdale of the University of Oklahoma, called by many the greatest college player in the country, was a unanimous selection to the 1983-84 Associated Press All-Big Eight basketball squad.

A panel of sportswriters and sportscasters who regularly cover the Big Eight made Tisdale, the Big Eight player of the year as a freshman, the only unanimous choice. He was joined on the elite five by another sophomore, University of Nebraska center Dave Hoppen, Iowa State University junior Barry Stevens and senior guards Carl Henry of the University of Kansas and Jay Humphries of the University of Colorado.

Tisdale led the Sooners to the Big Eight regular season title, while leading the conference in scoring and rebounding.

K-State's Tom Alfaro received honorable mention.

Services assist graduates in job search

By LYNN MEIER
Collegian Reporter

Finding a job doesn't just happen. Approximately 4,500 K-State students will receive diplomas in May and attempt to take the first step into the working world. Several services are available to K-State students in search of job opportunities.

The sending of a resume is often the first contact students have with a potential employer, said Carla Campbell, office manager of a local resume writing service.

"When writing a resume, ask yourself, 'What am I selling, my education at K-State, my experience or both?'" Campbell said.

There is no standard form for resume development. Resumes follow trends, and each individual must decide which of his qualifications should be emphasized and which style the resume should take, she said. Space is limited on a resume, so the job searcher should include information that will attract a prospective employer's interest.

Preparation of a resume is not something to be done hurriedly, according to an article in the Omaha World Herald, which stated that it requires soul-searching and brainstorming to identify particular skills and strengths.

Campbell said every company is looking for something different. An applicant can't expect to please every prospective employer. Honesty, clarity, neatness and absence of misspelled words are most impressive to employers, she said.

A cover letter discussing reasons for application should be included, she said. Employers look for college involvement in activities. To give the impression of being a well-rounded individual, an applicant should include personal information, hobbies and interests on his resume, as well as educational and job experience.

"If you're a versatile person, with a good background, this will be reflected by a good resume," Campbell said.

"Preparation of a high quality resume is important. The resume that got you a job five years ago won't (get you a job) now. Competition in the job market has increased," she said.

Another resource for job seekers is the Career Planning and Placement Center in Holtz Hall.

Bruce Laughlin, director of the center, said he estimates that 40 to 50 percent of K-State degree candidates register at the center.

"We help examine qualifications, build resumes and assist students in job-search strategies. We want students to find the right kind of job," Laughlin said.

Students complete data sheets which are filed at the center. The data sheets are sent to prospective employers and are used for on-campus interviews with company recruiters.

"We try to reach everyone in some way. Not all recruiters interview on campus, but every student and even alumni can get help here," he said.

Lori Siemens, senior in accounting, recently was hired for a job with a national oil company in Tulsa, Okla., after an on-campus interview arranged by the center.

U.S. condemns Iraq for use of chemical weapons in war

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The United States on Monday condemned Iraq for using lethal chemical weapons in its war with Iran, State Department spokesman John Hughes said.

"The United States strongly condemns the prohibited use of chemical weapons wherever it occurs," Hughes said. "There can be no justification for their use by any country."

He said U.S. officials had concluded from "available evidence" — such as independent news reports and "non-Iranian" sources — that Iraq had used the weapons.

He did not elaborate on what evidence the United States has and refused to say who officials thought had supplied the weapons to Iraq.

The Iraqi use of the weapons makes more urgent the need to negotiate an international treaty banning production and stockpiling of chemical weapons, Hughes said.

The United States has blamed the Soviet Union for the use of chemical weapons in Afghanistan and Southeast Asia and has called on the Soviets to negotiate a new global treaty banning the substances.

Regents plan more tuition increases

By MIKE TURNER
Government Editor

WICHITA — Students attending Kansas Board of Regents institutions will have to pay for increased tuition charges during the next two years, according to conclusions drawn Tuesday at the regents' Tuition and Fees Committee meeting.

In order to have students cover 25 percent of the cost of education, tuition charges will have to increase between 7 and 13 percent beginning in fall 1985, said Stanley Koplik, executive director of the regents. The regents approved a 10 percent tuition increase last year to take effect in fall 1984.

"It (the 25 percent fee-cost ratio) came from an informal understanding, a 'gentleman's agreement' if you will, with the Legislature that 25 percent is a reasonable and realistic amount for students to pay toward their education," Koplik said. "Nationally, 25 percent is respected."

Koplik presented four alternative recommendations for raising tuition charges. "Each proposal will attempt to provide for a systemwide fee-cost ratio of approximately 25 percent," he said.

The first alternative would provide an 8 percent tuition increase and maintain a $40 differential between graduate and undergraduate tuition charges currently scheduled for implementation in fall 1984.

K-State tuition for Kansas resident undergraduates would increase from $450 per semester in 1984-1985 to $484 per semester in 1985-1986. Current tuition charges are $410 per semester, and other special fees bring the total cost to $550.50 per semester.

One drawback with this proposal is the fee-cost ratios students pay at different schools within the system will become even more divergent, Koplik said.

He explained students at some schools pay a fee-cost ratio of up to 29 percent, while students at some of the smaller schools pay fee-cost ratios of only 18 percent. The system as a whole averages out to 25 percent, in line with the Legislature's guidelines.

The second proposal would limit undergraduate tuition increase to 7.5 percent and would create a $60 differential between graduate and undergraduate tuition charges, Koplik said. This proposal would save K-State undergraduates $2 per semester from the previous proposal, but would require graduate students to pay $544 per semester in 1985-1986, as opposed to $526 as provided in the first proposal.

The third proposal would attempt to equalize the fee-cost ratios at different schools by increasing tuition at regional universities (Emporia State University, Pittsburg State University and Fort Hays State University) by 13 percent and increasing tuition at all other regent institutions by 7 percent, Koplik said.

Under the third proposal, K-State undergraduates would pay $482 per semester in 1985-86. The proposal also calls for a $60 differential between graduate and undergraduate tuitions so that graduate students would pay $542 per semester.

The fourth proposal would increase tuition by 13 percent at the regional universities and 10 percent at all other regent schools. The measure also would require a $60 differential between undergraduate and graduate tuitions, Koplik said.

Under the fourth proposal, K-State undergraduates would have to pay $495 per semester in 1985-1986 and graduate students would have to pay $555 per semester.

Koplik said the regents' staff prefers the fourth proposal because it would eliminate the need for special lab, departmental and academic service fees.

Dudley Williams, Regents professor of physics, stands before a Spanish name for the first atomic bomb test site in White Sands, New Mexico. The English translation is "Valley of Death." Williams participated in the development and testing of the first bomb.

Professor recalls early atomic testing

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

When the announcement was made that the first atomic bomb was dropped on Hiroshima, Japan, Dudley Williams was waiting in a room with a number of his colleagues.

Feelings of guilt, shock and joy worked simultaneously to cause a period of deep soul-searching and eventually a physical feeling of sickness in some.

"One person actually went into the bathroom and vomited," Williams, a Regents professor of physics, said. "He was ahead of the rest of us."

The men in the room had helped to design and develop the atomic bomb. The room where they were congregated was a laboratory located in Los Alamos, New Mexico. The announcement, made over the intercom system, signified that a project they had spent almost three years on was a complete success.

"We thought we had put an end to war," he said. "We thought people would have enough sense not to use them thereafter, but they haven't had that much sense."

This writing of a page of history involving Williams began when he received a doctorate degree in physics from the University of North Carolina in 1936.

He then went to the University of Florida as an instructor and assistant professor until a month after Vermont runoff gives Sen. Hart lopsided victory

By The Associated Press

MONTPELIER, Vt. — Sen. Gary Hart, completing a remarkable sweep of northern New England, won lopsided victory Tuesday night in Vermont's Democratic presidential primary. He embraced indications of a Republican crossover vote and said, "I intend to defeat Ronald Reagan."

Walter Mondale lost for the third time in seven horrific days and looked South, saying, "New Hampshire, Maine has hurt. I assume Vermont will hurt."

The victory gave Hart unmistakable momentum going into delegate-rich elections Tuesday in Massachusetts and the South.

"If I were in the White House tonight, I would be very concerned about the Hart candidacy. He represents a far more significant threat to the president than does Walter Mondale," said Oliver Henkel, the winner's campaign manager.

With 68 percent of Vermont's 264 precincts reporting, Hart had 27,068 votes, or 71 percent, to Mondale's 7,444 votes and 20 percent.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson, who had 3,190 for 8 percent, awaited the final returns with interest — without 10 percent of the vote he stood to lose federal matching funds in 30 days.

President Reagan had 16,055 votes in the uncontested GOP election.

Hart said he got support from Republicans and independents as well as from Democrats, commenting, "This campaign does have a chance to reach out beyond the Democratic Party, to expand the frontiers of our party and expand the electoral base of our party."

Vermont's open primary allows residents to vote in the primary of their choice, and history has shown that voters tend to go where the action is.

Sen. Hart offers 'new hope' to young voters, Keys says

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

The strength of Sen. Gary Hart, D-Colo., is in his ability to attract votes from a broad spectrum of the population, former Congresswoman Martha Keys said.

Keys, who represented the Second District of Kansas from 1975-1979, spoke Tuesday afternoon in the Union Courtyard about the U.S. presidential candidate, who also is her brother-in-law.

"I think in another week we will find conclusive evidence that Sen. Hart can gain broad support across the nation," Keys said.

In New Hampshire, Hart captured the votes of women and labor union members and defeated Mondale 3-to-1 among independents, Keys said. Hart also won 6.7 percent of the write-in vote on the Republican ballot, a higher write-in percentage than President Reagan had on the Democratic ballot.

"What we're finding now are many people who are really enthused by what is seen to be an opportunity for new leadership," Keys said.

"The 20- to 40-year-olds who have really become very dismayed about the (political) process and very cynical have grasped a very new sense of hope in Sen. Hart's campaign, in his insistence on new leadership instead of a return to policies of the past," she said.

Hart's new ideas were described in the book, "Democracy in the '80s," which he wrote last year, Keys said.

Hart has dealt with issues and principles in his campaign, and it is that which makes him so attractive to the people, she said.

"I think he has articulated better than anyone else that part of the new direction means unleashing the talents of all citizens," Keys said. "He has said that women have to be brought into the economic mainstream."

Keys told of Hart's stand on economic recovery.

"He has been very strong in articulating that the way to economic recovery necessitates education and job retraining," she said.

Hart has proposed a program which would have working men and women give a small part of their salary, to be matched by the employer, to a fund for retraining of older employees.

Keys also discussed Hart's views on defense and foreign policy.

"Sen. Hart has very clearly shown...how we could strategically plan our defenses so

HUD clueless about change

By LEE WHITE
Manhattan Editor

The Jones Store Co. has pulled out of the proposed downtown mall project. But nobody at the Department of Housing and Urban Development in Washington, D.C., the agency handling Manhattan's $10 million Urban Development Action Grant, seems to know about it.

The Collegian contacted HUD Tuesday to ask if the store's action might jeopardize the grant. UDAG requirements mandate that two major department stores must file letters of commitment stating intent to become part of the mall.

After checking with the UDAG department, a spokesman said the agency was not aware of the local situation and considered the final stages of the grant application to be progressing.

City Manager Don Harmon said later that the city had notified Rosalyn Doggett, a UDAG official, about the move and that "she had no objections to it."

But Doggett, who handled Manhattan's grant application, is no longer employed by HUD. Harmon said she left the agency Feb. 24, nine days after the city announced that Dillard's department store had expressed interest in participating in the mall.

Forest City Enterprises Vice President Mel Roebuck, mall developer, refused to comment on when The Mercantile Stores Co., parent firm of The Jones Store, informed him of its intent to take the store out of the project.

Roebuck said he is "reasonably optimistic" that Dillard's, a department store chain based in Little Rock, Ark., will sign a commitment letter to participate in the mall. He said he plans to send the letter to Dillard's officials in the near future. Mayor Wanda Fateley said Monday that the Dillard's letter could be sent to the company this week.

Harmon said the contract between the city and HUD that would serve as final approval of the grant is not in jeopardy as long as two department stores have filed letters stating intent to place stores in the mall.

Harmon refused to say what might happen if Dillard's decided not to participate in the project.

Meanwhile, the Manhattan City Commission is set to review a formal draft of the UDAG contract next week and could give approval to the pact the following week.

Pulitzer winner to deliver speech

Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist Loren Jenkins is scheduled to present an All-University Convocation at 10:30 a.m. today in McCain Auditorium.

Professor to discuss brain studies

Larry Squire, professor of psychiatry at the University of California-San Diego, and Research Career Scientist at the Veterans Administration Medical Center in San Diego, is scheduled to lecture at 4 p.m. Friday in Ackert 221.

Squire will speak on "Memory and the Brain: Studies in Man and Monkeys."

Squire has published numerous articles and abstracts, with his recent work focusing on the neuropsychology of memory. With other investigators, he has identified two distinct memory systems in man and monkeys. These two systems, classified as "procedural," corresponding to habit or behavioral functions, and "declarative," corresponding to cognitive or representational functions, appear to be anatomically distinct.

The public is invited. Coffee will be served preceding the seminar. The lecture is part of the "Of Mind @ Matter: The Flow of Biological Information" series funded by the Division of Biology and the Graduate School.

Faculty member to edit journal

Rodney Goodyear, associate professor of administration and foundations, has been named editor of the "Personnel and Guidance Journal." This is the largest circulation scholarly journal of the counseling profession, serving more than 46,000 readers.

Goodyear has been co-editor of the "Current Trends" section of the journal since 1980.

Nancy Garfield, director of the psychology service at the Topeka Veterans Administration Medical Center, has been named associate editor.

Goodyear also has served on the editorial boards of the "American Mental Health Counselors Association Journal" and "Vocational Guidance Quarterly."

Students win fashion competition

Three apparel design students placed in competitions associated with the Fashion Group of Kansas City Career Seminar recently.

Karen Herren, senior in apparel design, won first place in Fashion Illustration Competition. She received an $800 scholarship from the Fashion Group.

Tracy Gardner, junior in apparel design, received honorable mention in the same competition.

All of the award-winning drawings will be on display in the Justin Hall lobby until March 19.

Trina Cole, senior in apparel design, received first place for her essay, "The Future of Fashion." She received a $300 scholarship.

In addition, Cole received honorable mention in the Original Design Competition. Joann Long, senior in apparel design, and Herren were finalists in this competition.

Apparel Design students' original garments will be shown at the annual Portfolio Show, April 15, at the Holiday.

Other schools participating in the competition included the University of Nebraska, the University of Kansas, Stephens College in Columbia, Columbia College and Johnson County Community College.

Couple donates computer funds

A gift of $5,231 to the Department of Political Science has allowed the faculty to acquire a computer to assist them with research activities and classroom instruction.

Jack and Romaine Goldstein, Manhattan, contributed the funds to the department.

Faculty member attends seminar

Ward Welty, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, recently returned from participating in the Very Important Professor Seminar in Dallas, hosted by the Specialty Advertising Association International.

Welty participated in a curriculum development session at the seminar, which was held Feb. 29 and March 1.

Specialty advertising is the advertising/sales promotion medium employing a useful article of merchandise which is imprinted with an advertiser's name or message and distributed without obligation to the recipient.

Assistant director dies at 34

Constance Varley Earhart, 34, 322 Twykingham Place, assistant director of the Midwest Race and Sex Desegregation Assistance Center at K-State, died Monday at St. Mary Hospital.

An autopsy is being performed to determine the cause of death. She was hospitalized Sunday.

Born in Iowa on May 29, 1949, Earhart graduated from Iowa State University in 1970 with a bachelor's degree in home economics. She earned her master's and doctorate degrees from K-State in 1973 and 1981.

Following graduation from college, Earhart taught a year in the Wichita public schools and a year in the Des Moines, Iowa, public schools before joining the Midwest Center for Equal Educational Opportunity at the University of Missouri-Columbia. She had been with the Midwest Race and Sex Desegregation Assistance Center at K-State since 1978 and held faculty rank as an assistant professor of administration and foundations in the College of Education.

At K-State she helped develop program proposals for more than $6 million in grants. She made numerous presentations and was author of a dozen articles for professional journals.

She belonged to several professional and honorary organizations, including the American Society for Training and Development, the Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development, Omicron Nu, Phi Delta Kappa, Phi Kappa Phi and the Western Social Science Association.

Earhart is survived by her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Varley; a brother, Evan; and a sister, Susan Kading, all of Menlo, Iowa.

Funeral services will be at 1:30 p.m. Thursday at the Lind Funeral Home, Stewart, Iowa.

City to discuss redevelopment

The Manhattan City Commission will consider authorizing Mayor Wanda Fateley to enter into a contract with the Vector Corp., a consulting firm to aid in relocation of businesses for downtown redevelopment, in their meeting at 7 p.m. today at City Hall.

The meeting is being conducted today instead of Tuesday because all the commissioners except Fateley were attending the National League of Municipalities meeting in Washington, D.C., which extended into Tuesday.

The commission also will consider authorizing city staff to seek proposals for appraisals of a tract of land located north of the wastewater treatment plant and south of U.S. Highway 24.

City planners will present three alternatives to the commission for changing traffic flow on one-way streets in the downtown business district. The change is a result of the planned closing of Fifth Street for construction of the Riley County Courthouse Plaza at Fifth and Poyntz Avenue.

U-LearN Line

I'm trying to find an apartment for next year, and I'm having difficulty obtaining information on the apartments in Manhattan. Can you help?

The Department of Off-Campus Housing compiles a list of local apartment complexes each January. The list is available at this time to students free of charge. It contains basic information about each complex, and although the list is not exhaustive, there are a wide variety of apartments to choose from. The list is available at the off-campus housing office in Pittman Hall.

When are tryouts for K-State cheerleaders?

Interested students should watch for an advertisement in the Collegian some time after spring break. The ad will list a date and time for an organizational meeting which should be attended by all students wishing to try out. The date for tryouts has not been set, but should begin about the last week of March or the first week of April.

A permanent date will be set after it is known when the wood floor will be removed in Ahearn Field House.

When do line schedules come out? When is pre-enrollment?

The summer line schedules should be available in the Union Bookstore the last week in March. Fall line schedules will be available the first week of April. Pre-enrollment will be April 9-25.

Sufficient day care may aid enrollment

By BECKY WILEY
Collegian Reporter

The lack of child-care facilities on campus may be detrimental to K-State's future enrollment figures. Ann Bristow, assistant professor of psychology and chairman of the Child Care Task Force of the Commission on the Status of Women, said that providing adequate day care for children could be a powerful marketing incentive when trying to recruit students to K-State.

"The fastest-growing population of college students is older students, particularly women. If we're looking at a time when student numbers are going down, then why not look to a group who could provide us with those numbers?" she said. "We might be able to increase our enrollment if we had adequate child care because most older students will have children, and they'll want to go somewhere that is able to provide child care."

Currently, there are two on-campus child care facilities which double as teaching labs in the College of Home Economics.

The Early Childhood Laboratory (ECL), associated with the Department of Family and Child Development, has a half-day program caring for children from ages 2½ to 5, Monday through Friday. The number of children cared for has decreased significantly from 64 children in 1980 to a current total of 18 children.

One of the reasons for this decrease is the budget cuts made due to a decline in enrollment.

"SGA (Student Governing

Association) also is cutting back (funding)," Bristow said. "There's been a poor response from student senators who feel that children are the students' responsibility."

Majorie Stith, director of child care centers and professor of family and child development, said there is a need for more child care services because the lab must serve a dual purpose.

"Everything we do must be tied to instruction as well as perform a service. Currently, we feel we can offer care for only 18 children and still operate a worthwhile lab for students," Stith said.

"Also, a lot of parents don't need the five-day service we provide. They may need it only on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, but because it's an instructional program, we need the same children five days a week," she said.

Fred Worman, graduate in agricultural economics, said child care for his son, Christopher, was somewhat of a problem because his wife does not work every day.

"Christopher's in the lab more for his benefit than our convenience. Financially, it would be better if we had a place that offered flexible child care, but he's better off having continuing contact with children his own age," Worman said.

The Stonehouse program, which offers child care for 30 children, also serves as a teacher training lab as well as providing a child care facility for the community.

Lou West, instructor of family and child development and one of the supervisors at Stonehouse, said allowing a child into one of the two Stonehouse programs, toddler or preschool, is done on a priority basis.

The two priorities hindering students the most are the age and sex requirements and the fact that children of working couples are preferred. Many students who need day care services for their children are full-time students and don't work, or if they do, it's only part-time. Waiting for a certain opening is a problem if a parent's child is a 3-year-old boy and the only place available is for a 4-year-old girl.

Flexibility also is a problem because the programs at Stonehouse are operated on a full-day basis.

Bristow said that there are several Manhattan day care centers which offer flexibility, but they cost about $200 per month, compared to the $55 per month at the ECL and $51 to $165 per month at Stonehouse. Rates at Stonehouse are based on the parents' gross income.

Elizabeth Lambert, sophomore in dietetics and institutional management, takes her daughter, Elise, to a commercial day care center although she would rather have her in Stonehouse because it's less expensive and more convenient.

"Right now, Elise's day care bill is as much as my rent, but I probably won't get her into Stonehouse before it's time for her to go to school. I've been on a waiting list for two years," Lambert said.

Bristow said the University of Kansas and Wichita State University both have large, non-profit child care facilities. Since a lot of parents need flexible child care, smaller programs such as half-day care are used to subsidize the larger and more expensive ones such as full-day or infant care.

"We (K-State) could be financially self-sufficient if we had programs that were real money-makers to subsidize those that aren't," she said.

On Feb. 24 the task force recommended to K-State President Duane Acker that an administrative officer be appointed to develop and coordinate child care services at K-State.

"It's unfair for parents to have to establish child care programs because they're the ones with the least resources — time and money," Bristow said.

One of the duties of the administrative officer would be to oversee the conversion of two Jardine Terrace apartments into a child care facility.

Bristow said she believes that parent cooperatives could be successfully established to staff the Jardine facility.

"Parents can put in time caring for the children when they have free time during the day, or maybe in the evening when other parents have tests or required programs to attend," she said.

Bristow said child care should be thought of as a University concern instead of a "woman's duty." This idea discriminates against women as well as men.

"We spend a lot of money on services that don't benefit all students, like housing for on-campus students and the Fenix program for older students. Why should we punish students with children?" Bristow said.

Trooper chases down murder suspect

By The Associated Press

ALMA — A man accused in Rhode Island of robbing and murdering an elderly woman was charged Tuesday with the murder of a man whose body was found along a highway rest stop in northeast Kansas.

Brian C. Lionberg, 18, was charged with first-degree murder and aggravated robbery in the death of Larry Gugler, 44, of Manhattan, said Wabaunsee County Attorney Ed Van Petten.

Lionberg, of West Warwick, R.I., had earlier been charged with first-degree murder and felony theft in the slaying of Mary C. Burroughs, who died from multiple stab wounds. Burroughs, 71, was found stuffed into a closet of her East Greenwich, R.I. house on Feb. 28.

A court appearance was set Tuesday afternoon for Lionberg, who would be tried on the Kansas charges before he was returned to Rhode Island, according to Van Petten.

Gugler's body was found Friday night by a man who entered the restroom at an Interstate 70 rest stop near Paxico. Gugler had been shot in the head and the side with a shotgun, according to Van Petten.

Gugler's wallet was missing, but it was not known how much money he might have been carrying, Van Petten said.

Lionberg, who apparently had been traveling since the discovery of Burroughs' body, was driving her car Saturday when a Kansas Highway Patrol trooper spotted him driving at a high rate of speed near Salina, about 85 miles southwest of Paxico, said Van Petten.

The chase continued about six miles at speeds of 100 mph until Lionberg's car became stuck in a ditch. The trooper shot out two tires on the car, but Lionberg managed to travel a short distance along a frontage road until he drove into the wheat field.

The shotgun believed to have been used to kill Gugler was found in the car, Van Petten said.

Driving laws ignored in Jardine

Drivers need to heed laws to avoid an accident that could ruin several lives, including their own.

Too often, young and old alike abuse the privilege and responsibility of driving. Death often results from careless driving and breaking the laws. Driver education films frequently deal with the gory details of unfortunate accidents caused by carelessness behind the wheel.

Jardine Terrace Apartments, a K-State married student housing facility, has a problem with wreckless drivers. The stop signs located at the intersection of Jardine and Jarvis drives and the intersection of Jardine and Hillcrest drives are run more than they are heeded. The campus police would be wise to hang out near these intersections.

Speeding also is common in Jardine. It is not uncommon to hear cars squeal around corners at night. It also is common to see people speed through the streets in areas where young children play.

Contrary to what many people believe, the "foreigners" living there can't be blamed for poor driving habits. The problem with poor driving isn't limited to Jardine.

It's Kansas law to stop first before entering an intersection marked with a stop sign or red light, and before making a right turn. Look both directions and make sure the turn can be executed without causing heart failure or an accident to an oncoming driver or pedestrian.

Because of abuses of this law, the Kansas legislature is thinking of repealing it.

Impeding traffic also is against the law. Often people are scared to turn on green arrows. This is better than being wreckless, but it is important not to impede other drivers by not moving.

Crossing over into other lanes during the execution of a turn is popular, but illegal. To make a left turn, turn into the lane closest to the center of the road (right of center).

And of course, let other drivers know your intentions. When making a turn, use automatic or hand signals. It could prevent a rear-end collision.

David Bevins, for the editorial board

Sensible proposal for license fee

The Kansas Senate Public Health and Welfare Committee has made a positive move to provide better care and education about domestic violence by endorsing a proposal to increase the marriage license fee.

If the bill passes, the price of a marriage license would increase to $18, from the $10 now paid. The additional revenue raised, estimated at an annual $207,000 by a lobbyist for the Kansas Association of Domestic Violence Programs, would be allocated to the secretary of the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services to distribute to the 20 domestic violence programs in Kansas.

The funds would supplement, instead of replace, private donations, federal grants and United Way contributions the violence programs currently use to meet operating expenses.

The Senate would be wise to pass this measure. Funding to benefit social programs is best culled from the institutions they arise from, and likewise, funding for domestic problems should be drawn from the legal requirements of marriage. To increase the cost of a marriage license to grant added funding for domestic violence programs is a step in the right direction to increase awareness of problems resulting in violence within marriage and family life.

LONELY HART CLUBS

Hart's foresight proves correct

MANCHESTER, N.H. — On Dec. 24, 1982, I met for breakfast with Gary Hart and said I would be interested in doing a book about his campaign. What I wanted, I said, was total access. I would attend all the staff meetings, be able to talk with anyone I wanted and be permitted to see the candidate himself on a regular basis. Hart never blinked. I had made the right decision, he said. There was no doubt in his mind he would win.

My book idea has since been discarded — but not, fortunately, the notes I took that day and in days that followed. Hart has since given me permission to use what he said back then, and what they prove is that his New Hampshire victory, almost universally labeled a surprise, was no surprise to one person — Gary Hart. He is now exactly where he thought he would be back on Dec. 24, 1982.

"People will be surprised," Hart said back then. "There will be great excitement and a cloud of dust and out of it will come maybe two candidates." Although Hart then did not say who besides him would be left, he seemed to think it would be Walter F. Mondale. Sen. John Glenn had no economic program and while Mondale had one, it was "distributive" — not based, he said, on growth, but on carving up the same old pie.

The basis of any winning campaign, Hart said, was an idea. George McGovern, for whom Hart had directed the 1972 campaign, had the idea of ending the Vietnam War. Hart had a different idea and it had to do with generations. He said the Democratic Party was similar in 1984 to where it was in 1960 when

Columnist

John F. Kennedy won the presidential nomination. Kennedy's nomination fight, Hart said, neither centered on his ideology nor his Catholicism, but on his age. The fight was generational — a battle between Kennedy and his generation and Democratic leaders and their generation.

In that interview, Hart said that he would win the generational fight in 1984, or he or others of his generation like Rep. Timothy Wirth (D-Colo.), Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) or Sen. Joseph R. Biden (D-Del.) would in 1988. The question was not so much one of age, but of outlook. They saw things differently. And when Hart saw that none of his political generation was going to run in 1984, he knew he would have the field to himself.

In his remarks that day, and his book, "Right From The Start," Hart sketched the way his campaign would unfold. He would rely on an organization of volunteers and remain low, maybe almost invisible, in the polls until he either came in second in an early contest or won one outright. Then his campaign would take off, and he would be lifted in the national polls which, he said, measure nothing more than name recognition.

In a subsequent interview here, he said he knew all along that the press would cover the front-runners in the polls and virtually ignore him. One good showing would change that, and from then on he would be able to ride the free publicity of the television news shows.

Politics is as mysterious an enterprise as there is. McGovern began the 1972 campaign as a little-known senator from South Dakota and won the Democratic nomination. Four years later, Jimmy Carter came out of Georgia to do the same thing, and there was a time when many people dismissed Ronald Reagan as nothing but a washed-up actor with a smooth-speaking style.

But still, Hart's scenario seemed brazen, overly plotted, taking everything into account — everything but Gary Hart himself. At the end of 1982, even as recently as two weeks ago, Hart ranked so low in the national polls that he virtually did not exist.

So what we have is either a candidate who knows something about America that the other candidates do not, or a man riding a fluke. The remaining primaries and caucuses will show which one it is. But the skepticism of December 1982 has to be tempered by Hart's victory of February 1984 and the distinct possibility that maybe Gary Hart has the touch, the instincts and the thinking from which presidential nominees are made. He is, after all, precisely where he said he would be more than a year ago. No other candidate can make that claim.

Recruitment issue ignores quality

One of the "big" issues of the recent Student Governing Association election on campus was the recruitment issue. Several candidates asserted that for K-State to remain viable as an academic hub in Kansas, efforts must be redoubled to staunch the decline in enrollment.

Such assertions flow from the faulty assumption that FTE's (full-time equivalents, a measure of enrollment) are the only measure of institution influence, quality and merit for Legislature appropriations.

Before arguing the weakness of the logic behind such assertions, let me present several facts.

Bank of America Economist John O. Wilson, in his book, "After Affluence," estimates that 1.4 million members of the baby boom generation graduated from college each year in the past two decades to compete for 365,000 jobs requiring their degrees. He termed the resulting oversupply "over-education."

K-State enrollment grew exponentially because of the baby boom and the Vietnam War. The baby boom provided K-State with the largest applicant pool ever. College was one way male members of that applicant pool could delay the draft, hence enrollment swelled faster than the University or the city could accommodate.

Declining birth rates have already forced the closure of elementary and secondary schools. This has reduced the pool of applicants for K-State, but more importantly, with the decreased emphasis on the basics in education, it has reduced significantly the pool of qualified applicants available to K-State.

The current cross-section of students has taken on what one faculty member calls "bi-modal" tendencies. Bi-modal in this sense means that classes are divided into two divergent groups. One group, traditional college material, finds the current curriculum undemanding and consistently scores high on exams. The second group, recruited from junior colleges or dilute high school programs, consistently fails exams and slows class progress by an inability to master college-level concepts.

THOMAS FIEGEN
Guest Columnist

Given these facts, is it in the best interest of students and graduates of K-State to redouble their efforts to recruit more and more bodies to maintain or increase student enrollment? Is it in the interest of the K-State bureaucracy and Manhattan to maintain current enrollment in an age of a declining pool of qualified applicants?

I would maintain it is not in anyone's long-term interest to recruit more and more bodies to maintain FTE's. If we follow a course of intensive recruitment for many years, the aptitude of the student body will decline even more precipitously — which will lead to even shallower curriculums and offend the more qualified faculty and students in the pool, leading them to pursue careers and degrees elsewhere. The bottom line will be a K-State known for its marshmallow degrees.

What is the answer then? First, we must accept that all post-secondary institutions are going to experience enrollment declines if they maintain their qualitative standards. Such declines are the result of demographic trends that can only be reversed if K-State alumni start raising large families of future K-Staters.

Second, as an institution we must work to strengthen our strongest programs in order to attract the brightest minds, while at the same time allowing other quality institutions to offer degrees in those areas which K-State is a marginal supplier, and academically uncompetitive.

Finally, as a society, we must accept that college is not for everyone's success and fulfillment. Ours is a pluralistic society in which a multitude of skills are needed which are not within the scope of a college degree.

Maybe some parents need to hear this when they're pushing an unwilling son or daughter to attend K-State. I overheard a fellow student giving his reason for coming to K-State the other day:

"I came down... (to K-State)... to see basketball," he said. The day when the majority of students offer such a reason for attending college here will be a sorry day indeed for Kansas State University.

Young plays a million-dollar game

Let's play "Let's Make A Deal" with the USFL.

Steve Young, former stand-out quarterback for Brigham Young University, signed a contract to play for the Los Angeles Express of the United States Football League. Not unusual, you say. How about that $40 million contract?

Young, great-great-grandson of Mormon leader Brigham Young, signed a $40 million contract Monday to play quarterback for the Express.

Young was told by the Cincinnati Bengals of the National Football League he would be the first player selected in the NFL draft, since the Bengals own the first draft choice. The club also offered Young a reported $3.5 million contract over a five-year period, including a $1 million signing bonus.

The Express offered Young a reported $1 million per year for four years and a $2.5 million signing bonus. Imagine being offered $2.5 million just to sign your name on a piece of paper.

The agreement also calls for a $100,000-a-year endorsement for a Salt Lake City savings and loan company; a scholarship policy with BYU for $183,000; and deferred payments totaling more than $30 million. The contract runs through the year 2027, when Young turns 65.

Young, a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, said at one time he wanted to play in the NFL, but decided over the weekend to sign with the Express.

"It was a very tough decision and it came after much deliberation on my part," he said.

The only deliberation I would have is how to invest all that money.

Young also said part of his decision to play for the USFL team was in part due to his desire to help BYU. The USFL has been signing up the crop of college stars lately. Mike Rozier, Nebraska fullback and 1983 Heisman Trophy winner, signed with the Pittsburgh Maulers. Marcus Dupree, formerly of the University of Oklahoma and the University of Southern Mississippi, signed with the New Orleans Breakers.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

Is this multi-million sports contract business bad? I think it can be, but with qualifications.

When seniors interview with companies, salary is often a key issue. Some take a job because of the company or location; many may take a job with a particular company because of the salary offered.

College professors can fall under the same category. A move to a different university could be due to an increase in salary, among other factors.

Let's face it — American society expects one to take the most, the best. Americans are taught to be greedy. If you don't believe me, watch some game shows. The name of the game is greed.

One show has a game which illustrates this principle perfectly. Contestants are shown six prizes and told to "keep" the three most expensive gifts. The prices of the gifts are added. If the contestant follows the instructions, he wins. Woe be to the contestant who "gives away" more than he "takes."

So why make all the fuss over some athlete signing a multi-million dollar contract? Because of values.

It is sad to think more value is placed upon someone who can throw a football 60 yards, or someone who can shoot a basket from 25 feet, or put a puck in a net with a wooden stick, than those who are responsible for governing and those who educate the future leaders of this society.

Here are some cases in point. The president of the United States makes $200,000 per year. The average public school teacher's salary is under $18,000. Dan Fouts, quarterback for the San Diego Chargers, makes a reported $1 million per year, as does Earvin "Magic" Johnson of the National Basketball Association's Los Angeles Lakers.

These people went into the wrong careers, you say. Maybe. What about the thousands of children who think anyone can play professional sports and structure their lives to that end? Few make it into college varsity sports; even fewer make it into the pros. Of those who do make it, there are always others waiting to "get a shot" at the pros.

What about injuries? There are a lot of former athletes who never got a shot at stardom because of an injury which ended their careers. If the athlete has no skills or education to back up his career, then that person is in trouble.

I think Young did the right thing in signing a contract with the Express. The scholarship agreement is outstanding and I hope it works.

I just wonder why society places more value on entertainment than education. Maybe someday it will wake up to the fact that the rest of the world has advanced in technology and education while we were left at the stadium to play our games.

Sig Ep housemom reflects on duties

By BECKY WILEY
Collegian Reporter

The smartly dressed woman hopped up from her deck of cards, flashed a warm smile and asked, "How's my little friend?" a familiar greeting to everyone she knows.

The woman is Cora "Cody" Shupe, an 81-year-old housemother for the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity who is retiring after 20 years of "motherhood."

"I'll miss the fellows, I really will, but I won't look back—that's stupid. I'll have happy memories," she said.

Shupe, who is from McPherson, explained how she got the job as housemother.

She said one of her daughters was in the Gamma Phi Beta sorority at K-State and knew that the fraternity was looking for a new housemother after the previous one died. Shupe was a widow, so her daughter recommended her to the fraternity.

"They told me how wonderful it (being a housemother) was and how I could go anywhere — Topeka or Kansas City — if I wanted to. All I had to do was make out the menus, buy the groceries and be a hostess," Shupe said, referring to the interview for the position.

She said the interviewing committee and the fraternity's Alumni Board were ready to sign her up, but she had doubts about the position.

"I told Fritz Knorr, a great Sig Ep on the Alumni Board, that I didn't know anything about being a housemom, but he said 'Good, we'll have a change,'" she said.

With more convincing from her daughter, she took the job and she said she hasn't regretted the decision.

"Everybody was really nice. I didn't dream I'd be up here for 20 years, but I've learned to love some mighty fine fellows from all over the United States. Boys are awful nice to be around," she said.

Marc Baker, junior in agricultural economics, said that Shupe was one of the main reasons he joined the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity. He had heard of all the nice things she did for the men.

He said he was the recipient of one of Shupe's "nice things" soon after becoming a member of the fraternity.

"About 20 seconds before I was to leave to pick up my date for my first big party, I ripped my zipper. Cody saw that I was having some problems, so she came over and asked me what was the matter. I told her, so she just whipped out her sewing machine and had it fixed in no time," he said.

However, fixing zippers isn't her only motherly talent. She said that she knows her "fellows" well, so she is able and willing to offer a listening ear and helpful advice whenever one of the men need her.

"One fellow came in and said 'I don't know what to do. My girlfriend wants to go out with another guy.' I said, 'Well, dummy, just give her some of her own medicine. Get some good-looking chick.' It worked. They're back together and might get married," Shupe said.

"If we get depressed and have a problem, it's nice to be able to get away from living with 100 guys and go in and see a smiling face," Baker said.

Some members of the fraternity simply enjoy Shupe's company.

"She's got a great memory and can tell some good stories about her childhood. That's why I go in there (Shupe's apartment) — to hear her stories," said John Stonner, sophomore in business education. "I don't think she's ever lost a game of gin either."

Shupe said she has tried to teach the boys about etiquette too.

"A couple of guys came in to dinner one night wearing those caps that have the bill on them, you know, and I said 'Take your cap off.' Then about 10 more came in, and it was the same thing. 'Take your cap off.' Why, even my president came in one time wearing one, so I told him that program council

"UPC... We do it right!"

The Union Program Council is a group of student volunteers whose main goal is to provide a variety of educational, cultural, and entertainment programs to meet the needs and interests of the diverse student body.

Arts

coordinates all phases of most K-State Union Art Gallery exhibitions, including selection, design, installation and publicity. The committee also schedules the Union 2nd floor showcase and sponsors print sales, Art Rentals on a semester basis, the Mid-Day Arts series, the annual Arts and Crafts Sale and the Photography Contest.

Feature Films

provides the best in current films and box-office successes to be shown every weekend in the K-State Union Forum Hall. Other programs include midnight shows, weekend matinees, film festivals, and an annual Academy Awards Contest.

Kaleidoscope

as a kaleidoscope produces different images, this unique film committee brings a diverse selection of movies from every corner of the world.

Issues & Ideas

strives to meet the challenge of current events by informing the campus of issues in the community, state, nation and the world. In addition to major speakers, the "Let's Talk About It" programs are open discussions in the K-State Union Catskeller that provide an informal atmosphere to discuss current issues.

Outdoor Recreation

offers a wide variety of exciting, challenging and rewarding programs based on a "cooperative wilderness adventure" structure. Such programs include Sailing, Canoeing, Rappelling and Backpacking.

Travel

offers a variety of trips for students during vacation periods. Members of UPC Travel plan and coordinate trips, as well as publicize them to the University community. They also sponsor the annual Travel Fair where students, faculty and staff have an opportunity to obtain information about UPC trips and also visit with local travel agencies.

Special Events

promote a wide variety of entertainment. They will be responsible for the selection, promotion, and execution of a variety of programs. In the past these programs have included: The Annual Welcome Back Concerts, Activities Carnivals, The Second City Comedy Group, Doc Watson, John McEuen, and Late Nite with the K-State Union.

Coffeehouse

provides the best in live entertainment in the unique atmosphere of the K-State Union Catskeller. Whether the program is folk, country-rock or comedy, the result is the same quality entertainment in an intimate setting. Coffeehouse programs include Nooners (student entertaining students), and the annual Recycle Your Records Sale.

Special effects debris caused crash

WASHINGTON — Debris from a series of explosions on the set of the "Twilight Zone" movie caused the helicopter crash which killed actor Vic Morrow and two children in July 1982, a federal investigation concluded Tuesday.

The National Transportation Safety Board said that while the helicopter pilot flew too close to the huts where the special effects explosives were detonated, director John Landis was equally at fault as the man "solely in charge of the filming operation."

The board members said there appeared to have been no communication or coordination between the pilot and the film director, even though the pilot had warned earlier that the special effects explosives could pose a danger if detonated beneath the helicopter.

The circumstances that led to the tragedy "took both the action of the pilot and the action of the film director," NTSB chairman Jim Burnett told reporters after the board decided on the probable cause for the accident.

Burnett cautioned, however, that the board's findings are "not intended to determine blame" for the accident and that its conclusions should not have a bearing on a Los Angeles trial in which Landis, the pilot and three other people associated with the movie faced involuntary manslaughter charges.

Theo Landon recuperating 'nicely'

TOPEKA — Former Gov. Alf M. Landon said Tuesday his wife, Theo, is recovering nicely from Monday's surgery to replace her right hip joint.

"She's just getting along fine. She's able to do more than I was able to do this soon (after surgery)," said Landon, 96, who plans to visit his wife in the hospital today.

Mrs. Landon, 85, had surgery two days after falling in the couple's northwest Topeka home and breaking the hip. She is expected to be hospitalized at Stormont-Vail Regional Medical Center several weeks.

Landon broke a bone in his left hip nine months ago and had to have pins inserted in the bone to facilitate its healing. He is walking normally again, following a long period of recuperation.

English pancake flipper wins race

LIBERAL — A mad-dash sprint to the finish line captured the Kansas half of the pancake race for Mona Canaday on Shrove Tuesday, but she couldn't outrun Louise Fitzgerald of Olney, England.

Fitzgerald, a 17-year-old schoolgirl, ran a 415-yard course through the streets of Olney in 64.1 seconds as Olney won the annual race for the second straight year and retained the silver skillet.

Canaday, 28, ran the S-shaped course in Liberal in 66.27 seconds.

Each woman carried a pancake in her skillet, flipping it once at the start of the race and again at the end to prove she still had it.

The two women congratulated each other in a trans-Atlantic telephone call following the race.

Liberal's edge over Olney was narrowed to 19-15. The race was declared a draw one year when a television truck interfered with the Olney women.

Legend has that Olney women began pancake racing in the 15th century. An absent-minded housewife is said to have started the tradition when she raced off to a Shrove Tuesday church service carrying her frying pan and pancake.

Networks survive losses of ad revenue

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — "The Day After," the highest-rated TV movie this season, was too controversial for many advertisers. "Lace," the season's highest-rated miniseries, was too sexy for many advertisers.

The result was that ABC unloaded some commercial time at bargain-basement rates.

Question: Does Madison Avenue, an innovator in creating commercials for its products, lose its nerve when the networks take programming risks?

Lewis Erlicht, president of ABC Entertainment, said advertisers have failed to support provocative programming, such as "The Day After," about the aftermath of a nuclear attack, "Something About Amelia," whose subject was incest, and "Playing for Time," set against a Nazi concentration camp.

"The same group that asks for change in programming doesn't support change," Erlicht said.

"We need advertisers to have backbone," said Brandon Tartikoff, president of NBC Entertainment. Because of sponsor defections, Tartikoff said, an award-winning "Quincy" episode on drug abuse lost $300,000, and "Special Bulletin," an Emmy-winning TV movie about nuclear blackmail, lost more than $1 million.

Some of the criticism has come from advertisers themselves. "Advertisers should use the same policies to judge programming that they do to create advertising," said Larry Lamattina, executive vice president of the SSC&B ad agency.

The advertisers, Lamattina said, have consistently called for innovative programs to combat pay TV, which has no advertising. "We should support it and we can, without giving up our own standards," he said.

Lamattina said a cosmetics company wouldn't show "a prim and proper librarian in its ads. It uses the sexiest and most beautiful women in the world. So, if you make sexy commercials, why would sexy programs frighten you?"

ABC said "Lace," a two-part drama about three glamorous women, was given the brush by some women's products. "They made that decision for image and public relations reasons. It was not a marketing judgment," said Bob Silberberg, ABC's national sales manager.

Silberberg said similar considerations were behind sponsor defections from the critically praised "The Day After." He said many companies are scared of viewer backlash, such as organized letter protests and boycotts from the Moral Majority and the Coalition for Better Television.

"The thinking of many advertisers is to avoid controversy at all costs," Lamattina said. "With any issue there are two sides and if it appears that an advertiser is taking a stand, it might alienate one side or the other."

Some advertising agency executives said they avoided "The Day After" because they regarded it as too downbeat and not a suitable environment for commercial messages.

"Some advertisers don't want to be associated for image reasons, whether the show is high-rated or low-rated," said Mark Goldstein of the Ogilvy & Mather ad agency.

But studies conducted after "The Day After" suggest greater positive than negative ruboff on controversial broadcasts.

A poll commissioned by the J. Walter Thompson ad agency said that, among people who reported changed attitudes about "Day After" sponsors were changed, the change was positive by a margin of 5 to 1. ABC's own survey, conducted by R.H. Bruskin market researchers, said viewer attitudes toward the show's advertisers were favorable by 3 to 1.

Lamattina said these results shocked Madison Avenue. "It was new news," he said.

Controversial content won't scare some advertisers. For example, K-tel records, Commodore computers and Dexatrim appetite suppressants constantly appear on these programs — often at the last minute, at reduced rates.

"We're just plain opportunistic purchasers of prime time," said Dale Applequist, the ad man responsible for K-tel's TV marketing. Applequist bought time in "Lace" several days before the broadcast at "considerably less than the average price" of $80,000 for 30 seconds.

"Those restricted-use fees are used by the institutions to supplement their state OOE (Other Operating Expenditures) support," he said, "primarily in the areas of library acquisitions and computing."

"Under this alternative, tuition rates would be established which would not only generate the revenues needed for a 25 percent systemwide fee-cost ratio, but which would also generate additional revenues to replace the current restricted-use fee revenue."

Koplik said the $10 academic support fee currently collected at K-State would not be collected under the fourth proposal, so students would pay about the same total amount regardless of which proposal is finally adopted.

Regent Jordan Haines, Wichita, said he would support a plan which increased the $40 differential between undergraduate and graduate tuitions. He said the differential was implemented due to the higher cost of providing graduate education over undergraduate education.

"Last year, without a great analysis or research, we pulled a $40 figure out of the air," he said. "I don't think it's logical to maintain the same difference."

Tom Rawson, regent director of planning and budget, said, "I don't think we can analytically derive an answer, because if we charged proportionately to the cost of graduate education, we would drive many students to Nebraska and Oklahoma."

he should know better and that he should set an example. He said "Well, my hair's a mess," but I told him that I'd rather look at messy hair than a cap," she said.

After retiring, she plans to go back to McPherson and live in the apartment that she keeps there.

"I think I'm smart to quit while I'm still in good health. I want the boys to remember me as jolly and helpful, not somebody they have to help down the stairs," she said.

Shupe expressed her feelings about being a housemother by reading a paragraph from an article from the Magazine of Executives.

"I really thought this was good. It said 'But most of all, we need to laugh. We need to see the humor in the dumb, crazy things the guys do. We need to see the joy and experience, the happiness in their lives. We really need to laugh.'" she said.

Neither Shupe, Stonner nor Baker will be involved with hiring a replacement, but Baker echoed the thoughts of many when he said, "If they could find somebody like Cody, that'd be the one they'd want."

Fred Worman, graduate in agricultural economics, and former 2nd District Congressman Martha Keys discuss the campaign of Democratic presidential hopeful Sen. Gary Hart, D-Colo., Tuesday morning in the Union Courtyard. Keys is Hart's sister-in-law.

we could strategically plan our defenses so we could have more security and could still cut our defense expenditures," she said. "He is committed to the nuclear freeze. He led the fight in the Senate against the MX (missiles) and forced there to be a three-day discussion on the issue."

"He is very strong on the issues of foreign policy and the terrible responses of this administration in its militaristic policies," Keys said.

"Sen. Hart has called for the bringing home of all troops and military advisers in Central America. He certainly supports our help there, but he has spoken very clearly of it being directed to economic aid, not military aid."

Keys said she was surprised by Hart's unexpected win in the New Hampshire primary.

"I always felt it could happen," she said. "Without question, all of us feel it's something of a miracle that such a strong, unprecedented win in New Hampshire occurred."

Keys said she expects Hart to have a win in the South.

"On super Tuesday, we're going to be able to show, I feel quite certain, a win in the southern states," she said.

Hart's strength is growing rapidly in the South and elsewhere.

"Washington is a strongly organized Hart state," she said. "Massachusetts seems to be reflecting the Hart strength as well."

Keys said she thinks Hart will do well in the Kansas Democratic caucus on March 24.

"I am feeling very good about Hart support and strength here in Kansas," she said. "Sen. Hart was born and reared in Ottawa. Some of those family connections have a lot of people coming out and getting interested in this who have never registered in an election. A lot of the people who were Republicans have changed their registration."

Scholar selection for Smith begins

Campus recruitment for participants in the Smith Scholarship Program will begin today.

Participants in the program can be nominated in two ways, said Bert Biles, assistant dean for sponsored programs.

In addition to extending an open invitation to any freshman, sophomore or junior currently enrolled at K-State, Biles has asked all deans and department heads "to nominate three men currently enrolled at K-State for consideration as participants in the 1984 Smith Scholars Program."

Each dean and department head is asked to nominate one freshman, one sophomore and one junior.

Before submitting a nomination or application, Biles said several preliminary requirements must be fulfilled.

The nominee must be interested in participating in the Smith Scholars Program and be willing to reside in Smith House for his remaining years at K-State. He must have a minimum 3.0 overall grade point average and demonstrate some financial need.

"It's important to emphasize that what we're talking about is participation in the Smith Scholars Program which includes program aspects in nine dimensions: academics, social activities, cultural activities, physical and mental well-being, vocational planning, leadership, governance, University involvement and community involvement and service," he said.

After selecting 15 participants from "a group of outstanding incoming freshman applications," and expecting between eight and 10 returning scholars, Biles said the Smith Scholarship Program is on its way to reaching its goal of 40 scholars for the 1984 program.

Applications for the program are available in Anderson 108.

Ag graduates' farming

Future uncertain

By LILLIAN ZIER
Collegian Reporter

For those who grew up on a family farm and have grown to love farm life, the process of choosing a career is often hampered by a desire to follow tradition and make a living from the land.

About 10 percent of 1983 agriculture graduates are self-employed, Jim Akin, associate director of the Career Planning and Placement Center, said.

"Many are going into partnership with their parents," John Riley, associate professor of economics, said. "Many are independent — they lease land and buy used equipment."

"Twenty to 25 percent of agricultural economics majors return to the farm," he said. "Our farm management option is designed for those who want to return to the farm."

"Some took jobs, and after two to five years, returned to farming. It is not easy for young people to get started. The cost of land and resources are too high for the prices farm commodities are commanding. We are not getting high prices," Riley said.

Farming expenses have risen more than 250 percent since 1967, he said. However, the prices received for wheat have changed little.

"Kansas farmers would have been in better shape if it wasn't for the drought the last two years," he said.

Riley said too many young farmers have "new paint disease." The are enamored with new equipment, while they should be willing to buy used equipment and rent land.

Gary Rumsey, loan officer at Citizen State Bank, said the prospects for graduates going back to the farm are bleak.

"There are farmers out there making a living. People who have incurred a large level debt find themselves in a difficult position, depending on how much they have borrowed and how well their business has been running," he said.

Rumsey said it is impossible for a young person to start out farming.

"He's either going to have to have inherited a large amount of money or have land to go back to. The only ones going back are merging with parents. It's always in conjunction with their family. They may be in partnership. Sometimes the partnership is just in operation, and the parents retain ownership," he said.

On the other hand, Dave Woolfolk, president of the Federal Land Bank Association, said now may be the best time to get into farming.

"Grassland is selling about the same as five years ago. Flint Hills grassland is selling for about $300 an acre. In 1978, it was selling between $425 and $450 and acre. It's a good time for young people to get into agriculture," Woolfolk said.

"There's a lot of used machinery out there they can buy cheaper. A lot of land can be leased right now. They can make it if they don't have to have a brand new pick-up and a $40,000 house."

The Federal Land Bank Association makes mostly long-term farm mortgage real estate loans. Farmers will mortgage their farm so they can buy it, Woolfolk said.

"Thirty percent of our loans go to people in the age group of 35 or below," he said. "Not very many loans go to people in the 22 to 24 age group. Ownership is not a key absolute to a young person getting started," he said.

Woolfolk drew an analogy between farming and running a dress shop. When a businessman decides to open a dress shop, he doesn't buy a building. He leases it until he can make a profit and possibly buy the building. He may find it more economical to continue leasing the building. The young farmer must also lease land until he makes enough profit to invest in land or new equipment, he said.

Keith Harimon, president of the Production Credit Association, agreed that land and machinery are at a reasonable price.

"Cultivated ground is selling between $500 and $600. Five years ago it sold around $700 or $800 an acre. This is a good time for young farmers to get into it (farming)," he said.

The Production Credit Association makes loans to "bonified farmers and ranchers." They are mostly drawn for operating costs, machinery loans or improvement. The average size of their loans are about $75,000, he said. The bulk of creditors are in the 50-plus age group. About 15 percent are young farmers.

David Crosson, senior in agricultural economics, said he will go back to the farm after graduation because he grew up on a farm, and that is what he has always wanted to do.

"My dad's retired, and I can go back and take over," he said. "My dad owns all his own ground. If I had to start over, I might not go back. It's a pretty good situation."

Crosson chose the agri-business option in case his current plans fall through. He said he wanted something he could fall back on in case he couldn't make a living farming.

However, Crosson's voice was enthusiastic and confident about his future in farming. He rents ground from his father now and accepts his father's advice, but he said he is ready to stand on his own.

Young farmers also realize their family farms may not be big enough to support two families.

Layne Hoops, senior in agronomy, said he would like to go back to the farm, but has made up his mind to have a career as a chemical sales representative or an agriculture consultant.

"If things get better, it would be nice (to go back to the farm)," he said. "I still say that's the best place to raise a family."

Hoops' family farm is in Byron, Neb. One of his brothers is farming, and three others may go back to farm.

Hoops said he hasn't ruled out the option of going back some day.

"It depends on how jobs go and if I like it or not," he said.

Senate kills farm bill; tax shift shelter lost

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Stirred by concerns over possible tax increases for homeowners, the Kansas Senate changed its mind overnight and killed a bill Tuesday which would have protected farmers from property tax shifts under statewide reappraisal.

The proposal, killed on a 18-22 vote, would have required agricultural land to be assessed according to the property's ability to produce income rather than its fair market value.

Favored by Senate Republican leadership, the "use valuation" bill received first-round approval on Monday. But urban senators, Republican and Democrats, joined together to kill the proposal on a final roll call vote.

Sen. Bert Chaney, D-Hutchinson, opposed the measure saying it "separates out agricultural land for special treatment and creates a situation whereby taxes on homes could skyrocket in the movement toward uniform and equal."

Another opponent was Sen. Mike Johnston, D-Parsons, who warned that passage of the bill would make it "almost impossible" to reach a future agreement on how to resolve inequities in the Kansas property tax system.

Johnston said the bill "is poor policy, bad law and will serve only to further divide and make more difficult the already enormous task ahead of us dealing with the many issues involved in our property tax structure."

Kansas voters approved a constitutional amendment in 1975 to permit use valuation of agricultural land, but the assessment method has never been implemented. The use valuation bill was prompted by passage of a measure in the House two weeks ago ordering statewide reappraisal of all real estate.

The Senate bill would have required use valuation if reappraised property values were implemented for tax purposes without property classification, which permits different types of property to be taxed at different rates.

To classify property, the Kansas Constitution must be amended to change the mandate for uniform and equal taxation.

State law calls for property to be assessed at 30 percent of its fair market value, but inequities have developed because real estate has not been reappraised in 20 years. State tax officials agree residential property is assessed only at 8 percent of its market value and agricultural land at 4-6 percent.

Pasture control studied in tallgrass laboratory

By TODD NIGHSWONGER
Collegian Reporter

There is an area of land south of Manhattan that looks like typical Flint Hills scenery with its rolling hills and tallgrass prairie. It can be seen off to the right when traveling south on Kansas 177 before coming to Interstate 70.

However, this area is not typical. It has a unique quality not found anywhere else in the United States. It is the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area.

The Konza Prairie — named after an American tribe that lived in this area in the 1700s — is 8,616 acres of prairie research land aimed at benefiting man in its understanding of the prairie ecosystem and how it has been self-sustained for thousands of years.

The "tallgrass laboratory" was set up to study the original prairie and how it is affected by burning and grazing. Further research has begun with watersheds and rodent populations.

The value of this research is exemplified by concerns of some Flint Hills ranchers that their ranch was not as productive as 100 years before, Lloyd Hulbert, professor of biology and Konza Prairie director, said.

The birth of the Konza came in 1956, when about nine people in four K-State departments began meeting to see what they could do to obtain a prairie research area. They wrote a report to the University administration in 1958 about what the value of such an area would be and why it was needed.

Support gradually grew, and in early 1970, Hulbert and a counterpart went to Washington, D.C., to try and gain support from government agencies.

"Several of them (agencies) thought it was a great idea, but didn't have the money," Hulbert said.

Finally, the two found help from The Nature Conservancy, a national, non-profit and private organization whose objective is to preserve natural diversity by protecting lands containing the best examples of all components of the natural world.

Hulbert had previously spent a year and a half in the 1960s trying to find the best site for a research area. He said he knew that he had to find a location where the natural prairie system was in good condition and had cultivatable soils never plowed. The latter was especially difficult to find, he said, because of abundant farmland in the Manhattan area.

A location was found and purchased by the Conservancy in 1971. The area is bounded by K-177 to the east, I-70 to the south and McDowell Creek Road to the north. Most of the Konza was at one time part of the Dewey Ranch, owned by C.P. Dewey and operated for many years by his son, Chauncey Dewey.

Sold by the Deweys in 1930, the land changed hands three times before being acquired by The Nature Conservancy and added to the Konza in 1977. The Konza is now administered by the Division of Biology at K-State.

Currently the Konza Prairie is the largest site of long-term study of the original prairie and its habitat, Hulbert said.

"We're the prime site for prairie research because we (K-State) got the opportunity from having land that hasn't been plowed," he said.

The Flint Hills is the only area of extensive, unplowed tallgrass prairie left. And without tallgrass prairie, which is required of many prairie animals, these animals would be homeless and would perish, Hulbert said.

Hulbert and his research colleagues are developing an example of original prairie conditions so they can have something to compare with the change in physical, biological and chemical properties of agricultural land. This comparison may lead to a better understanding of what changes have occurred in agriculture.

"It's difficult to know how much change has occurred in land," he said.

To help renew the characteristics of the original prairie, experiments with prairie fires was begun.

Many prairie fires must now be set, unlike pre-settlement times when frequent burning occurred as a result of lightning and Indians.

"We're doing it (burning) because it's part of the natural system," Hulbert said. There are many advantages to burning.

"If you don't burn you get forest eventually, and there wouldn't be any prairie anymore," he said.

Burning to prevent forest takeover allows prairie grasses to properly grow, providing sufficient food for livestock grazing. In the future, Hulbert said he plans to restock once-native bison, elk and proghorn which will help provide the desired original prairie system.

Hulbert said that without burning, there would be no prairie and no prairie animals.

In one study, the population of rodents decreased immediately after burning. But by the end of the year, the population was higher than it was before the burning. The reason for the increase was that burning enabled grass to produce more seeds to feed the rodents.

"Burning at proper intervals and proper times of the year seems to be good for the prairie," Hulbert said.

Research on annual, two-year, four-year and 10-year burnings to determine the most efficient interval is now being conducted. The best time of the year seems to be late spring, he said.

Hulbert said he believes burning is the best method of maintaining the prairie because it's a part of the natural system and costs less than other procedures.

"The only other ways to keep prairies in decent shape would be to mow or use herbicides, and those are both much more costly," he said.

'Sodbuster bill' funds soil conservation

By LINDA MORRELL
Collegian Reporter

Early agriculturists had limited knowledge about soil conservation and cared little about it. The land was there for the taking, and there seemed to be enough for everyone.

The Dust Bowl era in the early 1900s changed the attitudes of both agriculturists and government. Conserving soil became a major issue then, and continues to be important today to farmers and politicians.

Currently the government is considering a program to provide additional aid in soil conservation. Included in this program is what is known as the "Sodbuster Bill," proposed by Sen. William L. Armstrong, R-Colo., last fall.

The bill is designed to eliminate benefits, including price supports, for those who grow crops on highly erodible land that has not been farmed for the past 10 years, said John Tippie, state conservationist for the Kansas Soil Conservation Service (SCS).

Erosion is defined as the movement of soil from its original site to a new site. Wind and water are the primary erosion causes, but pesticides, glaciers, cropping and soil slips are among other natural and man-induced causes.

The SCS was established in 1935 to aid the farmer in maintaining conservation practices.

The service leads the farmer through surveying his farm, developing a farm conservation plan, applying plan treatment and using and maintaining the plan.

Price supports involve ineligibility for crop insurance, disaster payments, storage facility loans and adjustment payments, he said.

Since the bill was introduced, Republican Senators Nancy Kassebaum and Robert Dole have become co-sponsors of the bill.

The Senate Agriculture Subcommittee on Soil and Water Conservation and the Environment passed the bill last November in an amended form.

The 15-member House Agriculture Subcommittee on Conservation Credit and Rural Development will consider the bill this week, Greg Frazier, legislative assistant to Republican representative Dan Glickman, said. Glickman serves on the subcommittee.

If the House subcommittee approves the measure, it will go to the House Agriculture Committee and back to the Senate subcommittee, Frazier said.

"Farmers will be taking a closer look at whether it's economically feasible to break out land," said Charles Gentry, SCS North Central Kansas area conservationist.

"I'm not aware of a lot of land (in Kansas) going from grass to cropland, although one county did have 3,000 acres (converted) one year," Tippie said.

The change from grass to cropland may offset the beef industry some, he said.

The area of crop production also will be affected because of soil conservation practices of minimum tillage, said Robert Paris, second vice president of the Kansas Association of Wheat Growers.

The bill "is a good bill because it would control mismanagement and dust erosion," Paris said. "It's (soil conservation) a complex issue, and I wish it was a simple process."

Croplands are to become less productive, according to the Global 2000 Report, a data collection and analysis report by scientists and the Central Intelligence Agency to determine the United States' resources by the year 2000.

Soil conservation will probably be of concern in the 1985 farm bill, said Al Schmaderer, state Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service program specialist.

A pilot program in Washington and Idaho to plant and retain vegetative cover on erodible land until 1985 is to be considered in writing the bill, Schmaderer said.

"It's a rather exciting time for soil conservation," he said.

Farmers are now trying to work on a method of obtaining soil conservation for future use, and today's agriculture students will have to continue conservation, he said.

Another current program involving soil erosion is the Acreage Conservation Reserve Special Project, Schmaderer said. This project covers idle land in a commodity program, such as the payment-in-kind program, which must be protected from wind and water erosion.

If the land is classified by the conservation service as being within specific erosion levels and is eroding at two times its tolerance level, the owner is eligible to receive 90 percent of the cost to put on a vegetative cover. If covered with grass, the land must remain idle for five years. Land planted to trees must remain idle for 10 years.

Schmaderer estimated there are about 300 to 400 participants in the program statewide.

Nationally, about 150 million acres of land have been destroyed or seriously impaired because of erosion, the Environmental Protection Agency reports.

An average of six tons of soil per cropland acre is lost to wind and water erosion annually, state SCS inventory figures show. However, the EPA estimated that even the deeper soils cannot withstand more than a five-ton-per-acre loss.

Soil conservation practices include contour farming, strip cropping, minimum tillage, terracing, gully reclamation and shelterbelting.

SGA provides chance for student participation

By SUZY HILL

Student government elections may be over, but involvement isn't limited to elected positions.

Students may become involved in student government by serving on Student Senate committees, the Senate aide program or campus-wide committees.

Senate committees are made up of senators and at-large members. Committee chairmen, appointed by the Senate chairman, select other committee members through an application process, said Tracy Turner, Senate chairman and junior in economics.

"The deadline for applying for a seat on a standing committee is Friday. The applications are available in the SGA (Student Governing Association) office," he said.

The seven standing committees are Finance, Communications, Operations, Personnel Selection, Academic Affairs, Student Affairs and State/Local Affairs.

"We've selected the Finance Committee already, because they're already working on budget hearings (for upcoming tentative allocations)," Turner said.

The number of people selected for each committee varies. The committee chairman chooses the number of members to best do the job.

"If there are a lot of people interested in getting involved, there are plenty of things the committees have to keep people busy," he said.

Students must devote several hours a week to committee work, with the amount of time varying among the different committees.

"If you can budget your time well and plan ahead, setting aside a couple of hours a week is enough time to serve on a standing committee," Turner said.

The other way students can become involved in Senate is through the Senate aide program, which has been revised since last semester. The program provides the opportunity for 20 students to work with senators and become familiar with Senate operations.

"The new aide program will be more beneficial for Senate overall and will give the aides more experience and direct involvement," said Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities.

Under the former program, each senator had an aide assigned them. The new program created a pool of 20 aides to be used by all senators.

"We wanted to make the program more selective and wanted the aides to end their term feeling a part of the system. Too many Senate aides felt they were just attending the meetings with little chance for direct involvement," Turner said.

An aide is required to attend the Senate meetings and be available to research material for senators, Turner said.

Routson said she thinks the program can help these students become more knowledgeable about student government, and will help them decide whether they want to continue involvement by running for Senate the next year.

Students are appointed to campus-wide committees by Ken Heinz, student body president and junior in computer science. These committees represent students to administrators and faculty members. Examples of campus-wide committees are the Recreation Services Council and the University Activities Board.

For more information about applying for Senate and campus committees, students may contact the SGA office in the Union, or call 532-6541.

K-State dumps ISU in tournament opener

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

It wasn't a pretty game. Fifty turnovers were committed, 37 fouls were called and 50 free throws were attempted.

But it was a win, nevertheless, as the 7th-ranked K-State Lady 'Cats advanced to second-round action of the Big Eight Conference Tournament with a 86-60 victory over the Iowa State University Cyclones Tuesday night at Ahearn Field House.

K-State improves its overall record to 23-5, while Iowa State falls to 4-24. The Lady 'Cats will next face the University of Oklahoma at 3:15 p.m. Friday at Kemper Arena in Kansas City. OU was a 76-63 victor over the University of Kansas in first-round action at Norman.

"We won big, and I'm glad to get this one out of the way," Head Coach Lynn Hickey said. "I didn't think it was a smooth win, but it's nice to have that 23rd win."

K-State's Cassandra Jones opened up the scoring with a eight-foot jumper to give the Lady 'Cats a lead they would never relinquish. Iowa State failed to connect on its first eight tries downcourt before scoring its first basket with 14:50 remaining in the first half.

The Lady 'Cats raced to a 20-6 lead as Cassandra Jones, Jennifer Jones and Angie Bonner accounted for 16 of those 20 points. The Cyclones would get no closer than 13 points and fell behind by as many as 18 in the first half. The Lady 'Cats took a 39-19 lead at intermission.

Cassandra Jones, who suffered a forearm injury on a layup attempt and left the contest at the 4:49 mark, led the first-half scoring with nine points. Sophomore Sheronda Jenkins added eight, while Bonner contributed seven.

The Cyclones had their share of offensive problems in the first half, hitting on seven of 27 field goal attempts for a dismal 26 percent. The visitors also had difficulty with K-State's fullcourt press and 3-2 zone as they turned the ball over 12 times.

The Lady 'Cats, who hit 17 of 28 field goals for 60.7 percent, had even more trouble in the turnover department, committing 15 first-half mistakes.

"We had way too many mistakes, and we weren't too alert," said Hickey, who watched her squad mishandle the ball a total of 25 times in the contest. "But we did much better in the second half."

K-State continued its zone pressure in the second half and opened a 23-point advantage with 12:02 remaining in the game. Jennifer Jones canned four straight baskets to give K-State its 58-35 lead.

Freshman guard Susan Green later hit six consecutive points and connected on two free throws at the 1:45 mark to help give K-State its biggest lead of the night at 81-53. Green also dished out two straight assists to sophomore Tina Dixon during the scoring run.

Green also fed an assist to sophomore Cindy Durham for what would be K-State's last basket of the game and the 86-60 victory. Green and Durham finished the contest with 13 and seven points, respectively.

Bonner paced all scorers with 16 points, followed by Jennifer Jones with 14, Green with 13 and Dixon and Jenkins with 10 apiece. Freshman Carlisa Thomas grabbed a team-high 10 rebounds, handed out six assists and grabbed five steals. Dixon added nine rebounds.

The Lady 'Cats finished the contest connecting on 35 of 59 shots for 59.3 percent from the field and sinking 16 of 29 charity tosses for 55.2 percent. Iowa State, which was led by Tonya Burns' 15 points, made 23 of 60 field goals for 38.3 percent.

The winner of the K-State-Oklahoma contest will advance to Saturday's final against the winner of the University of Missouri-Oklahoma State University game.

OU women win

By The Associated Press

NORMAN, Okla. — Jacquette Hurley had a game-high 18 points and 13 rebounds to lead Oklahoma to a 76-63 win over Kansas in the first round of the Big Eight Conference women's basketball tournament Tuesday.

The Lady Sooners, 21-7, will face K-State in a semi-final game Friday at the Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo. Kansas finishes the season at 11-16.

After spotting Kansas a 3-0 lead, Oklahoma raced to a 40-21 halftime advantage and led by as many as 21 points early in the second half.

Tubbs adds spark

Maybe I should transfer to the University of Oklahoma. I should definitely get out of the state of Kansas. The reason for this sudden desire that I should transport my body elsewhere? It seems that I'm one of the minority of fans supporting Billy Tubbs and the Oklahoma-style of basketball.

I've always been a fan of Sooner basketball, and when OU hired Tubbs, I didn't know much about him except that his former team — Lamar University — played an exciting run-and-gun type of offense. So while the Sooners lost more than their share of basketball games in his initial season at Oklahoma, at least they were fun to watch.

During Tubbs' next season, the Sooners went 22-11, including a second-place finish in the Big Eight Conference postseason tournament. They received a bid to the National Invitational Tournament and won three games before falling to eventual tournament champion Bradley University.

And this was all before the "Wayman Tisdale Era" began at Oklahoma. This year's team was successful in playing the same type of game it is now — exciting and fun to watch.

Forget everything you read or hear about whether or not Tubbs is a good coach. His record speaks for itself — three consecutive 20-win seasons, with this year's team on the verge of winning 30. He lets his players be themselves and doesn't try to program them into a certain system. A friend of mine said that if Tisdale had attended K-State, Jack Hartman would have turned him into a 16-points-per-game player who dove for loose balls, and he's probably right. It just seems that to some people, there is nothing worse than a player's coach who wins.

Tubbs' team traveled to Boulder, stomped on the Buffalos in overtime and celebrated. Later in the season they took a trip to Lawrence, rolled past the Jayhawks in overtime and celebrated.

These Sooner celebrations led

HUEY COUNTS
Sports Editor

to confrontations between the OU basketball squad and the opposing fans. The crowd threw cups and OU team members raised fingers. Which fingers were raised is something only the players' hair dressers know for sure. But I do know that I saw replays and photos from the games, and while I saw a lot of index fingers raised, I never did see any obscene gestures.

Instead of constantly knocking Tubbs, the Big Eight should be thanking him for giving the conference some national recognition. Kansas, the Big Eight's second-place team, lost five conference games. Five teams finished below .500 in conference play.

The Sooners are having a fine season and Tubbs is being criticized for letting them enjoy it. Tubbs has said numerous times that college basketball is fun and was meant to be played that way, and his team actually looks like it's having a great time when it's on the court. And this year the Sooners are doing what every other coach probably wishes his own team could do — win and have fun.

Tubbs is a rebel in a league of — and I'll use Billy's own words — "robots and phonies," and it's time to give credit where credit is due.

Tubbs deserved being named the Coach of the Year for simply not letting the entire conference slip into oblivion and for putting life back into Big Eight basketball.

Let's hear it for "Billy Ball."

Lady 'Cat Carlisa Thomas steals the ball from floor-bound Iowa State University guard Sheila Mason during K-State's 86-60 first-round victory in the Big Eight Conference postseason tournament Tuesday. The victory advances the Lady Cats to the semifinals in Kansas City on Friday.

'Hacker' becomes racquetball teacher

By TOM FAY
Collegian Reporter

A teacher and a promoter of the sport, he has traveled the Midwest playing racquetball. Glen Caby has spent the last five years promoting the sport in Manhattan.

Caby, a senior in electrical engineering, began playing racquetball seriously in 1978, his last year in the U.S. Army, while stationed at Fort Riley.

"I met this guy in the Army. His name was Ron York, and he was chasing the pro-tour back then (1978 and 1979). Before I met him, I had played for about six months and I really liked it. I met him when I played in the all-post tournament at Fort Riley," Caby said.

"I'm a decent, natural athlete and I thought I was getting pretty good, and then I played him (York) and I got three points in a match. I was soaked. I was drenched. I ran all over the court, and when I finished playing him, he just had a little dot of sweat (on his shirt) in the middle of his chest. That's when I found out that there was really a lot to the game," he said.

Caby was a "hacker" until he met York, and then he realized that racquetball is a complex game. From 1980 to 1982, he said he put his best efforts and all of his money into racquetball.

"I've been competing for the last five years. When I first started playing, I'd travel all over (the Midwest) to the tournaments," Caby said. "Six years ago there weren't that many tournaments compared to the number there are now. Back then I was more serious than I am now. I would travel as far as St. Louis to play."

He has played at almost all of the clubs in Kansas City. He has won six open tournaments in the Midwest and taken third in Kansas twice. His biggest accomplishment is taking second in the Omaha Pro-Am Tournament in 1981.

"More people are playing racquetball than ever before, but it's shrunk in the fact that there is less money than ever to be made by the pros. Three or four years ago there used to be a money tournament every two or three weeks that was within driving distance (300 miles) of Manhattan. Now there are just a couple a year," Caby said.

Amateurs used to be able to play at tournaments in the qualifying rounds where they would have a chance to play the professionals, but that isn't possible anymore. There is a separate division for the amateurs, in which there may be a $500 prize to the winner.

"The pro tour is almost nonexistent. It just has a select 16 (players), which is real hard to break into. It's (racquetball) not like tennis where you can be number 582 in the world and still make a healthy living. If you're not in the top five in the world is racquetball, you're not going to make a living," Caby said.

Racquetball tournaments are classified by novice, D, C, B, A, open and professional divisions, with novice being the easiest bracket and professional the most difficult. If first or second place is taken in any division, then one must advance to the next division.

"I started playing in the C division and I worked my way all the way up to where I was winning open tournaments and I was just starting to be able to compete at the pro-am's," Caby said. "But most of my competing was done on the amateur level."

"I was never actually deriving any steady income playing racquetball. I'd cash in every now and then because I'd make a few hundred dollars here and a few hundred dollars there," he said.

Caby said his practice time depended on upcoming tournaments and how much time he had for school. He said that when racquetball was his main priority he would play six or seven days a week.

Besides being a player, Caby also teaches lessons.

"Usually the way I worked my lessons was that when people would approach me directly, I would do it for free. I was also the teaching pro out at Cottonwood Racquet Club. I worked there for two years and then gave that up when school got bad," Caby said.

He said he had to do well to get his grade point average to a point where he could get a job this semester.

Caby played intramurals his first year at K-State and won the all-University singles bracket, and then limited his playing time for about three years. He is involved in the doubles intramural racquetball competition this semester and has already clinched the independent division.

Caby has done many things to promote racquetball around Manhattan.

"Since I've been here in Manhattan, I've put on 12 tournaments out at Cottonwood. They've all been small open tournaments," Caby said.

"Little tournaments are held inside the club (Cottonwood) where the members play the members, or against other racquetball clubs. I've had social gatherings where we'd (members and friends) all get together, play racquetball and have barbecues," he said.

Caby and four other students started the K-State Racquetball Club, which has a $10 per semester membership fee.

"The purpose of the club is to promote racquetball, and originally it was founded to be an external organization," Caby said. "It wasn't too concerned about pleasing the members. It was to be concerned about promoting racquetball. Some of the things that we were trying to do were to get some kind of Big Eight competition going and to establish a team to go to the collegiate nationals."

The K-State Racquetball Club began last spring and took about a semester to become established. Caby is no longer a member.

"Probably the biggest thing I've done to promote racquetball is or has been in offering help. I've given tons of free lessons, clinics and exhibitions," he said.

Competition is essential in gaining experience in racquetball, he said.

"To win a national tournament, you have to live where the competition is," Caby said. "There isn't going to be anybody living in Manhattan who is going to be able to go out and ever do anything on a national level because you have to have the competition."

"The only reason that I am as good as I am is because of York and one other pro who used to be in the Army at Fort Riley. I got to play them for a couple of years, and you need that competition to be able to go out and compete with the real world," Caby said.

"The intensity level gets real high. I've had racquets thrown at me and people who try to purposely hit me with the ball, but you learn to fight back," he said. "You learn to fight back."

Memorial Stadium turf upgraded

By TOM FAY
Collegian Reporter

New Kentucky fescue grass planted last fall in Memorial Stadium is beginning to sprout, but K-State officials said the field would not be ready for use until May 1.

"The reason for redoing it (the field) is because we've had a vegetation of many different kinds there — bare spots and chickweed. We wanted to get rid of all the unwanted vegetation and get a nice fescue lawn," Don Sherley, grounds foreman, said.

"The reason we were getting pretty irregular with holes, dips and ruts," Tom Lee, superintendent of grounds, said.

"When we put that (grass) in, we had originally planned that it (the field) would be open around the first or middle of April, but since winter came as early as it did, it didn't give the grass a good chance to get established," Lee said. "At the same time, we put a whole new irrigation system in so that during the spring and summer, if we have dry spells, we can go ahead and do plenty of watering."

A snow fence was put up to keep people off of the field until it is ready for use.

"We had people out there before the grass had come up walking their dogs, running and digging gouges and grooves in it," said Lee, who added that no other forms of vandalism have occurred.

"We have upgraded that area immensely from what it was," Sherley said, "but when we seeded this fall, we also went into an early winter so that grass did not get the fall growth that it normally would."

"This (weather) is one of the reasons that we put that fencing up. I think after we mow it two or three times and harden the ground up, it's going to be a very nice, quality turf when spring gets here."

"We also spread new cinders on the track, and it should be ready anytime," Lee said. He said that because of the weather, there will be a delay on the availability of the field.

"Right now the best we can say is approximately the first of May after it seeds," he said.

Evelyn Hupe, office administrator of University Facilities, said that the stadium is used for student organizations such as the soccer and rugby teams, continuing education programs and military science reviews.

University-organized athletic teams — football, basketball and baseball — are not permitted to use the field, but organizations related to the University are permitted. The Lambda Chi Alpha Chariot Relay is the only event scheduled for spring because it takes place on the track only, said Hupe, who is in charge of scheduling events for the stadium.

Lee said that groups that want to use the stadium are required to obtain a form from University Facilities.

Pearl Harbor was bombed during World War II.

After leaving Florida, Williams went to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology to work on microwave radar and then helped in the production of synthetic rubber.

During the early part of World War II the United States was completely cut off from all sources of natural rubber. Williams said when the synthetic rubber was ready for production, he was left with two choices. He could either work for Phillips Petroleum Company as a production engineer, a job for which he said he wasn't qualified, or he could join the U.S. Navy, which was looking for flying officers.

Williams said he had heard about another project, so he wrote to a man named Robert Bacher who was on leave from Cornell University.

"In less than a week I received a long-distance telephone call from Bacher telling me to expect a letter," Williams said. "I received the letter which was from the Manhattan District Engineers, Box 1663, Santa Fe, New Mexico. I soon disappeared into Los Alamos."

While in Los Alamos, N.M., with a wife and two small children, Williams said he learned the Navy had traced him to Santa Fe to offer him a commission as a lieutenant commander.

But he was already committed to work with a group of scientists headed by Robert Oppenheimer to construct what they called a "gadget."

Williams said nobody in the laboratory ever called it a bomb. Two of the most important elements in the production of the atomic bomb are Uranium 235 and Plutonium 239.

Williams said no one had yet separated appreciable amounts of Uranium 235 from natural uranium or produced any significant amounts of plutonium. He said various enriched samples of uranium arrived daily to the laboratory.

"I was responsible for measuring the amount of U-235 in these samples," Williams said. "This had to be known before the pertinent nuclear properties could be determined. Our last measurements were made on the parts of the device that was actually used at Hiroshima."

Three bombs were produced in the Los Alamos laboratory.

The first atomic bomb, named Trinity, was tested July 16, 1945, in Jornada Del Muerto, a desert about 80 miles from the Alamogordo bombing range.

Jornada Del Muerto is a Spanish phrase meaning "Journey of Death." The area was named by Spanish explorers in the 16th century after a large number of them died from the desert conditions.

During that test, Williams said he was 10,000 yards away from the bomb in an earthen bunker which had two small windows and four galvanometers on top to measure different levels of radiation.

At 5:30 a.m., Trinity exploded. Williams, who was watching the galvanometers, said he was blinded by the light of the explosion and fell to the ground.

"I had a stopwatch and waited 26 seconds for the blast-wave to arrive, at which time I began to get up," Williams said. "I was about two-thirds of the way up when the blast wave arrived and I was knocked to ground."

Williams said he saw many brilliant colors and a mushroom cloud after the explosion. On the way back to the base camp, Williams said point zero looked like a huge putting green because the explosion had created a deep hole, and the heat from the blast melted the sand to create a glassy green glaze.

"Upon arriving at the base camp, we were immediately briefed by Army security officers," Williams said. "It was at this time I realized our 'gadget' had become the property of the U.S. Army and was completely out of our control."

By using the atomic bomb, President Harry Truman probably saved many lives, both Japanese and American, which would have been lost in the eventual planned invasion of the Japanese Islands, Williams said.

"People say we shouldn't have used it," Williams said. "I never have gotten any argument about that from Professor (Basil) Curnutte in the physics department because he was an ensign just graduated from the naval academy on a ship getting ready to go in."

Now, almost 40 years later, Williams said the use of nuclear arms has gotten out of hand, but he said he can't understand why people equate nuclear power plants with nuclear weaponry.

"One of the troubles is that people like Jane Fonda can't distinguish between a nuclear power plant and a bomb," Williams said. "They are paralyzing nuclear energy through complete ignorance."

"The fellow who received the most radiation from the Three Mile Island accident had gotten as much as most of us got every day at Los Alamos for two or three years."

People always think of the worst possible case when debating about nuclear energy, Williams said.

"For example in Manhattan, the highway runs right by Poyntz Avenue," Williams said. "There are big oil trucks that pass through there with enormous supplies of energy which could explode at any time. If we worried as much about an oil truck explosion as we do about nuclear energy, we wouldn't have anywhere to transport the oil."

But while Williams thinks the depletion of fossil fuels will eventually force the acceptance of nuclear and solar energy, he doesn't underscore the effects of the arms race.

The television movie "The Day After" was dramatically "pretty poor," Williams said. But more importantly, he said, the movie underestimated the danger and effects of nuclear war which "would be much worse than what the movie portrayed."

Edward Teller, one of the people in charge of the Los Alamos project who wanted to by-pass production of the atomic bomb and build the hydrogen bomb, brought up the possibility of using lasers and other high-technical equipment in space to guard against advancing missiles. Williams said this isn't feasible with present technology.

"First of all, we have a treaty with the Russians not to do it," Williams said. "Second, if it worked, it would be enormously expensive and would at most intercept only about 10 percent of their missiles."

What began as a theory on a piece of paper and developed into reality by several thousand intellects has become the object of heated emotions and controversy.

Williams said the political, financial and social impacts are not his area of expertise, but said, "The ultimate effect of nuclear weapons on world history is still unknown, and it's a frightening question."

House to consider regents' cutback

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The House Ways and Means Committee approved a measure Wednesday which would cut $1.43 million from Gov. John Carlin's recommended 1985 budget for the Kansas Board of Regents and the seven regents' institutions.

The bill now goes to the full House for debate and action.

The measure would provide $153,065,000 to the University of Kansas and $158,840,000 to the KU Medical Center, $151,097,000 to K-State and $8,376,000 to the Veterinary Medicine Complex, $60,072,000 to Wichita State University, $25,530,000 to Fort Hays State University, $24,855,000 to Emporia State University, $22,999,000 to Pittsburg State University, $3,607,000 to the Kansas Technical Institute and $9,313,000 to the regents' office.

The proposal would eliminate $2 million which the governor proposed for distribution to the campuses for faculty salary increases.

But it would restore $1.9 million in base budget reductions which Carlin proposed for the six regents' universities. That money would be used to raise faculty salaries by 7 percent, instead of the 6 percent recommended by the governor.

The committee would allow a 1 percent increase over the 5 percent recommended by Carlin for other operating expenses at regents' institutions.

But it allowed only a 7 percent increase in utility expenses. Carlin proposed an 8 percent increase for utilities.

The committee also agreed to introduce a measure which would provide $1.1 million more than Carlin proposed for regents' capital improvements.

The bill would allocate $2.8 million to a fund for major repairs, special maintenance and remodeling. Carlin recommended $4 million for the fund.

In addition to the governor's recommendations, the proposal would allocate $900,000 for renovation and an addition to a Wichita State University library, $485,000 for final planning for a new chemistry-biochemistry building at K-State and about $1 million for other capital improvement projects at the regents' institutions.

Energy company hails discovery of gas field as hydrogen bonanza

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Discovery of a huge field of hydrogen gas beneath the central Kansas plains could be a $2 billion bonanza for a tiny energy company convinced hydrogen is the fuel of the future.

Billings Corp. announced the find Wednesday, saying it could lead to hydrogen cars, hydrogen houses and even hydrogen cities.

Initially, the discovery probably means profits for the Independence, Mo., company which now has a natural supply of hydrogen to sell to refineries, ammonia manufacturers and chemical and pharmaceutical companies.

"This discovery of a plentiful and affordable supply of hydrogen should create substantial commercial markets for many of the devices our company has developed over the years," said Roger Billings, president and founder of the firm.

Hydrogen has been found before — it's present at nearly every oil well — but never in the concentrations of the field near Junction City and Manhattan. Test wells drilled in the 100-square-mile field deliver 40 percent hydrogen and 60 percent nitrogen, according to Billings.

Hydrogen normally is found in concentrations of about 1½ percent, Billings said. It is the most abundant element known, but it has never been cost-effective to produce it, according to Billings.

Billings Corp. paid about $12 million in its stock to acquire rights to the hydrogen field it valued at $2 billion, Billings said.

There is about 1.36 billion thousand cubic square feet of hydrogen beneath Kansas, the equivalent of 65 million barrels of oil, he said.

Scientists don't know how the hydrogen got there, but they suspect the field is constantly being replenished somehow from beneath the Earth's mantle.

Hydrogen disperses quickly and probably has been leaking out of the rock for years, said Dr. Ernest Angino of the University of Kansas.

"It's probably been bleeding out over a long period of time," Angino said at the news conference Billings called to announce its find. "The presumption is that there is a steady and continuous source."

The field was discovered by Donald C. Clark, an oil wildcatter who observed an unusual rock formation one day after he got a flat tire.

Clark took his discovery to Billings, who has been involved in hydrogen research since he founded his company in 1973. The cost of producing hydrogen has limited Billings' efforts, and he finds it ironic that such a large natural supply should be found 150 miles from his corporate headquarters.

"No one has ever produced hydrogen this way so there is a lot of pioneering involved," Billings said.

"But I think it will have a very significant commercial application even if it is never used as a fuel because of its chemical uses."

But Billings believes the major value of hydrogen is as fuel. Hydrogen, he says, is non-polluting and burns more efficiently than petrochemicals.

Pulitzer winner faults Mideast policy

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

The Reagan administration's policy in the Middle East, particularly in Lebanon, suffers from "naivete," said Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist Loren Jenkins. One of the results of this lack of wisdom was the death of 264 U.S. Marines, he said.

Jenkins, who received the Pulitzer Prize for his coverage of the massacres of Palestinians at the Sabra and Shatila settlements in Beirut in 1982, spoke at an All-University Convocation on Wednesday in McCain Auditorium.

"We as a government chose to go in with 1,800 Marines to do the same things the Syrians failed to do with 40,000 men and the Israelis with a 100,000 men," Jenkins said.

"This, frankly, is a height of blindness and highlights a real problem," he said.

Jenkins, who has worked as foreign correspondent for the Washington Post since 1980, first went to Lebanon in 1970. The policy of previous administrations when dealing with Lebanon was one of neglect and was treated like a "sideshow" to the whole Middle East problem, he said.

The presence of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) in Lebanon, Jenkins said, drew the small country into the Arab-Israeli conflict, mainly because of covert actions against Israel from Lebanese territory. Fighting along the border ended in a cease-fire in 1981, much through the work of U.S. diplomat Phillip Habib.

That cease-fire, Jenkins said, ended in 1982 with Israel's invasion of Beirut which was intended to crush the PLO's army. The invasion was successful for the most part, he said.

"Our role then was clear," Jenkins said. "Habib's mission was revived to mediate some sort of truce that would end the bloodletting in Lebanon."

The agreement that was reached forced the evacuation of the PLO from the city and forced Israel from invading west Beirut. Jenkins said the multinational peace-keeping force then was present to keep the Israelis from interfering with the evacuation and taking advantage of the PLO's absence.

By moving forward out of their positions and opening up roadways in southern Beirut, the Israelis violated the Habib Accords, Jenkins said. Everyone, including the United States, knew Israel was going to invade west Beirut.

"I had an interview with Yasser Arafat," Jenkins said. "Arafat said, 'Of course they're going to invade.' He had an exact plan of the invasion."

The assassination of Lebanon's President-elect Bashir Gemayel in September 1982 gave Israel the excuse for the invasion.

"The history of that invasion, as short-lived as it was, is well-known," Jenkins said. "I need only to remind you that what resulted and forced them to eventually withdraw was the massacres that occurred at Sabra and Shatila."

Staff/Allen Eyston

Loren Jenkins, Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist and foreign correspondent for the Washington Post.

Sabra and Shatila were two Palestine refugee camps north of the Israeli positions. On the first day, the two camps were surrounded by the Israeli army, Jenkins said. On the second day the Israelis went to the Phalangists, a Christian militia, and ordered them to enter the camps to look for arms and possible PLO refugees.

"The Phalangists went in there and in two nights and a day systematically began to slaughter everybody they could find: men, women and children," Jenkins said.

"They went from the south part of the camp up to almost the north part, destroying everything in their path, killing babies and throwing them in the streets. It was an example of their savagery. It's hard for us to comprehend," he said.

Jenkins said the Israeli army knew the massacres were happening and that their embarrassment over the incident forced them to pull out.

"The result was the multinational force was re-created and sent back into Lebanon," Jenkins said.

The Reagan administration, by backing the Christian-supported Amin Gemayel, the brother of Bashir Gemayel, made itself a target of Lebanon's Muslim majority, Jenkins said, and the result was the deaths of Marines and the failure of the American-trained Lebanese army.

"The fact that this army collapsed last month proves again this naivete," Jenkins said.

The Reagan administration, he said, is "functionally illiterate" about international politics. The Reagan administration made a

City housing regulations spark commission debate

Developers battled property owners, including former Manhattan Mayor Mert Hanks, during a discussion of structure relocation on the city's south side at Wednesday's Manhattan City Commission meeting.

The controversy began when the commission discussed changing regulations regarding the relocation of structures in the city. Jerry Petty, city engineer, said one of the regulation changes would be a $400 fee to be paid to the city for its role in the relocation. There is currently no fee required, but those moving houses have 90 days from the time the house is placed at its new location to meet housing codes on the exterior and interior of the house and to apply a new coat of paint or new aluminum siding.

Also under the guidelines, photographs of a structure to be moved would have to be shown to neighbors within 200 feet of the site and two-thirds of those neighbors would have to sign a petition approving the move. Photographs aren't now required, but signatures of neighbors within 100 feet are.

The proposal was tabled for further discussion Feb. 22.

A request by Scott Tucker, a Manhattan resident, and William Alexander, of Topeka, to relocate a structure to Riley Lane also was tabled because Hanks and other citizens said the area was within 150 feet of Union Pacific railroad tracks. A 1975 Urban Renewal grant designated the land as "green space" where no structures could be built.

Howard Fick, an attorney representing the two men, said his clients were victims of a petition two weeks ago by area residents to stop the relocation. Fick also spoke against the proposed $400 processing fee. The city owns 30 percent of the land within 100 feet of the relocation site, so its approval would be necessary under current regulations.

Because of possible legal ramifications, the commission put the question on hold until the next meeting to allow City Attorney Bill Frost to examine the issue.

The commission also tabled a move to enter into a contract with the Vector Corp., a firm to aid in the relocation of businesses displaced by downtown redevelopment, because of legal questions raised by an attorney representing one of the businesses to be relocated.

Senate to authorize funding for groups

Student Senate will determine the 1984 summer school allocations at 6 p.m. today at their meeting in the Union Big Eight Room.

Tracy Turner, Senate chairman and junior in economics, said the allocation proposal provides for all groups requesting summer allocations to receive the amount they requested and for four of the nine groups to receive $1,600 more than they requested. The total summer allocation will be $8,000 more than was allocated to groups last summer.

The money for summer school comes from student activity fees collected by the Department of Continuing Education. Since the department provides summer school services, all summer activity fees stay in its pool, Turner said.

Kirk Porteous, finance committee chairman and senior in radio and television, said Continuing Education has accumulated a reserve pool of money during several years. That reserve pool has grown to the point where extra money should be diverted back to the students, he said.

But groups requesting allocations for the 1984-1985 school year will have almost $30,000 less to divide among themselves due to dropping enrollment, he said.

Senate also will hear five-minute presentations from groups seeking funds for 1984-1985. Groups making presentations tonight are K-State Union, International Coordinating Council, Associated Students of Kansas and Associated Students of Kansas at K-State.

Other groups making presentations tonight are Black Student Union, Coalition for Human Rights, Sports Club Council, Debate, MEChA, Off-Campus Student Association, Students for BAC-CHUS, Recreational Services and Fine Arts Council.

In other business, Senate will hear first readings of a bill which would encourage all student government personnel to wear "student government" buttons while on campus. Another bill will be presented which would allocate $165 to FONE for rent money inadvertently left out of their 1983 allocation.

"The new button bill is just a continuation of things we started last year," Turner said. "But it's an extension because it includes members of student government rather than just senators."

The bill would encourage the Senate chairman, student senators, student members of Senate committees, the student body president and members of his cabinet to wear the button whenever they are on campus. There is no enforcement clause in the bill, so those who don't wear the button will not be subject to a penalty, he said.

Stephan continues investigation

TOPEKA — Attorney General Robert Stephan on Wednesday asked Kansans who ordered watches from a Chattanooga, Tenn., company last year and haven't received them, or who are dissatisfied with the watches they got, to contact his office.

Stephan identified the company as Time Electronic Corp., which he said also uses the name Timely Innovations.

The attorney general filed a lawsuit against the company last June, and the firm signed a consent judgment in November agreeing to refund the money or replace the watches of people who complained or had not received them.

However, Stephan claimed in a public statement issued Wednesday that only about half the 50 complaints he received have been satisfied. He also said the company has not paid his investigative costs.

The attorney general said the company solicited consumers mostly in the Manhattan-Junction City area, offering the watches for sale at reduced prices through distribution of coupons.

He said he is soliciting additional complaints to present at a hearing April 3 in Geary County District Court on his motion to amend the consent judgment to seek additional damages from the company.

The telephone number of the consumer protection division in Stephan's office is 913-296-3751.

Just dropped by to have a beer

LLOYD HARBOR, N.Y. — Police have charged a man with breaking into singer Billy Joel's $2 million mansion and drinking a beer at the bar off the kitchen.

John Andreoli, 23, of Deer Park, told police he was not a fan of the singer but "knew it was Joel's home and felt the need to be there," said Detective Scott Forst of the Suffolk County Police Department.

"He said all he did was walk around and looked through things," Forst said.

Two Lloyd Harbor Village policemen responded at about 1 a.m. Wednesday to a burglar alarm at the home on the waterfront of this exclusive village on Long Island, Police Chief Philip Wehrheim said.

Joel, who has had a string of hits including "Piano Man" and the recent "Allentown" and "Uptown Girl," was not at home.

Police said the beer was apparently the only thing taken. Andreoli was charged with burglary.

Student hijacks Air France jetliner

GENEVA, Switzerland — An Algerian student claiming to have a bag of explosives hijacked an Air France jetliner with 68 people aboard to Geneva on Wednesday, and Swiss police disguised as airport staff overpowered him nearly five hours later.

All the passengers and crew were safely freed.

Official Geneva sources identified the hijacker as Ali Chohra, a 27-year engineering student in Darmstadt, West Germany. They said he demanded that the plane be refueled and fly to Libya.

The Air France Boeing 737 was en route to Paris from Frankfurt with 62 passengers and a crew of six when it was forced to land at Geneva's Cointrin airport at 4:12 a.m. EST.

Police spokesman Marcel Voudroz told reporters that the passengers and crew were freed when policemen in airport work clothes entered the plane to deliver lunch and took Chohra by surprise. Shortly afterwards, the passengers continued on to Paris.

mistake in getting bogged down in the problem in Lebanon instead of concentrating on the overall Middle East problem.

Jenkins said the Arabs and Israelis have gone to war five times, increasing in intensity with each battle.

"The logical scenario would be a nuclear war on down the line," he said. "With the Soviet Union there and our involvement, it could be a trigger for something much larger," he said.

Thieves burglarize fraternity

Sometime between midnight and 9 a.m. Feb. 19, someone burglarized a fraternity house in the 500 block of Sunset Avenue.

Burglars entered the house and went downstairs, where they found some study rooms unlocked. They removed miscellaneous stereo items including a Unitech cassette player, a Sherwood AM-FM receiver, two Bose 301 speakers and a Fisher cassette tape deck. Loss in the incident is estimated at more than $1,000.

The same evening, two white males were seen trespassing at the fraternity. The men were described as 19 to 21 years old, one 5-feet-7 and weighing 140 pounds, and the other 6 feet tall and weighing 150 pounds. The former had dark, shoulder-length hair and small wire glasses, and the latter had dirty brown hair.

Senate vote names envoy to Holy See

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Wednesday named the first U.S. ambassador to the Vatican in more than a century, approving President Reagan's nomination of millionaire real estate developer William A. Wilson as this country's representative to the Holy See.

The vote on the nomination was 81-13. Wilson, 69, has been Reagan's part-time personal representative to the Vatican since 1981.

It is not known if these men are responsible for the burglary.

Bomb threat hardly a fairy tale

Once upon a time there was a campus idiot — a weak-minded simpleton who never understood the consequences of his own actions.

Because the lad was an idiot, he was always playing pranks on his campus and the people who lived there. One day he called the Division of Biology and cried, "I planted a bomb in Ackert Hall." Then he hung up.

So the police came to the rescue. All the earnest students were evacuated while the building was searched. The police were relieved to find there was no bomb and that it was only a hoax, so classes tried to resume.

The campus idiot thought, "My, what fun."

A week later the campus idiot was in the mood for more perverted fun. He placed another call to the same department and cried, "I planted a bomb in there." Then he hung up.

Once again the police came to the rescue and evacuated the building, only to find out it was another hoax.

This went on for quite some time. The idiot would make a call, the people would evacuate and the police would come up empty handed in their search.

Life could not return to normal because classes and tests had been disrupted and experiments had been ruined. Once again the campus idiot was heard saying, "My, what fun."

Now it so happens that on this campus there was an even crazier person than the campus idiot. He had been watching the idiot for quite some time and decided to plant an honest-to-goodness, real-live, genuine bomb in a building.

"My, what fun," he cried. After planting the bomb he phoned the police and cried, "I planted a bomb in there." Then he hung up.

But the police had had enough of these hoaxes and said "Enough is enough. We are tired of all these pranks and will not go investigate."

Meanwhile, as it always happens in these fairy tales, the campus idiot had gone to that building to study.

The end.

Lectures inform about Central America

Editor,

I am writing this letter to make a request of anyone who reads it.

The request: to become more aware of the problems and policies surrounding Central America and the role the U.S. government has played and is currently playing in this area, which includes the countries of Belize, Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica and Panama.

Keep reading — this is important. The opportunity exists to learn about Central America and is open to everyone through the Lou Douglas Lectures on Public Affairs. The theme of the lectures this spring is "1984: The Americas in Crisis" and deals primarily with issues regarding Central American politics.

The request to attend these lectures isn't directed at those who already have an opinion one way or the other about Central America and U.S. involvement in the area (you already attend the lectures), but the request is directed more specifically at those who have no opinions concerning the subject — those who don't think it is important.

The Lou Douglas Lectures will provide a base on which to build an informed opinion and will undoubtedly enlighten many minds which have been closed to the subject of Latin American-U.S. relations.

The lectures also may open some eyes to the fact that Central America is more than just some "communist-infested" area that must be dealt with militarily by the United States; it is an area populated by living, breathing, feeling human beings just like we "Americans."

The lecturers participating in the series may have different points of view, but they have a common goal — to educate and inform us about Central America and the problems facing these countries.

Attend the lectures or do some research of your own about Central America. What have you got to lose aside from ignorance?

Column on Reagan's policy lacks facts...

Editor,

Re: Dan Robison's column, "Reagan policy more than 'bull,'" in the March 6 Collegian.

Dan Robison's columns belong in a high school English class. Any English 101 teacher would give his latest column a D-. A good journalistic opinion, or at least one that should be published, is drawn logically from fact.

The whole column is based on an answer to a fictional response from a fictional person. The only fact in the editorial: "Federal budgets are expected to incur deficits of $200 billion," was followed by a blatant misstatement: "Reagan looks at this and declares it to be 'clear economic recovery.'" When did Reagan declare the deficit to be "clear economic recovery?"

Robison then goes on to relate Reagan's ability to communicate with (the abilities of) Hitler and Mussolini. Does this mean that anyone who tells us "what (we) want to hear" is an evil dictator? What about Martin Luther King Jr., John F. Kennedy, George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Abe Lincoln...need I go on?

Another false premise is that Reagan's defense policy is "based, necessarily, on the premise that we can win a nuclear war." Since when did Reagan take that position? Last I heard, he wants a defense buildup on the premise of strength as a deterrent. Where did you get your information, Robison?

After pushing myself through this 10th-grade column, it was refreshing to read Richard Cohen's column. Though sometimes I don't agree with Cohen, his columns make me question my own opinions because of the logical strength and basis in fact of his arguments.

Maybe Dan should take the time to study some real journalistic writing before submitting his own for publication in the Collegian.

...expresses 'ungrateful' air

Editor,

Re: Dan Robison's column, "Reagan policy more than 'bull,'" in the March 6 Collegian.

In response to Robison, I might first mention that the article should have been printed on the comics page, for in my estimation, many of the ideas brought up were funnier than the comic strips.

I never fail to be amazed at the ungrateful attitudes of people like Robison. I never read a sentence that mentioned the decline in inflation, the decline in unemployment (which is seldom done simultaneously), the growth in purchases of durable goods or the overall growth of positive attitudes by many Americans toward our country.

No, it was the loss of lives in Lebanon, the large deficit (which existed long before Reagan took office) and the sudden threat of nuclear war (which is not really sudden at all).

Maybe people like Robison should look at the more obvious positive side of things, instead of always digging and searching for the negative.

I feel better about our country than I ever have. Maybe it is a feeling of "safety," but it sure is a great feeling to have — for a change. Ronald Reagan is not only a good communicator, he is even a better leader. He is what America has been needing for a long, long time.

Memorials shouldn't be ignored

War memorials, reminders of our past history, are too often ignored in passing or slighted in favor of convenience.

Veterans of World Wars I and II, the Korean War and the Vietnam War are honored at K-State by Memorial Stadium, Danforth and All Faiths Chapels and commemorative plaques — but these memorials are often overlooked.

"Lest we forget" is inscribed in the wall intended to be part of Memorial Stadium, in memory of those K-State students who served in World War I. The memorial arch connecting the east and west wings of Memorial Stadium was never built, but the wall prepared for display there was instead installed in what is now Anderson Hall. And, lest we forget, this wall is only a small part of a larger memorial that is carelessly overlooked.

How many people are aware of the original purpose in building Memorial Stadium? As the name implies, the stadium is a memorial — an architectural shrine honoring those who gave their lives in service to their country in World War I.

Unfortunately, even lack of use of the proper name of the stadium, in favor of East and West nomenclature, negates the intent of the stadium.

At an institution of higher learning, awareness of history is of paramount importance. War memorials serve not only to remind us of the sacrifice of individual lives for our country's sake, but also provide a visible link between past and present. For the sake of both remembrance and education, such memorials deserve continual respect.

Remember while passing Memorial Stadium, lest we forget.

Changes necessary to save energy

WASHINGTON — News of a potential disruption of oil shipments from the Persian Gulf has reminded us of hours spent waiting in gas lines during the 1970s.

But there's no immediate concern for panic. America's energy picture in 1984 is stronger than it's been in years. The strategic petroleum reserve, which Congress approved in 1975 as part of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act, has afforded the United States a stockpile of almost 400 million barrels of oil — enough to keep the nation running for almost three years in the event of a cut-off of Persian Gulf supplies.

But relying on increases in energy prices, consumer attitudes and government programs such as fuel-efficiency standards and building codes won't ensure America long-term energy security. Additional steps remain to be taken, and the Reagan administration ought to be leading the way.

To be sure, as statistics indicate, American citizens have made significant progress in reducing their energy consumption during the last decade. In 1983, the U.S. imported about 20 percent less oil than in 1973. Moreover, as a recent study by the Congressional Research Service (CRS) found, per-household energy consumption in 1980-1981 was about 15 percent less than eight years earlier.

These savings have been realized despite the fact that Americans are taking advantage of only a portion of the conservation measures available to them. The Census bureau estimates that out of 54 million single-family homes in America, 19 million have no storm windows; 8 million have no attic insulation; and 12 million have no wall insulation.

MAXWELL GLEN

CRS estimates that households could reduce energy consumption by as much as 38 percent through home improvements. Though these conservation investments would cost about $1,400, they would bring household savings of up to $800 annually.

The Reagan administration continues to believe that high energy prices will stimulate additional conservation measures. Accordingly, in his budget proposals, the president has repeatedly attempted to eliminate every conservation program on the books.

This year's spending plan would change that pattern somewhat. For the first time, Reagan would subsidize weatherization for low-income families.

Yet energy conservation and renewable resource projects would receive only 17 percent and 8 percent shares, respectively, of the Energy Department's expenditures on technologies. Meanwhile, nuclear fission and fusion programs would receive 62 percent of that budget.

Moreover, the administration proposes to fund its few energy conservation programs with money collected by the government as a result of violations of the Petroleum Allocations Act, passed in 1973 to discourage overcharges on oil pricing. The law's intention was to reimburse victims of oil overcharges — not to bail out the government's misguided policy.

Given its lukewarm, if not hostile, disposition toward energy conservation, the Reagan administration has been fortunate that no international crisis has exposed its narrow-minded focus. But that doesn't mean the United States is out of danger.

It seems clear enough that higher prices don't replace a sound conservation policy. They don't provide money to individuals or businesses who lack capital to invest in conservation. Nor do they provide information to consumers who do not know what they can do to use energy more efficiently. Nor do they give tenants the power to influence the operation of their apartments or office buildings.

Unfortunately, these realities may come to haunt American consumers before they dawn on the president.

War dead enshrined in campus history

Office holds memorial for World War I

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

"1917 — Lest We Forget — 1918," states the memorial wall honoring K-State students who died during World War I.

"I'm a veteran. Not that I'm any great flag waver, but I think it's important to recognize that kind of thing, contributions people have made, particularly when it does involve their life," Doug Hurley, associate registrar, said.

The memorial wall is located in his Anderson Hall office. It was originally intended to be part of Memorial Stadium, but instead became a separate feature that was placed in Recreation Center, which is now Anderson Hall.

As explained in J.T. Willard's history of Kansas State Agriculture College, "The delay in the memorial feature contemplated for the stadium led the College to construct a memorial which was placed in Recreation Center."

The memorial was dedicated on May 28, 1929, with College President F.D. (David) Farrell presiding. The dedication program states, "The complete experience of giving one's life for one's country can only be imagined. The living can only guess at the significance of the supreme sacrifice. But they can acknowledge whatever memorials they conceive as wholly inadequate and their debt much greater than can be told."

Thornton Edwards, director emeritus of housing, said Anderson was originally an open area called the canteen. It was a place to get food and had a chapel in the rear. Dances were often held in the canteen. It was yesterday's student union.

One of the young men whose picture hangs on the memorial was a cousin of Edwards.

Jessie McDowell Machir, registrar from 1913 to 1943, told Ellsworth Gerritz, professor emeritus of admissions and records, that some of the faces of the young men had been superimposed on uniforms because pictures of them in uniforms had never been taken.

Gerritz recalled that after the Union was built, he first suggested the memorial wall be moved to either the chapel or the library. K-State President James McCain appointed a committee to decide what should be done with it. In one of the committee meetings, Arthur Weber, dean of agriculture, pointed to a young man's picture on the memorial (Joe R. Speer) and said the boy had saved his life from drowning when he was 12 years old. Weber didn't want the memorial moved, so the committee decided to drop the idea, Gerritz said.

After Recreation Center became Anderson Hall, the memorial stood in an office much like Hurley's office now. A lot of people visiting the campus would come into the Admission's Office, and the memorial was rather distracting, he said.

"I have a true appreciation for it and I certainly didn't want it destroyed," Gerritz said. So the committee decided to cover it with a curtain.

Remodeling of the admissions and records office about six years ago divided the area into two offices with separate budgets. Admissions and the registrar's office traded space, and the memorial wall became one side of an office, which has belonged to Hurley since he came to K-State in 1976.

"I get a fair amount of visitors as the day goes on, and people come in and almost universally the first reaction is to look at this and do a double take. Those that know me very well say, 'Does it bother you to have all those people looking at you, all those eyes staring down at you?' It's a little eerie for some people I guess to have something like that looking down at you, so I think that might have been part of the reason it was covered up too," Hurley said.

When Hurley moved into the office, he said he decided to display the memorial. "As soon as I moved into this office I opened the drapes. I will leave them open, I think it's important."

"What I'd really like to see is a fund-raising effort undertaken," Hurley said. "I don't really think it would cost all that much to physically move it (perhaps even the top half of the memorial) out to the chapel, the Union or even out into the main lobby of Anderson, someplace that is more public. I think it's really important, like the title says up there, 'Lest We Forget.'"

"It's important to remember that these people did make this sacrifice, that this memorial is here and somebody at some time spent a lot of money to put this memorial together," he said.

Plans are underway for remodeling the registrar's office again.

"We will leave it intact. I wouldn't at all be unhappy if we did make this into one big lobby area, having this on one wall of the lobby."

"It's a very beautiful memorial really, it's just in the wrong place," Hurley said.

Buildings commemorate fallen students

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

History can come to life by taking a walk around campus. Most of the buildings on campus are reminders of the contributions made by past presidents and deans.

Two buildings on campus are reminders of history in another way. They are memorials for college students who died fighting in World War I, World War II and the Korean War.

In 1922, there was a demand for a service memorial at Kansas State Agricultural College. College President William Jardine appointed a committee and a campaign was begun to raise funds for a World War I Memorial Stadium.

According to information from the KSAC Bulletin, J.T. Willard, vice president of the College and dean of the General Science Division, gave reasons for the appropriateness of building a stadium.

He said, "These men fell in war; in heroic physical contest. It is fitting that a splendid facility for physical development and an arena for physical contests should be erected as a memorial to men who were physically fit and who died in a contest where physical heroism was the ultimate basis upon which a victorious result was attained."

There were other reasons for the proposal of the stadium as a memorial. However, it was a speech to 2,200 in a packed auditorium that swayed the students' opinions. Football Coach Charles Bachman "burned into the minds of his hearers the conviction that the stadium must be built."

Bachman said, "It is because the stadium is itself a manifestation — an outward and visible sign of loyalty in its most superb form... Our soldiers have given the highest proof of loyalty that a man can give; and in dedicating this memorial to them, we are but faintly echoing their noblest deeds. They made a great sacrifice for you and for me and we are now privileged to show our gratitude by erecting to their memory this monument of loyalty."

"Do you realize that you cannot have loyalty without sacrifice? You will never appreciate this college and what it has done for you until you have done a service for it — until you have given something to it, or made a sacrifice for it."

"Give so that you may be more loyal to your college as students today and as alumni tomorrow. So that when you return you may point with pride to this stately monument and say 'I helped.'"

Six hours after his famous speech, students had pledged $77,000 toward the building of Memorial Stadium. College faculty pledges soon amounted to $34,944 from a subscription plan based on annual income. The Manhattan Chamber of Commerce canvassed the city and collected pledges totaling $48,419.

The Memorial Stadium Corporation was organized in spring 1922 in order to care for the financial part of the project. It is a corporation in name only, formed for the purpose of making contracts and handling other business detail," the KSAC Bulletin said.

A subscription plan was recommended by the Memorial Stadium Corporation to raise the $500,000 needed to build the stadium as planned. Students were asked to pledge $40, payable in four installments.

The stages of building the stadium are documented in Willard's History of KSAC. Enough money was raised to construct the west wing of the stadium in 1922.

The east wing of the stadium was completed in 1924. Construction of the enclosing wall for the east section followed in 1928.

It was reported in the October 5, 1927, edition of the Industrialist that, "After considerable debate, the stadium board has decided that the logical thing to do now is build the enclosing wall of the east wing as the next step in the completion of the memorial."

"Some thought that the next work done should be the erection of the memorial arch so that the memorial feature might not be lost sight of. The athletes, however, need shelter and rooms for baths and equipment at the field. Kansas Aggies will not forget that the stadium is a memorial to the World War dead. Sentiment is merely stepping aside for good business."

In 1933 there was an attempt to obtain funds to build a field house at the south end of the athletic field as a connecting unit for the two wings of the stadium, instead of the curved structure originally planned. It met with no success. Instead, plans were passed in 1936 for enclosing the west wing of the stadium for locker space and offices.

The end of World War II caused many students to return to the college or to decide to pursue a college education. Shortage of housing caused surplus army barracks and trailers to be moved onto campus.

See MEMORIALS, page 8

An artist's drawing depicts Memorial Stadium as it was to look when completed. However, the planned enclosure of one end of the stadium was never constructed.

began its final scoring run.

Alfaro opened up the 'Cats scoring, canning a jumper from outside. After a free throw by Husker center Dave Hoppen, 'Cats junior center Eddie Elder scored to cut the lead to 29-20 with 16:08 left. Sophomore forward Ben Mitchell then scored from outside to cut Nebraska's lead to 27-22.

And with 14:25 left, K-State benefited from a five-point play.

Nebraska's Hoppen went inside and scored in heavy traffic underneath but was called for charging Elder, disallowing his basket. Sophomore guard Jim Roder then scored a three-point play on the following possession, drawing a foul from Nebraska's David Ponce and closing the gap to 27-25.

With 8:17 left, Roder scored again on two free throws, knotting the score, 33-33. It was a close contest the rest of the way with neither team taking more than a two-point lead.

An Alfaro jumper gave K-State its first lead of the second half, 35-33, with seven minutes remaining. After Ponce scored for Nebraska, Roder hit two more charities to reclaim the 'Cats lead, 37-35.

But Ponce again knotted the score for the Huskers, hitting a 25-footer. Nebraska took over the lead, 39-37, off a tip-in by Cloudy.

Alfaro then hit the first of two pressure shots to tie the score, setting the stage for Jackson's crucial steal.

Alfaro and Roder led K-State in scoring, each hitting 12 points. Cloudy was the leading scorer for the Cornhuskers, also connecting for 12 points.

K-State officials differ on Title IX enforcement

By JUDI WRIGHT
Staff Writer

On Feb. 28 the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the federal government may not cut off all aid to a college because of illegal sex discrimination in a particular program. In this ruling, the area of women's sports was never mentioned, but K-State officials differ in their opinions of how it will affect University women's sports programs.

The case involved Grove City College, a small Presbyterian institution in Pennsylvania that accepts no funds from the federal government except the money students receive from federal student-assistance programs. Because of this, the college argued that it should not be required to comply with federal Title IX regulations, which forbid sex discrimination in any institutions using federal funds.

The court ruled 6-3 that Title IX does apply to the college, but just to the area receiving federal funds. This rule brought about a new interpretation of the law.

Dorothy Thompson, director of the Office of Affirmative Action at K-State, said when Title IX was introduced in 1972, it was agreed that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare would issue regulations to enforce the enactment. In 1974, HEW presented the regulations, and in 1975-1976, each school was required to do an institutional self-study to determine if the school's program was in compliance with the Title IX regulations.

Thompson said that because of these regulations, HEW set up the "first interpretation" of Title IX which stated that whole institutions, not only individual programs, are subject to the Title IX regulations at institutions receiving any type of federal funds.

This interpretation shifted with last week's court decision. Now officials of the National Collegiate Athletic Association have said the ruling appears to mean that only those athletic programs that receive federal aid are subject to Title IX. The big confusion falls with what actually constitutes this aid, but the court has made no ruling on this.

Since 1972, with the enactment of the Title IX program, women have been given the opportunity to participate in organized sports of similar quality to men's sports programs.

"K-State's women's sports have made leaps and bounds since the Title IX program began," Dick Towers, K-State athletic director, said.

Towers said the program has changed from areas such as new locker rooms to increased scholarship numbers and other areas in women's athletics.

"K-State was one of the first schools, if not the first, to be checked for compliance of the Title IX program (in 1981), and we received a clean bill of health," Towers said.

"Right now I see no change in K-State's women's athletics (as a result of the recent court ruling)," he said. "Women's athletics are here to stay and will continue to do so as long as a good job is done."

"I feel confident here that the new interpretation of Title IX will not have any detrimental effects on K-State's women's athletics," Thompson said. "K-State has made strong commitments, and we would not have a such a strong women's program without Title IX."

For schools that don't have as secure a program as K-State's, women's sports programs supporters' of only help would come from a recent decision made at the NCAA convention in January. At the convention, member schools voted that Division I schools (major colleges) would be required to sponsor six women's varsity sports in 1985-1986, seven in 1986-1987 and eight by 1987-1988. The eventual eight varsity sports for women would then equal the number currently required for men's athletics at member schools.

Towers said K-State is well ahead of this decision because it already sponsors eight varsity sports for both men and women.

Towers said he does not expect the NCAA decision to be changed at the 1985 convention because of the Supreme Court ruling. He said he thinks the convention will push harder in 1985 for women's sports to move to the same level as men's.

Smaller schools or schools just beginning to start women's programs now will probably "not feel the pressure to fully comply with Title IX," Towers said.

The schools won't be using the court ruling as an excuse, he said, but they just won't be pressured to confine the struggle of building a strong, successful women's program.

Caroline Peine, assistant dean of student development, said she sees the Supreme Court ruling as a "set back."

"I consider anything a set back where there's the constant efforts of 'chipping away' at the idea of equality for women," she said. "I see that as long as women keep showing threats to the role of men that it will be easier to keep the forward momentum."

"The women's movement needs to keep plugging away despite the constant efforts for a retreat," she said.

Thompson said now what is likely to happen is "legislation will be proposed to make it clear that the initial intent of Congress was to require and include non-discrimination in all programs of a college."

"I think Congress is now going to have to act and clarify its intent of the Title IX program," Thompson said.

Clinic to feature champion boxer

The third annual K-State Golden Gloves Boxing Clinic will be held from 7 to 9 p.m. Thursday at the L.P. Washburn Recreation Complex.

The clinic, which is free, will feature K-State graduate Olan (Calvin) Alexander, the 1984 Golden Gloves National Heavyweight Champion.

Raul Guevara, former Kansas-Oklahoma region middleweight champion and outreach coordinator for the K-State Office of Minority Affairs, invited James Beasley to give the clinic last year.

Beasley, national president of the Golden Gloves Association of America and executive director of the Kansas-Oklahoma regional association, will be bringing Gary Davis, former six-time region lightweight champion, this year to demonstrate punches at the clinic.

The event is sponsored by the association, the Office of Minority Affairs, Recreational Services and Sigma Phi Epsilon.

"The reason the Sig Eps are involved is because of their fraternity fight-night that is held here in Manhattan," Guevara said. "They're really excited, and we (organizers of the clinic) suggested that they ask all of the participants to wear their warm-ups to get a work out and take advantage of the expertise that will be involved in the clinic."

"Every year it has gotten better. The first year Beasley just spoke about various tactics, but this year we'll actually have an exhibition by the national champion of the Golden Gloves Association, Olan Alexander," Guevara said.

Alexander played basketball on the 1977 Wichita Heights State Championship team that featured Darnell Valentine and Antoine Carr and also was a baseball letterman at K-State.

The area under the stadium was utilized as dormitory facilities for 266 students.

Minutes from the stadium corporation meeting show the total amount of receipts and expenditures between April 1922 and Jan. 20, 1948 was $386,313.93. Arrangements were made at one of the last meetings for bronze plaques to be installed on the pillars of the east and west stadiums honoring 48 former students who gave their lives in World War I, 1917-1918. The memorial arch that was to connect the east and west stadiums was never built.

But the stadium isn't the only memorial for students who died on the battlefield.

The K-State College Endowment Association was established in March 1944 following the end of World War II. One of its first projects was the organization of a chapel building program, with a unique plan to finance it entirely from gifts as a memorial to K-Staters who fought and died in World War II.

The Oct. 11, 1945, Collegian reported, "Kansas State College went forward today on plans for an all campus memorial which will honor all K-State men and women who served in the armed forces of World War II."

By Feb. 21, 1946, the committee recommended a $200,000 chapel to be built on campus. Through the chapel, special recognition would be given to approximately 200 alumni and former students who died in the war. It was decided the chapel would be located north of the president's home near Lovers' Lane.

The Kansas City Times reported in July 1948 that overseas veterans of both world wars selected the design for a chapel and chime tower as a memorial to the 5,000 graduates and former students who served in World War II.

Plans were finalized by College officials, reported the Manhattan Mercury on Dec. 19, 1948. "The chapel will consist of two wings. The smaller of the wings will be known as the Danforth Chapel. The Danforth Foundation of St. Louis contributed an undisclosed amount to the college for the construction of the small wing. The main chapel (All Faiths Chapel) is to be equipped so that it may be used for Protestant, Catholic and Jewish services."

The Oct. 28, 1947, edition of the Collegian reported that the first sod was broken for Danforth Chapel in a special ceremony in which Gen. Dwight Eisenhower and K-State President Milton Eisenhower took turns with the spade.

"One dollar a stone" was a slogan adopted to help raise money, walls and a roof for the chapel. By March 1947, $57,000 had been collected.

A $200 pledge came from the Hillel Foundation for a memorial to the three Jewish students who died in the war, but particularly to Lt. Milton Kaslow, originally from Brooklyn, N.Y., who was the first K-State student killed in the war.

Donations came in all forms and all denominations for the chapel that was to be built entirely from gifts. Chimes were to be located in a tower that would be a connecting link between the Danforth Chapel and the large All Faiths Chapel.

Merrill Werts, president of the 1947 graduating class, announced that the class' farewell gift to the College would be a window for the chapel. Class members voted to each donate $1 for the window estimated to cost between $500 to $700.

The Jan. 12, 1950, Collegian summed up the gifts for the chapel, saying contributions have ranged from a load of steers to the small change (including a Topeka bus token) given by students.

The dedication of the Danforth wing marked the first time in the 86-year history of K-State that students have an entire building dedicated to religious worship and meditation. In the dedication ceremony on Oct. 10, 1949, 500 people participated.

In 1950, all civilian building was halted and construction stopped toward completing the auditorium part of the memorial with the Korean War. Lack of funds after the war made it necessary for the plans to be changed and for a different type of architecture to be used to complete the memorial.

On April 15, 1956, the chapel was dedicated. The overall cost was just under $200,000 — $150,000 for the building and $50,000 for the organ.

"No country on earth would want war if the decision were left to the people," Dr. Preston Bradley, pastor of the Peoples Church of Chicago, said at the All Faiths Chapel dedication ceremonies. "We must be able to say to the boys, 'This will never happen again. You died for something big.'"

A bronze plaque on the wall of local limestone flanking the entrance lobby to chapels is dedicated to K-State students who died in World War II and Korea.

Gifted student enjoys college at young age

By LILLIAN ZIER
Collegian Reporter

At 14 years old, Phillip Romanelli is not a typical K-State student.

"Flip is still very much a middle school student," Eileen Romanelli, Phillip's mother, said. He also takes courses at Manhattan High School, as well as Manhattan Middle School.

Romanelli has had no trouble adjusting to the mix of college life and middle school life, his mother said.

"There's a little bit of admiration (from his friends), but mostly they don't think too much about it," she said. After finishing his classes at the middle school, he is able to slip out and walk to the University without drawing much attention.

When asked what he thinks about K-State students, he said, "They are no worse than anyone else." Then he smiled, realizing how his remark sounded. "What I mean is, they don't pay any attention to me. One time somebody asked me if I was a freshman."

Romanelli enrolled at K-State last fall when he was still 13. He took History of the United States to 1877. This semester he is taking History of the United States since 1877.

"The thing that makes his situation unique is that he is exploring this area (American history)," said Pearl Watson, gifted education coordinator at the Manhattan Middle School and Manhattan High School.

Several high school students have enrolled in K-State math, science and modern languages courses in previous semesters, Watson said, but Romanelli is the first middle school student to take history courses. He is the only middle school student enrolled at the University this semester.

Watson also said students in the fifth and sixth grades have previously enrolled in classes at K-State.

Before enrolling, Romanelli attended the

At age 14, Phillip Romanelli manages to keep a low profile while attending classes at both K-State and Manhattan Middle School. Romanelli is enrolled in History of the United States since 1877.

Senate committee kills Reagan's aid proposal for Nicaraguan rebels

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Republican-controlled Senate Appropriations Committee on Thursday rejected President Reagan's emergency request for $21 million in aid to CIA-backed Nicaraguan rebels.

On a 15-14 vote, the committee defeated an amendment by Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, to provide the money for the rebels battling the leftist Nicaraguan government.

The vote dealt a blow to Reagan's plan sent to Congress only hours earlier to rush military aid to the Nicaraguan rebels and to the Salvadoran army, which is fighting Marxist insurgents.

The committee was also expected to consider Reagan's proposal for $93 million in emergency military aid for El Salvador. The president had proposed attaching the military aid request to two unrelated bills passed by the House Tuesday.

Those two bills would send $150 million in emergency food supplies to Africa and $200 million in energy assistance for the poor.

The committee approved the $200 million for low-income energy assistance after rejecting the $21 million package for the Nicaraguan rebels.

Despite Reagan's defeat, the administration could try to revive the $21 million proposal when the bill reaches the Senate floor.

Earlier Thursday, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. denounced the president's military aid proposal as a "backdoor approach" to obtain the money.

During the Senate committee's debate, chairman Mark Hatfield, R-Ore., opposed the administration's approach, claiming the low-income energy assistance bill would be jeopardized if the money for the Nicaraguan covert operations were included.

Hatfield said that a number of states, including Oregon, had exhausted their energy assistance money.

Another Republican, Sen. Warren Rudman, R-N.H., also broke with the president, fearing the additions to the bills would endanger the energy assistance plan.

"There are people in my state who are cold. Maybe that's not significant to people from California, but it is important to people in New Hampshire," Rudman said.

Both bills cleared the House this week with strong Democratic support and administration strategists believe that by attaching the new military aid as riders, President Reagan can overcome House opposition and dispatch the aid quickly.

White House spokesman Larry Speakes said the administration settled on the maneuver after exploring various options for quickly resupplying Salvadoran government forces who are battling leftist guerrillas.

"We attach national importance to the situation in El Salvador," Speakes said.

State Department spokesman John Hughes said the Salvadoran army is running low on supplies ranging from ammunition to medical equipment.

He said there is evidence that the guerrillas will try to disrupt the Salvadoran presidential election, less than three weeks away, and that it could take months for Congress to approve the administration's proposed Central American assistance package. Leftist leaders in El Salvador have promised not to disrupt the elections.

Last fall, the House and Senate intelligence committees agreed to provide $24 million for the anti-government rebels this year, but insisted that the administration return to the committees if more money was needed.

The United States has never formally acknowledged aiding the 12,000 to 15,000 rebels based in Honduras and Costa Rica. A White House statement Thursday said simply that the extra $21 million was "necessary to continue certain activities of the Central Intelligence Agency which the president has determined are important to the national security of the United States."

Committee requests stiffer liquor laws

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Senate committee voted Thursday to have two bills drafted which would toughen penalties for anyone under 21 years old convicted of illegally buying liquor.

The first proposed bill, which the Federal and State Affairs decided to have drafted, would require a one-year suspension of the driver's license of anyone under 21 who was convicted of illegally buying liquor.

The committee did not vote to introduce the bills but probably will discuss them next Tuesday and decide at that time whether to introduce them, said a secretary to Sen. Ed Reilly, R-Leavenworth, the committee chairman.

Thomas Kennedy, director of the Official says statutes not effective

Alcoholic Beverage Control Division of the Department of Revenue, said legislation is needed to toughen penalties for under age persons buying liquor.

"Current statutes designed to prohibit the selling, buying and consumption of alcoholic liquor by minors do not appear to be very effective," he said.

Kennedy said the state of New Jersey recently passed a law that provided for driver's license suspension as a penalty for illegally buying liquor. But Kennedy said the law's effectiveness is not yet known because it was passed only last January and there has not been enough experience with it.

Kennedy said the proposal for suspension was "probably legal" because driving is a privilege — not a right.

But Sen. Bill Morris, R-Wichita, said he isn't certain whether the proposal would work because, he said, determining whether a person is under age might conflict with the state's current juvenile code.

Sen. Wint Winter, R-Lawrence, said he favors legislation toughening penalties for people convicted of illegally buying liquor.

The second bill the committee requested would increase the fine for anyone less than 21 convicted of buying alcohol. Under the proposed bill, the fine, which now can be any amount up to $200, would be increased, with $250 as the lower limit and $1,000 as the maximum.

The committee also approved and sent to the Senate floor for debate a bill which would require the driver's licenses which minors receive to differ from those of adults. Under the bill, the background behind pictures in driver's licenses obtained by anyone less than 21 years old would be a different color from the blue background now used in licenses for adults.

Kennedy said the different color would cause club and bar owners to be more careful in examining the licenses of persons who obtained their licenses before turning 21.

Bill may govern relations within educational system

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A proposal governing relations between state universities, the state Board of Regents and faculty unions was introduced Thursday during a brief session of the Kansas Senate.

The proposal, introduced at the request of the regents, is prompted by long-standing contract problems involving faculty at Pittsburg State University, which is represented by the National Education Association. An agreement was just recently reached.

The bill introduced in the Senate, which will be sent to the Ways and Means Committee for further consideration, defines procedures for the "meeting and conferring" of the regents, universities and faculty representatives. However, it does not require universities or the regents to participate in collective bargaining.

Also introduced Thursday were proposals to authorize an early retirement program for university faculty members, and to transfer the state Office of Emergency Medical Services from the Department of Health and Environment and place it under control of the Kansas Highway Patrol.

Hiney craze stirs air waves

By DIANE KERSTING
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan may get some Hiney at last.

As legend has it, Big Red and Thor Hiney came to the United States and settled in Allentown, Pa., where they opened a winery.

Soon after, they decided to move their business to Flush, emphasizing what they had to offer: wine in a flip-top can. Hiney Wine.

Their Hineys operation is a "family-like thing," said Doug Gillan, program director for WIBW-FM, Topeka, which airs the fictitious commercials daily. Other Hineys include Ophelia, Seymour and Cousin Oma Akin, and they help Big Red and Thor with the business. Uncle Harry Hiney died recently.

But the Hineys are looking for "a (new) permanent home — a bigger location" for their winery, Gillan said, because of the tremendous response they've had for their product.

"So many people are requesting Hiney Wine," Gillan said. "We even get requests from liquor store owners" wanting to know how to buy the wine.

The staff at The New 97 ran a promotion on the air to help the Hiney brothers find a new location. Listeners suggested more than 75 different towns, some of which are "up for consideration," he said.

Within the next two weeks, the station will announce the location the Hiney brothers have chosen.

Response to the commercials has been "overwhelmingly positive," Gillan said. "Sometimes we even get requests to play the commercials. The people just go nuts. And they've got to have the merchandise too."

The Hiney brothers have a wide selection of Hiney Wine gifts including caps, T-shirts, nightshirts, key chains, ash trays, barbecue aprons, license plate holders and bumper stickers, Gillan said. Hiney merchandise is available at two locations in Topeka, and Manhattan will soon have a retailer for the popular items.

"Obviously it's a hot item for retailers," Gillan said. "Radio gets the interest up."

Hiney Wine was the brainchild of a writer at a Dallas radio station. The commercials have since been syndicated and can be heard nationwide, he said.

WIBW-FM began broadcasting the commercials in October. Jack Daniels, the morning disc jockey, is the spokesman for Big Red and Thor.

Student Senate argues button bill, passes summer school allocations

The "button bill" is once again a subject of debate for Student Senate.

In January, outgoing senators considered repeal of the bill. The bill, which was not repealed, required senators to wear an identification button while on campus the day of the Senate meeting. According to the original bill, the button was designed to improve communication between senators and constituents.

Thursday, first reading was heard on a bill which would make wearing the button no longer mandatory. The student body president, Senate chairman, members of Senate committees and members of the student body president's cabinet, as well as senators, would be encouraged to wear the button. The new "student government button" would be worn every day, not just Thursday.

Brian O'Neill, graduate senator and one of the bill's sponsors, said the new bill would solve some of the problems encountered with the current button.

"There are two major problems with the old button bill," he said. "First, the button came off as being haughty — which was not its purpose. Second, enforcement procedures were not carried out to ensure the button was being worn."

The button created by the new bill would promote communication more effectively than the old button, O'Neill said.

"This bill expands the ID button from being worn by only senators on one day a week to being worn by most members of student government on more days," he said. "Also, there is no enforcement clause. This is a more positive way of going about it (promoting communication), and will encourage more people to wear the button."

The bill will receive final consideration at the next Senate meeting March 22.

In other business, Senate passed a 1984 summer school allocations bill. The bill allocated money to the following groups: K-State Union, $25,000; Recreational Services, $4,800; Student Publications, $7,000; KSDB-FM Radio, $1,916; Summer Artist Series, $4,510; Summer Repertory Theatre, $6,075; U-Learn, $1,297; University for Man, $2,582; and FONE, $330.

A special allocation of $165 for FONE also was passed. The special allocation was necessitated by a misunderstanding over the amount of rent between FONE and UFM (the landlord), said Kirk Porteous, Finance Committee chairman.

Senators elected Kay Deever, education senator, for the position of Senate vice chairman. Keith Westervelt, agriculture senator, was elected Faculty Senate representative.

Budget consideration may prompt student media merge

By SUZANNE LARKIN
Staff Writer

Student Publications, Inc., and the radio and television section of the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications may merge if an increased line item is supported by Student Senate.

"The success of the merger, although in the pre-planning stages, will depend on Student Senate and whether it endorses an increased line item," said David Adams, director of Student Publications and associate professor of journalism and mass communications.

A line item is a set amount of money which comes directly out of student fees rather than being allocated each year by Senate. Student Publications, Adams said, receives $3 from full-time students and $1 from part-time students.

There are three departments, determined by the University, which provide services and functions throughout the year, Adams said.

They are the Union, Recreational Services and Student Publications, which includes the Collegian and the Royal Purple yearbook.

"We're looking into changing the name of Student Publications into something like Student Media or Student Communications, Inc.; something along that line and incorporating the broadcast side of JMC (journalism and mass communications) in with the print side," Adams said.

"We would also have to change some bylaws. Many other major universities have successfully combined both media," he said.

If the merger works out, it will mean a boost to KSDB, the campus radio station, Lee Buller, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications, said.

KSDB's major problem is that it is funded by the state and licensed by the Federal Communications Commission as a non-commercial educational service, unlike Student Publications.

Student Publications, Inc., is financed through advertising from the Collegian, Royal Purple advertising and sales and the sale of the Campus Directory. The Collegian, Royal Purple, directory and workshops sponsored by Student Publications are 90 percent self-supportive — only 10 to 12 percent of its total support comes from the line item, Adams said.

But funding is a different story for broadcast media.

"Basically, we get our (KSDB) funding from student government, which averages from $10,000 to $12,000 a year, depending on what we're asking for. But we have to keep going back each year and asking for more money," Buller said.

KSDB is not allowed to sell anything on the air, but it can have underwriting announcements, which are grants or gifts from someone who wants to help the station. In turn, the station gives them a

K-State places first in blood drive

K-State is in first place in the Big Eight Conference Blood Drive Challenge.

The University has collected blood from its October and February blood drives totaling 3,369 pints. This breaks the record set by the University of Missouri by 139 pints.

The Big Eight Blood Drive Challenge is the first blood drive competition among universities. K-State was the first university to accept the challenge, which was issued by Missouri in October during halftime of the K-State-Missouri football game.

The University of Kansas, the University of Oklahoma, Oklahoma State University and the University of Colorado have all accepted Missouri's challenge and will compete against each other to top the new record set by K-State. The University of Nebraska and Iowa State University will not participate due to an excess of blood in those states.

K-State exceeded the total from last year's February blood drive by 1,500 pints. The next blood drive will be October 23 to 26.

Food service staff to be honored

The annual K-State residence hall food service recognition program is scheduled today to honor staff members for length of service, perfect work attendance and those who will retire.

The ceremony will be at 1:30 p.m. in the Boyd Hall dining facility. A program recognizing housing maintenance staff members is scheduled for 3 p.m. March 16 in Kramer Food Center.

Retirees to be recognized are Grace Pepper, food service; and Stan Marsteller, maintenance.

Judging team places sixth overall

K-State's livestock judging team placed sixth high overall with a third place in cattle at the Houston Livestock Show and Rodeo in Houston, Texas, on March 2.

Thirty-one teams competed in the contest, which was held in the Astrodome, Chris Skaggs, graduate in animal science and industry and assistant coach, said.

Oklahoma State University won the contest, while Texas Tech University finishing second and Colorado State University third.

Individually, Dan Stanley, sophomore in agricultural economics, placed fourth in cattle. Other members of the team were Jo Lynne Wilber, junior in animal sciences and industry; Gary Siemens, senior in agriculture education; Lowell Kissinger, junior in agriculture education; Jonetta Cutshaw, junior in pre-veterinary medicine and Alan Hildebrand, sophomore in animal sciences and industry.

The Houston contest was the last intercollegiate contest for the team for the 1983-1984 school year. Their first contest next fall will be in Wichita in September.

Spring tornado season nears

State practice drill helps predict safety

By KIMBERLY STOLLE
Collegian Reporter

Viewers of the film "The Wizard of Oz" were shown a fierce tornado ripping across Kansas, which uprooted Dorothy's house and transported it to the make-believe Land of Oz. Kansas residents know, however, that it takes more than three taps of some magical red slippers to repair the damages of a true tornado.

Under Gov. John Carlin's proclamation, March 12-17 will be Severe Weather Awareness Week in Kansas.

The eighth annual statewide tornado drill will be at 10 a.m. March 14. A mock warning will be issued and the civil defense sirens will sound. The drill offers citizens the opportunity to see how they might react in severe weather.

Manhattan's tornado preliminary spotter training and weather safety meeting will be at 7:30 p.m. March 15 at Pottorf Hall in CCo Park.

Literature provided by the National Weather Service defines a tornado as a "violently rotating column of air."

These rotating funnels claimed the lives of 31 Kansans and injured 357 in the 1970s.

While an individual tornado usually destroys a relatively small area, the weather service records occasional "super outbreaks" of tornadoes which result in widespread damage over extensive areas.

The last such incident occurred April 3-4, 1974, when 148 tornadoes rampaged across 13 states, killed more than 300 people, injured more than 6,000 and caused $600 million in damage.

Kansas' tornado season is during May and June, with the most severe weather occurring in May. The state averages seven tornadoes per 10,000 square miles and about six related deaths annually.

Counties vary in tornado-related death rates. Since 1916, the counties with the highest death rates include Cowley County with 76; Sedgwick County with 28; Butler and Shawnee counties each with 23 and Osage County with 18 deaths on record.

National statistics show that 33 Americans were killed and 102 injured in 116 tornadoes during 1983. This figure marks the ninth year in which fatalities numbered less than the average of 103. Only one of these fatalities occurred in Kansas, according to the weather service records.

"The low tornado death rate in 1983 can be attributed, in part, to the lack of major, killer tornadoes during the year," said Fred Ostby, director of the weather service's National Severe Storms Forecast Center in Kansas City, Mo.

"Another contributing factor was improved countermeasures such as the NOAA (National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration) tornado watch and warning programs, local spotter groups and the tornado preparedness activities of the news media and local governments," he said.

The public is informed and warned about tornado conditions through the weather service stations. Tornado watches and warnings are announced through the media with the accompaniment of sirens, if needed.

"The tornado watch is like a forecast," said Warren Sunkel, a meteorologist at the weather service office in Topeka. "It's valid for a large area, like one-third of the state, and it's valid for six hours or so. It means the weather conditions are favorable for a tornado."

A warning, on the other hand, means a tornado has been spotted, he said. It lasts about one hour and affects one or two counties.

"It is a much more specific message," Sunkel said.

Tornado spotter training and weather safety meetings are held throughout the state. These meetings are open to the public and are dedicated to educating citizens about tornadoes. These meetings also train participants in weather watch procedures and how to report a tornado, Sunkel said.

Basic safety measures should be taken into consideration in the event of tornado-like weather conditions.

"The best place to be is underground, in a basement if you have it," Sunkel said. "If you don't have a basement in your house, you want to be in an interior hallway, close to the center of the house if possible."

If caught in a tornado, Sunkel said the worst place to be is in a car.

"Usually there's very heavy rain with the tornado, and it's not very inviting to get out in that (the rain) and lie in a ditch. But you're a lot safer doing that than in a car. The car's being lifted up and turned around and thrown against trees. If you're lying flat (in a ditch), it's possible the tornado may just pass over you," he said.

Flying objects plague family

By The Associated Press

COLUMBUS, Ohio — John and Joan Resch said that since Saturday, lights and water faucets have turned themselves on, eggs have splattered against their kitchen walls and telephones have risen from tables of their north side Columbus home whenever their 14-year-old adopted daughter, Tina, is in the house.

The Psychical Research Institute in Chapel Hill, N.C. said it appears the family is being beset by Recurrent Spontaneous Psychokinesis, or RSPK, described as the unconscious ability of an individual to cause nearby objects to move. Parapsychological journals have reported on cases of RSPK around the world.

Singer takes three gospel awards

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Gospel singer Sandi Patti received three awards, including female vocalist of the year and artist of the year, at the 15th annual Gospel Music Association's Dove Awards.

Patti was awarded her third Dove for "More Than Wonderful," chosen inspirational gospel music album of the year.

Glen Campbell presided over the show Wednesday night, which was attended by about 3,000 people at the Tennessee Performing Arts Center. There were 16 categories of awards.

Russ Taff was named gospel male vocalist of the year, while Lanny Wolfe received a song of the year Dove for "More Than Wonderful."

Wolfe also was honored as gospel songwriter of the year.

Debbie Boone, whose father, Pat, was in the audience, received the gospel music album of the year by a secular artist award for her record "Surrender."

Cronkite misses the news business

NEW YORK — Walter Cronkite, himself revered as one of the most successful television newscasters, says he's "always thought that the anchorperson personality cult thing was awful." Cronkite, a retired anchorman for the "CBS Evening News," adds, however, that he was unsuccessful in persuading his own network that television news doesn't need anchorpersons.

Cronkite, in an interview in the March 11 Parade magazine, said he misses "not being part of the news every night — the clicking teletypes and the clacking typewriters."

"But I don't miss the on-air part at all. Actually, I've always thought that the anchorperson personality cult thing was awful. I don't think there should even be anchorpeople — except off the air. We even worked on that idea when I was at CBS, but it didn't get anywhere."

Cronkite also said the only time he remembers putting "three bleeps" together was when a woman accused him of being two-faced the day President John F. Kennedy was murdered.

He said it happened when he got a few minutes of break time from a draining stint of on-air reporting of Kennedy's death.

When he tried to call his wife, he said, an incoming call had just been connected and he heard a cultivated voice say, "I want to make a complaint..."

"It's a terrible time for CBS to have that awful Walter Cronkite on the air. He's crying his crocodile tears when everybody knows he hated John Kennedy," the woman said.

Cronkite said "suddenly something snapped."

"I just trembled with fury to think that I could be so misinterpreted," he said. "But all I said was, 'Madam, what is your name?'"

"And she gave me her name and her address, on Park Avenue. And then I let her have it."

"'Madam,' I said, 'you are speaking to Walter Cronkite and you are a (bleep bleep bleep) idiot!'"

"I didn't know I had it in me. I don't think I've put three bleeps like that together in my whole life," Cronkite said.

Weather

Partly cloudy today, high mid-40s. Winds southwesterly 10 to 20 mph. Fair tonight, low mid- to upper-20s. Sunny Saturday, high in low to mid-50s.

Talent Identification Program at Duke University in Durham, N.C.

To be eligible for the program, students must be in the seventh grade and score in the top 97 percent of his peers on a national standardized test. In Kansas, the Iowa Basic Skills Test is used. Then the student must take the Scholastic Aptitude Test.

Romanelli's verbal scores on the SAT were in the top 2 percent of the national high school sample when he first took the test in January 1983. He retook the test this year and scored in the top 1 percent of high school and college-bound seniors. His scores made him eligible for the TIP program at Duke. Last summer, Gov. John Carlin awarded him a certificate of merit for being named fifth in the nation in the TIP program.

Romanelli's college experience has had its trials.

"They (the admissions office) made it very clear no allowances would be made for age," his mother said. "He would be treated like any other student."

"The first test was an essay test," Romanelli said. "I wasn't quite prepared. Junior high tests are objective tests. That's what I'm good at. That's what I'm used to. That's what the SAT is. I couldn't write fast enough and couldn't get my thoughts down to synthesis. I got there late, which didn't help. The first test was a traumatic event."

Although history is one of Romanelli's main interests, he said he is not sure what he will eventually major in.

His extracurricular activities include scouting, drama and choir. He is a life rank Boy Scout of Troop 74 at the First Presbyterian Church and is working on an Eagle project. In 1981, he won the Outstanding Achievement Award of Manhattan Music Enrichment School.

Horsemen's conference to bring 300 to K-State

The third annual Kansas State University Horsemen's conference is scheduled for Saturday morning in Weber arena.

The conference is sponsored by the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry and the Division of Cooperative Extension.

Three hundred Kansas 4-H members and leaders and horsemen are expected to attend the conference.

The program begins at 8:15 a.m. Topics to be covered in the morning program include feeding the young growing horse, tax considerations for horse farm owners, blister beetles in alfalfa hay and practical equine exercise physiology.

In the afternoon, a discussion of basic training maneuvers for advancing the performance horse will be lead by B.F. Yeates, extension horse specialist from Texas A&M University.

A demonstration on fitting halter horses by Tom Gibbs, professional fitter and exhibitor from the Texas College station, will begin at 3 p.m.

Vehicle crash kills Fort Riley soldier

By The Associated Press

FORT RILEY — A 20-year-old soldier was killed Thursday during field maneuvers at Fort Riley when he was thrown from the vehicle he was driving, an Army spokesman said.

The victim was identified as Spec. 4 Steven J. Protheroe of Wyoming, Pa.

Spokesman Harvey Perritt said the soldier was thrown from the vehicle, which overturned and rolled over on him. He was pronounced dead at Irwin Army Community Hospital.

Prayer debate a waste of time

Why is the U.S. Senate wasting its time debating a constitutional amendment promoting prayer in schools?

There are persuasive arguments both for and against structured prayer in schools. But the question should never have been raised in the first place.

The amendment itself seems unnecessary:

"Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prohibit individual or group prayer in public schools or other public institutions. No person shall be required by the United States or by any state to participate in prayer."

This seems to simply state the situation as it exists now in public schools: students can pray or not pray if they so desire.

An amendment to the amendment reads, "Neither the United States nor any state shall compose the words of any prayer to be said in public schools." An amendment to the amendment to the amendment replaces the word "compose" with "prescribe."

What, then, does this amendment propose? If it doesn't specify anything different from current practice, what is its point?

Arguments against school prayer pinpoint its absurdity.

Prayer depends on individual religious beliefs and needs. Because concepts of God vary from person to person, it is illogical to assume one specific prayer could satisfy the spiritual needs of all.

According to the 1981 North Carolina Baptist Convention, "Prayer is a personal communication between an individual and God and does not depend on either the permission or sponsorship of government or its agents."

Furthermore, considering there is no dominant religious consensus in America, no one prayer could serve the spiritual needs of Methodists, Jews, atheists, Catholics, Lutherans, Moslems or any other belief. A prayer construed to please all such religions probably couldn't be recognized as prayer.

And what teacher would want to lead a prayer before a class of students with diversified religious beliefs? How would he or she consider the students' needs and his or her own in the same prayer?

Who says God can be legislated? Is the concept of God a material object that can be permitted or disallowed in the classroom, like chewing gum (as Sen. Jack Danforth, R-Mo., suggested)?

The first amendment to the Constitution was written partly to ensure the government would not attempt to establish a national religion or influence personal religious conviction. But now our national senators ignore these first amendment principles — and for them to even consider altering one basic civil liberty of our society is extremely frightening.

'Acker' awards honor campus best

It seems like every month or so we are bombarded with a nationally televised awards show of one sort or another. Most recently were the Grammy Awards, recognizing artists who set the (ugh) standards of taste in popular music.

Later come the Academy Awards, the Country Music Association Awards, the Tony Awards and so forth. And we can't forget the inevitable beauty pageants.

One word describes these awards shows: booring. How any sane person can sit through two or three hours of superfluous, slobbering back-slapping is beyond me.

Wouldn't it be so much nicer if there were a really relevant awards show — one that gives those in the public light their just reward? I thought so.

Therefore, I have created another award to be presented to several deserving recipients. Welcome to the first-ever Acker awards, named after (you guessed it) our beloved president, Uncle Duane.

The "demand-side" Acker: To Department of Intercollegiate Athletics Director Dick Towers, who must be learning his economics quite well after allowing student basketball ticket prices to soar and bleachers to empty.

The "special events" Acker: To outgoing Union Program Council Adviser Barbara Burke, who loves rock'n'roll and realizes what a difference she has made in our lives, but plans to do the "Stray Cat Strut" eastward. I won't stand in her way.

The "roses and roadapples"

LEE WHITE
Manhattan Editor

Acker: To Edward Seaton, publisher of The Manhattan Mercury and part-owner of KMAN-AM and KMKF-FM, for realizing the power of the press and using it to railroad downtown redevelopment all the way through Washington.

The "What was wrong with the old 97 FM?" Acker: To Stauffer Communications, owner of WIBW-FM, for ruining a perfectly good radio station by calling it "The New 97" and considerably mellowing the music. Wonder when the new will wear off? Probably next ratings period.

The "Cretins are people, too" Acker: To those responsible for tossing tear gas canisters into the Sigma Chi fraternity house and Kite's Bar and Grille and placing a grenade simulator in the mailbox of the Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity. May your identity be discovered and your body put behind bars.

The "eternal pedestrian" Acker:

To Vice President for University Facilities Gene Cross, who proposes to close Mid-Campus Drive and make K-State a "walking campus." Fine, Gene. Let's take away your parking space.

The "dog house" Acker: To the Riley County Commission, which has refused to adopt a leash law and help the city pay for animal shelter facilities, but seems to have enough money to build itself a shrine called "Courthouse Plaza."

The "incommunicado" Acker: To Memorial Hospital, The Saint Mary Hospital and Lafene Student Health Center for their constant refusals to issue to the press basic information about patients after accidents. The Collegian is fortunate that now, after considerable complaining, the institutions will confirm or deny if a person is a patient. What progress.

The "Real Manhattanites don't drive cars" Acker: To the Manhattan City Commission which makes laws (obviously aimed at students) that move parking problems farther down the street. Honorable mention goes to Municipal Court which sees to it that all the money from parking fines is paid — one way or the other.

And finally, the award we've all been waiting for...

The "Who's that guy on TV?" Acker: To the namesake of this award: K-State President Duane Acker. He has successfully made himself a non-issue just about everywhere. About the only times one sees him are Landon Lectures and occasional press conferences.

I can't wait until next year.

After this, break is mandatory

A condensed overview of the semester so far:

It would seem that the University would be happy to reward students for a job well done. After all, better educated people will attract new industry to Kansas.

At the same time, the library is also trying to become a member of the Association of Research Libraries.

Currently, some students graduate from college without consulting an adviser. However, the Soviets are unlikely to go to the nuclear arms bargaining table with the United States because they view the president as a hostile leader who refuses to negotiate a mutual agreement.

One sure thing about the coming year's student government is that it will spend more than $800,000 of student money.

Furthermore, even on the "issues" they present as vital to students and the well-being of the University, candidates fail to offer creative plans for improving current situations or specifics about how these plans will work.

As Kennedy said, "We have to remind ourselves that he is in office, not in opposition. It is his government, and he must not be permitted to run for re-election by running against himself."

On the basis of the above argument, it appears obvious that the only solution is to keep the drinking age 18. If it is raised,

Kansas will be none the better for it. If the dry forces win, that weekend six-pack would only be replaced by bottles of liquor, wine and stronger beer.

It is unfortunate that those who complained so loudly last week probably did not go to the performance to see what they were complaining about. Also, concerts are far from dead at K-State. All it takes to preserve a worthwhile program is patience and cooperation in sharing facilities.

But about 10,000 books checked out by faculty prior to Sept. 1, 1983 are still on loan. The fact of the matter is, students have very few places to go after 10:30 p.m.

Finally, by placing the negotiation responsibilities in the hands of European leaders representing millions of people more directly concerned with nuclear destruction than the American public is, we may see a stronger effort to find a resolution to the nuclear threat.

Where political communication is involved, is it ever completely safe to give the power of prior censorship to the media, even if it only pertains to obscenity or profanity?

Obviously, the editorial board needs a break.

Editor,
Re: "Students' choices raise county abortion rate," in the March 1 Collegian:

With this article, the Collegian printed a photograph of two women, one in the last few months of pregnancy, and empty-handed, the other not obviously pregnant, but carrying school books. Underneath was the cutline, "Statistics show college towns have higher-than-average abortion rates because some women choose to be students instead of mothers."

Such a caption reinforces the already rampant pregnancy discrimination in our society and is an insult to millions of student-mothers. Pregnancy, and indeed motherhood, are not incompatible with a college career.

My mother completed a master's degree in computer information when she was 51 years old, had four children at home and worked full-time for an engineering firm. A friend of mine, 19 years old and unmarried, just gave birth to a son while continuing her studies at K-State. A third example is another friend's mother, a black woman who had two children at 17, and who went on to complete her doctorate degree at just 27 — a young age for anyone.

What do these three very different women have in common? They come from families and communities which, unlike society at large, consider pregnancy and motherhood not pathological conditions which interrupt life, but rewarding (although challenging) parts of life itself. Additionally, children are viewed as a shared responsibility, not just that of the biological mother.

The Collegian would never imply that the father of a soon-to-be-born child must choose to let that child in order to continue his education. It is pregnancy discrimination and blatant sexism to imply that women must do so.

Complex Theatre suffers 'identity crisis'

Editor,
Re: "UPC names best comedian at second biennial 'Laff Off,'" in the March 5 Collegian:

In your brief article you spoke about the results of the 'Laff Off' and all the other activities associated with Late Night at the Union. Unfortunately, you failed to recognize the performance by the Complex Improvisational Theatre, who shared the stage with guitarist Jeff Eubanks in the Stateroom.

As a result, the group has developed a severe identity crisis and is seeking emergency assistance from the Counseling Center. The prognosis is not encouraging.

One hundred or so people attended the performance and many felt the theatre to be on the verge of humorous. Please recognize this group, even if only at an existential level. "They were, therefore they am."

When you see them walking down the street, run up to them, put your arms around them and carry them on to the sidewalk, explaining that they could get run over by a car if the driver didn't see you. Especially if the driver is the same person who wrote the article.

Thank you for listening. This has been a cathartic experience.

Disrespect fills ordinary lives also

A few nights ago, a small group of people sat around a table in a library basement and discussed a letter one of them had received from Mr. Gonzales of the Internal Revenue Service.

They knew it would be difficult to avoid the IRS, even though they believe taxation is tyranny and theft, but then they hit upon an idea they all liked.

"Tell him you want to see his Americanization papers before you talk to him," one said. "Yeah! Make him prove he's an American."

They had never met Gonzales and knew nothing about his background, but they didn't need to know. They're the Citizens Union, one of the Posse Comitatus groups in Kansas. Their beliefs have raised eyebrows and elicited laughter, anger and fear in my home county where they meet.

In short, they are concerned most with the evils of Communism, taxation, the court system, gun control and Jews. The last named, they say, "seek to destroy all the Christian nations on the earth." One of the CU's more intriguing theories is that any law or vote passed in the United States that didn't have a clear majority without Ohio is void, because Ohio isn't a state.

And then there's the media, which is owned by Jews, gun-control advocates and, of course, communists.

KARRA PORTER
Staff Writer

"It looks like our news media and television industries have been working overtime to 'educate' us that 'posses' and 'vigilante groups' are something to be avoided," the group said. "Shouldn't our sheriff, instead, be informing the Posse Comitatus (militia) to arm themselves, as provided for in the second amendment, in the event that subversives (bureaucrats) should try to take over our government?"

Although the people in the Citizens Union seem harmless enough, clearly they do deserve to be watched. They don't advocate violence, but the spreading of some of their views could be harmful.

On the other hand, however, attention focused on these groups should not be exclusive of what may pose a bigger threat: the disrespect for humanity held by some "ordinary citizens" not associated with such groups.

Some recent examples from this area:

— The person who scrawls "nigger" on a display honoring black achievement.

— The person who puts a dozen shotgun blasts into a "Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial Highway" sign.

— The person who displays his ignorance by writing "Dress decently" on a poster about how to prevent rape.

— The person who says the victim of a vicious rape and mutilation murder "probably deserved it."

— The pro-lifer who "visits" abortion clinics to further destroy the lives of women who have had to make a difficult and painful decision.

— The high school superintendent who beats a base drum during a football game with the Kansas School for the Deaf to interfere with the drum-reverberation communication that team uses.

Few of these activities are deemed "newsworthy," so they are generally discussed only in private. There's no need for paranoia, but it's sensible to be aware of all potential social problems.

Sculptor Shawn Fischer of Baltimore arranges one of his bronze sculptures in the Union Art Gallery. The sculpture was made by the "lost wax" method.

Sculpture uses 'visual metaphors'

Work by sculptor Shawn Fischer, winner of the Phillips Award for Figurative Sculpture and the Award of Excellence, is on display in the Union Art Gallery through March 26.

The gallery is open weekdays from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Fischer, who lives in Baltimore, Md., completes his sculpture by the "lost wax" method — a mold is made from wax, submerged in sand or a similar material, and filled with molten bronze. The wax then melts and is "lost," leaving behind the finished piece.

"My abstract work shows my fascination with nature, as well as uninterpretable moods and emotions," Fischer said during an interview in the gallery as he arranged his works.

"My figurative works depict very real human experiences. I try to express things that have happened to me and to others."

He said he uses many visual metaphors in his sculptures.

Fischer said that before he went to college, he knew he wanted to be an artist, he just didn't know what kind of art he wanted to practice.

"I went to college to swim, but I wanted to be an artist, too. I went to a small college which had a very good liberal arts department. I had heard about this bronze sculpture class and thought it sounded interesting, so I took it. At the time, I was involved in print-making," he said.

If the facilities had not been there he would never have been involved with it, nor would he have made bronze sculpting his art, he said.

He has continued making prints.

"I've always liked to build things and I like sculpting because I'm touching and building," Fischer said. "Also, it became a vehicle to tell a story. I like allegory."

Fischer received a master's degree from the Rinehart School of Sculpture at Maryland Institute in 1983.

Actor's latest transition fails

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Very seldom have actors successfully made the transition to being directors. Most often the results have been quite mediocre — like the work of Burt Reynolds or Clint Eastwood. But on occasion an actor has made the jump with resounding success — as have Robert Redford and Warren Beatty.

Back in 1968, Paul Newman made an impressive directorial debut with "Rachel, Rachel." But since then, it has become quite apparent that the success of that film had more to do with the brilliant performance of his wife, Joanne Woodward, than it did with anything Newman brought to the film. And the mild success of "The Effect of Gamma Rays on Man-in-the-Moon Marigolds" had more to do with the outstanding screenplay by Paul Zindel, from his Pulitzer prize-winning play.

Newman's newest film, "Harry and Son," is his most disappointing to date. He attempts the same simple visual style he had used in his previous films, but the style is so visually uninteresting that the film must have a very strong screenplay and strong performances in order to succeed. "Harry and Son" fails on both counts.

The film's central character is played by Robby Benson. While Benson might certainly be considered cute by many pre-pubescent girls, he is nonetheless a very lightweight actor. In virtually every film he has been in, he has been called upon to play virtually the same role — the sensitive youth.

In "Harry and Son," he is type cast once again. This time, though, he must be convincing as an aspiring writer. Benson is so completely unable to understand for one minute what it means to be a serious writer that the film can never be taken seriously. All he can give his role is a somewhat charming and naive aura, but this is totally inappropriate for a character who has much boiling beneath his surface.

The only nicks in his character are shown through his relationship with an ex-girlfriend who is now pregnant, but has had so many lovers she doesn't know who the child's father is. The scenes with her give his character a semblance of depth, but Benson is once again not up to providing anything more than the most facile representations of emotion.

Benson can't be fully blamed for the failure of the film because he was given painfully little material to work with.

The screenplay, co-authored by Newman, falls into the same cliched form that we have seen so many times in the past: the sensitive young artist trying to succeed at his art but being restricted by the environment he finds himself within.

Only some bizarre twists could keep that shopworn story interesting. All that Newman does, though, is to surround Benson with a cast of rather weak characters who are never developed enough to become interesting.

A lot of time is devoted to these characters, principally Benson's father (played by Paul Newman), but the important scenes that would have allowed the audience to sympathize with Newman are all missing.

Newman loses his job once he begins having blinding head pains. Benson must then play the father-role as his father reverts to the child. This is all painfully obvious and trite in the way it has been represented on screen. It could have been powerful material, but nearly all the important scenes are missing — and they have been replaced by half-baked inconsequential ones.

Gallery shows artists' work exhibiting Indian influences

A collection of Southwestern art geared toward collectors is on display at the Strecker Gallery, 332 Poyntz Ave.

The works on display should appeal to collectors and their interests, said Julie Strecker, owner of the three-year-old gallery.

The current display features original works by Katalin Ehling, R.C. Gorman, Charles Jeffres and Amado Maurillo Pena Jr.

"Indian women are the focus of each work," Strecker said. "There is no background, and the artists have used contemporary styles and colors."

A dyer of art batiks of "Pueblo women doing everyday tasks," Ehling was born in Kassa, Hungary, in 1941, and has been living in Arizona since 1961.

"When I first started, batik was just a craft," she said. "When I first entered the Arizona State Fair in 1973, they didn't know where to put my work. They finally decided to put it up with the crafts, but my batiks ended up winning the prizes anyway. I haven't had to fight that bias too much. Being in good galleries gives my batiks credibility as fine art."

Her family left Hungary in 1944 and moved to the United States in 1950. She studied at the American Academy of Art in Chicago for two years, then went to Paris in 1963 to learn fashion illustration. She saw her first batik in San Francisco in 1973, and completed her first piece with a kit.

McCain patron survey recognizes low prices of auditorium's events

A survey to determine performance preferences, ticket-buying habits and the type of patron who attends the McCain Auditorium performances was given to McCain patrons during the four February performances.

"There has been an excellent percentage of returns," Doreen Bauman, director of McCain, said.

The complete results of the survey have not been released yet. However, statistics on reactions to ticket prices have become available.

Only one person of those surveyed responded that ticket prices were too high.

"There is a large difference between our ticket prices and urban (ticket) prices," Bauman said.

An average ticket price for an event in New York City is $40, according to Bauman. A standing-room-only ticket often costs more than $35. The price for a ticket to see the New York City Opera National Touring Company at McCain was $17.

"It's an incredible bargain," Bauman said.

A good portion of the programming activities at McCain are paid for by box office sales.

"It is always a struggle to meet costs from ticket sales," Bauman said. "That's why so much is done to promote audience activity."

The auditorium also receives funds from the Fine Arts Council budget. McCain makes up one part of the Fine Arts Council, which is a line item on the Student Governing Association budget.

The council's total budget for 1983-1984 was $764,000, Bauman said. Last year McCain requested $6,000 from the council and received $3,514.

"That doesn't cover half of the advertising fees," Bauman said. Other costs incurred for the performances are performer fees, production costs and other promotional activities.

Most universities have student subsidies to cover some costs, Bauman said. Unlike many universities, K-State students do not pay a specific fee to fund the performing arts.

The ticket prices at McCain are determined prior to the season ticket campaign in late April and early May. Bauman determines production costs and performance fees, then divides this number by the estimated ticket sales to determine the ticket price.

Play exemplifies real-life comedy

By JOHN CREGO
Collegian Reviewer

It has often been said that the best comedy comes not from a writer's imagination, but from real-life situations. This is the case in the Manhattan Civic Theatre's presentation of Preston Jones' "The Oldest Living Graduate."

Review

The two-act play is being presented at the City Auditorium tonight, Saturday and March 16-17.

This play has everything going for it in the form of witty lines, a good plot and a fine cast. The author's skill evokes laughter, tears, sorrow and anger from the audience as a tale unravels of an old man confined to a wheelchair and condemned to live out his days with his son and daughter-in-law.

The setting is a small west Texas town, Bradleyville, that has been bypassed by the building of a new highway.

Col. J.C. Kinkaid, who is brilliantly played by Joel Climenhaga, associate professor of speech, is the harsh-spoken, brassy old World War I veteran with nothing to live for but his memories. He has given away all of his land to his son, except for a small lake that holds dear memories of a long-lost love. But, because the colonel can no longer get around without someone driving him, the son wants to turn the property into a resort.

Ron Hoffman, director of the K-State instructional media center, plays the colonel's son, Floyd Kinkaid. His task is to convince the old man to give up the small lake so Floyd and his partner can develop the resort area. He thinks the resort will make money while putting Bradleyville back on the map.

To make matters worse for Floyd, his father refuses to attend a ceremony at the cadet school where the colonel is the oldest living graduate. The old man explains his actions by saying, "It's no honor to be the oldest living anything."

On top of this, Floyd has his hands full with his wife.

Maureen Kinkaid, played by Pat Foltz-Pearson, is a hard-drinking, wise-cracking woman who sees more than her husband gives her credit for. Although she may not always agree with the colonel, she really can't see eye-to-eye with her husband either — except she knows that her husband needs this land deal to regain his feeling of self-worth.

Climenhaga, Hoffman and Foltz-Pearson turn in excellent performances as this funny, funny play winds its way in and around their lives. Each has wants, hopes and fears with which they must learn to deal. There is a great deal of action and reaction between these characters. Tension is built and released with dialogue and actions, a feat that is very difficult to do convincingly from a stage. However, in some of the lesser characters, the level of energy could have been higher. It is not enough to come on stage and shout lines to get the energy going without that certain something that gives the character realism.

The rest of the cast are: Amy Friesen as Martha Ann Sickenger, Rix Shanline as Mike Tremaine, Spencer Tomb as Clarence Sickenger, Preston Gregory as Maj. Leroy W. Ketchum, Michael DeBoer as Cadet Whopper Turnbull and Winifred Endicott as Claudine Hampton.

The directing of the play is cleverly done by Edith Hinrichs, audience development specialist for McCain Auditorium. I can't imagine any blocking or movement changes that could be made in the limited space allowed for the presentation of the play on stage.

USFL football swings past Tarzan

Professional football all year long. That's music to my ears and a sight for sore eyes! Yes, you read it right, a girl actually enjoys pro football — not to mention all the quarterback sacks, trick plays and hard hitting that goes along with it.

Two weeks ago the United States Football League began its second season, making me one happy pro football fan. No more do I have to constantly flip television channels on Sunday afternoons looking for something besides old Tarzan movies or some celebrity golf tournament.

For the rest of the spring and summer season I can sit back, relax and enjoy the performances of football greats like Hershal Walker, Mike Rozier, Doug Williams, Joe Cribbs, Gary Barbaro and Brian Sipe as they battle each other in a league that is still an infant in the world of professional football.

Last year was a very trying year for the USFL because the league had to compete with the idea of possibly taking something away from the already popular National Football League. The USFL survived that initial season, and with it, gathered unsatisfied players from the NFL for this year's season, gained attention from players on the college level and now — with the signing of Marcus Dupree, who will be making his debut on Sunday with the New Orleans Breakers — the USFL has even signed undergraduate players.

The USFL has increased its number of teams from 12 to 18 for this year's season, including teams such as the Pittsburgh Maulers, Houston Gamblers, Memphis Showboats, Jacksonville Bulls, Oklahoma Outlaws and San Antonio Gunslingers.

Some coaches in the USFL have even gone so far as declaring "war" against the likes of the NFL, but that "war" won't become anything more than just words until teams from both leagues average about the same amount of pay.

For this year, teams in the USFL will receive less than $1 million from television contracts compared to the estimated $14 million that NFL teams will receive. Until this gap is narrowed, it isn't even possible for the new league to get anywhere in the shadows of the NFL.

The USFL, however, has caused its share of pain and frustration for the NFL with the league switching of players and gaining the top college draft picks. But the new league has yet to prove itself to the actual investors — the fans.

The first season could be called a "curiosity" season when fans watched to see what the new league was all about and if it could survive in the sports world. That curiosity is no longer a factor, and the USFL must appeal to the fans to generate popularity this season.

JUDI WRIGHT
Staff Writer

Jerry Argovitz, owner of the Houston Gamblers, is thinking positively and said in four years the USFL will be playing the NFL in the "Galaxy Bowl". He said the Michigan Panthers and Philadelphia Stars could possibly compete in the NFL right now.

Even though the USFL has provided me and other fans with football the year round, I'm still skeptical of the type of football it is trying to promote. Maybe it will take me these four years to actually see this and switch from being a devoted NFL fan.

Take the team names for example. Where did they ever come up with them? Could they possibly be from a "Pick the New Name and Win A Trip To The Galaxy Bowl" contest? Like the Memphis Showboats, are they supposed to be a "classy" team? Or what about the New Orleans Breakers, are they going to be the "tough guy" team? The Oakland Invaders sounds awful similar to the old Oakland Raiders to me. Come on folks, let's be a little more original. It's a wonder the team colors aren't the same.

Bragging rights on line in K-State-KU rematch

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

For the third time this season, state bragging rights are on the line as K-State and the University of Kansas are set to square off in the semi-finals of the Big Eight Tournament at 9:30 p.m. today at Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo.

The Jayhawks, 19-9, have swept the two previous games between the two squads this season. On Jan. 28, the 'Hawks blew K-State away, taking a 65-54 victory in Lawrence. But in Manhattan, the 14-14 'Cats made it much closer, falling to the 'Hawks 63-61 before a packed house at Ahearn Field House.

The two teams' third meeting should be a nail-biter since each team is coming off impressive victories.

Playing at home Tuesday, the 'Hawks beat the Oklahoma State University Cowboys, 75-58, their second win over the 'Pokes in less than a week.

K-State earned a trip to Kansas City by beating the University of Nebraska, 41-39, at Lincoln. In that contest, junior forward Tom Alfaro sank a 20-foot jumper with two seconds remaining to give the 'Cats their second road victory of the season.

Defense was the story Wednesday, with NU and K-State playing the lowest scoring game in conference post-season history. By holding the 'Huskers to 39 points, the Wildcats gave the best defensive effort against a Big Eight team by a Jack Hartman-coached team.

K-State will be hard-pressed to match those numbers against Kansas. The 'Hawks are the third best scoring team in the conference and are leading the league in both field goal and free throw shooting percentages.

The 'Hawks are led in scoring by all-Big Eight performer Carl Henry, who hit a last-second shot that beat the 'Cats in Manhattan. The 6-foot-4 senior is averaging over 18 points a game, and is one of the leagues top rebounders, averaging over seven boards a contest.

Also scoring in double figures for the Jayhawks are Kelly Knight and Calvin Thompson.

K-State's resurgence has been led by Alfaro's hot hand. Since gaining a starting spot, Alfaro has led the 'Cats in scoring nine straight times, raising his average to 12.4 points per game.

Junior Eddie Elder continues to lead the 'Cats in scoring with a 13-points-per-game average and is also the team's top rebounder, grabbing seven boards a game. Joining Elder and Alfaro in double figures for K-State is sophomore forward Ben Mitchell, averaging 10.9 points a game.

The 'Cats also are the league's top defensive team, holding opponents to under 63 points a game.

Smith House grabs title

The intramural basketball season ended Wednesday as teams traded baskets for claims to all-University titles.

In the fraternity division, Sigma Alpha Epsilon beat Tau Kappa Epsilon.

Seventh-floor Haymaker Hall clinched the residence hall division by stopping fifth-floor Moore Hall.

In the co-recreation league, the Allstars met and defeated the Bears.

The Breakers beat the Juco Jammers in the finals of the women's division, and in the six-foot and under league Cloud County was victorious over the Sixers.

In the independent division, Smith House eliminated the Blitzkrieg.

In the battle for the all-University position, the Sig Eps from the fraternity division stopped seventh floor Haymaker from the residence hall division in the first round.

In the final title game, Smith House stopped the Sig Eps.

How to avoid frostbite

General information

Frostbite is a condition in which tissues of a part of the body—usually an extremity, ear, nose, or cheek—become frozen or partially frozen as a result of exposure to cold. To avoid frostbite, however, you must protect yourself against not just cold but also the conditions that increase body heat loss: moisture and wind.

Moisture—whether from rain, snow, or perspiration—speeds the conduction of heat away from the body. Therefore, it is of utmost importance to remain dry.

Wind has a marked effect on heat loss. If the thermometer reads 20°F (−6.7°C) and the wind velocity (speed) is 20 mph, the exposure is comparable to −10°F (−23.3°C). This is called the windchill factor. A rough measure of wind velocity is: if you feel the wind on your face, the velocity is about 10 mph; if small branches move or dust or snow is raised, 20 mph; if large branches are moving, 30 mph; and if a whole tree bends, about 40 mph.

Selecting the proper clothing

Proper clothing for winter weather provides insulation from cold, ventilation so that perspiration can evaporate, and protection against wind, rain, or snow. Avoid one bulky, heavy, or constricting garment. Instead, wear several layers of light, loose clothing that will trap air—a very effective insulator—and provide adequate ventilation. Wool and polyester down substitutes retain some protective value when wet; cotton and goose or duck down do not.

For ideal protection, wear underclothing made of wool or propylene, a substance used in making synthetic materials. Wear layers of wool or synthetic down between underwear and the outer layer of a water-repellent and windproof covering. (Waterproof clothing is not recommended since it holds in the moisture produced by your body.) Protect your head and neck with a scarf and a hat or hood and your face with a mask. Wear two pairs of socks—both wool or one cotton and the other wool—and well-fitting boots high enough to protect your ankles. Innersoles made of a reflective material that retains heat normally lost to the ground are available.

Your hands are better protected by mittens than gloves. Keep in mind, however, that since mittens limit what you can do with your fingers, you may need to remove them frequently. By wearing lightweight gloves under mittens, you will still have protection against heat loss if you remove the mittens.

Be sure that your clothing is not tight. Heat in your extremities is supplied by your blood and anything that hampers blood flow will increase the risk of frostbite. For this same reason, do not remain in a sitting or kneeling position for long periods; doing so can impair circulation of blood.

If you become stranded

Many people suffer frostbite when their cars break down in freezing weather. Be sure to keep protective clothing in your car if there's any risk of breakdown in an isolated area. When working on a car in the cold, avoid getting gasoline on your hands. While it doesn't freeze, it takes on the temperature of the surrounding area and cools your skin by evaporation. Avoid contacting metal with bare skin; don't try to make repairs without gloves.

Don't walk through the snow in low shoes. If you lack boots and other appropriate protective clothing, stay in the car. As a rule, a rescue team is more likely to find you if you remain close to your vehicle.

If you car breaks down and you're stranded in the cold, use the auto heater with a window open slightly to guard against carbon monoxide poisoning or, if possible, build a fire outside. Protect yourself from the wind as much as possible. If there is no shelter, make one with tree boughs and/or snow, or with a blanket if you have one in your car. Don't work so fast that you get overfired or wet from perspiration, both of which make you more susceptible to cold injury. Insulate yourself from the ground with tree boughs.

Avoid smoking if stranded. Smoking constricts your blood vessels, limiting the blood supply to your arms and legs and adds to the risk of frostbite.

Lady 'Cats to face Sooners

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

Things look promising for the Lady 'Cats basketball team as it takes on the University of Oklahoma Sooners in semi-final action of the Big Eight Tournament today.

The game will be played at 3:15 p.m. in Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo.

First, the Lady 'Cats are the odds-on favorites. The team has beaten Oklahoma two previous times this season with an 88-70 victory at Ahearn Field House on Jan. 21 and a 72-61 win at Norman on Feb. 11.

The Lady 'Cats also hold an advantage when it comes to conference records, ending the Big Eight Conference regular season tied for first with a 12-2 mark. Oklahoma ended in the conference's fourth-place position with a 7-7 record.

But K-State Head Coach Lynn Hickey knows better than to count the Sooners out. The 21-7 Oklahoma squad will be out for revenge against the seventh-ranked Lady 'Cats, Hickey said.

"The danger about OU is that they'll really be after us," she said. "They have a good group inside."

Leading that group inside will be 5-foot-11 senior Lynn McCurdy and 6-foot-1 sophomore Jacquetta Hurley, who both rank in the top 20 in conference scoring with 16 and 14 point averages, respectively. Hurley scored 18 and McCurdy added 16 in the two squads' last encounter on Feb. 11.

K-State will counter with the inside attack of Angie Bonner and Tina Dixon. The 6-foot-1 Bonner, who was selected to the second team all-Big Eight squad, is connecting for 15 points per game, while Dixon is averaging 12 per outing. Sophomores Jennifer Jones and Cassandra Jones round out the K-State double-figure scoring with 13 and 11.2 point averages, respectively.

Jennifer Jones was the star in the two squads' last meeting, leading the Lady 'Cats with 20 points and nine rebounds. Jones tallied 19 in the first K-State vs. Oklahoma game this season.

The Lady 'Cats, who have won three post-season tournament titles, placed second following a 75-65 loss to Missouri in the finals. K-State had already received a bid to the NCAA tournament prior to the game, however, and went on to make the tournament's final 16-team field. The Lady 'Cats lost a 73-70 overtime decision to the University of Texas and ended the season 25-7.

NCAA qualifiers ready for meet

By JUDI WRIGHT
Staff Writer

Nine members of the men's and women's track team will compete in the National Collegiate Athletic Association Indoor Track Championships today and Saturday in Syracuse, N.Y.

During the indoor season, these athletes qualified for nationals by meeting or surpassing the qualifying standards set by the NCAA. Of all the qualifying times turned in, the top 20 make up the field for the national meet. The top six finishers are then named all-Americans.

Mike Bradley, the only representative from K-State's men's squad, will compete in the 500-meter run. Bradley was the third-place finisher at the national meet last year in the 600-yard dash and holds the Big Eight Conference record in the event. He defended his championship in that race this year with a season-best time of 1:09.19.

Head Track Coach Steve Miller, said he hopes that Bradley will be able to "repeat his all-American performance." Bradley has been an indoor track all-American the past two years.

Two other members of the men's squads qualified for nationals, but because of injuries, Veryl Switzer and Kenny Harrison will not compete.

K-State's women are led by Deb Pihl, who will compete in the 1,000-yard run and will anchor the 3,200-meter relay. Pihl's quality performances this year earned her the honor of being named Most Valuable Female Competitor at the Big Eight indoor championships two weeks ago. At that meet, Pihl recorded a season's best while setting a conference record in the 1,000 with a time of 2:29.79. She also finished first in the mile-run with a time of 4:47.02.

Joining Pihl on the relay team will be Erin Ficke, Anne Stadler and Lauretta Miller.

Jacque Struckhoff will represent K-State in the 3,000-meter run. She finished second at the Big Eight meet with a season's best of 10:03.58. Michelle Maxey is scheduled to compete in the 500-meter dash. She had a time of 1:20.98 at the conference meet.

Governor's conference to include specialists

By LISA HEIMERMAN
Collegian Reporter

Four nationally known experts, including the television personality Captain Kangaroo, will be featured speakers at the Fourth Governor's Conference on Education for Parenthood at K-State March 15-17.

Bob Keeshan will speak at 10:45 a.m. March 17 in the Union on "The Nurturing of Young America." He has been commended for creating and starring in the longest-running children's program on network television, "Captain Kangaroo," and for numerous awards and honors in the broadcasting industry.

In addition to Keeshan, featured speakers to appear at McCain Auditorium include Bettye Cardwell, professor of education at the University of Arkansas and current president of the National Association of Education of Young Children. She was named Woman of the Year in Humanitarian and Community Service in 1976 by the Ladies' Home Journal. She will speak on "Parenting: The Name is Change" at 10:15 a.m. March 15.

The third speaker is Robert McCall, senior scientist and science writer at Father Flanagan's Boys Town, writer for Parents magazine and co-producer of news features on children and families for television.

He will speak at 10:45 a.m. March 16 on the "Dawn of Love." He also is the author of "Infants: The New Knowledge About the Years from Birth to Three."

Tony Jurich, K-State professor of family and child development and a staff member at The Menninger Foundation in Topeka, will present "Parenting Adolescents: a survival course," at 3:30 p.m. March 15. Jurich is the author of 40 professional publications about adolescents and their families.

Stephan Bollman, director of the Family Center and the conference co-coordinator, said, "The 1984 conference basically has three goals to accomplish. First, to bring together parents and professionals who work with families to share parenting concerns, methods and programs.

"Another objective is to place emphasis on the changing concerns — such as necessary resources, varied approaches to parenting throughout the life cycle and on varied lifestyles of families.

"Finally, the conference is to highlight current community resources for parent education throughout the state and to examine adaptations necessary for broader use," he said.

About 650 community family service professionals, education professionals, community volunteer leaders, parents and other individuals interested in education for parenthood are expected to attend the conference.

The conference will feature more than 70 sessions and workshops led by professionals representing 42 agencies and universities.

Merger

15-second donor announcement, but Buller said that this does not generate enough added income.

KSDB has three major improvement goals in mind if the merger should go into affect, Buller said.

The first is to update the equipment, which dates from the 1950s and 1960s and is continually breaking down, he said.

Second, programming needs to be updated, Buller said.

"We need to get people who can be more professional on the air, and the way you do this is by paying them, as the staff of the Collegian is paid.

"And finally, we really need a full-time person to run the radio station.

We need continuity from semester to semester and from year to year," he said.

An alternative to the merger would be changing KSDB to a commercial licensee, but Buller said this would necessitate time and money.

"A license change would cost a couple thousand dollars, take a bunch of time and contain a lot of legal hassle, plus there is no frequency we could move to in the commercial area," he said.

For the merger to come about, Student Publications' line item would need to be increased, Adams said. He said the ideal situation would be to have the increase for about three years to allow KSDB to purchase its needed equipment and hire additional staff, then allow the two media to work as a non-profit corporation. In this way, KSDB would have a better chance to have its license changed from an educational station to a commercial station so it could be more self-supporting, Adams said.

An increased line item and merger would not yet be feasible for the 1984-85 school year, Buller said.

"Student Senate also said that it is unwise to look at a line item for this year. Student Publications is under its line item review this year, and with the Coliseum issue last year, it would not be wise to bring it up this year. Plus, we have a lot of planning to do in regard to a possible merger," Buller said.

The physical distance between Kedzie Hall (where Student Publications is based) and McCain Auditorium (where KSDB is based) can be filled only if the faculty of journalism and mass communications and radio and television bridge the gap, Buller said.

"Faculty provide leadership, and they will be the ones to build the bridge between print and broadcast. We need to mesh, and the radio-television people really want to explore the possibility. We both need to understand each other. The world of communication is too complicated to be specialized to just one aspect of communication. We need to go between the two," he said.

Because print and broadcast media are growing together technologically, Adams said the possible merger would be an asset and a learning tool to both media.

"I see the possible merger as broadening the scope of the two media and the horizons of students present and future," Adams said.

British pianists share love of music with K-State students

By DIANE KERSTING
Collegian Reporter

A room that seats 462 was full, although there were only two people in it. But those two people were Richard McMahon and Martin Jones, and the room was full of concentration, flying fingers and beautiful music.

After spending the past week on the K-State campus, duo-pianists McMahon and Jones are preparing to wrap up their visit tonight with a dinner-serenade concert at 7 p.m. in the Manhattan Holidome.

McMahon and Jones, teachers and performers at University College at Cardiff, Wales, were invited by Rod Walker, associate professor of music, to come to Manhattan to participate in the Flint Hills Festival of Music that began March 1.

In addition to preparing for tonight's performance, both have shared their talents and love for classical music with K-State students during the week in the form of workshops, lectures, classes and a recital given by Jones on Monday.

Although both men began playing the piano at the age of five, McMahon said he took it upon himself "because we had one in the house," while Jones said he needed a little more prodding.

"My mother just decided it was time for me to learn," he said.

McMahon's piano studies began with Ella Pounder in Middlesbrough, England, where he spent his childhood. He then became a student of Gordon Green at the Royal Academy of Music in England, from 1965 to 1970, where he won many awards, including the Mendelssohn Scholarship. He studied with Vlado Perlemuter in Paris from 1970 to 1972 before joining the teaching staff of the Music Department of University College, Cardiff, in 1972.

Jones made his London debut as a soloist in 1968 after a distinguished student career at the Royal Academy of Music and the Accademia Chigiana in Siena. He became a pianist-in-residence at University College in 1971.

Although each has many classical composers that he likes, they agree that their "favorite" is whatever they're doing at the time.

"To say a favorite is pretty hard. We can't really choose one because there are so many we like and so many to choose from and so many things to base it on," McMahon said.

While McMahon is on the staff as a pianist and tutor, and Jones is a pianist-in-residence, they both have to do a certain amount of performing "to keep the bread rolling in," McMahon said.

"It's sort of a basic job at the university which gives us a chance to do other things, too, such as perform and make records," Jones said.

Both have independent careers as soloists as well as their duo performance, which they've done for the past three years.

They have made four records together and have another two in the works. In addition, McMahon has made one solo album and Jones has made several — although they are not all available.

Meese requests delay in Senate investigation

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Department of Justice opened a preliminary inquiry Sunday to determine whether a special prosecutor is needed to investigate attorney general designate Edwin Meese's financial transactions.

Meese, who disclosed the investigation, immediately asked the Senate to postpone hearings on his nomination.

The decision by the Justice Department, which followed extraordinary Saturday and Sunday meetings by top agency officials to discuss the Meese affair, could postpone the Senate vote on Meese's confirmation for some time.

Meese himself disclosed the investigation by having an aide call news service reporters at home Sunday night and read the text of a letter which Meese had read Sunday evening to Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond, R-S.C.

Meese told Thurmond that the Justice Department would be investigating "certain matters pertaining to the filing of information concerning the $15,000 loan received by my wife in connection with stock purchased for our children's education."

The White House counselor was referring to an interest-free $15,000 loan he received in December, 1980 from Edwin Thomas, who later became an aide to Meese in the White House and is now regional director of the General Services Administration in San Francisco.

Thomas's wife, Gretchen, also works for the federal government in San Francisco.

Meese failed to disclose the $15,000 loan on 1981 and 1982 financial disclosure reports as required by the Ethics in Government Act. He also failed to disclose the loan to the Senate Judiciary Committee, for which he apologized in a letter to Thurmond last week.

Meese has said the loan was used to buy stock in Biotech Capital Corp., which was later sold for a $3,000 loss. He also failed to disclose that as required by the ethics law.

Under the ethics act, the attorney general has up to 90 days to decide whether there is enough evidence of a federal crime to turn the investigation over to a special prosecutor or an independent counsel, who would be named by a special three-judge panel.

In his letter to Thurmond, Meese said, "I welcome this inquiry by the Justice Department. It provides a full opportunity to evaluate and to expose the baseless insinuations that have received extensive media exposure and have been undoubtedly motivated by election-year politics. I am confident that a calm and dispassionate examination of the facts will fully reveal the absence of any wrongdoing on my part."

Meese told Thurmond he had President Reagan's permission to "respectfully request that the confirmation process relating to my nomination be postponed until the Department of Justice's examination has been completed."

Meese had been set to return the Judiciary Committee for a second round of questioning later this week. Meese aide Jim Jenkins said Meese met with Reagan at the White House at 5 p.m. Sunday to seek permission to send the letter to Thurmond.

Thurmond, who was in South Carolina, was told of Meese's decision and did not have any immediate statement. Mark Goodin, his spokesman, said the senator was happy to grant Meese's request for a postponement, which was expected to last two to three weeks.

Meese's primary opponent on the committee, Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, said through a spokesman that the Justice Department action was "appropriate."

Last week more and more senators expressed doubts about Meese's fitness to serve as attorney general, particularly in light of evidence brought before the committee showing that five men who extended loans or other generous financial treatment to Meese later received federal government jobs.

Meese told Thurmond Sunday night, "I in-

Bob Keeshan, who portrays Captain Kangaroo on the children's television program, believes he is an advocate for young people.

Keeshan reflects on 28-year stint as TV 'Captain'

By TOM SCHULTES
Collegian Reporter

An interesting thing happened to Bob Keeshan on the way to law school. And it's still happening almost 29 years later.

Keeshan became "Captain Kangaroo," known to millions for his oversized coat, trimmed mustache and jingling keys used to open the door of the "Treasure House."

But even without the coat or hat, Mr. Green Jeans or Dancing Bear, Keeshan's twinkling eyes and slow, resonant voice identify him as the "Captain" immediately.

Keeshan was on campus Friday and Saturday as a featured speaker for "The Governor's Conference on Education for Parenthood."

See related story page 10

Although at one time he had aspired to become a lawyer, Keeshan began to develop the "Captain Kangaroo" program at a local ABC station in 1953, when he captured the attention of CBS.

"They were about to replace Jack Paar in the morning, or Jack was quitting again — that was a long time before the 'Tonight Show' and everything else. And so, they (CBS) decided to try a program for children," Keeshan said.

"They asked me to do a pilot, and I did one called 'Captain Kangaroo' that went on the air Oct. 3, 1955. And here you are," he said.

But things haven't always gone that smoothly for the Captain or his show. Changes over the years have resulted in the dropping of the weekday shows to the current 6 a.m. Saturday morning slot.

"When I first went on the air there were very few stations on the air at that hour of the morning. Most of them came on at 10 or 11 a.m. or even later in the day. So when I

Congresswoman Schroeder to deliver Landon Lecture

Congresswoman Pat Schroeder, D-Colo., will give a Landon Lecture at 10:30 a.m. today in McCain Auditorium.

Schroeder is the national co-chairman of Sen. Gary Hart's, D-Colo., bid for the Democratic Party nomination for president. She is the senior woman in Congress and the first woman to serve on the Armed Services House Committee. As Majority At-Large Whip and member of the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee, she has been active in setting policy for Democrats in Congress.

Schroeder is also founder and co-chair of the Congressional Caucus for Women's Issues, a bipartisan group of representatives devoted to advancing women's concerns in the Congress. Her recent legislative achievements include reintroducing the Equal Rights Amendment and aiding in extending the voting rights of the Act of 1965.

In her lecture, "Great Expectations, from Abigail Adams to Betty Friedan to the White House," Schroeder will address women's issues.

Her talk will be aired by Manhattan Cable TV channel 6 and KMAN-FM radio station. A delayed broadcast of the talk will be aired on the University's radio station, KSAC-AM.

Mondale shuts out Hart in Puerto Rico

By The Associated Press

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — Former Vice President Walter Mondale scored a runaway victory over Gary Hart in Puerto Rico's Democratic presidential primary Sunday, a contest that the Colorado senator expected to lose even before it began.

Mondale outpolled Hart by a margin of 99 percent to 1 percent.

Hart had charged that the primary wasn't "open" and chose not to contest it.

Mondale's victory adds to his wins — and Hart's shutout — in the caucuses in Michigan and Arkansas on Saturday. He won all 48 delegates in Sunday's primary, and the remaining five slots will go to party and commonwealth officials.

With 645 of 1,650 precincts reporting, Mondale had 56,891 votes to 383 for Hart. Sen. John Glenn, who withdrew Friday, had 129 votes.

"Turnout is a little bit better than expected," said Kenneth McClintok, spokesman for the Democratic Party in Puerto Rico. "We didn't expect too much because there was no competition. There was no incentive for the Mondale supporters to go out in big numbers."

Officials expected no more than 250,000 voters Sunday because of Hart's decision not to contest the primary.

Acknowledging Mondale's expected victory in the primary, about 2,500 supporters of Hart and Glenn met earlier Sunday to pick their own delegates, whom they will try to get seated at the convention.

At the meetings, Hart won 32 delegates and 1 was uncommitted, according to Jose Manuel Saldana, Hart's campaign manager here and president of Democrats United.

Michael Levy, head of delegate selection for Hart, said the primary was "exclusionary" and predicted there would be a "credential fight at the convention" to determine which delegates are seated.

He said the "entire primary was run" by the National Progressive Party, which backs Puerto Rican statehood. He said primary ads contained the symbols of statehood, a star and the number "51."

He said these symbols "clearly discouraged" participation of those who don't support statehood. "This clearly violates delegate selection rules, which called for encouraging participation for all Democrats," he said.

Forty-eight of Puerto Rico's 53 delegates to the Democratic National Convention were at stake in the primary. Candidates had to pick up at least 30 percent of the vote to qualify for any delegates.

Although Hart decided not to contest the primary and Glenn quit the race, both men were on the ballot. Hart posters remained up, and a van with loudspeakers cruised San Juan on Saturday urging support of Hart.

Hart's campaign claimed Puerto Rico's primary "isn't open." Local Democratic officials charged that Hart was trying to lessen possible damage from a defeat in Puerto Rico on the eve of Tuesday's important primary in Illinois, a state with a sizable Hispanic population.

Residency regulations create fee controversy

By KARLA PORTER
Staff Writer

Each semester the Admissions Office receives complaints from students who claim to be Kansas residents but are required by the University to pay non-resident fees.

Non-resident tuition is more than twice that for residents. This semester it is $1,340.50, compared to $550.50 for resident fees, so many students try to convince administrators with such documents as a driver's license or voter registration that they are Kansas residents.

Not many succeed. The catch is a clause in the Kansas Board of Regents' residency policy, passed by the state Legislature in 1975, which requires a year of residence in Kansas before a student can qualify for resident status at a state university. Exceptions are made for some university employees, military personnel and dependents.

Most states have similar requirements, Assistant Director of Admissions Cyndy Platt said, but because the requirement is not well known, many students feel unfairly treated when they are classified as non-residents.

Payez Al-Natour applied for admission to K-State last year after two years at Johnson County Community College, where he paid in-state tuition. He said he was surprised when K-State notified him he would have to pay non-resident fees.

Because Al-Natour had not lived in Kansas for a full year before entering school, he did not meet the Regents' residency standard.

Junior colleges and private colleges are not affected by the Regents policy, so many students may pay resident fees there, but not at K-State, Platt said.

Al-Natour came from Kuwait on a student visa two and a half years ago, but said he liked the country and became a U.S. citizen. He appealed his case to the University Residency Appeals Committee, but was dissatisfied with the hearing.

"They asked me questions which did not relate to my case," he said. "Why are you studying architectural engineering? Why did you choose Kansas? Why K-State?"

Those questions are designed to reveal a student's intent, Platt said.

"It's very hard to justify giving resident status to a person who is just here for an education," she said.

The committee ruled against Al-Natour, so he went to Student Attorney Dianne Urban.

"Many students come in and want in-state tuition," she said. "Unfortunately I haven't been too successful in helping them."

Urban said she has helped only a small percentage of the complainants because it is very difficult to get residency.

The law protects Kansas taxpayers, she said. Kansas income taxes pay about 80 percent of the cost of educating Kansas residents.

Junior wins humanities grant

Angela Griffin, junior in history, was chosen to receive an $1,800 grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

The award, under the "Younger Scholars Program," will permit Griffin to conduct independent research this summer.

Griffin's project, "The Concept of 'Reason of State' in French Political Theory during the 16th and 17th Centuries," will result in a paper that will make use of the writings of such prominent theorists as Claude de Seyssel, Jean Bodin, Cardinal Richelieu and Bishop Bossuet.

The "Younger Scholars Program" encourages talented undergraduate students to engage in serious research in the humanities during an uninterrupted period of study.

Professor to direct physics center

Alvin Compaan, professor of physics, has been named the director of the newly established K-State Center for Molecular and Solid State Energetics (MASSE). The center, approved by the Board of Regents in December 1982, promotes experimental and theoretical research on dynamical processes in the gaseous and condensed phases of matter.

As part of MASSE, a Laser Center is being developed through a grant of $101,700 from the National Science Foundation and the support of about $100,000 from K-State resources.

The Laser Center, a unique facility in the Midwest, emphasizes the use of high power-pulsed excimer and dye lasers in a wide range of research projects.

MASSE emphasizes interdisciplinary research currently involving faculty and students from the departments of chemistry, chemical engineering, physics and nuclear engineering.

Professors organize conference

Two K-State professors are part of an international trio chosen to organize a conference set for this summer in Bad Honnef, West Germany.

Liang Fan, professor and head of chemical engineering, and Roger Nassar, professor of statistics, will be among 11 lecturers for a summer school on modern applied mathematics in chemical engineering.

The program is part of the "1984 Holiday and Science on the Rhine," scheduled for July 31 through Aug. 1. The meetings are being sponsored by The Volkswagen Foundation.

The K-Staters are assisting a faculty member from Hannover University, West Germany, in planning the math/chemical engineering section of the meeting.

Fan, who was senior lecturer at the 1983 conference, will discuss applications of the "fuzzy set" theory, which is coming into use as the mathematical language of "artificial intelligence." Fan currently is involved in a research project in which he is applying the theory to grading and transportation of grain. It is the first time the theory has been used in research in chemical engineering.

Nassar, who participated in the 1982 and 1983 conferences, will be lecturing on the applications of "stochastic" theory to the modeling processes in chemical engineering.

Among Nassar's research interests are stochastic processes and modeling in the physical and natural sciences. His experience has involved research appointments in the U.S., France and Germany and numerous scientific talks held at meetings and at different universities in the United States and Europe.

Specialists from Germany, Australia, the University of Minnesota and Ohio State University will join the K-Staters as lecturers for their section of the meeting.

Elderhostel program scheduled

K-State's 1984 Elderhostel program has been scheduled for June 3-9.

The Elderhostel program consists of non-credit courses lasting one week and designed for older citizens. No homework or testing is required, but professors will make suggestions for additional study if asked.

Participants will live in a K-State residence hall and will eat in the cafeteria with other summer students.

The three classes being offered this summer are "Barefoot Through Time and Space," to be taught by Charles Walters, professor of geology; "A Survey of Books and Libraries," to be taught by Diane Slater, assistant professor of library; and "The Amazing Stupid Computer," to be taught by Jake Smaltz, professor of industrial engineering.

The program, including lodging and meals, costs $190. Residents of Manhattan and nearby communities may participate as "commuter" students for a fee of $90.

Noted radio correspondent to give Lou Douglas lecture

Bill Buzenberg, a 1968 K-State graduate and current Latin American correspondent for National Public Radio, will be the third speaker this semester for the "Lou Douglas Lectures on Public Affairs" series.

Buzenberg will speak about "U.S. Foreign Policy in Central America and Democracy at Home," at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in Forum Hall.

After graduating from K-State, Buzenberg served as a Peace Corp volunteer in Bolivia for two years and was a journalism fellow at the University of Michigan. He completed the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies Program in Bologna, Italy in 1978.

Buzenberg joined NPR in 1978 in Washington and can be heard on "All Things Considered" and "Morning Edition" on the University's radio station, KSDB-FM.

In 1982, Buzenberg received the Robert F. Kennedy Journalism Award for his NPR series on immigration and refugees.

Following his lecture, Alpha Epsilon Rho, the broadcast honorary society at K-State, will have a reception for Buzenberg in the Kedzie 105.

Cultural programs, exhibits highlight International Week

American and foreign students alike will be offered numerous activities March 19-24 as part of International Week. The activities are being sponsored by the International Coordinating Council, which represents 15 international campus groups.

Events scheduled for the week include a Chinese noodle-making demonstration, Arab folk dances and an International Film Festival.

"We try to bring more awareness of different cultures to K-State," said Ardo Mnassaghianians, senior in construction science and president of ICC.

This is accomplished by exhibiting handicrafts and literature and by using audio and visual aids to expose international cultures, he said.

The film festival will feature films from Canada, France, Russia, Britain and America.

"The films are open to any student at no charge," Leslie Allen, senior in journalism and mass communications, said. "Schedules for the films will be posted throughout campus."

"Our purpose of International Week is to encourage non-foreign as well as foreign students to participate," Mnassaghianians said.

international Week is not a money-making project, Allen said.

"It is to communicate with American students."

Lafene encourages appointment system

If more students were aware of Lafene Student Health Center's appointment system there would be less confusion and less wasted time, Dr. Robert Tout, director of student health, said.

"Most students visiting Lafene are aware of the acute care system which enables students to drop in to see a doctor at any time," Tout said.

With 62,000 visits per year, Lafene is trying to make the appointment system more convenient for students, he said.

Before the appointment system was established two years ago, each student had to check in at one window to pick up his charts and then the nurses would distribute the charts among the 10 doctors available, he said.

Using the appointment system, a student calls Lafene and sets up an appointment with a doctor of his choice.

"Lafene went to an appointment system because it gives students the opportunity to make an appointment and therefore they wouldn't have to wait an hour or more to see a particular physician," Tout said.

The appointment system also allows students to make follow-up appointments with the same doctor after being prescribed medication or receiving a diagnosis.

Tout said a common complaint among students is that every time they come to Lafene they see a different doctor and never get a chance to establish medical history with the same doctor, as is possible with a family physician.

With an appointment system, a student should never have to wait more than 15 minutes, Tout said. An appointment to see a physician of the student's choice can be made six weeks in advance.

The appointment system is not only beneficial to students, but allows the physicians to perform other duties during the hours they are consulting with acute care patients.

"It gives them (physicians) the opportunity to be involved in other avenues of medical education such as stress management or wellness clinics," Tout said.

He said students are not using the appointment system the way it was designed to be used.

"I want to see acute care used more for emergencies or those illnesses a student feels he can't wait to make an appointment for," Tout said. "There will always be cases of the student with an hour to kill between classes who decides to drop in for medication."

Besides creating the appointment system to make things run smoother, Lafene has separated the medical charts for allergy, mental health, physical therapy and LaFemme Clinic patients so students can go directly to those offices without checking with the front desk.

"This will cut down on the congestion in the waiting area," Tout said.

Acid rain hazards spur faculty studies

By SUZANNE LARKIN
Staff Writer

In the past, there has been little study of acid rain in the Midwest, said Frank Gilliam, a research associate from Duke University who is currently at K-State studying acid rain.

"Acid rain has not been thoroughly studied in the Midwest, but in the East and in California it has been. That is why it is so important to get going now in the Midwest," he said.

Gilliam and a group of K-State faculty are conducting research on the potential hazards of acid rain. The research is being done at Konza Prairie Natural Research Area, 8,618 acres of tall-grass prairie in the Kansas Flint Hills.

Acid rain results when sulfur and nitrogen oxides react with water vapor in the atmosphere and form acid. These pollutants are produced primarily by burning fossil fuels, said Robert Robel, professor of biology.

"Acid rain contains oxides of sulfur and nitrogen which are emitted by natural and man-made sources. The major source of the man-made emission comes from automobiles and power plants," Robel said.

The sulfuric acid in the atmosphere returns to earth in the form of rain, snow or particles. Rain is normally slightly acid, but acid rain has a lower pH level, said Richard Marzolf, professor of biology.

"The pH (measure of a solution's acidity or alkalinity) is a measure of the hydrogen ion concentration in water. As a drop of pure water falls through the atmosphere, it absorbs carbon dioxide and becomes acidic," he said. "If rain weren't acidic normally, its (pH level) would be startling."

Normal rainfall has a pH of around 5.6. On a scale of 0 to 14, pure water has a pH of 7. The lower the pH, the more acidic the solution. Lemon juice has a pH between 2 and 3. At the opposite end of the scale, ammonia and lye have pH levels in the 12 to 13 range.

The pH scale is logarithmic, so each number differs by a factor of 10. A pH of 6 is 10 times more acidic than pure water, and a pH of 3 is 10,000 times more acidic. The average pH recorded at K-State is 4.8.

Pollution produced in one area can cause acid rain in another, Gilliam said.

"Emissions from automobiles and power plants are put into the atmosphere and are carried along by wind currents. As these currents move eastward, more pollutants are picked up. The entire process is slow, and the acidity increases as it moves eastward," Robel explained.

According to a legislative study, the Eastern United States routinely has rainfall with a pH of 4 to 5, and often falling between 3 and 4. An all-time low pH of 1.5 was recorded in Wheeling, W. Va.

Acid rain problems in Eastern states, caused by pollution produced in the West, are compounded by local use of fuel oil for heating.

"The use of fuel oil in the New England states is about 80 percent," Robel said. "This, in turn, emits sulfur oxides which add to the acid rain problem."

Kansans have seen few results of acid rain, Marzolf said.

"Acid rain has some effect on the limestone buildings on campus, but there are places where it makes a bigger difference," he said. "Places like Athens, Greece."

"We have two things going for us in Kansas, the first being that the movement of population and human activity in Kansas is upward, free of heavy industry. Secondly, we have huge amounts of calcium carbonate (limestone) bedrock which buffers the acid," he said.

Automobiles are the major cause of acid rain, but a great deal of controversy surrounds coal-burning power plants, Robel said.

"There are two major alternatives you have to consider when you deal with acid rain. Do you stop emissions from power plants or do you do it more effectively by cutting down the emissions that allow the conversion of sulfur oxides to sulfuric acid? It's a real debate," he said.

There was little acid rain before automobile use became widespread, Robel said.

Before the automobile came out, there was no significant acid rain accumulation. This was true even during the Industrial Revolution when there were many coal-burning plants," he said.

The solution to the acid rain problem is in technology, Gilliam said.

"Acid rain involves more than just problems with the emission of dangerous chemicals, it involves politics and unhappy people. It's an emotional issue as well as a scientific issue; there are no easy answers. The solution rests in technology and its advancements in the future," he said.

One form of technology which can reduce harmful emissions is the scrubber concept which is currently being used by large coal plants, said Marzolf.

"Scrubbers are a technology for removing oxides of sulfur that result from burning coal. And when they work, they are very effective," he said.

Long-term acid rain effects will only get worse unless more study is done, Robel said.

Marzolf and Gilliam are also involved with the National Atmospheric Deposition Program which is a network of participation collection sites around the country that collects weekly rainfall. K-State has been involved since 1982.

"Every week, about 100 different collection sites measure their sample for pH levels, box them up and send them to the University of Illinois for analysis. Every two weeks or so we get the results and record the data," Marzolf said.

Storm whips across state; causes power failure in city

From Staff and Wire Reports

What forecasters hailed as one of the worst storms of the season moved through the city Sunday, packing heavy rain, wind and ice.

The wind combined with the ice to snap power lines, to create massive power outages and to send firefighters to several reported tree and electric transformer fires. Outages were expected to continue during the night.

At the Riley County Police Department, where an emergency generator provided power, officers said as many as eight calls a minute — most having to do with power problems — flooded the station prior to 8 p.m.

Thunderstorms and freezing rain spread over southeast Kansas as the powerful winter storm that could bring up to 10 inches of snow to the state approached from the west.

A winter storm warning was posted for northwest and north-central Kansas for Sunday afternoon and night as between 5 and 10 inches of snow was expected by Monday.

A winter storm watch was in effect for southwest and northeast Kansas for Sunday night and for the northeast on Monday. The National Weather Service said between 5 and 8 inches of snow could fall in those areas.

Winds gusting to 30 mph could whip the snow into near-blizzard conditions at times, the weather service said.

A huge area of precipitation covered much of Kansas by mid-morning Sunday. Heavy thunderstorms were widely scattered across south-central Kansas, some producing very heavy rain and ½-inch hail.

Panelists to discuss impact of media in Latin America

A panel discussion on the media in Latin America will be at 7:30 tonight in Kedzie 106.

Featured panelists will be Bill Buzenberg, reporter for National Public Radio in Latin America; Gloria Freeland, instructor of journalism and mass communications, director of advertising for Student Publications, Inc., and former reporter and editor in San Jose, Costa Rica; Jason Petosa, publisher of the National Catholic Reporter; and Edward Seaton, Manhattan Mercury publisher and member of the Inter-American Press Association.

The discussion, which will focus on communications in Latin America instead of U.S. policy, is open to the public. It is sponsored by the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications and the Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi.

Wolf Creek's review poor

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — The Nuclear Regulatory Commission gave Kansas Gas and Electric Co. poor ratings in an annual review of construction at the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant, but the review does not mean the plant is unsafe.

The NRC review found 16 violations of standard procedures at Wolf Creek, mostly in plant safety and piping systems, according to Clyde Wisner, an NRC spokesman.

The annual review, known as the Systematic Assessment of Licensee Performance, is designed to "tell you which areas you're weak in and where we need more surveillance," Wisner told the Wichita Eagle-Beacon in a story published Sunday.

"Even the lowest rating shows that the performance is adequate, but there are weaknesses," Wisner said. "It's more a management tool that shows them what needs to be done."

Continued poor grades on the review could jeopardize KG&E's chances of obtaining an operating license for the plant, according to Wisner.

The NRC will perform one more annual review, for the year 1984, before it makes a decision on whether to grant an operating license for the plant.

The latest review, which covered a period from mid-1982 to mid-1983, "certainly wasn't as good" as the previous review, said Lyle Koerper, spokesman for KG&E.

"We know there have been some problems," Koerper said. "The next one — for 1984 — that's going to be the critical one."

A team of 35 NRC inspectors completed its investigation last summer and gave the results to KG&E in November. The regional administrator of the NRC, John Collins, told KG&E that "significant improvement" was needed on safety and piping systems and in testing of plant components.

KG&E had already taken steps to improve many areas, and was confident the actions would give positive results on the 1984 review, said utility vice president Kent L. Brown in a letter to Collins.

"We think appropriate steps have been taken so we're back on track," Koerper said. "If we didn't take steps, we'd be in trouble. But we feel comfortable that we've taken those steps."

Please reconsider, governor

Gov. John Carlin
Statehouse
Topeka, Kan. 66612

Dear Gov. Carlin:

I read, with somewhat of a heavy heart, your decision to sign into law a bill which eliminates the car inspection system. I hope you will reconsider your action.

Kansas did have a very unusual vehicle inspection law. Automobiles and light trucks were required to be inspected when sold or brought into the state by new Kansas residents.

I also understand there was some concern about cost. Vehicle inspections cost $5. Inspection stations, in the hands of private firms such as auto dealers, gas stations and garages (repair facilities), weren't regulated on a regular basis. There was some concern that these inspection stations were spending more on labor for doing the inspections than $5, and some stations were just filling out the paper work instead of conducting the inspection.

Because of the above reasons, the Legislature decided to do away with the inspection program. You, as governor, had the opportunity to veto this bill. You didn't. I would like to know why.

Let's examine a major reason why the vehicle inspection law is needed: used cars. Without making clichés, I think we both know there is a need to have used cars inspected — including those sold privately, from one owner to another. There are countless thousands of used automobiles on the highway today. I wouldn't buy a used car without having it inspected. The state should provide some sort of safety guidelines for automobiles which travel the state's highways. Without these guidelines, provided by the inspections, there will be unsafe vehicles sold and driven on the state's roads.

You do travel the state's highways, don't you, governor? I thought so. Therefore, you do have something at stake. So do the rest of us, whether we are drivers, passengers or pedestrians.

OK, so the cost of inspecting an automobile actually costs more than $5. Why not increase the fee to $10? This figure isn't an outrageous amount of money, yet could keep the inspections affordable to the general public. What's money compared to safety?

With the increase in charges for the inspections, the state could have the Kansas Highway Patrol make periodic checks at the inspection stations. The patrol is supposed to enforce the state's highway laws; it can surely enforce the inspection law, which affects the vehicles which travel the state's highways.

Kind of like letting the Highway Patrol look out after its own bread and butter, eh, governor?

Governor, I'm going to go one step more. I'm going to request you support having all vehicles inspected each year as a requirement for obtaining a new tag (or sticker, as the case may be).

Let me explain my proposal. I think cars aren't inspected enough. There are probably too many unsafe cars — both new and used — which need to be repaired. A yearly inspection could detect problems before they become serious.

Governor, I want to be able to drive the streets and highways of my state and know I won't have to worry about whether that old car coming toward me is going to fall apart. I also want to know that car has been inspected sometime during the past year and pronounced fit to travel the state's roads.

Is this an unreasonable request? I think not. We regulate how much alcohol is permissible in a driver's bloodstream. We issue drivers' licenses to regulate driving requirements. We regulate the wear allowable on tires, the amount of lead in gasoline and the amount of pollution we will allow to come from our new cars. Why not make sure the cars are safe before issuing a new tag each year?

Governor, the inspection-before-tag system is in force in Missouri. It seems to work. While I don't advocate doing everything the "Show Me" state does, I think Kansas could use a similar system.

I'm asking you to support my proposal. While I know that legislation must come from the Legislature, I think you can help bend a few ears to listen to this proposal.

Governor, you have campaigned for many things which have improved the state's economy and well-being of its citizens. The severance tax has brought in a previously untapped source of revenue for our state. You have campaigned for higher salaries for teachers in the state's public schools and institutions of higher learning. I'm asking you to help improve the quality of life for everyone in Kansas.

Please bring vehicle inspections back.

Sincerely,
Brian La Rue

I guess my reasons are selfish, governor. I want to be able to drive the streets and highways of my state and know I won't have to worry about whether that old car coming toward me is going to fall apart. I also want to know that car has been inspected sometime during the past year and pronounced fit to travel the state's roads.

Tubbs fails to fulfill coaching responsibility

Editor,

Re: Huey Counts' column, "Tubbs adds spark," in the March 7 Collegian.

You have got to be kidding. How can anyone, especially a responsible journalist, condone the acts of Tubbs and his team when the main purpose of athletics is not only to win, but to build character?

A good coach knows that he or she has two major responsibilities. One is to the school to produce a winning program. The other is to impress upon players the values of discipline, sportsmanship and excellence both on and off the court. It is said that the success of Tubbs in one aspect of coaching is overshadowed by his dismal failure in the other.

Each player has his or her own personality, and that personality cannot be locked in the locker room until after the game. However, the team as a whole should reflect the personality of the coach. Unfortunately, the Sooners ball club does this perfectly. A Hartman-coached team would never be seen fighting with a crowd or making questionable gestures, no matter how good his team was. The reason is because Hartman knows the difference between "celebrating" and "taunting," which Tubbs obviously does not. If Tubbs would lick that index finger he is always holding up and flip through a dictionary, maybe then he could explain the difference to himself and his team.

A good coach — one who weighs these two responsibilities evenly — knows that he or she can make winners out of kids even though they have a losing record. It is too bad that Tubbs only measures his winners by how many victories they can add to his win column. If this is the type of coach and team you want to represent your University, Counts, then I suggest you move to Oklahoma. Maybe Tubbs will let you be waterboy, and then you can wave your finger and fight with the crowds alongside Tubbs and the rest of society's finest.

More than economic reasons for seal hunt

Editor,

Re: Kris Barnard's letter, "Seal hunt involves more than economics," in the Feb. 29 Collegian, and Dan Mulhern's letter, "Economics real issue behind seal killings," in the Feb. 23 Collegian.

Barnard said, "Yes, bashing in their skulls in one swift swing is usually a quick death, but what are the reasons behind it?" There are many reasons for those seal hunts, both economical and biological.

The seals in question are limited to one small island. The whelping of seal pups increases the population of that island drastically each year. Without these controlled hunts, the entire population would be threatened, not just the young.

If this hunt were to be banned, there would most likely be an exponential increase in the number of animals suffering from disease and parasites. Those baby seals would probably die from any one of a handful of diseases, if they didn't starve to death first.

As far as economics are concerned, this aspect goes farther than Dan Mulhern stated.

Most people who oppose the killing of animals for their pelts stand behind the fact that modern technology has created synthetic fur as a replacement for the natural product. What these protectionists fail to mention is that fake fur is made from petroleum, and petroleum is a non-renewable resource.

Seals are renewable. Natural fur is a better insulator, longer wearing and an all-around better material to make clothing from when compared to fake fur.

These hunts and "slaughters" are very closely watched by professional biologists who specialize in wildlife, including seals. They understand the importance of maintaining a stable and healthy population. They understand the methods used by man in killing these animals are quite humane when compared to the methods incorporated by Mother Nature. They know and understand that a few of those seals are going to have to die each year in order for the remainder of the population to survive.

"We teach a great deal of Americanism here."

St. John's Military Academy

Students at St. John's Military Academy are taught "Americanism" as well as self-discipline in the classroom.

A young cadet finds a friend in the opportunity room where students may enjoy free time with pets, computers, arts and crafts.

It is one of the last of its species. Before the Vietnam War more than 250 of its kind existed in the United States. Currently, fewer than 50 remain.

However, as one views the midday formation at St. John's Military School in Salina, it is obvious the military school tradition is one that is very much alive for the 165 students at this school.

Faded blue jeans and well-worn tennis shoes aren't part of this school. Instead, each boy is dressed in a pressed military uniform. The shine from the boys' boots and the buttons on their uniforms reflect the rays from the midday sun.

Nine-year-old boys march next to 17-year-olds, and they walk with stiff dignity unknown to most boys their age.

Nevertheless, the school's administration strives to make life at St. John's as "normal" as possible.

"We don't train them to be robots who are always thinking kill, kill, kill. Self-discipline is what we're teaching here... We're here as a school with a military atmosphere. We teach respect for the flag and what it stands for: home, country, apple pie, America," Col. Kenneth Faerber, academic dean of St. John's Military School, said.

Col. Keith J. Duckers, president of St. John's, said he believes the economy is responsible for the decline in enrollment. The school's capacity is 200.

"It costs approximately $10,000 to send a boy to St. John's Military School for one academic school year. The school year at St. John's coincides with the school year in public schools, August through May," Duckers said.

"The boys can benefit from attending St. John's. Each boy is here for some unique reason. A lot of kids here are from broken homes and some have parents overseas who want to send their kids to private schools. Military schools are stereotyped as the 'rich man's reform school.' This isn't the case at all," Duckers said.

Daily life for the students at St. John's is structured. Cadets are up at 6 a.m. They must make their beds and ready their rooms for personal inspection. Their first class begins at 7:55 a.m. The cadets have class until their midday formation. They have exactly 20 minutes to eat lunch. Afternoon classes resume promptly at 1 p.m.

Classes continue until the 4 p.m. formation. The cadets may participate in sports until 5:45 p.m. They eat again at 6 p.m. and finish by 6:30. Each day from 7-8 p.m., the school's three military companies, Alpha, Beta and Charlie, meet. Study hall begins at 8:30 p.m. and lasts one hour. Lights are out at 10:15.

Nancy Swisher, counselor at St. John's Military School, said she doesn't believe the structured life of a cadet is detrimental to the students, although most students do have an adjustment problem at first.

"We sometimes help the boys with problems in the initial adjustment. The biggest problem is living in close quarters with so many other boys. But I don't see it as a source of stress. Not everyone can operate in an open situation. Most of the boys seem quite comfortable with the regulations and structure," she said.

The cadets are allowed to leave the campus one night a week. Saturday passes are given to all cadets in high school. Curfew is at 10:30 p.m.

John Little, freshman in pre-design professions at K-State and 1982 graduate of St. John's, said he was glad he attended the academy.

"Going there gave me a lot of self-motivation and discipline. It helps me now to fight temptations," he said.

Little said the cadets are easily distinguishable from other teen-agers their age when they go into town.

"It would be like living at Fort Riley and coming to Manhattan to party. We weren't really accepted," he said.

"But once a week, if you weren't restricted, you could go into town for a movie and get something to eat. It was something to do just to get off the base," he added.

Swisher said she didn't know of any way the boys could shake their roles as cadets for a short while.

"It's a program that is seven days a week, 24 hours a day. They don't escape from it after classes; in fact that's when it just begins," she said.

She added, however, the constant identity with the military wasn't harmful to the cadets.

"It gives the boy a group to identify with, a sense of belonging. Sometimes that can be beneficial," Swisher said.

There is no corporal punishment at St. John's. Instead, privileges are given and taken away. For example, restrictions may be placed on a cadet's weekend pass if he violates some of the school's regulations.

"We run a good school, and we're old-fashioned. We teach a great deal of Americanism here," Duckers said.

Daily life for cadets ranging in age from nine to 17, includes marching with a discipline unknown to most boys their age.

Cadets must dress in military uniforms while attending the school.

Horse sense turns bet into fortune

ARCADIA, Calif. — In all her 78 years, "a little bingo" was the most gambling Alberta Gearin ever did, but after winning $313,929.60 on a $2 bet she just may go whole hog for the horses.

Gearin, a widow who lives in Sweet Home, Ore., went to the races at Santa Anita, plunked down her two bucks on the "Pick Six" bet and walked away with the largest payoff ever at the track. The Pick Six requires selecting the winning horse in six different races.

"I just picked at random — a horse kind of looked good or a number kind of looked good," she explained. "Except for the seventh race, where I bet on Willie Shoemaker because I'd heard of him."

"By the last race, my whole section of the stands was rooting great for me — or else running off to bet on my horse," said Gearin.

River adds color to St. Pat's Day

SPRAGUE, Conn. — Signs along the Little River said: "Sprague celebrates St. Patrick's Day. Look at the river!! Green!!"

But the state Department of Environmental Protection played it safe, trying to make sure it wasn't pranksters who changed the color of the eastern Connecticut waterway Saturday in honor of St. Patrick.

Inspectors found "something unusual" in the water, said Don Burton, chief emergency field inspector for the department, adding that he did not know the origin of the green-colored water.

Burton said he found out later that the water pollution people in the department were working with a local company on a discharge problem.

There were a variety of opinions about the river's color: First Selectman Matthew Delaney, who said he inspected the river, said: "That's the normal color of water on a cloudy day. It doesn't look any different than it normally does."

Resident Bob McDonald said he thought the color was caused by an industrial discharge: "It looked like a green milkshake. This is not the first time it's happened, but it's brighter than I've ever seen it before."

Promoters win concert settlement

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Two promoters will share $5,065 for profits they lost when city officials, fearing that people would get hurt or killed, canceled a 1979 concert by the rock group The Who.

Mayor Vincent A. Cianci Jr. canceled the show at the Providence Civic Center a day after 11 people were trampled to death in a rush for seats before a Dec. 3, 1979, Who concert in Cincinnati.

Judge Ronald R. Lagueux ruled Friday there was no legal justification for the Civic Center Authority's decision to cancel the show. That left the issue of damages for a jury to decide.

Weather

All Dorothy had to do to get home was tap her heels three times and say, "There's no place like home, there's no place like home." With today's forecast, students might want to tap their heels three times and say "There's no place like Padre, there's no place like Padre."

Freezing rain changing to snow, possibly heavy at times is predicted for today. Accumulations up to 6 inches possible. Winds northerly to northeasterly 15 to 30 mph, causing blowing and drifting snow. High mid-30s. A chance of snow tonight, low around 30. Mostly cloudy Tuesday, high in 40s.

Activity climbs as world's fair evolves

By The Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — With the gates set to open May 12, the New Orleans World's Fair is in what one executive calls the "duck mode" — smooth and unruffled on the surface, paddling like crazy underneath.

Big buttons worn by fair employees say: "Don't Panic."

Out there in the mud, in what used to be a warehouse district beside the Mississippi River in the middle of town, the site of the fair still looks like a war zone.

But the shape of this $350 million exposition is beginning to show.

For two months, a cash flow pinch gripped the fair. Now Petr Spurney, the fast-talking president of the Louisiana World Exposition Inc., says a fresh infusion of $10 million from the city and the Dock Board means the fair's money worries are over.

With foundation work complete, or nearly so, exhibitors and concessionaires were moving in as fast as construction traffic would allow.

"An event like this is sort of like a giant stage set," said Jim Brandt, vice president of planning. "I would guess 5,000 people are working on the project now on a full-time basis...

"All that stuff snaps into place in the last three or four weeks, including the landscaping, the paving, the filling of the watercourses, the lagoons and the lighting," he said.

"On opening day, be careful where you sit because the paint might still be wet. But we will open as advertised, completely ready."

Brandt said 78,000 season passes for the six-month fair had been sold in advance, and $7 million worth of one-day tickets were bought by tour and travel agencies. Between 11 million and 15 million visitors are expected.

A monorail train system, designed to move 3,500 people an hour, has made test runs loaded with engineers and sand bags instead of tourists.

The theme of the 82-acre fair will be "The World of Rivers; Fresh Water as a Source of Life." It sounds pretty dull but it has been gussied up with such attractions as a 1939-style aquacade in the old Billy Rose style featuring the cleanest beauties in town. They will thrash around in a water ballet, six shows a day, seven days a week.

In addition to lagoons and bayous, there will be weird fountains, a real offshore oil drilling rig, an undersea aquarium filled with former denizens of the Gulf of Mexico, riverboats and a "kid wash" where you send the children through the water spray, clothes and all, and they come out the other end blown dry.

Countries to be represented by exhibits include Australia, Canada, Egypt, El Salvador, France, Israel, Italy, Japan, Liberia, Mexico, China, Korea, the Vatican, Peru, Belgium, Denmark, West Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States.

President Reagan is scheduled to fly in for opening day ceremonies.

The biggest national publicity splash came when a newspaper ran a picture of the two voluptuous papier-mache mermaids, with breasts four feet wide, who will loom over the fair's city gate, along with sea gods, alligators and other sea creatures.

The fair has resisted demands to cover up.

Though Spurney believes practically any publicity is better than none, he would rather head off reports on the fair tax.

It totals 14 per cent — made up of an 8 percent state and city sales tax, the city's 50-year-old 5 percent amusement tax, and a special 1 percent tax imposed to help repay a city loan to the fair.

Spurney, and those who hold concessions, argue that reporters sent to write about the fair will seize upon the 14 percent tax to cry "ripoff."

The City Council has before it a proposal to exempt the fair from the amusement tax. Since the move cannot require the 5 percent to be taken off prices, it would leave concessionaires free to add that to their profits. Exemption would cost the city welfare programs about $6 million.

Spurney is hard put to name any world's fair that has broken even. He scoffs at a report that the 1982 World's Fair in Knoxville, Tenn., will break even and says the true picture of Knoxville's loss isn't yet known.

Yet, there is no shortage of world's fairs: After Louisiana comes Tsukuba, Japan, in 1985; Vancouver, Canada, in 1986; Queensland, Australia, in 1988; Paris in 1989; and Chicago in 1992.

Tipster's warnings fail to stop suspect's death

By The Associated Press

BATON ROUGE, La. — An unidentified man called authorities and tried to warn them that someone might try to harm a kidnapping suspect, minutes before the suspect was shot by the father of an alleged kidnap victim, according to a sheriff's deputy.

And the same caller was apparently on the phone moments later with Gary Plauche, 39, when Plauche turned and fired the shot that killed Jeffery Doucet, 25, the alleged ab-ductor of Plauche's son, in front of TV cameras on Friday, sheriff's Sgt. Ricky Murphy said.

After Doucet died Saturday, sheriff's deputies charged Plauche's booking from attempted second-degree murder to second-degree murder.

Plauche will try to post a property bond today so he can be released, his lawyer, Foster Sanders III, said.

Officials and witnesses said Plauche, after he shot Doucet, said: "If it were your son, you would have done the same thing."

The unidentified tipster called the sheriff's office about 10 minutes before Doucet stepped off a plane at the Baton Rouge airport, said Murphy, who talked to the man. Doucet was shot while being escorted past the airport's metal detector.

Murphy said the caller said a "friend had called him and said he was going to try to hurt a prisoner they were supposed to be bringing in." Doucet was extradited from Los Angeles on a kidnapping charge.

After calling the sheriff's office, the caller apparently got on the phone with Plauche, who was standing at a pay phone when the shooting occurred. The man was talking with Plauche at the time of the shooting, said Murphy.

Doucet, a martial arts instructor, was accused of kidnapping Jody Plauche, one of his students, on Feb. 19, authorities said. They were found in Anaheim, Calif., a week later when a phone call was traced to a motel room where they were staying. FBI agents burst into the room while Doucet was talking by phone to June Plauche, Jody's mother.

K-State beats MU for Big Eight tourney title

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

It was a rematch of a game that just one week earlier pitted the nation's No. 12- and No. 10-ranked squads.

The rankings were different this time around, but the results were the same, as the seventh-rated K-State Lady 'Cats won the Big Eight Tournament with a 84-75 win over the 10th-ranked University of Missouri Lady Tigers, March 10 at Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo.

The Lady 'Cats played much the same in grabbing the title from Missouri as they did in K-State's earlier 100-84 win over the Lady Tigers on March 3 in Ahearn Field House. That victory over the Lady Tigers gave K-State a tie with MU for the Big Eight Conference regular season championship and avenged an earlier 66-62 defeat by the Lady Tigers on Feb. 8.

This time around, the game's opening half belonged to Missouri, who reversed an 11-8 K-State lead, scoring 10 straight points to take an 18-11 advantage. The Lady Tigers led by as many as nine points in the first half behind the hot-handed shooting of junior Joni Davis, who canned 18 points in the game's first 14 minutes of play.

It was K-State's Angie Bonner who later got the Lady 'Cats untracked in the first half, scoring eight of K-State's last 20 points to help keep the team within range of the Lady Tigers. A 20-foot jumper by K-State's Cindy Durham off the fast break cut the Missouri lead to 37-35 at halftime.

"When Angie went back in she really got more powerful," K-State Coach Lynn Hickey said of the six-foot-one junior, who hit 12 first-half points despite sitting out almost four minutes with two fouls. "The kids have been really dependent on her as well as Tina (Dixon) and she came back on the floor ready to play."

K-State suffered from a case of first-half mistakes, turning the ball over 16 times compared to nine for Missouri. The Lady 'Cats hit 14 of 28 field goals and seven of 10 free throws, while the Lady Tigers connected on 15 of 32 field goals and seven of nine attempts at the charity stripe.

"I thought the middle was open, but we weren't reversing the ball," said Hickey of the Lady 'Cats' .500 percent showing from the field. "We did a much better job of that in the second half."

A much-better job, indeed, as K-State connected on 19 of 29 second-half field goals for 65.5 percent. Missouri hit only 14 of 36 shots for 39 percent.

A lay-in by Dixon off an assist by freshman Carlisa Thomas tied the score at 37 at the 19-minute mark. Thomas then fed three assists inside as K-State took the lead for good at 45-43.

Credit also went to the K-State man-to-man pressure, with the Lady 'Cats' successful second-half efforts holding Davis to only two points in the first six minutes of the second half.

"We had a freshman (Thomas) on her (Davis)," Hickey said. "We convinced Carlisa to not let her get the ball in the first place. We did a better job of not letting her get set."

"I'd have to credit the full-court pressure. I think the pressure was a big factor," Hickey said.

The K-State defense also held MU guard Dee-Dee Polk, who scored 27 in the Lady Tigers 94-69 semifinal win over Oklahoma State University, to 12 points on a six-of-13 field goal performance. Polk sat out the last three minutes of the first half and the opening moments of the second half with three fouls.

"With Dee-Dee out of the game it caused problems for them," Hickey said. "They don't have a lot of really quick ball handlers. We were able to utilize our speed."

Missouri Coach Joann Rutherford agreed.

"Dee-Dee had three fouls and we lost our intensity," Rutherford said. "We had our momentum going then they pressed and took advantage of our turnovers."

And it was those Lady Tiger turnovers — 15 in the second half of play — that allowed K-State to open up a 58-49 lead with 10:40 remaining. Thomas drove the MU zone for an uncontested layup to give K-State its nine-point advantage.

Dixon next hit three consecutive layups off two Thomas assists in helping the Lady 'Cats take their largest lead of the contest, 72-57. MU lost the ball-handling services of Polk, who with four fouls left the contest for good with 2:29 remaining.

Missouri's full-court pressure and a 14-5 scoring burst brought the Lady Tigers as close as five points with 17 seconds remaining, but Dixon broke the MU press for two straight layups as K-State grabbed the 84-75 win.

"We had a 15-point lead and got a little too excited," Hickey said of MU's comeback try. "We got into trouble in the last two minutes."

Dixon led K-State's offensive charge, scoring 23 points and grabbing 11 rebounds. Jennifer Jones added 22 points, while Bonner contributed 17 points and eight rebounds. Sophomore Cassandra Jones rounded out the double-figure scoring with 11.

Bonner and Dixon joined MU's Davis and Polk on the All-Tournament team, along with Kathy

Tina Dixon is hugged by teammate Jennifer Jones following the Lady 'Cats' 78-73 victory over the University of Missouri Tigers to claim the Big Eight Schulz of Oklahoma State. Davis, who ended the title contest with 30 points, was named the tournament's most valuable player for the second consecutive year. MU defeated K-State 75-65 in last season's tourney final.

One upsetting aspect of the tournament — especially to Hickey — was the absence of Cassandra Jones on the All-Tournament team.

"I'm pleased with the All-Tournament team since two K-State girls were on it, but I'm very disappointed for Cassandra," Hickey said. "She was the guts of this tournament. In my heart, she's an all-American."

And it was Cassandra Jones who almost single-handedly pulled out a tense 69-67 victory over the University of Oklahoma in semifinal action March 9. Despite missing an entire half in K-State's first tournament contest against Iowa State University, Jones ended the tourney with 34 points, 14 steals and 16 assists.

Jones grabbed a key steal with OU leading 59-58 and hit a driving layup to give K-State a 60-58 lead. She stole the ball once again to set up two free throws by freshman Susan Green and fed two assists underneath to Green and Bonner, as K-State moved out to a 66-61 lead with 2:34 remaining. Jones next completed a three-point play off an assist from Green to close out K-State's 69-point scoring.

"We got an excellent game out of Cassandra," Hickey said. "She was a little upset when she didn't make all-Big Eight and she wanted to prove to people here that she's the best guard in the Big Eight. When I can get her mad and fired up, the things she can do are tremendous. She definitely turned the tide in the game."

Six points by OU's Lynn McCurdy closed the gap to 69-67 with 23 seconds remaining before the Sooners called time out with 15 seconds left. An OU outside jumper missed and the followup did also as K-State hung on for the win.

"It's a play we've run a thousand times in practice," OU Coach Maura

McHugh said. "We had a downscreen to McCurdy and she was open, but we didn't get the pass off to her in time."

And it was no surprise to Hickey that the game's last play would be designed for McCurdy. The five-foot-11 senior finished the contest with 22 points.

"We knew they wanted to go to McCurdy," Hickey said. "We told them to put pressure on the ball and we told Cindy (K-State forward Cindy Durham who was guarding McCurdy) to keep her feet on the floor, her hands up and not to foul. It was close."

And the game's early moments were close also, as four quick points by Dixon gave K-State the early advantage until a 10-foot baseline jumper by McCurdy gave the Sooners a momentary 11-10 lead.

An inside bucket by Jennifer Jones lifted the 'Cats to a 17-13 lead, but the Sooners outscored K-State 10-0 in the next four minutes of play to move out to a 23-17 lead. The Lady 'Cats hit only four points in a six-minute span as OU increased its lead to 30-21.

Dixon canned three straight baskets — an eight-footer from the right baseline and five- and eight-footers from the lane — to help K-State close with 38-32 at halftime. Dixon ended the first 20 minutes of play with 10 points.

"They forced our concentration to be poor and we missed too many shots that normally would have fallen for us," Hickey said of the Lady 'Cats shooting performance that netted 13 of 26 field goals in the first half. "We haven't been behind very many times and that was a new experience. It was like we were in a daze."

OU continued its domination in the early moments of the second half, netting the first four points for a 42-32 lead.

Bonner then went to work for the Lady 'Cats, scoring 10 of K-State's next 14 points as the team took a short-lived 48-47 lead. OU took the lead once again at 59-58 before setting the stage for Cassandra Jones' heroics.

Jayhawks end Wildcats' season

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

University of Kansas guard Ron Kellogg is known more as a player who can give the Jayhawks a scoring lift coming off the bench than as a defensive specialist. But with K-State's junior guard Tom Alfaro keying a second half 'Cat comeback with his outside bombs, it was the 6-foot-5 KU sophomore who drew the assignment of trying to stop Alfaro.

Kellogg did the job, holding Alfaro scoreless in the 'Hawks box-and-one defense over the last six½ minutes of the game. As a result, the 'Hawks were able to cruise to a 70-59 victory over the 'Cats in the semifinals of the Big Eight Tournament on March 9 in Kansas City, Mo.

With the loss, the 'Cats ended their season with a 14-15 record, K-State's second consecutive losing campaign, while the Jayhawks went on to earn a berth in the National Collegiate Athletic Association tournament.

"Obviously, Alfaro was hurting us," KU Coach Larry Brown said. "We went to the box-and-one by mistake in the first half. We haven't really practiced it."

"Out on the court, Kellogg is our best defensive player," Brown said. "Ronnie has good instincts. You tell him what you want and he is able to do it."

K-State Coach Jack Hartman said, "I had anticipated someone trying that on us before now. The box-and-one is definitely going to disrupt our offense. You can't spend all your time trying to free up that one guy, especially when you're behind."

The 'Hawk defensive change stalled a typical K-State second-half comeback.

Down by 11, 35-24, at halftime, the 'Cats appeared to be well on their way to their third straight loss to the 'Hawks this season. Being outshot from the field — 63 percent to 45 percent — and outmuscled on the boards, the 'Cats were outplayed in the first half.

But at the start of the final half, the 'Cats came out a different team, cutting KU's lead down to five, 35-30, with 18 minutes left.

"Coach came in at halftime pretty fired

Women's hoop season ends in NCAA first-round action

By VIKKI WATSON

It was a case of too little, too late.

The K-State women's basketball squad's second half rally fell five points short as the No. 7-ranked Lady 'Cats ended the 1983-84 season with a 78-73 loss to the No. 13-rated Northeast Louisiana University Indians in first-round action of the women's NCAA tournament on March 15.

K-State finishes the year 25-6, co-champions of the Big Eight Conference and champions of the Big Eight Post-Season Tournament. Northeast Louisiana improved to 23-3 with the win.

The Lady 'Cats trailed 41-36 at halftime and fell behind by as many as 16 points with 14:40 remaining in the contest. Sophomore Cassandra Jones and freshman Carlisa Thomas scored the next eight points to cut the Indians' lead and the Lady 'Cats cut the margin to three points with nine seconds remaining, but could get no closer.

Free throws proved to be a major factor in the Indians' win, as Northeast Louisiana went to the free throw line 24 times in the contest, connecting on 22 of those attempts. K-State made seven of only 10 tries.

Northeast Louisiana was led by All-America sophomore Lisa Ingram's 28 points and the 24-point performance of sophomore guard Eun Jung Lee. Lee also contributed six of the Indians' 11 assists.

Kings edge Cavaliers

RICHFIELD, Ohio — Mike Woodson scored 27 of his game-high 33 points in the second half as the Kansas City Kings overcame a 14-point halftime deficit to defeat the Cleveland Cavaliers 108-97 Sunday night in National Basketball Association action.

Using long jump shots and spinning layups, Woodson scored all 11 of the Kings' points as Kansas City outscored the Cavaliers 11-2 at the end of the third quarter and the beginning of the fourth.

Cleveland never led in the fourth quarter. The Kings built up as much as a 13-point lead in the closing minutes.

Kansas City had trailed 59-45 at the half as Cleveland's John Bagley scored 11 points in the second quarter. But in the third quarter, Woodson scored 13 points and guard Larry Drew scored 11 as the Kings took a 78-76 lead at the end of the third quarter.

Drew finished with 21 points, while Eddie Johnson had 18.

Geoff Huston, who scored 10 points in the first quarter, finished with 18. Lonnie Shelton had 14 and Bagley and Cliff Robinson scored 13 each.

The Cavaliers played without leading scorer World B. Free, who sat out with a blister on his left foot.

Virginia shocks Razorbacks; Kansas falls to Wake Forest

By The Associated Press

Guard Rick Carlisle sank a 12-foot baseline jumper on the rebound of a blocked shot with four seconds remaining in overtime, giving Virginia a 53-51 upset over eighth-ranked Arkansas in the second round of the East Regional of the National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball tournament Sunday.

Illinois, Georgetown, Wake Forest, Syracuse, Louisville and DePaul were other winners Sunday in NCAA tournament action.

With seven seconds left in overtime, Arkansas guard Alvin Robertson blocked a jumper by Virginia's Othell Wilson, and the ball fell into the hands of Carlisle, who sank his fourth game-winning field goal of the season.

Tyrone Corbin scored 19 points and Kenny Patterson had 14, leading DePaul to a 75-61 victory over Illinois State in the second round of the NCAA Midwest Regional.

The victory was the first triumph in the last four tries in the NCAA for DePaul. The Blue Demons lost opening-round games in 1980, 1981 and 1982.

The victory also was the second over Illinois State this season. The Blue Demons won Coach Ray Meyer's 700th career game 69-66 at Chicago Dec. 3.

DePaul picked up the tempo midway through the first half and moved ahead by nine points, 24-15, with 8:07 to play. The Blue Demons led by as many as 11, 32-21, when Corbin hit a pair of free throws with 4:52 to go.

Sophomore guard Rafael Addison scored 24 points as 18th-ranked Syracuse broke open a tight contest in the final six minutes for a 78-63 victory over Virginia Commonwealth Sunday in the second round of the East Regional.

The Orangemen broke open the game with steady foul shooting late in the second half, when they went 19 for 23 from the free-throw line. Leading 59-57 with 6:33 left, Syracuse outscored the Rams 19-6 with 13 points coming from the free throw line. In that stretch, center Andre Hawkins had seven points.

Guard Milt Wagner sank a 12-foot shot from the right baseline with five seconds left in the game to lift Louisville to a 69-67 upset victory over 12th-ranked Tulsa in the quarterfinals of the NCAA Midwest Regional.

Louisville, 24-10, advances to the semifinal round Thursday against Kentucky at Lexington, Ky.

Louisville appeared to have the game under control after Billy Thompson hit two free throws with 3:45 to go for a 65-54 lead.

But the Hurricanes, behind the shooting of guards Ricky Ross and Steve Harris, put on a furious rally down the stretch. Harris hit a baseline jumper and Ross followed with a three-point play to cut the deficit to 65-59 with 3:07 to go.

After Louisville's Lancaster Gordon hit two free throws for a 67-59 advantage at 2:20 left, the Hurricanes scored eight straight points to tie the game 67-67 with 34 seconds.

Louisville got its final possession, following Harris's tying free throw, and worked 29 seconds off the clock before Wagner's winning basket.

Gordon led the Cardinals with 17 points, followed by Wagner and Charles Jones with 15 apiece. Ross topped all scorers with 27 points.

Kenny Green scored 20 points to lead Wake Forest to a 69-59 win over Kansas in the second round of the NCAA Midwest Regional.

The victory sends the 21-7 Demon Deacons against DePaul.

Kansas, which rallied from 11 behind at halftime to beat Alcorn State 57-56 Friday night, led 32-31 at intermission Sunday after shooting 61 percent in the first half.

However, the Jayhawks went cold early in the second half to fall behind 45-38 with 15:47 to play.

Green, with 10 points, and Lee Garber and Anthony Teachey, with seven points each, led the second-half charge by the Demon Deacons as they went ahead 60-47 with 7:12 to play. Garber and Teachey ended with 13 points each.

Swingman Doug Altenberger scored eight of his 12 points in the second half to help sixth-ranked Illinois turn back Villanova 64-56 in the quarterfinals of the NCAA Midwest Regional basketball tournament Sunday.

Illinois, 25-4, advances to the regional semifinals at Lexington, Ky., where it meets Maryland, 24-7, on Thursday night.

Illinois took the lead for good with eight straight points to go up 14-6 with 8:36 left in the first half. Altenberger triggered the spurt with two jumpers.

Villanova rallied to cut the margin to 16-14 on Ed Pinckney's rebound basket 02:50 later, but Illinois regrouped to lead 24-20 at the halftime.

Illinois opened a 34-26 lead on Altenberger's driving layup with 14:50 left in the game.

Villanova came back to pull within 34-30 on consecutive baskets by Harold Pressley and Dwayne McClain with 14:05 to go. But Illinois ran off nine straight points, four coming from forward Efrim Winters, to take a 43-30 advantage less than four minutes later.

Michael Jackson's free throw with eight seconds to go gave second-ranked Georgetown a 37-36 victory over upset-minded Southern Methodist University Sunday in the second round of the NCAA West Regional.

Jackson made the front end of a one-on-one free throw situation to put the Hoyas, No. 1-seeded team in the West, ahead 37-34.

Jackson missed his second free-throw opportunity and Carl Wright of the Mustangs hit a 25-foot jump shot with one second left.

Maulers clinch first victory

By The Associated Press

Tony Lee's 18-yard field goal and Jeff Delaney's 50-yard TD interception return, both in the fourth quarter, lifted the Pittsburgh Maulers to their first victory ever, a 16-7 United States Football League triumph over the Washington Federals Sunday.

In other Sunday games, Houston beat New Jersey 32-25. Denver topped Tampa Bay 36-30 for the Bandits first defeat and Philadelphia beat Oakland 28-7. On Saturday, Los Angeles beat San Antonio 13-12. Oklahoma beat Chicago 17-14 and Birmingham beat Memphis 54-6. Tonight, New Orleans, plays at Jacksonville.

Lee's field goal was set up by a 62-yard pass from Glenn Carano to Heisman Trophy winner Mike Rozier, who was downed at the Federals' 3.

Delaney picked off a Reggie Collier pass — the fourth Mauler interception — and raced 56 yards for the game's final score.

In the first period, safety Larry Friday picked off a Collier pass and returned it 16 yards to set Pittsburgh up at the Washington 29. Two passes to Rozier moved it to the 5. On third-and-goal from the five, Carano threw to wide wide receiver Greg Anderson for 7-0.

Rozier, enjoying his best day in a Pittsburgh uniform, finished with 22 carries for 77 yards. He had another 87 yards on three receptions.

Kelvin Bryant ran for 173 yards and scored two TDs to lead the Philadelphia Stars to a victory over the Oakland Invaders.

Oakland, now 0-4, opened scoring on a 2-yard run by Otis Brown with 9:17 left in the first half. Bryant tied it with two third-period TDs, running for 74 yards on nine carries during the two drives.

He scored first on a 4-yard dive up the middle with 9:20 left in the third quarter, and David Trout's kick tied the game at 7-7.

Quarterback Chuck Fusina threw 25 yards to Scott Fitzkee for the third Stars' touchdown on the first play of the fourth quarter. He threw a 35-yard scoring pass to Tom Donovan for the final Philadelphia touchdown with 1:51 left in the game. Philadelphia is now 3-1.

Oakland's Kenney Daniel stripped the ball from Bryant and ran 68 yards to the Stars' 17 with 4:42 left in the game. But two penalties and three incomplete passes ended the Invaders' threat.

Daniel set up the Oakland TD by recovering a fumble at the Invaders' 37-yard line a minute into the second period.

Houston's Sam Harrell scored two touchdowns and cornerback Will Lewis intercepted two passes, returning one 34 yards for a touchdown Sunday, to lead the Gambiers past the New Jersey Generals.

The Generals dropped to 3-1 and the Gambiers improved to 3-1.

Lewis returned an interception 13 yards to the General 1-yard line in the second quarter prior to Harrell's 1-yard plunge in the second touchdown run that gave the Gambiers a 15-7 halftime lead.

Cornerback David Martin picked off a John Reeves sideline pass and returned it 38 yards for a touchdown with 6:34 left, lifting the Denver Gold to an upset over the Tampa Bay Bandits.

Bobby Hebert fired three touchdown passes, including two to Derek Holloway, as the Michigan Panthers edged the Arizona Wranglers.

The victory kept the Panthers undefeated in four games this season and extended their overall winning streak to 10 games over the last two seasons. The Wranglers slipped to 2-2 in making their first road appearance this season.

Women place fifth at indoor finals

Eight representatives of K-State's women's track team compiled 14 total points to finish fifth at the National Collegiate Athletic Association indoor track championships March 9 and 10 in Syracuse, N.Y.

The fifth-place finish didn't come easily for the Wildcats, however. Traveling problems during the trip and individual injuries were obstacles that the athletes overcame.

Sophomore Rita Graves was the top performer for K-State, placing second in the high jump with a height of 5-feet-11.

Head Coach Steve Miller said lack of sleep resulting from traveling difficulties took its toll on Deb Pihl, K-State's top performer in the 1,000-yard run. Miller had hoped Pihl would win the event and become a two-time all-American, but the senior ended her last indoor meet with a third-place time of 2:46.8.

Pihl also anchored the two-mile relay team, which consisted of Erin Ficke, Anne Stadler and Lauretta Miller, to an eighth-place finish. Ficke and Stadler ran 2:14 and 2:09 splits, respectively. During her performance Miller suffered a broken foot but still managed to finish. In preliminary competition the previous day, the squad set a school record with a time of 8:45.2.

Pinkie Suggs was also slowed by an injury, competing in the shot put with a strained wrist sustained earlier in the week. Suggs made the finals and finished eighth with a throw of 48-feet-3/4.

The University of Nebraska, the Big Eight Conference champions three weeks ago, were the top team at nationals. NU compiled 58 team points in Syracuse University's Carrier Dome. The University of Tennessee was second and Villanova University was third with 48 and 30 points, respectively. Florida State University edged K-State for fourth place with 16 points.

Mike Bradley, the only national competitor for K-State's men's team, ran with an injured knee and finished fourth in his heat of the 500-meter run with a time of 1:03.54.

up," sophomore guard Jim Roder said. "He told us to start rebounding and move the ball faster on offense."

After Brown was given a technical foul for protesting a charging call on guard Carl Henry, Alfaro sank two free throws to bring the 'Cats within three, 37-34, with 15:30 remaining.

Alfaro again led the 'Cats with 18 points while junior center Eddie Elder also hit double figures, scoring 14. Scoring for the Jayhawks was led by Henry and sophomore forward Calvin Thompson, each chipping in 16 points.

Experts discuss parent, child alliances

By KATHY WOODWORTH
Collegian Reporter

Robert McCall, a child psychologist and author of "Infants: The New Knowledge About the Years from Birth to Three," was one of several child development experts to speak at the fourth Governor's Conference on Education for Parenthood on campus Friday and Saturday.

McCall discussed theories about the beginning of love between parents and infants.

The "instinct theory," which McCall said he does not believe, supposes the love between a parent and an infant is an automatic instinct.

The "early love" theory states that babies love who feeds them, but McCall said research proves this theory is untrue.

The third theory states that love occurs between a parent and an infant from bonding.

"This theory has taken the nation by storm," McCall said. "It takes more than a quick fix of a few hours in the first days of life to create a relationship with both love and attachment."

McCall also discussed the requirements for the parent and the infant to have a loving relationship.

"Babies must be able to detect and remember the parent," he said. "Next, there must be some kind of signaling and communication between them."

Bettye Caldwell, president of the National Association for the Education of Young Children and professor of education at the University of Arkansas, Little Rock, also spoke during the education conference.

Caldwell delivered a speech titled, "Parenting — Thy Name is Change," about parenting changes over the years.

Caldwell began her lecture with the following statistics:

— More than half the women in this country with children under six years of age are in the work force.

— On the average, more than one of five babies are born to single parent families.

— The average duration of marriage is now about seven years.

— One of three new marriages will end in divorce in the first five years.

She predicted changes likely to occur in families during the next two to three decades.

The number and types of acceptable family variants and parental roles will undoubtedly increase and the number of children per family will decrease, Caldwell said. She said she also believes the role of a parent will become increasingly professional.

"All young people, prior to becoming parents, who get some training in parenthood are evidence of the fact that we are indeed recognizing that this is important. We need training in how to rear our children just as we need training in anything else," she said.

"Children who spend the first years of their lives in institutions have certainly been found over and over to grow up impaired in the ability to learn and relate well to other people," she said. "One fact in the field of human behavior is that children appear to need some kind of parenting if they are to develop well intellectually and emotionally."

Anthony Jurich, professor of family and child development and co-clinical director of the University marriage and family therapy program, spoke on parenting and adolescents.

"One problem is that parents and adolescents treat each other as two totally different species of being," Jurich said. "One of the biggest mistakes the parents make is they treat adolescents as children rather than adults-ready-to-be."

Jurich explained how adolescents grow during the lifespan.

"After childhood, there is adolescence, which is between the ages of 13 and 15 years old," he said. "This is the age of the peer group and it dominates everything. Middle adolescence is the age of friendship and heterosexuality. Late adolescence is when they start breaking away and become their own people. The adolescents are trying to ditch childhood."

Jurich said the breakthrough comes when the parent realizes the adolescent is not a child anymore.

"If I had a wish for parents, my wish would be that parents stop trying to be perfect," he said. "Parenting and adolescence is a series of compromises. You walk a tightrope, literally. You step right too much and the adolescent says your meddling. You step left too much and he feels you don't care. The adolescent then seeks an independent ego identity. He is trying to discover who he is."

The financial transactions in question occurred after Reagan was elected and while Meese struggled with the problem of selling his La Mesa, Calif., home and took up residence here.

Meese has denied under oath that the jobs had any link with his financial dealings with the men, and those men who have testified thus far have also denied any link.

Official says U.S. aid to Central America lacks safe channels

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A top U.S. foreign aid official concedes that Central American nations have inadequate safeguards to ensure proper use of U.S. assistance, but he says the problem will be corrected by the time Congress acts on a major aid increase this year.

Jay Morris, deputy administrator of the Agency for International Development, also said corruption in El Salvador is not as widespread as some allege: "I honestly do not believe that we have a serious corruption problem in El Salvador — certainly no worse than found in most of our recipient countries."

"I submit that a certain amount (of corruption) is endemic...in all human society, including our own. It's when it goes beyond levels of tolerance that you should become alarmed."

Congressional concern about alleged misuse of U.S. aid has grown since President Reagan's National Bipartisan Commission on Central America recommended $8.4 billion in U.S. economic aid to the region over the next five years. Reagan wants $674 million in economic aid this year and next for El Salvador alone.

Some Congressmen question whether El Salvador and the other major recipients, Honduras and Costa Rica, can effectively handle the increased aid or whether the money will be diverted into the personal bank accounts of government officials.

Morris said while Salvadoran safeguards against diversion of U.S. funds need improvement, U.S. auditors find no evidence of widespread theft. "There isn't rampant diversion of money," he said.

He said a 100-page classified report prepared for AID by Arthur Young and Co., a consulting firm, "does not allege widespread corruption" in El Salvador's Central Bank. "What the Arthur Young reports said is that you're open to it unless things are done."

In January, Rep. Michael Barnes, D-Md., said the report shows "rampant mismanagement and corruption in the use of foreign exchange assistance that the United States has provided to El Salvador."

The June 1983 report, a copy of which was obtained by The Associated Press, found weaknesses in the bank's handling of foreign exchange funds but did not estimate how much was being improperly used.

Specifically, it criticized political influence in allocating the scarce funds and said the bank inadequately checks import invoices to prevent businessmen from inflating costs and pocketing some money.

Morris said in response to the study, the bank's price-checking unit has been increased from three to five officials and should grow to 13 shortly. He said Honduras and Costa Rica, with even less sophisticated operations, are setting up similar units.

Morris said AID, an arm of the State Department, was expanding its auditing staff for Central America from 13 to 25 and enlarging its management staffs attached to U.S. embassies in the region.

Morris also disputed reports that U.S. food aid for El Salvador's poor was being sold for profit: "I don't find a scintilla of truth in those charges." He said most of the grain bags marked with AID insignia that U.S. reporters have seen in markets had simply been reused after the original food was properly distributed.

first came on in the '50s or '60s, and even the early '70s I had almost every market completely to myself. I was the only children's program in most markets in which I was seen," he said.

"Another thing that happened was the 'consumer movement' which started in about 1970. The consumer movement, though very well intentioned, for the most part believed that commercials and children's television didn't mix at all.

"So they would often attack advertisers for advertising in children's television and they would attack stations for carrying it, and then attack networks," Keeshan said.

"So, a lot of responsible corporations that did make a practice of supporting value-oriented children's programming decided that they didn't want to be embarrassed in this way, and did not want to risk a confrontation, and so, a substantial number of them withdrew their support from children's television altogether," he said.

Changes also took place in the subject matter of "Captain Kangaroo" over the years.

"It is certainly accurate that our curriculum probably changed a little bit in the end. We were probably much more involved with life styles and things of that sort earlier on — manners, good health, and cleanliness — the sort of things that parents grapple with around the house with young children."

Keeshan said he believes television can be used as a learning tool for children.

"Unfortunately, you know, we grow up and usually by the time we are six or seven years old we start shutting our minds, and by the time we are 10 or 12, our minds are pretty well shut and our capacity for learning is diminished considerably," he said.

"There is no question that learning is an activity that begins at the very earliest moment of human experience and is very consequential learning," he said.

Keeshan does not take full credit when he receives approving letters from parents.

"When I get a letter from a parent saying what a nice influence I am on a child — that's nice — but that child is from a nice home. That child knows that she is loved and that she has a future and she feels secure and all that."

"But if the child is being beaten maybe by his mother's boyfriend, he doesn't know who his father is, he goes hungry half the time, there is no way 'Captain Kangaroo' is going to be able to do anything to help that child — no way in the world," Keeshan said.

Keeshan said his TV sidekick, Mr. Green Jeans "is the funniest man, he really is. He's wonderful, wonderful. That's what I think about him. He's great, what you see is what you get, that's Lumpy. There's no acting there at all. He's just a great human being."

Keeshan said he has two new series in development, one that should be ready to show to the networks by April.

Keeshan's new shows will also cater to the young people.

"I feel a position of advocacy for young people, not only related to television, but to almost any area that impinges on the life of a young child," he said.

Committee unanimously supports Mahaffey

By ALAN STOLFUS

Student Publications, Inc.

Ben Mahaffey should be reinstated to the classroom, the special Faculty Senate committee unanimously recommended to K-State President Duane Acker in its report released March 12.

"After careful consideration...the committee finds that the Kansas State University administration did not present clear and convincing evidence for dismissing Dr. Ben Mahaffey. We therefore unanimously recommend that Dr. Mahaffey not be dismissed on the grounds of professional incompetence," the report states.

"All panel members agree that the administration failed to provide clear and convincing evidence that Dr. Mahaffey was professionally incompetent.

"While Dr. Mahaffey bears some of the responsibility for the conflict in the Department of Forestry after July 1, 1977, the administration failed to demonstrate that his contribution to the conflict warrants dismissal on the grounds of professional incompetence," the committee wrote.

Mahaffey, associate professor of forestry, was recommended for dismissal and suspended from University duties for professional incompetence Aug. 18, 1983, in a letter signed by four University administrators. He is the first tenured faculty member in the University's 120-year history against whom such actions have been taken.

Because he is a tenured faculty member, Mahaffey appealed the action to Faculty Senate, which established the special committee to hear the case. The appeal hearing began Jan. 17 and concluded Jan. 27.

The committee can only make a recommendation to Acker, who has the final decision in the case.

Charles Hein, director of communications, said Acker is now reviewing the committee's report and hasn't yet set a date for a decision.

"In the committee's view, the conflict in the Department of Forestry was intolerable. We find that both Dr. Mahaffey and his supervisors contributed to this conflict," the report states. It recommends that "all parties be admonished to avoid repetition of past confrontational behavior and to make every effort to ensure that a professional relationship be developed so that the education objectives of the department can be achieved."

The report also specifically recommends Mahaffey "develop a more cooperative working relationship with supervisors" and forestry department personnel, especially Mahaffey's supervisors, "to develop a more positive working atmosphere." The committee recommends the College of Agriculture administration "be directed to provide leadership in accomplishing" better departmental relations.

The report addresses each charge the University made against Mahaffey in the Aug. 18 dismissal letter, including "a history of student complaints of intimidation, unfair grading practices and a sexist attitude," "creation of classroom environment that reduced interest in course offerings and departmental programs" and "unproductive and uncooperative relationships with forestry department personnel and administrators."

On the charges of intimidation, unfair grading practices and a sexist attitude, the committee concludes no "clear and convincing" evidence was presented to back up the allegations.

"It is not uncommon for university professors to be challenged by students about grades when return-

Lecturer discusses women in politics

By JAY BAUMANN
Collegian Reporter

Women have become more assertive in questioning the political process and its effects in the United States and have begun to realize the importance of equal rights, said Congresswoman Patricia Schroeder, D-Colo., Monday in McCain Auditorium during the 63rd lecture of the Alfred M. Landon Lecture Series.

"Women have tended to put everybody else's priorities ahead of their own, in both personal affairs and in the political arena," she said. "There has always been a hesitancy to push their (women's) own rights. They are finally asking how and why certain issues are being voted on in the political arena. Women are finally realizing that equal rights are not just life-style issues, but also economic issues."

Schroeder is the national co-chairman of Sen. Gary Hart's, D-Colo., bid for the Democratic Party nomination for president. She is the senior woman in Congress and the first woman to serve on the Armed Services House Committee.

She also is founder and co-chairman of the Congressional Caucus for Women's Issues, a bipartisan group of representatives devoted to advancing women's concerns in the Congress. Her recent legislative achievements include reintroducing the Equal Rights Amendment and aiding in extending the voting rights provided by the Act of 1965.

"Democrats and Republicans alike, liberals and conservatives, have been pushing bills of interest to women. Suddenly, IRA expansion, pension reform, Social Security changes, child support and similar issues are hot tickets in Congress," she said.

Schroeder also gave her views about the possibility of a female vice president of the United States.

"There are many very good women who are qualified that will be put on the list," she said. "I am in charge of putting together this list in Hart's campaign."

Hart said if nominated, he had already selected "her" to be his choice for vice president, Schroeder said.

"We're not sure who 'her' is. It isn't me because I'm from the same state as Hart and this automatically disqualifies me," she said.

In a press conference prior to the lecture, Schroeder talked about her involvement in the Hart campaign.

"Gary has been a friend of mine for 20 years," she said. "When he Electrical outages bypass University

By RHONDA BROWN
Collegian Reporter

Except for a few "bumps and interruptions," K-State has been able to maintain electrical power and conduct normal operations during the past 36 hours in the wake of a hard-hitting winter storm that has left many in darkness or stranded due to poor traveling conditions.

Gene Cross, vice president for University Facilities, attributed this to the fact that K-State produces 30 percent of its own power, which is supplemented by service from the Kansas Power & Light Co.

Despite the overall power sufficiency of the University, the L.P. Washburn Recreational Complex was forced to close Monday due to electrical problems.

"The surge and decrease of power is hard on our particular type of lighting system," Raydon Robel, director of Recreational Services, said.

Despite closings of area school districts and businesses, K-State held classes.

"The decision to hold classes today was based on three things," said Charles Hein, communications director. "We are a residential college and most of the students were back. Second, we (the University administration) felt that the storm was going to slack off, and third, we do not close the University ever."

"We are deeply concerned for the safety of those traveling, but we felt that the storm was going to slack off, and by Sunday night many students had returned. So, we felt that the correct decision was not to cancel classes," he said.

The last time the University closed was Feb. 1, 1983, when classes after 4 p.m. were cancelled due to heavy snow, according to a Feb. 2, 1983, Collegian article. Prior to that, the last time classes were cancelled was in 1971.

The snow and ice caused many automobile accidents throughout Manhattan, but none have been reported on campus, according to a K-State Police Department spokesman. A Riley County Police Department dispatcher said the department had responded to many such calls, but an exact figure is not yet known.

The effects of the storm also have kept the Manhattan Fire Department busy.

"We had 73 calls Sunday night and 10 by noon Monday," Wilkinson said. The calls have been for

Hart to visit Topeka, meet with Democrats

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Colorado's Gary Hart pays a visit to Topeka today, hoping the media attention will provide added impetus to the momentum he has built in Kansas with his early primary and caucus successes in his bid for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Weather permitting, Hart flies into Forbes Field south of the capital city at 11:50 a.m. today, rides with Gov. and Mrs. Carlin to the statehouse, delivers public remarks in the second floor rotunda at 12:30 p.m. and then meets with Democratic legislators at 1 p.m. before flying back to Washington at 2:10 p.m.

The Colorado senator, a native of Ottawa comes to the state from Illinois, where he was hoping for a victory or solid performance in that state's presidential primary today.

Hart's visit comes four days before Kansas' Democratic caucuses Saturday afternoon.

Former Vice President Walter Mondale, Hart's chief rival for the Democratic nomination, was not due to make an appearance in the state ahead of the caucuses, but his wife and son are coming to Kansas.

Tom Cosgrove, Mondale's state coordinator, said he still was trying to get the organization to have the former vice president make a Kansas appearance but had not succeeded by Monday night.

Mrs. Joan Mondale will be in Wichita Thursday and in Topeka Friday, while their son, William, is scheduled to be in Kansas City Tuesday afternoon and Wednesday morning, in Topeka Wednesday afternoon and in Manhattan Wednesday night for a debate at Kansas State University, Cosgrove said. William Mondale will represent his father and Sam Keys, Hart's former brother-in-law, will speak for Hart.

Panel endorses regents' faculty salary increase

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Senate Ways and Means Committee agreed Monday to increase faculty salaries by 7 percent and other operating expenses by 8 percent at Kansas Board of Regents' institutions during fiscal year 1985, which begins July 1.

In adopting the 7 percent increase for faculty salaries, the committee decided to go along with a recommendation the House made when it passed a regents' 1985 budget bill last week.

The 8 percent increase for other operating expenses, which include building maintenance and repair and equipment purchases, is one-third higher than the 6 percent increase approved by the House.

"I just don't think 6 percent is enough," said Senate President Ross Doyen, R-Concordia. "I'm tired of hearing about them carrying buckets to deal with leaking roofs."

Sen. Jack Steineger, D-Kansas City, said the regents have been coming to the Legislature for years requesting more money for equipment purchases and building repairs.

"We've never really addressed those issues," Steineger said. "This could be used for all of those."

Sen. Paul Hess, R-Wichita, the committee's chairman, said the proposed increase could be viewed as a "down payment" on the $14 million reduction in the regents' base budget made permanent by the Legislature last year.

In addition to exceeding the 6 percent increase approved by the House, the committee's proposed increase would surpass the 7 percent requested by the regents and the 5 percent recommended by Gov. John Carlin.

The 8 percent increase would add $1.4 million to the House-approved regents' budget, which is already estimated to exceed Carlin's recommendations by $3 million.

About two-thirds of that $3 million is due to House changes in the governor's recommendations for faculty salaries.

Carlin had proposed increasing faculty salaries by 6 percent and allocating $2 million to the regents' central office for additional salary adjustments. He had also recommended reducing the regents' base budget by $1.9 million.

The House voted to increase faculty salaries by 7 percent and to eliminate the proposed base budget reduction and the $2 million allocation to the central regents' office.

The committee also agreed to go along with the House proposal to increase by 7 percent the money available to regents' institutions for utility expenses.

Telefund sets new records

At the mid-point of the six-week K-State Telefund, pledges totaling more than $186,754 have been received. Colleges participating in the fund-raising effort so far are the Colleges of Arts and Sciences, Home Economics and Engineering.

The telefund is sponsored each year by the KSU Foundation. More than 1,000 students and faculty call alumni of their college during the event and ask for a gift to be pledged to their college. A bank of forty telephones in the Union is used to call nationwide.

The College of Arts and Sciences began its portion of the Telefund on Feb. 19 and secured $82,391 in pledges. The College of Home Economics called during the second week of the drive and brought in $38,096. The College of Engineering wrapped up the first half of the Telefund with $66,228 pledged.

The College of Business Administration will begin the second half of the Telefund on Sunday. It will be followed by the Colleges of Architecture and Design, Education and Agriculture. The Telefund concludes on April 12.

Most of the money from the Telefund is used for student scholarships within the colleges. Control of the money rests within the dean's office of each college. Besides scholarships, Telefund income is spent on such things as student activities and educational materials.

Visiting professor to lecture

A Cornell University professor of architecture, John Reys, will speak as part of the K-State College of Architecture and Design 1984 Lecture Series today.

Reys, who is a former chairman of the Cornell Department of City and Regional Planning, will speak on "Frontier Urban Planning on the Great Plains" at 3:30 p.m. in Union Forum Hall. The public is invited to attend.

Reys was a Fulbright Scholar to the United Kingdom in 1959, a Fulbright Research Fellow in The Netherlands in 1965-1966 and a senior fellow of the National Endowment for the Humanities in 1973-1974.

He is author of seven books, the most recent of which was "The Forgotten Frontier: Urban Planning in the American West Before 1890," published in 1981.

Reys' visit is co-sponsored by the K-State Fine Arts Council.

Three students win scholarships

Three animal sciences and industry students have been awarded scholarships from the Kansas Meat Processors Association.

David Clawson, sophomore in general agriculture; Jeff Neumeyer, sophomore in animal sciences and industry and Julie Schuler, sophomore in animal sciences and industry each received a $500 award.

The money for these scholarships was earned from a ham auction at the Kansas State Fair. K-State meat scientists who judged the processed products at the annual KMPA convention also donated their honorariums to the scholarship fund.

Schafer said the Kansas Meat Processors Association scholarships are awarded to sophomores or juniors in animal or food science who have demonstrated interests in the meat field. The winners participate in KMPA and State Fair activities.

decided to run (for president), he asked me to be the national co-chairman for his committee, and I said 'Yes.'

"The campaign has been a real ballgame," she said. "It really is a David and Goliath number. We are doing it with chewing gum, rubber bands and sweat equity."

Schroeder said the financial part of Hart's campaign has been slow.

"The staff hasn't been paid in four months. We did raise $1 million Tuesday in less than one hour in Washington," she said. "The money is beginning to come in fairly rapidly now and so are the states where the primaries are taking place. In any of these states, we didn't even have a phone installed."

"It has been moving to me to see so many people willing to work so hard for nothing and keep going."

Panel analyzes U.S. news from Latin America

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

The United States is getting very little news about Latin America, and the news it is getting is not very complete, according to a panel discussing the media in Latin America, which met Monday night in Kedzie Hall.

The panel was made up of Bill Buzenberg, foreign correspondent who covers Latin American affairs for the National Public Radio; Gloria Freeland, instructor in journalism and mass communications and former reporter/editor in San Jose, Costa Rica; and Edward Seaton, Manhattan Mercury publisher and member of the Inter-American Press Association.

Buzenberg said part of the reason the United States does not get complete coverage of Latin America is because national news can be framed by the government.

"There is a danger in this country in the national news, and I see it all the time in Washington, that Washington dominates what kind of news the country gets," Buzenberg said. "The coverage of Latin America can be turned on and off by the president and sometimes by the Congress."

Buzenberg said the administration is able to frame the debate and has framed the debate in Central America in East-West terms.

"There is a great need for much more analysis and much more context on the events that are being reported," he said.

Seaton said the news concerning Latin America reported in most U.S. newspapers and the Latin American news reported in Spanish newspapers is considerably different.

"The only stories on Latin America that ran (last week) in papers that are available in Manhattan focused on the debates in Congress over the appropriations to Central America," Seaton said. "Looking at one Spanish paper, I was able to read about ... the success the Mexicans are having in dealing with their economic problems and their national debt, and that's something that should be of major interest to the United States."

Freeland said another problem in getting accurate coverage in Latin America are the perceptions Latin Americans and people from the United States have of each other.

People in the United States tend to lump all Latin Americans together in one group, Freeland said, and Latin Americans do the same thing to people in the United States.

"There are misconceptions on both sides of the border and a lot of the images come from poor, grade B movies and news stories that don't tell as much as they should," she said.

When Freeland was reporting in Costa Rica, there was a licensing law that required all journalists to be members of the Association of Journalists. She said the supposed purpose of the association was to help the journalists in reporting, but it actually limited reporters.

Both Freeland and Buzenberg pointed out that numerous cultural differences hinder reporters in Latin America.

"The major cultural differences in Central America are not conveyed in the kind of reporting we get," Buzenberg said. "The administration tries to play down the cultural differences of Central America."

"If elections in Central America are reported in our terms, with our models of what an election is, it's not really very accurate," Buzenberg said. "El Salvador has had lots of elections in the last 50 years, not many of them have meant very much ... that kind of cultural difference has to be reported."

Buzenberg said there is more news on Latin America today than there was five or 10 years ago.

"This was a joke 10 years ago that the coverage of Latin America was coups, earthquakes and revolutions," Buzenberg said. "We really have to get beyond that for our own self-interests."

Forum to focus on views of presidential hopefuls

Speakers representing both Democratic and Republican presidential hopefuls will be featured at a political awareness forum from 7:30 to 9:30 p.m. Wednesday in the Union Ballroom.

Four speakers, three of them representing Democratic candidates and one representing the Republican candidate, are each scheduled to speak for a period of five to seven minutes.

The program, sponsored by the Black Student Union, will include William Mondale, representing his father Walter Mondale; William McNary, state youth coordinator for the Jesse Jackson campaign and Samuel Keys, K-State representative for the Gary Hart campaign.

David Owens, state GOP chairman, has agreed to speak for the Reagan campaign.

"The forum is not intended to endorse any one candidate," said Richard Horton, chairman of the BSU Political Awareness Committee and sophomore in political science.

"Our primary concern is to get students involved in the political process," Horton said. "We thought that by getting as many candidates here as possible, we could promote political awareness at the University while providing an unbiased sampling of views and issues."

The forum is something BSU wanted to do to get more involved with the community as well as with state and national affairs, said Shirley Turner, BSU president and junior in pre-professional secondary education. It is, in part, the result of ideas that came up at BSU meetings last semester, she said.

"We would have to give Jesse Jackson some kind of credit, though," Turner said. "As a result of his announcement to campaign as a presidential candidate, more black students are becoming aware of the need to get involved politically. For BSU, this has meant greater participation in the organization's activities and meetings."

Roebuck, commission to discuss mall project

Mel Roebuck, vice-president of Forest City Rental Properties Corp., the firm in charge of downtown redevelopment, is to address Manhattan City Commissioners at their meeting at 7 p.m. today at City Hall. Roebuck will discuss consideration of a supplemental agreement with his firm and the Urban Development Action Grant contract.

Commissioners also will consider authorizing Mayor Wanda Fateley to enter into a contract with Vector Corp., a firm to aid in the relocation of businesses being displaced by downtown redevelopment.

A number of resolutions are slated for discussion dealing with the city's policy on open public records. The commission will discuss a resolution which would declare the city's policy and then consider a resolution which would provide for the maintenance, preservation and protection of public records and procedures to gain access and copy those records.

Two other measures would appoint custodians for records and establish a fee to be charged to people wishing to copy or inspect records.

The commission also will consider adopting a pay classification plan based on a February study prepared by Hay Associates. The firm studied the wages and duties of various city workers and made recommendations for changes at an earlier meeting.

Storm snowblinds administration

University administrators showed extreme disregard for human life when they made no decision to close K-State during Monday's dangerous winter storm.

While many public and private offices, public schools, the University of Kansas and even Fort Riley closed for the day, the powers that be left K-State open, possibly as a reminder that people lacking the sense to come in from the rain (or snow) still exist.

It didn't matter that the Kansas Highway Patrol had advised motorists not to risk driving on the icy, snow-covered roads. It also made no difference that most of the major highways into the city were closed. Our administrators seemingly were unaware that many students were still returning from spring break and could have been injured or killed trying to get to campus.

What mattered was the almighty dollar. After all, it costs money to close the University so, with all the fiscal restraint of mindless bureaucrats, a value was placed on human life.

Of course, students had the option of staying home, but when classes are in session, many choose to attend so as not to miss important material. Some professors have mandatory attendance policies which force students to attend class. This places the student between the proverbial rock and hard place — go to class and risk life and limb or stay home and risk a grade.

Because those in charge at the University have chosen to be irresponsible, the Kansas Board of Regents should review Monday's situation at the earliest possible time and set some guidelines for K-State President Duane Acker to follow.

If no students are hurt or killed trying to reach campus, then all should be thankful for miracles. If the worst happens, partial blame could be placed on the administration.

Week offers cultural learning

Cultural awareness is an integral feature of a university environment. An appreciation of the society and customs of other countries can be effectively cultivated where people of many different nationalities and ethnic backgrounds converge to pursue a college education.

This week, during International Week at K-State, various activities and exhibits are being sponsored by the International Coordinating Council, representative for 15 international campus groups, in order to increase awareness of different cultures.

Through Arab folk dances, a Chinese noodle-making demonstration, displays of handicrafts and literature and an International Film Festival with free admission, the ICC hopes to encourage all students, both foreign and non-foreign, to learn more about the cultures of other countries.

Universities should offer stimuli for the mind in extracurricular as well as academic activities, and this week is a fine example of such educational incentive. International Week provides an excellent opportunity to gain insight and knowledge that may not always be found in specialized college curriculums.

Students should make an effort to increase their personal awareness of other cultures during International Week. Best of all, this learning is free and not subject to graded examination.

Press fails to capture voters' intent

WASHINGTON — On the Sunday before the New Hampshire primary, the Washington Post reported that Walter Mondale had blunted Gary Hart's drive and stood on the verge of his second primary victory. Two days later, the New York Times said that Mondale stood supreme in the Democratic Party with a lead, war chest and organization unmatched in American political history. Fortunately, these stories now rest at the bottom of bird cages.

I could choose almost any American newspaper, television network or newsmagazine to tell the same story. I could also include official Washington: it knew with absolute certainty that in November Ronald Reagan would face Walter Mondale. Only the voters so far have disagreed.

Gary Hart accomplished quite a bit with his victories. But one of his sweetest achievements was to demolish the notion that either the media or Washington officialdom knows very much at all about what lurks in the heart of the voter. Seldom have so many people who are supposed to know so much been so wrong — including, for the record, yours truly.

You may wonder what evil purpose motivates me to put a spotlight on the press' pratfall. It is this: the sorry performance of the press ought to discredit once and for all the argument that it is all-powerful, that it controls and directs the political process. If that were true, Mondale would be today the nominee-apparent and Hart's newest idea would be how to salvage his wrecked political career.

Conspiracy theorists, however, are passionate sorts and not likely to revise their thinking. They did not do so in 1976 when the press goofed just as badly by largely overlooking Jimmy Carter (Jimmy Who?) — a performance second only to 1972 when Edmund Muskie was anointed the Democratic nominee. George McGovern, who apparently does not believe what he reads, proved otherwise.

There are all kinds of technical reasons why the press performed so badly. In the first place, it followed the money and Mondale had lots more of it than anyone else. Second, it followed whatever action there was, including straw polls, and Mondale won all but one of these. Third, it paid almost as much attention to endorsements as Mondale did and these, so far, have proved of little value. And last, the media not only reported but were influenced by national opinion polls which measured nothing but name recognition. Those findings proved as worthless as Chinese railroad bonds.

All of these were worth reporting at the time, and to the extent that the press offered a snapshot of where things stood at a particular time, a service was performed. Mondale was the story and Hart was not. It is impossible to report a phenomenon that does not yet exist or whose vital signs are so feeble they cannot be detected. Consequently, Hart received little attention, although there were reporters who caught his movement. They, though, were the exceptions.

It is clear the press followed a ghost campaign. Because the candidates hit the trail early, mostly to raise money, the press hit the trail with them. But the attention of the voters was somewhere else, and little that went before Iowa mattered much at all. For a year and a half, Mondale won everything in sight. They were all exhibition games, though.

I would prefer to report that the press turned in a stellar performance. It did not. Having said that, it is cheering nevertheless to note that no one else did any better — not the political establishment, not the money men, not the pollsters. Once again, official-journalistic-political Washington, including the White House, is reeling, trying to figure out what's going on in the country. We all were surprised by the American people, who having either read the forecasts in the newspapers or heard them on television, went their own way anyway.

So here's to you, dear readers. We talk to you, we interview you, we poll you, we watch you and then we tell you what we have learned. And then every four years you tell us how wrong we were. Hemingway said that Paris is a moveable feast. But for the press, America is. Again this year the dish is crow.

Foreign policy by legislative poker

After my last critical column, I was strongly encouraged to show more gratitude for the policies of the Reagan administration. I am trying, but recently an event occurred for which I am having great difficulty finding a charitable thought.

I am referring to the administration's attempts to attach a rider of emergency military aid to Central America onto a bill calling for famine relief for Africa.

According to the Wichita Eagle-Beacon, President Reagan has personally lobbied for the rider, which calls for $93 million in immediate additional military aid to El Salvador and $21 million for CIA-funded rebels in Nicaragua. Reagan argues that El Salvador urgently needs new military supplies before the Salvadoran elections on Sunday.

What I have trouble accepting is that this bill has been attached to a $150 million bill for emergency famine relief in Africa. The famine bill already passed the House with wide support two weeks ago. The administration has openly admitted the hope that House Democrats — given the choice between approving the military aid or killing the famine bill — will "swallow" the military aid.

The administration seems to be saying it is willing to risk the passage of the famine bill. In other words, the very debatable support of repressive governments is more important than famine relief for millions of Africans.

In practice, this "rider strategy" means the administration is trying to carry out their Central American policy without bringing it to vote in an election year. The military assistance bill was first attached to an energy assistance bill, but that attempt failed.

It is interesting that Reagan, without congressional approval, can send emergency aid to El Salvador under a law that allows sale of weapons abroad without demanding immediate payment. I imagine this would incite a public uproar that the congressional quasi-approval of a rider will not bring.

Another explanation might be that Reagan does not want to divide the Republican party in an official debate on the Central American issue. A significant number of Republicans differ with the president on the issue. Kansas Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, for example, repeated in both of her recent campus speeches that she is against increasing military aid to El Salvador.

Some things are not immediately evident in Reagan's rationale: how can El Salvador possibly use $93 million before Sunday? The Senate debate is not until this week. Again my ungratefulness shows through. I interpret this as one of Reagan's "signals to our friends in Central America." In effect he is saying he will back the Salvadoran government no matter how corrupt or repressive they are.

Reagan also is sending a signal to Salvadoran voters. When they line up at the polls Sunday, the message they are to receive is, "You might as well vote for the status quo, because that is what you are going to get if the U.S. government can help it." You could argue that this message is not really necessary, since there are no opposition candidates to choose from anyway.

Ironically, White House spokesman Larry Speakes called the action "an important part of the President's program for democracy in Central America." You see, $21 million is to go to the rebels destabilizing the Nicaraguan government. That government also is moving toward an election — one where opposition is being allowed.

I realize there are nuances to U.S. politics that are over my head, such as spending days of floor time reading "Gone With the Wind." But it seems to me that when there are two important, and very different issues, they should be debated separately. When one, famine relief, is widely supported, then it should pass. When the other issue is as debatable as military aid to Central America, it should undergo complete examination.

Actually, I am thankful for Reagan's policy in this case. It has given us an opportunity to gauge his sensitivity for hungry people in Africa. It has also given us an opportunity to gauge how willing Reagan is to have his foreign policy debated by Congress and the U.S. public.

'Twas the day of the Kansas snowstorm...

Editor,
'Twas the day of the snowstorm and all through the state, not a creature was stirring except at K-State.

Much to their wondering ears they did not hear, the name of K-State again this year.

Now I in my scarf and my warm winter cap, slipped out the door in search of the mishap.

On the president's doorstep I landed with a bound I was sure the answer was here to be found.

But the jolly old elf I was unable to see. It seems he was trapped somewhere under a tree.

A message I left as I went on my way, Dear Mr. President, Have a good day.

Smoking ban on airlines rejected

WASHINGTON — The Civil Aeronautics Board today unanimously rejected a proposal banning smoking on most commercial airline flights.

The vote was 5-0.

Before the vote, each board member said he felt airlines' current practice of separating smokers and non-smokers is adequate.

The board members said a proposal to ban smoking on flights under two hours in duration was impractical and could be anti-competitive.

The airline industry said that a smoking ban on flights of under two hours would have affected an estimated 90 percent of all regularly scheduled flights.

Even the board's two strongest critics of in-flight smoking opposed a prohibition based on flight time.

Board member Gloria Schaffer called such a ban "extremely impractical."

Member Diane Morales, acknowledging she probably holds the strongest views against smoking on the board, said she reluctantly opposed the proposal because of the competitive problems it would cause.

Barbara McConnell, the board vice chairman, said airlines should be left to decide the smoking issue and that a government order based on the length of flight would amount to "an administrative headache" for the carriers.

Largest-ever lottery prize awarded

NEW YORK — A Queens resident Monday claimed a $10 million lottery prize, believed the biggest ever in the United States, for matching six numbers on a $1 ticket, lottery officials said.

The new millionaire was identified only as being from Queens, but state lottery officials called an afternoon news conference to give more details.

The person who bought the winning ticket for Saturday's Lotto drawing gets an initial after-tax payment of about $350,000 to start.

The largest individual lottery prize in North America was a $13.9 million jackpot — about $11.1 million in U.S. currency — won in a Canadian lottery in January. The previous U.S. record for a single winner was $8.8 million in Pennsylvania last July. Unlike U.S. lottery winnings, those in Canada are tax-free.

New York archbishop installed

NEW YORK — John J. O'Connor, one of the Roman Catholic Church's most vehement opponents of abortion, was installed today as leader of the Archdiocese of New York, the nation's fourth-largest diocese with 1.8 million Catholics.

O'Connor, a 64-year-old Philadelphia native, was presented a simple crosier, the shepherd's staff that symbolizes the office of archbishop, at an afternoon ceremony at St. Patrick's Cathedral. He became the eighth leader of the New York Archdiocese.

Archbishop Pio Laghi, the pontiff's representative in the United States, read Pope John Paul II's letter appointing O'Connor successor to the late Cardinal Terence Cooke. O'Connor previously was bishop of Scranton, Pa.

"Such behavior was not professional and should not be condoned. However, there was no evidence of repeated patterns of this type of behavior by Dr. Mahaffey in the classroom," the report states.

incidents such as breaking power lines, power lines getting hung up in a tree and transformers catching fire, he said.

A fire truck was called to Shellenberger Hall about 10:30 a.m. Monday in response to an alarm.

Apparently, ice had caused the alarm to sound, said Glen Wilkinson, assistant fire chief.

He said fallen tree branches will be removed within a day or two by campus police after snow is removed from sidewalks and parking lots.

The city of Manhattan was plagued with power outages throughout Sunday night.

"We're having scattered outages," John Johannes, KP & L division manager, said. "We fix one outage and something else goes down."

Outages occurred from Atchison to Great Bend, Johannes said. Manhattan power outages began about noon Sunday.

"We're working as fast as we can and will continue until dark. Then I'm going to send our people home for some rest and get them back at it in the morning (today)," Johannes said.

Johannes said he expects to be cleaning up the last of the damage on Thursday.

Mahaffey's comments about women's roles without also referring to men's roles in the natural resource management field to promote class discussion "could be interpreted as sexist and we do not condone such practice," the committee wrote.

In making its recommendation to not dismiss Mahaffey, the committee wrote it was impressed with his involvement with the department and students.

"Committee members were impressed by Dr. Mahaffey's frequent field trips with students, his involvement of students in professional meetings, his long hours spent in helping students on class projects, his work to accredit his program (natural resource management), his skilled use of visual aids and his leadership in helping the Natural Resources Management Club win the Agricultural Science Day first-place award for three years."

Mahaffey's conflicts within the forestry department which caused him to file faculty grievances for unfair merit pay increases and faculty evaluations in 1979, 1980 and 1981 were primarily with his supervisors, the report stated.

"Dr. Mahaffey had a history of insensitivity and lack of respect for administrators and supervisors. Although he may have truly felt that the lack of teaching experience and formal degrees made his supervisors 'incompetent,' this is not sufficient grounds (sic) for his persistent uncooperative behavior. Certainly the administrators in the Department of Forestry are not without blame for their actions."

"However, it is notable that Dr. Mahaffey failed to develop a cooperative relationship with any of his supervisors," the report stated.

The four administrators who signed the dismissal letter — Provost Owen Koeppel; John Dunbar, dean of the College of Agriculture; David Mugler, associate dean of agriculture and director of resident instruction; and Jay Schultz, head of the Department of Forestry — declined to comment on the results of the report Monday.

"My only comment is I know it's out and the decision is up to the president," Dunbar said.

In an interview Monday, Mahaffey said he was elated with the decision and praised Faculty Senate for the hearing's procedures.

"(The hearing) was about as close to a court of law as you could get without being in one," he said. "I felt if there was any justice in that hearing, I would win it."

"They documented a lot of things and put them in my file, but they couldn't prove them. And in this type of hearing, they had to prove it and they couldn't."

Mahaffey said he was hopeful Acker would follow the committee's recommendation, adding, "I'm anxious to get back into the classroom."

"I'm hoping bygones will be bygones. I've had no troubles with the present head (Schultz). I feel I can get along with him," he said.

"When he came on board, I thought this would be the end of it and things would blow over."

But when asked what he would do if Acker does not follow the recommendation and dismisses him, Mahaffey said, "If that would be the case, I certainly wouldn't stop in my pursuit of fair play ... I won't stop in my pursuit of justice."

K-State football Coach Jim Dickey and his staff will begin spring practice March 29 with hopes of building a winning team for the 1984 season.

Wildcat football squad returns 16 starters; good depth, talent at offensive positions

The K-State football team will begin spring practice March 29, and one thing Wildcat Head Coach Jim Dickey will be looking for is "some real headhunters at linebacker," an area in which the 'Cats were lacking during last year's 3-8 season.

The Wildcats return 50 lettermen — 28 on offense and 22 on defense. Nine offensive starters and seven defensive starters are among the returning lettermen.

"We need to work hard this spring on defending against the pass. But we've got to get the right personnel at the right positions in order to do this," Dickey said. "We have good athletes at linebacker, but we'll be looking for some real head knockers."

The Wildcat defense finished sixth in the Big Eight Conference against the rush, allowing 221.5 yards per game on the ground. The defense finished seventh in points per game as the unit gave up 31.2 points per outing.

"I think our offensive line and our offensive backs would have to be the strengths of our team," Dickey said. "We have good depth and talent at those positions."

"Also our kicking game is in good hands. I would compare our two kickers (place kicker Steve Willis and punter Scott Fulhage) with any other kicking duo in the nation."

The offensive line will be anchored by 6-foot-5, 280-pound tackle Damian Johnson. Johnson, a senior, is a three-year letterman who possesses good speed, Dickey said.

Senior Stan Weber will be the man at the helm of the Wildcat offense. The 6-foot-1, 185-pounder didn't make his first start until mid-season, but responded by vastly improving K-State's offensive effort. After taking over as the starting quarterback, the 'Cats scoring average rose from 13.1 to 23.5; rushing yardage jumped from 154 to 268 yards per game; total yardage rose to 379 yards from 268 and third down efficiency jumped from 25 percent to 64 percent.

"I feel more comfortable with our offense now than ever before," Dickey said. "That's because we have so many starters returning. We plan to work quite a bit on our passing this spring and also try to develop our option game to a greater extent."

The purple-white intra-squad game is scheduled for April 28, the last day of spring practice.

"We need to put people where they can play the best. We will have extremely close competition at all positions, but we would like to come out of spring with a definite starter at each position," Dickey said.

"We will have a lot of emphasis on fundamentals and contact work in order to arrive at our goals."

The Wildcats open their 1984 schedule against Vanderbilt University at Nashville, Tenn.

Drug screening to educate athletes

All K-State athletes will be introduced to a mandatory drug testing program at a meeting March 26. The program is being established to comply with a recent resolution by the National Collegiate Athletic Association requiring drug screening of athletes at all member institutions.

Guest speakers at the local meeting will be Dr. Guy Smith, K-State's athletic physician, and Carl Eller, a former member of the Minnesota Vikings football team.

The NCAA resolution states that the use of controlled substances and alleged performance-enhancing drugs represents a danger to the health of students and a threat to the integrity of amateur sports. The drug testing should identify those students involved in athletic competition who have used the substances.

The purpose of the program is to educate student-athletes with the dangers of substance abuse. The intention of the program is not to punish anyone, but to treat individuals with drug or emotional problems.

"We plan to implement it here this spring," Dick Towers, director of athletics, said.

Under one guideline of the program, the athletes sign a consent form giving the athletic medicine department permission to test the athlete at four randomly scheduled examinations at a maximum of four times per year.

The results of the tests will be given only to Smith and the drug rehabilitation program personnel.

Any of the athletes with a positive test will have a confidential meeting with Smith and will be referred to the drug rehabilitation program for counseling, which also is directed by Smith.

Only the medical personnel will know which athletes are participating in the program. No information will be released about any athlete during or after completion of the program as long as they are making a good effort to comply with the drug rehabilitation program. However, if an athlete fails to comply with the program, the head coach of the athletes particular sport and Towers will be informed.

When asked if there have been any problems with athletes using drugs in the past, Tower's said, "not that we know of."

Drugs such as amphetamines and stimulants are thought to be the ones most commonly used by athletes.

"Several drugs are thought to enhance performance, but I don't believe there are any that truly do that," Smith said.

McLain hit with racketeering charges

By The Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — Former major league pitcher Denny McLain has been charged in a racketeering indictment that alleges conspiracy, cocaine violations, loan sharking for lending money at 150 percent interest, and extortion for threatening violence to collect unlawful debts.

A five-count indictment was opened Monday charging the one-time Detroit Tigers star on all counts and six others with various offenses. The charges include racketeering, conspiracy, extortion and implied threats, possession of 13 kilos of cocaine and conspiracy to import 400 kilos of cocaine.

Last May, after Tampa TV station WFLA ran a series of reports that he was under investigation, McLain denied any wrongdoing.

He said at that time he was "not a bum, not a crook, not a dope peddler ... I am guilty of many things — bad judgment, bad investment, being a little rowdy, maybe. I'm no angel, but I'm not guilty of any of the charges that TV station has made."

U.S. Attorney Robert Merkle said McLain would surrender before arraignment in Tampa Thursday. Two others now are behind bars and the rest were arrested in Los Angeles, Newark, N.J., and Miami.

Among the acts alleged were that McLain at times with others worked through a mortgage-lending firm lending money at a rate as high as 150 percent interest, collected extended credit by extortion, interfered with commerce, took illegal bets on football and basketball games and conspired to import and distribute cocaine.

McLain, 39, posted a 31-6 record and 1.96 earned run average in 1968, leading the Tigers to the American League pennant and winning the A.L.'s Most Valuable Player and Cy Young awards.

The 6-foot-1 right-hander was 24-9 in 1969 and was named co-winner of the Cy Young Award with Baltimore's Mike Cuellar. McLain also was a 20-game winner in 1966.

His major league career plunged after the 1969 season. Baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn suspended McLain in 1970 for alleged involvement in bookmaking three years earlier. McLain was reinstated late that season and was immediately traded to the Washington Senators in a deal involving eight players.

He was 10-22 with a 4.27 ERA in 1971 and Washington dealt him to the Oakland Athletics the next year, his last season in the majors. He retired with a 10-year record of 131-91 and career ERA of 3.39.

McLain now lives in Tampa and associated with an emergency walk-in clinic in Sarasota.

Charged with him were Seymour Sher of Los Angeles, associated with Jay-Re Inc.; Frank "The General" Cocchiaro, a New York native who moved to Florida but is serving a 10-year sentence for mail fraud; and Larry Knott, who is in prison on federal drug violations.

Also charged were Barry Nelson of Newark, who works with Crown Bullion Inc.; Mel Kaplan and Jose Rodriguez, both of Miami.

Kaplan and Knott were charged with possession of cocaine; Rodriguez with conspiracy to smuggle cocaine; Sher and Cocchiaro with racketeering, conspiracy and extortion; Nelson with possession.

Merkle said First Fidelity Financial Services Inc. of Hollywood, Fla., was an equity mortgage lending company that acted as the clearing house or parent corporation for Tampa Equities Corp. and Sarasota Equities Corp. The Tampa and Sarasota businesses issued the loans, Merkle explained. The firms weren't indicted.

Nelson was named as vice president-director of the parent corporation and president of the two subsidiaries. McLain was the office manager for Tampa Equities Corp.

Grand jurors said Nelson and McLain required potential borrowers who were in financial trouble to agree to pay a cash kickback to them from the proceeds of the loan.

Women's team nets three road victories

Making a swing to the south, the K-State women's tennis team found success, winning three of four duel matches during spring break.

The team opened play March 14 in Commerce, Texas, blanking East Texas State University, 9-0. K-State was paced by straight-set victories from Tamie Peugh and Carlye Madelen in singles competition. Peugh, K-State's top-rated player, posted a 6-4, 6-3 win while Madelen, playing in the No. 3 spot, claimed a 6-3, 6-2, win.

No. 2 player Susan Peugh, No. 4 player Kim Black and No. 5 player Lisa Creighton posted three set wins in their matches. Erica Anderson, playing No. 6, won by default.

In doubles play, the teams of Black and Madelen, Peugh and Peugh, and Anderson and Creighton posted wins.

On March 15, K-State again captured a 9-0 win, beating the University of Texas at Arlington.

K-State dominated the duel match as Texas-Arlington was unable to win a set in any of the nine matches. Tamie Peugh was the most dominant player, win-ing 6-0, 6-0 in No. 1 competition. No. 6 Anderson had the closest singles match, winning 6-4, 6-3.

On March 16, K-State dropped its only duel of the road trip, falling to Texas Wesleyan University, 5-4, at Fort Worth.

Claiming wins for K-State in the loss were Tamie Peugh, winning 6-2, 6-0; Madelen, with a 6-2, 6-4 victory and Creighton, winning 6-2, 3-6, 6-0 in singles play. In doubles the team of Black and Madelen had the only win, 6-4, 6-4.

The team bounced back on March 17 to whip Oklahoma City University, 7-2.

All seven K-State wins were straight-set victories. Only Black, playing in the No. 3 spot, lost in singles play. In doubles, the team of Black and Madelen dropped K-State's only other match.

Joyce Allen, K-State assistant tennis coach, said she was happy with the play of the K-State team.

"They performed so well," she said. "We were really pleased with the team's overall performance."

Virginia cagers show life after Ralph

By The Associated Press

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — The hero of Virginia's National Athletic Association East Regional victory thinks the Cavaliers have already shown the world there is life — and a Cavalier team — after Ralph.

"We have nothing left to prove," said Rick Carlisle, who lobbied in the overtime 10-footer against Arkansas that sent Virginia to the regional semifinals against Syracuse Thursday night.

Many thought Virginia wouldn't even qualify, let alone compete for the national championship the year after star center Ralph Sampson graduated to the National Basketball Association.

"We were awfully glad just to be in the tournament," said junior forward Jim Miller.

The Cavaliers were ousted by Wake Forest in the first round of the ACC championship. They had the worst record — 17-11 — of the 24 teams with at-large NCAA bids. It was the first time since 1976 they didn't get a first-round bye as one of the top four teams in the area.

But as soon as the Cavaliers got into this year's tournament, they beat Iowa 58-57 in the first round and turned a last-minute Razorback deflection into the winning field goal and an overtime 53-51 victory.

"People can say all they want. All I know is we're going to the regionals," said senior guard Othell Wilson.

Even during the super Sampson years, Virginia went only two NCAA games further than it is now, when it made the Final Four in 1981, when Wilson and guard Ricky Stokes were freshmen.

So the celebration after the Arkansas game, when Carlisle was hugged by teammates and mascot Carmen Davis was knocked over, released the tensions of past years as well as this season.

"It's been a long, long time since I've seen a reaction from our players like that," Coach Terry Holland said.

Virginia had proved that basketball was still a team sport, and that they could play it. "We're capable of beating anybody. We've known that all along," Carlisle said. "To be successful, we need balance. We've had a lot of different guys score a lot. Othell is the guy who sets the tone on defense and offense, but we don't really have a superstar. We depend on each other."

Holland believed his team had a "decent chance to make the final 16. Now we've made it that far, and we don't have anybody who's getting a lot of national recognition. Sure, they know about Othell around the country, but he's not one of the really big-name players."

Holland thinks Virginia already proved what it could do when it defeated Houston in Japan last year when Sampson was out.

"I think a lot of people did underestimate us coming into the season ... I think people tended to look at us and say, 'They were a good basketball team with Ralph Sampson, but they won't be that good any more,'" Holland said.

"Hey, we've got good basketball players, smart basketball players and we play well together," the coach said. "We're back where we're supposed to be."

K-State rowers take first

K-State's rowing team captured a first place in the men's varsity four-man crew race while competing in the 2nd Annual Heart of Texas Regatta held at Austin, Texas.

K-State's victory was one bright spot in a meet dominated by the University of Kansas team. The KU squad took nine first places in the meet, while Wichita State University's team captured three first places, and Washburn University claimed one win. Teams from the Universities of Texas and Minnesota as well as the Austin Rowing Club also competed in the race held on Lake Austin, but were shut out in first place finishes.

Don Rose, K-State rowing coach, said the race illustrated his team's need for a new boat.

"K-State can no longer compete in eight-man races unless we go to carbon fiber boats," Rose said. "Not having the boat acts as an actual as well as a psychological handicap for our team."

Jucos request fee increases

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A spokesman for Kansas' 19 community colleges asked a Senate committee on Monday to support legislation permitting the schools to increase student tuition by 20 percent.

The bill, before the Senate Education Committee, would raise the limits on tuition that can be charged from the current range of $10-$15 per credit hour to $12-$18.

"Increasing the tuition range by 20 percent ... will enable community college boards to meet their fiscal obligations for the next few years and will permit the 19 community colleges ... to continue to provide quality educational opportunity at a relatively modest cost," said Merle Hill, executive director of the Kansas Association of Community Colleges.

School prayer falls 11 votes short in Senate

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate rejected on Tuesday President Reagan's proposal for a constitutional amendment to permit spoken prayer in the nation's public schools.

After two weeks of heated debate and intense lobbying by the president, senators voted 56-44 in favor of the measure, but 11 votes short of the two-thirds needed to pass a constitutional amendment.

This was the first time in five months all 100 senators were present for the vote. October 19 was the last when the Senate voted 78-22 in favor of a national holiday in honor of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

Sen. Lowell Weicker, R-Conn., leading the opposition to the amendment, said the proposal "would have us forfeit our birthright of religious liberty for a mess of speculative political pottage."

"We cannot bring our children closer to God by blaring a formula over the public address system of our schools. This is not a political issue. It should not be a political issue. If anyone makes it so, I hope it will be the cause of their defeat, Republican or Democrat."

But as the debate drew to a close, Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker Jr. said the choice was to "either restore the neutrality of the state with respect to religion, or officially affirm an anti-religious bias in our schools."

"This amendment simply restores the neutrality which ought always to have been the case in the exercise of religion," the Tennessee Republican said.

Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., an amendment supporter, told the Senate following the vote, "We have just begun to fight. As long as I'm in the U.S. Senate, there will be other rounds."

Helms said he would renew attempts to limit the jurisdiction of federal courts on the school prayer issue.

In a letter to supporters of the amendment who gathered in Washington for the vote, Reagan said the First Amendment "was designed to protect our religious liberty, not restrict it."

"But there are those who have distorted its meaning to achieve a freedom from religion instead of freedom of religion."

School prayer was the last of the social issues pushed by the so-called New Right in the 1980 elections to come before the Senate. The president promised his constituency a vote on school prayer, and he delivered it.

Reagan has been unable to deliver congressional passage on any of these constitutional issues — prohibitions against school busing and abortion, an effort to limit the authority of federal judges and a balanced budget amendment.

Baker rejected amendment opponents' charges that the president should not have been lobbying on something as personal as the prayer issue.

"It is a leadership prerogative of the president, and it's even more important when it's a morally sensitive issue like this," Baker told reporters.

But Weicker had called the president's lobbying efforts "tasteless" and said, "This is not the type of issue you can lobby on. It's a matter of deeply held beliefs, not like a missile system."

The Senate had rejected, 81-15, an alternative proposal that would have permitted only silent prayer or reflection in the nation's classrooms. That proposal was not acceptable to Reagan or the fundamentalist church groups pushing hardest for an amendment.

So heavy was the lobbying effort on behalf of the amendment that Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., chairman of the Judiciary Committee that approved the proposal, reported receiving 100,000 letters in support of it.

The amendment was designed to overturn 1962 and subsequent Supreme Court rulings that organized vocal prayers in the public schools violated the separation of church and state enshrined in the Constitution.

On the House side, a similar amendment is bottled up in the Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on civil and constitutional rights. The subcommittee's chairman, Rep. Don Edwards, D-Calif., opposes the amendment, as do most House leaders, but has scheduled hearings March 29.

Coliseum to bear fund-raiser's name

By MICHELE SAUER
Campus Editor

The Kansas Board of Regents on Friday named the University's new multi-purpose coliseum the Fred Bramlage Coliseum in response to a recommendation by K-State President Duane Acker.

"I'm surprised and happy, who wouldn't be?" Bramlage said. "But it's the 'Student Body Coliseum' as far as I'm concerned. I think it's great that the students voted it in. I said I would help all I can if the students voted it in."

Bramlage, a Junction City businessman and philanthropist, is serving as national development council chairman of a $7 million capital campaign which will provide a portion of the structure's $16 million cost.

The fund-raising campaign is in its final stage, and construction is expected to begin in 1985.

"It was nice of (Duane) Acker to recommend me and nice of the Regents to choose me," Bramlage said. "But the greatest thing about it is that the students chose it. I've never heard of any other student body doing that. There couldn't be any better students than the students at K-State."

Art Loub, executive vice president of the KSU Foundation, said naming the coliseum in honor of Bramlage was a natural choice.

"There wasn't any competition," Loub said. "He has affluence and influence."

"I believe it's common knowledge that Fred got the campaign moving with a gift of $1.25 million. He later added another $500,000. It would have been easy at that point for Fred to sit back and say he'd done his share."

"Fred has communicated with me virtually every day since the campaign began last April, and he has played an integral part in mapping out strategy and making personal calls to present our case to potential donors."

Bramlage graduated from K-State in 1935 with a degree in business administration, and has been a

Members of several sororities moved to the Ramada Inn, where lodging was offered at half price for victims of the storm. A blown transformer caused the delay in restoring service.

House approves funds for regents institutions

By The Associated Press

A funding bill for K-State, five other state universities and the Kansas Technical Institute in Salina passed the House Tuesday, 110-13, and advanced to the Senate with $2.5 million less than Gov. John Carlin recommended be spent.

Lawmakers in the lower chamber actually added several million dollars to Carlin's proposed spending level, however, all money for classified employees salary increases — about $5.6 million suggested by Carlin — was taken out of the bill.

Traditionally, salary increases for the classified workers, such as janitors, maintenance workers and secretaries, are taken out of appropriations bills and handled later in the session. The $5.6 million would equal a 5 percent raise.

The biggest chunk of general fund tax money goes to the University of Kansas in Lawrence, which would receive $77.3 million. In addition, lawmakers penciled in $59.5 million for the KU Medical Center in Kansas City, bringing the total state dollars for KU to $136.8 million.

Kansas State University at Manhattan would receive $73 million from the state treasury and the K-State Veterinary Medical Center would get another $5 million.

Wichita State University's allotment of tax dollars would total $34 million and Emporia State University would receive $16 million.

Pittsburg State University would get $15.7 million and Fort Hays State University would receive $14.9 million.

KTT's budget would be $2.9 million and the regents board would receive $5.6 million.

Included in the bill is $5.9 million to finalize a 4.5 percent salary increase granted last year. The House bill also increases by $1.7 million the $10.7 million Carlin suggested for faculty salaries.

Carlin wanted 6 percent increases for faculty but the House added money to boost salaries 7 percent. The House deleted $2 million from the regents board for salary increases.

Student workers would get a 5 percent pay hike on their hourly wages under the bill, at a cost of $314,000.

The House bumped up the $3.5 million increase in other operating expenses that Carlin recommended for the universities. Carlin wanted to give schools a 5 percent increase, but the House added $710,000 to bring it to a 6 percent raise.

Collegian Reporter

If the United States maintains its current Latin American policy, it will lead to increased instability, said Bill Buzenberg, the Latin America correspondent for National Public Radio. Buzenberg spoke on "A Critical Question: U.S. Foreign Policy in Central America" at the third Lou Douglas Lecture on Public Affairs this semester in Union Forum Hall Tuesday.

A K-State graduate, Buzenberg won the Robert F. Kennedy Journalism Award in 1982 for his NPR series on refugees and immigration. He joined the NPR staff in Washington in 1978.

Buzenberg compared American policy to a railroad track. He said the train, U.S. policy, can derail like it did in Southeast Asia in the 1960s, or it can switch tracks toward negotiations.

The first thing that needs to be done, Buzenberg said, is to dispel seven generally accepted myths concerning Central America.

The first myth, and the most important one, is that violence is caused by poverty and economic injustice. The violence, he said, is caused by politics.

Bill Buzenberg

"There is a blocked access to power, and that causes revolution. Honduras and Mexico are poor, but they are relatively stable because these countries have channels of change. Dissenters in El Salvador are either killed, exiled or join guerilla groups," he said.

The second myth is that more economic aid can alleviate poverty. Buzenberg said economic aid should only be given to reform-minded countries.

The third generalization is that more American military aid will defeat the guerillas and bring peace. Buzenberg said this couldn't happen.

"Political reform is essential to end violence. In most of the Latin American countries, the military calls the shots. The United States is relying on the military to bring about the reforms," he said.

The fourth myth is that no one knows who controls El Salvador's death squads. Journalists and investigators point their fingers at Roberto D'Aubuisson, right-wing presidential candidate, and the security forces, he said. This killing is intrinsic to the regime, and the power structure must be changed.

The fifth myth is that elections held during wartime are likely to produce stable leaders. Buzenberg said he fears a civilian president would not be able to change military rule.

That the United States supports the Contradora peace proposal is the sixth myth. The Contradora group is composed of Columbia, Venezuela, Mexico and Panama. Its objective is to use diplomacy to bring peace. One way it plans to do this is by reducing military aid. The backers of this proposal don't believe the United States is helping them, Buzenberg said.

The last myth is that Soviet- or Cuban-backed assistance to a country makes them an enemy of the United States. Buzenberg said leftist regimes are not automatically wrong.

The conclusion, Buzenberg said, is that the United States must protect its interests. It has chosen to do this by military intervention. Although Nicaragua has asked for talks, the U.S. government has declined, saying it (the Nicaraguan government) is insincere, although it has never been tested.

"There is a clear choice: the Contradora and negotiations or increased American intervention," he said.

City extends Roebuck's redevelopment contract

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

Manhattan City Commissioners at their Tuesday meeting granted Forest City Enterprises, the developing firm in charge of downtown redevelopment, an additional 45 days to reach a supplemental agreement with the city on its participation in the project.

Mel Roebuck, vice president of Forest City, said Manhattan's situation concerning land for the mall is unusual.

"This is the first project I have ever worked on where the land is not ready to move," Roebuck said. "I'm not complaining. I'm just explaining."

Mayor Wanda Fateley said Roebuck shouldn't be surprised because it was known all along that land wouldn't be acquired by this stage of the project.

Plans for the downtown mall were in question when one of the department stores, The Jones Store Co., decided to withdraw from the project. Another department store, Dillard's, gave notice to Roebuck that it would fill the vacancy, but there has been no written confirmation.

Some commissioners were frustrated by the recent turn of events and remained skeptical. Commissioner Eugene Klingler was one.

"Maybe it's just Midwestern mental, but I don't understand how a firm can get this far and pull out," Klingler said.

Roebuck replied that situations like this are part of the business world.

"This is a tough business we're all in," Roebuck said. "Until there is a signed lease, there is no lease. Until there is a signed mortgage, there is no mortgage."

"I wish you wouldn't make this a moral statement. What Jones did was not immoral. It was a business aspect. It is not easy to be on the verge of success and have your legs cut out from under."

Klingler asked if the agreement with Dillard's is any more binding than the Jones Store pact. Roebuck said it isn't.

"We've been working hand in hand with UDAG," Klingler said. "Our concern is that we don't want the project to fall through and have the businesses down."

Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood said the city's risk has increased in small increments, and now it's a major problem. She asked Roebuck if there is any way Forest City could put up more money to acquire land.

"I would say there is no possibility," Roebuck replied.

Commissioners also voted to authorize Fateley to enter into a contract for relocation services with the Vector Corp. with an amendment stating that the city be able to cancel that agreement after prenegotiating services if the supplemental agreement with Forest City is not reached.

Lindamood voted against this measure, stating that city staff could do the same prenegotiating services which require meeting with the planned displaced businesses for about a week to conduct interviews, answer questions and determine the needs of the firms.

Community Development Director Gary Stith said Vector would establish a field office in early April to conduct those interviews.

BSU sponsors political forum

A political awareness forum featuring representatives of each presidential candidate will be at 7:30 p.m. today in the Union Ballroom.

The program, sponsored by Black Student Union, will include William Mondale, representing his father Walter Mondale; William McNary, state youth coordinator for the Jesse Jackson campaign; and Samuel Keys, K-State representative for the Gary Hart campaign.

David Owens, state GOP chairman, will represent the Reagan campaign.

Acker announces dean of architecture

By KARRA PORTER
Staff Writer

The selection of the new dean of the College of Architecture and Design was announced by K-State President Duane Acker Tuesday at a press conference. Acker also commented on the education appropriations bill passed by the Kansas House of Representatives last week and outlined his goals for the College of Veterinary Medicine.

Mark B. Lapping, currently director of the University School of Rural Planning and Development at the University of Guelph in Guelph, Ontario, Canada, will assume the office in August 1984. He is replacing Bernd Foerster, who has asked to be relieved from his responsibilities as dean but will remain a faculty member.

Acker indicated Lapping's experience at Guelph will transfer to K-State because of similarities between the two campuses.

"The University of Guelph is rather comparable to Kansas State University in terms of its curriculum, its components and its activities," he said.

Lapping has visited K-State twice in the past month and received good reviews, Acker said.

"We are very impressed with Dr. Lapping. He has left a strong imprint on our faculty and our students and those who will be his administrative colleagues," he said.

Acker said although Lapping is relatively young, 37, he has a wealth of experience in writing, research and consulting. He has been on the faculty of Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University, State University of New York at Plattsburgh and the Universities of Missouri and Vermont.

Lapping also has been involved with numerous Canadian and U.S. projects, including rural development policy in Canada, the Tennessee Valley Authority, National Trust for Historic Preservation and the U.S. Water Resources Council.

Acker also discussed the benefits for K-State if the Board of Regents' appropriations bill, recently passed by the Kansas House, is passed by the Senate.

"It's certainly a step in the right direction," he said, citing some positive factors in the legislation.

The proposed 7 percent hike in faculty salaries would result in "one of those rare times" when a salary increase surpasses the rate of inflation, he said. In addition, the increase might make K-State more competitive in securing and retaining qualified faculty, he said, although it is difficult to compete with colleges untouched by the economic crunch.

"We are in better competition with some, but have a lesser ability to compete with others," he said. "In this general area ... on the average it (appropriations bill) might improve our competition just a hair."

Boosting faculty in the College of Veterinary Medicine will be a primary factor in making K-State one of the top six veterinary medicine schools in the country, Acker said. To reach that goal, it will be necessary to increase funding for approximately 30 college faculty positions currently filled by trainees and persons with a lesser level of experience, he said. Those positions would then be filled with specialists, board-certified faculty and "senior-level faculty," he said.

That action could boost private and federal research grants to several million dollars, compared to the current $450,000 total, Acker said.

Other goals for the veterinary medicine college include strengthening the diagnostic laboratory and providing more continuing education for practicing veterinarians, Acker said. There would also be efforts to increase the actual experience received by students, lessened now by a wide teacher-to-student ratio.

Faculty debates mid-term grade policy

By KARRA PORTER
Staff Writer

Faculty Senate tackled the controversial issue of a new mid-term grade policy at its Tuesday meeting in the Union Big Eight Room.

The senate heard a proposal to change the current mid-term grade policy of mailing letter grades to all freshmen and transfer students. Under the new proposal, all students except graduate students would be rated as "Satisfactory" or "Unsatisfactory," with notification going to those receiving the latter rating.

Sandy Coyner, director of women's studies and member of the Academic Affairs committee which presented the motion, said the new system would eliminate some problems with the current policy.

"One (of the problems) was a rumor we had heard that some faculty members were giving all students a C because they (faculty) felt they didn't have enough information to discriminate grades at that time, and the other was we felt there was a relatively large percentage of blank grades," she said.

Coyner said 19 percent of the University's mid-term grades are turned in blank, with the percentages varying from 11 percent to 32 percent among individual colleges. This indicates a problem in communication between instructors and students. The satisfactory/unsatisfactory mark would encourage students to consult with their instructors and advisers, she said.

Opposition was raised by faculty members who complained the new system would give less information to students, was unnecessary for upper-level students and would be difficult to implement without specific guidelines.

Arlo Biere, professor of economics, said the proposal is vague regarding what is or is not satisfactory. If an upper-level student is unaware of his status in a class by mid-term, then another type of problem exists, he said.

The proposal was defended by Embert Coles, professor of laboratory medicine, who said the College of Veterinary Medicine currently uses a similar system successfully and supports the system's expansion to all students.

No agreement was reached, and the proposal was voted 34 to 17 back to the Academic Affairs committee.

A proposal that blank grades be designated on transcripts as "NR," not reported, was approved with little discussion.

In other action, senate members gave final approval to course and curriculum changes in four colleges, all of which had been previously approved by the individual colleges.

The senate also voted unanimously to endorse a resolution supporting Farrell Library's efforts to obtain membership in the Association of Research Libraries.

The senate was not unanimous, however, in its discussion of the Traffic and Parking Council's recommendation to handle moving violations on campus.

Opponents said they were concerned about the apparent double standard of the proposal: Moving violations handled on campus would not appear on a person's driving record, while those handled at the county court would.

The Traffic and Parking Council's proposal was eventually endorsed.

The senate bestowed honorary doctoral degrees on four men. Their names are being kept confidential to maintain the element of surprise.

U-Learn Line

Pre-enrollment is coming up and I still don't have any idea what to major in. Any suggestions?

First of all, don't despair! Choosing a major and career direction is a difficult task for most people. Research indicates that the average K-State student changes his major three times.

Research also indicates the more effort put into choosing a major, the more likely the decision is to be satisfying for you.

There are numerous services available on campus to assist you. "Career Choices," a booklet written by David A. Blankenship, lists four primary resources for students needing assistance in making career decisions:

1. The Counseling Center, Holton 103, provides individual and group career counseling by professional counselors. The center also provides career interest testing and other self-assessment services. Appointments may be made by calling 532-6927.

2. The Career Planning and Placement Center, Holtz Hall, provides a variety of career exploration services. A microcomputer focuses on values and interest clarification. The center also offers various career symposiums and career resources.

3. U-Learn, staffed by trained students, offers Kansas Careers, a computer-based career guidance system, career information and choosing-a-major workshops. Two such workshop series are planned this spring. The first one begins Thursday at 3:30 p.m. and continues for the next two Thursdays. To sign up for the workshops or request more information, call 532-6442 or come to Holton 2.

4. K-State has eight degree-granting colleges. Advisers in each of the colleges are valuable resources when making a career decision.

NOTE: U-Learn Line is a weekly column devoted to a variety of issues concerning K-State students. If you have any questions or issues you would like to have addressed through the column, please contact Laurie Fairburn at Holton 2 or call 532-6442.

Faculty ruling raises questions

After the initial reaction of surprise to the unanimous decision to reinstate Ben Mahaffey to the classroom subsidies, some troubling thoughts arise.

Why was the decision of the special Faculty Senate committee unanimous? How will this case affect other reprimands of faculty? Would Mahaffey's firing have changed the code of ethics for administrative treatment of tenured professors?

Mahaffey, associate professor of forestry, was recommended for dismissal in a letter dated Aug. 18, 1983. Four University administrators cited professional incompetence as the reason for Mahaffey's suspension. Mahaffey appealed to Faculty Senate, and a special committee heard the case for two weeks in January. After deliberation, the committee found the administration "failed to provide clear and convincing evidence that Dr. Mahaffey was professionally incompetent."

After hearing testimony disputing and supporting Mahaffey's competence as a professor, did the committee act fairly in its decision? Did committee members fear a change in administrative treatment of all faculty if such unprecedented action against a University professor succeeded?

The last question is answered most easily. The recommendation to dismiss Mahaffey and his suspension were the first such actions taken against a tenured faculty member in all 120 years of K-State's history.

Was the committee attempting its own reprimand, but aiming at the administration after its violation of the seemingly sacred turf of tenure? Or were they attempting to protect their professional privilege by ensuring no tenured faculty member would be fired?

For tenure to be violated is indeed a frightening circumstance all faculty would be wary of. But the question of whether the committee was totally objective and fair in its decision is debatable.

Prayer debate hides real issues

Congresswoman Patricia Schroeder, D-Colo., responding to a question after she delivered a Landon Lecture Monday morning, compared the debate on school prayer to a circus distracting people from important issues. Problems that should be discussed are shuffled by the wayside, she said.

Schroeder is right. The real issue deserving the attention of Congress is education, not prayer in schools.

Several measures have been passed recently concerning the improvement of education for high school students.

The National Collegiate Athletic Association has legislated an amendment to their Qualifier Rule requiring a high school student to do more than simply maintain a 2.0 grade point average in high school. The amendment defines the kinds of courses necessary to maintain that GPA if the student wishes to be admitted to a Division I college.

The high school student will be required to complete a core curriculum of at least 11 academic courses, including three years of English, two years of math, two years of social science and two years of natural or physical science. This sets a standard of education Division I colleges can expect from students who desire to compete in collegiate athletics.

The Missouri State Board of Education also has taken steps to improve requirements for high school graduation in that state.

The number of units required for graduation was raised from 20 to 22 and must include three units of English, two units each of math, science and social studies, and one unit each of fine arts, practical arts and physical education.

These are the steps needed to improve the quality of education in U.S. high schools today. But instead of proposing and encouraging steps like these, Congressional leaders and the media have been misled to debate prayer in school — as if reinstating prayer (a traditional value) will improve the quality of our nation's educational system.

As Congresswomen Schroeder said sarcastically, what the public really needs is for the nation's boards of education to debate what prayers to allow in school, instead of discussing the quality of education of math, English and computer science.

Connie Woodard, for the editorial board

LaRue, Andy Ostmeier, Karra Porter, Dan Robison, Mike Turner, Lee White and Connie Woodard.

True perception of prayer issue

"Senator, telephone."

The senator was weary of talking to his constituents. All they can talk about is this prayer amendment, he thought. Never mind half the world is starving or that nuclear war is fast becoming a possibility. All they want to talk about is letting kids pray in school.

There's already prayer in schools, the senator thought. Shoot, I used to pray before every test.

"Hello, Senator Everyman here."

"Hello, John." The voice belonged to Rev. Goodman, his pastor back home. The senator sighed.

"What can I do for you, Reverend?"

"John, there's talk here that you are going to vote against the school prayer amendment. I thought I'd call you to find out your position on the amendment."

Geez, not him, too, the senator thought.

"Well, Reverend, I'm still trying to sort out all the legalities of the proposal, and..."

"John, John, John," the minister chided, "why do we have to talk about legalities? The First Amendment guarantees the right of religion. We know the government can't legislate an official religion, but the Constitution doesn't say our students should be deprived of the right to pray in public schools."

"John, you and your colleagues open each day with a prayer," the minister said. "Why can't our students do the same?"

Well, he's been listening to President Reagan, the senator thought.

"Reverend, you've made a good argument for the amendment," the senator said. "Tell the folks back home I'm still looking at the legalities of the amendment. It's not as simple as some people think."

"What's the problem, John?"

"Pastor, you and I share one faith," the senator said. "We believe in certain things and follow certain practices."

"But there are other faiths, other religions in this country. We, as representatives of our constituents, must be careful not to legislate one type of faith on everyone, because there are more faiths in our country than the one you and I share."

"John, what's wrong with allowing our students to pray in the schools that our tax money has financed?"

"Nothing, Reverend," the senator said. "I just want to make sure the bill is constitutional."

"Thank you, John. Keep up the good work. Goodbye."

"Goodbye, Reverend."

The senator rubbed his eyes. It was 9 p.m. He had arrived at the office at 7 a.m. to take care of some personal business. He was ready to go home and sleep.

As he rose from his chair, a letter dropped from his desk to the floor. The senator picked it up. It was unopened.

Well, I can read this before I leave, he thought.

He opened the letter. A sheet of notebook paper awaited him. He saw the handwriting was neat, but in pencil.

"Dear Senator Everyman, how are you?" the letter read. "I am a student at Smalltown Junior High School. I am in the seventh grade."

The senator smiled. He remembered his youth and the experiences he had in Smalltown.

"Our government teacher, Mr. Jones, requires us to write a letter to a government official as part of the class requirements. I chose you because I know you're going to vote on the school prayer amendment."

Oh, no, the senator thought. Not this again.

"I think the amendment is unnecessary," the letter continued, "because we can pray in school now."

"Some kids pray by their lockers early in the morning. Some pray before eating lunch. Some pray before football or basketball games."

"We've been studying the Constitution," the letter said, "and we've talked about prayer in schools. Isn't it true the Supreme Court just prohibited a state or school district from writing a prayer and forcing kids to pray it?"

Yes, I believe so, the senator thought.

"Well, why should a school or state or even the federal government force a kid to pray if he doesn't want to?" the letter said. "My parents say prayer is a personal communication with God. I don't think the government or anybody should tell someone what or when to pray."

"I know you probably won't read this, because I'm just a kid. I hope your aide tells you about it. Thank you."

"Sincerely, Jack Smith," the closing read.

Thank you, Jack, the senator thought. There is someone out there who understands the issue.

Decision inconsiderate of faculty, staff...

Editor,

I say give a red rose to Vicki Nearing for her poem "Twas the day of the Kansas snowstorm..." and a red rose to Lee White for the editorial "Storm snowblinds administration," both in the March 20 Collegian.

The article "Electrical outages bypass University," also in the March 20 Collegian, mentioned that the power never went off, but what it did was blink off and on, so every time the lights blinked telephones rang, smoke alarms sounded and computers were shut down because of surges in power.

Charles Hein mentioned three reasons why K-State was not closed Monday.

— "We are a residential college and most of the students were back."

"Residential college?"

Are the schools in Manhattan not residential? Students might live on campus, as does the president of the University, but many of the faculty and staff live off campus and have to drive some distance to work. How does a school function with students and no faculty or staff to open offices and classrooms?

— "We (the University administrators) felt that the storm was going to slack off."

What radio and/or TV station did they listen to? Weather information I heard said more snow and ice through the day, continuing into the night, icy roads, etc. Slacking off?

— "We do not close the University, ever."

ty, ever."

If the University never closes, what happened on Feb. 1 and 2 of 1983? Were we off for good behavior? No, the weather was bad, and for the safety of the students, faculty and staff, the University closed. So you cannot say the University "does not close, ever."

Also mentioned was no accidents on campus. Fine, what about people trying to drive/walk/slide to K-State who had to get to campus? I wonder how many accidents there were between their home and the University? There were ice, downed trees and downed power lines practically everywhere. It couldn't have been a 100 percent accident-free day in Manhattan.

Another problem which occurs when schools and day care centers close (except for K-State) is finding a place for your children while you go to K-State. Single parents or families with both parents working suffer. Single parents are pulled to

...ignores weather changes

Editor,

The decision to keep K-State open Monday may have been made on the unpredictability of Kansas weather.

So this also may have been the basis for spending thousands of precious dollars to remove the snow from campus parking lots. Weather forecasts promised temperatures by mid-week in the 50s, which would take care of the slush in nature's ef-either stay with their child or come to K-State. Young parents who both work choose which one stays home and which one goes to K-State (unless one is lucky enough not to work at K-State).

What it all amounts to is that the highway patrol, police department, television and radio were all reporting that people should stay in their homes unless it was an emergency. This was for our protection so that we didn't get hurt from tree limbs falling on us or from power lines breaking, from the blinding snow or from slipping on ice and possibly hurting ourselves.

For our protection.

Yet, as students, faculty and staff, we had to venture out to come to K-State. I too agree with Lee White that something needs to be done about K-State's guidelines on closing the campus.

Failure to close after snowstorm unrealistic

Editor,

Re: "Electrical outages bypass University," in the March 19 Collegian.

It seems the powers that be, in their "unquestionable wisdom," made a decision Sunday based on ego. I quote Charles Hein, "...we felt the storm was going to slack off..." and "we do not close the University, ever."

Who are these "we's," anyway? Anyone traveling west on I-70 (or any highway toward Manhattan) late Sunday evening can attest to the nature of the storm. Anyone who paid attention to the numerous weather reports Sunday night can certainly, and rightly, question the lack of logic behind the administrative decision not to cancel classes on Monday.

Personally, the egos of the "we's" don't bother me. My husband and I spent a quiet, warm and safe Sunday night in a Kansas City motel. Yes, we both had classes on Monday and yes, we both missed them. The way we see it, missing one day of class due to unsafe travel conditions sure beats missing a month or two due to an accident caused by unnecessary lack of caution.

It would seem that foolish pride has gotten in the way of logic and realistic consideration of circumstances.

By the way, Mr. Hein, the students are the people who keep this university open, not your ego. Think about it.

Editor,

Re: "Students' choices raise county abortion rate," in the March 1 Collegian.

As I read the recent article on abortion, I was not surprised to find the rate of abortion twice as high in this county as in the rest of the state. These figures alone should serve to dispel the frequently held opinion that the majority of abortions are performed on the poor and uneducated, whose only other option is to raise an unwanted, unloved child.

I can't help but recall a recent article in a national magazine that described one couple's long search for a baby — a search that cost thousands of dollars and finally resulted in a trip to another country in order to find a baby to adopt.

Another recent news story told of how hundreds of families gave thousands of dollars to some women in the vain hope that they would be able to adopt children from Mexico.

While I wish with all my heart that all unwanted children from any country could be cared for by loving parents, the cost and the red tape prohibits most childless parents from doing so.

How can we justify destroying children while many wait years and spend thousands for the privilege of caring for a child?

I am heartsick.

Airliner, snow truck collide

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A Continental Airlines Boeing 727 taxiing in a ramp area collided with a snow removal truck Tuesday at Kansas City International Airport.

No one on the plane was injured, according to John Ellis, a spokesman for the Federal Aviation Administration. The driver of the truck, Frederick Silva, was listed in good condition at North Kansas City Memorial Hospital with cuts.

The plane, Flight 335 to Denver, was preparing for takeoff when the airport snow removal truck backed up and struck the plane under the left wing, said Cliff Trainer, Continental's station manager in Kansas City.

The left wing of the plane was damaged, Trainer said, and the passengers were placed on other airliners.

"Airliners always have the right of way on the ramp when taxiing, but it's too early to tell who is to blame," Trainer said. Ellis said the FAA is investigating and the National Transportation Safety Board was notified.

Cryts now plows political fields

OMAHA, Neb. — Less than five years ago, farmer Wayne Cryts was leading farm protests, challenging court orders and being jailed.

Now, Cryts said Monday, he's fighting for farmers in a different way. As chairman of the American Agriculture movement's political action committee, he urges farmers to become involved in politics.

"We have a political system in this country that works, but you can't be represented unless you represent yourself," he said.

Cryts is in Nebraska this week to help publicize the problems facing American agriculture and urge greater participation in the political system, especially in formulation of the 1985 farm bill.

In 1979, his farm at Puxico, Mo., produced more than 33,000 bushels of soybeans and he stored them in a grain elevator. Then the elevator went bankrupt and a judge ruled that stored grain would be sold to pay the elevator's debts.

After trying to convince officials the grain was farmers' property and not elevator assets, Cryts went against the judge's order and moved his soybeans. He was later jailed for contempt.

Cryts said his experience taught him better ways to attain goals. "A person asked me once if I could eat an elephant and I said no. But he said I could if I ate it one bite at a time," Cryts said.

"Too many farmers wait to get involved until they get into bad financial problems and then try to swallow the elephant whole, and it just doesn't work."

Crowd greets freed Cuban captive

UNION CITY, N.J. — More than 1,500 people, most of them Cuban exiles, gathered to welcome Jose Rodriguez, a political prisoner released by the Cuban government after 22 years in prison.

Rodolfo Pardo, a leader in the exile community, said of Sunday's special mass at St. Anthony's Church that Cuban exiles here admire Rodriguez, 37, because he continued to defy the Castro regime throughout his incarceration.

Imprisoned in 1961 at 15 after he became disillusioned with Castro's revolution, Rodriguez was released last August and deported to Venezuela. He later settled in Miami.

'Underground railroad' takes family to safety

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The parents in a refugee family being led to sanctuary in a church group's "underground railroad" say they were labeled as guerrilla sympathizers in their native village in Guatemala because they were religious and social leaders.

Felipe and Elena Excot — that is the name the family has assumed to protect family and friends still in Guatemala — were "social promoters" in their peasant village in a mountainous region of southern Guatemala, they said in a series of interviews as the auto caravan traveled from Chicago to Washington.

In these volunteer roles, they said, they encouraged villagers to each put together a little bit of their land so that they could build a road to their fields; then they could rent a pickup truck to haul out their corn and beans instead of carrying 100-pound bags of produce on foot for miles.

The right-wing army commanders of Guatemala had a word for this, Felipe said: "Communism."

The "underground railroad," a loose network of 110 churches in 60 cities offering sanctuary to Central American refugees in this country illegally, arrived here Monday after stops in several other cities. The refugees and their 40 American "conductors" sang hymns, attended prayer services and unrolled their sleeping bags on church floors along the way.

After a series of meetings and rallies with critics of U.S. military aid to Central American countries Monday and Tuesday, the caravan was scheduled to head north today and arrive at the Weston Priory in Vermont on Saturday.

Felipe Excot said he and Elena were the first couple in their village to have a courtship rather than a traditional family-arranged marriage. He was a farmer, working a 32-square-meter plot of land for corn and beans. Elena stayed home with their children — the five now range in age from 11 years to 7 months — and contributed to the family income by weaving intricate, gaily colored wraps for which their Mayan culture is famous.

Living in a one-room adobe home with a straw thatched roof and a dirt floor, Felipe and Elena were among the few people in their village who could read. He said he had to flee when soldiers came looking for him after he organized 17 other men who could read into teams of two to conduct reading classes in the countryside.

He said local army commanders regarded that as subversive, and troops came looking for the men. "All 17 of them are dead now," Felipe said. "I was the only one to escape."

He fled to the countryside, making his way to the capital, Guatemala City. He did any odd jobs he could, and spent most nights sleeping outdoors.

Farrell book sale to solve library storage problem

Students and faculty will have the opportunity to purchase a variety of books from Farrell Library today.

An accumulation of books which have been donated to the library will be sold at the first such sale on campus.

"Many of the gifts we received duplicated what we already have in the library. In many cases, two copies are not warranted," Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said.

Prices will range from 25 cents to $1, and most of the books are hardback copies, said Sara Williams, library employee.

"The books are a hodge-podge of topics," she said. "Many deal with scientific subjects, a few with art, with one even titled 'The History of the Corset.'"

Because extra storage space for books is not available, Farrell administrators thought the book sale was the best solution, Williams said.

She said the University of Kansas, which has had a similar sale, advised library administrators to have the sale.

Speech students place in national tournament

Members of the Department of Speech and Speech Unlimited, K-State's speech and debate team, won several awards last weekend at the Delta Sigma Rho/Tau Kappa Alpha National Tournament, held at the University of Nebraska at Lincoln.

Tom Overmyer, junior in speech, won first place for dramatic interpretation. He performed a selection from the play, "I Never Sang For My Father" by Robert Anderson.

Kellie Sanders, senior in speech, won first place in extemporaneous speaking, fourth in informative speaking, and was a semi-finalist in both impromptu speaking and communication analysis.

Leota Dye, senior in general business administration, took fourth place in persuasive speaking and was a semifinalist in impromptu speaking.

Laura Memming, freshman in pre-medicine and political science, finished as a semifinalist in extemporaneous speaking and persuasive speaking.

Five students from K-State participated in the national competition, which was attended by 45 universities from across the nation.

member of the Foundation's Board of Trustees since 1959. He was elected to the Trustee's Executive Committee in 1976.

The Executive Committee is responsible for the direction of the policies of the Foundation. Loub said. The committee meets eight times a year and handles all gifts to the University.

"One of Fred's favorite sayings — one that he has often repeated during this campaign — is 'you raise money from your friends.' The progress of this campaign proves many people recognize the worth of Fred Bramlage. He has a lot of friends," Loub said.

As a philanthropic organization, the Foundation depends on the personal counsel and involvement of outstanding leaders, Loub said.

The coliseum is to be located south of the KSU Stadium and will serve as home for the men's and women's basketball teams and as a showcase for fine arts and cultural events, convocations, commencements and other all-University events.

The campaign enters its final month of fund-raising with $5.5 million in cash and pledges. The year-long, fund-raising effort will conclude in mid-April.

Loub said he expects the $7 million goal to be surpassed by April.

The $7 million contributed by K-State alumni and friends will provide a portion of the construction cost of the new facility. The balance of the financing will be provided by student fees and the K-State athletic department.

Wildcats find losses, rain aplenty in Texas

There was some good news and some bad news for the K-State baseball team, which traveled through Texas during spring break for a scheduled 13-game road trip.

The bad news is that they lost every game they played. The good news is that nine of the contests were rained out.

The four-game losing streak began on March 13 with a two-game sweep by Texas Christian University at Fort Worth. The Horned Frogs ripped the Wildcats 11-3 and 7-1 in the twin bill.

Gerry Zimmerman suffered his first loss in the opener against two victories and saw his earned run average jump up to 7.62.

In the second game, Lynn Lichter saw his record even out to 1-1 on the season. Lichter gave up 11 hits and two walks while striking out seven TCU batters.

The Wildcats were defeated 8-2 by the University of Texas at Arlington March 14.

The Mavericks dealt Wildcat hurler Mike Wilkerson his first loss in two starts as they rattled the K-State right-hander for seven earned runs and 11 hits.

Wildcat hitters could only manage six hits in the loss.

The four-game swoon ended with another loss to Texas Christian on March 15. TCU beat the Wildcats 12-7 to leave K-State's record at 6-4 on the season.

Third baseman John Tirrell, who is hitting .292 on the season, had a pair of hits for the 'Cats, as did second baseman Kerry Golden.

First baseman Otto Kaifes currently leads the Wildcats in hitting with a .385 average. Designated hitter Cary Colbert has a team-leading 11 RBIs to go along with his .321 batting average. Shortstop Todd Thiemert is hitting at a .313 clip.

Michigan coach questions NCAA bids

By The Associated Press

University of Michigan basketball Coach Bill Frieder has no gripes with the National Invitation Tournament. It's just that he looks at the final 16 teams in the National Collegiate Athletic Association tournament and wonders what might have been.

Michigan, 20-11, will host Xavier University, 22-10, in Ann Arbor on Thursday night in one of two third-round NIT games, while the University of Santa Clara, 24-8, plays the University of Southwestern Louisiana, 22-8, at Lafayette, La.

The University of Notre Dame, 19-11, plays at University of Pittsburgh, 18-12, and University of Tennessee, 21-13, is at Virginia Tech University, 20-12, in third-round games Friday.

The winners advance to the NIT semifinals in New York next Monday, with the finals scheduled for March 28.

"Ask the selection committee if we belonged there," Frieder said Monday. "We have no sour grapes. We're happy to be in the NIT, but there are three teams in the NCAA that we've beaten — that says something about our team."

Michigan has beaten Indiana University, the University of Illinois and the University of Dayton and in downing Marquette University 83-70 on Monday, beat another highly regarded team.

"They were tough to contain," Frieder said. "They beat three Big Ten teams and three teams still alive in the NCAA. They're no fluke."

The home game will be Michigan's third in the NIT.

"It's nice to play at home," said center Tim McCormick, who scored 21 points in the victory over Marquette. "There's an air of excitement in this tournament. You never know who you're playing, or if it's at home or away."

Xavier, which edged the University of Nebraska 58-57 Monday night, will be making its first road appearance in the tournament, and Coach Bob Staak and his players are well aware of what the home-court advantage at Cincinnati Gardens means.

"You hear them before the game, and you hear them yelling at halftime," Staak said. "The roar of the crowd at the defensive end really stimulated us. The fans here really get into the game."

Santa Clara advanced to Thursday night's game with a 76-74 victory over Lamar University, while Southwestern Louisiana ousted Weber State University 74-72 in double overtime.

The next stop for the Broncos will be Lafayette, where they play the Ragin' Cajuns, who will be playing their home game in the NIT.

"Two times in a row we've gone out and we've had two dog fights," said Cajuns Coach Bobby Paschal. "Both teams played unbelievably well each of the games we've played and it's a shame any of us had to lose. I think that shows the quality of the NIT this year."

Royals stomp Yankees

By The Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Steve Balboni hit a two-run home run and a two-run double to lead the Kansas City Royals to a 12-2 victory over his former teammates, the New York Yankees, in exhibition baseball Tuesday.

The Yankees scored their only two runs in the top of the first inning on RBI singles by Don Baylor and Steve Kemp.

The Royals cut the lead to 2-1 in their half of the first on an RBI single by Jorge Orta, Kansas City took a 3-2 lead in the fifth on a solo homer by Onix Concepcion and a run-scoring single by John Morris.

Balboni, acquired by the Royals in an off-season trade with the Yankees, hit a two-run homer in the sixth off losing pitcher Phil Niekro. Buddy Biancalana had an RBI single in the sixth.

The Royals scored two runs in the seventh on Balboni's double. Kansas City added four in the eighth on Darryl Motley's homer with two men on base and Morris' second RBI single of the game.

Royals starting pitcher Mark Gubicza was credited with the win.

Athletic director puts Jayhawks on upswing

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — After one full season of Monte Johnson's rule, the scoreboard reads the University of Kansas Jayhawks 9, Arch-rivals 0.

It's doubtful any first-year athletic director ever had a year like this. Any Kansas follower would tell you that the University of Missouri, K-State and Wichita State University, in no particular order, are the schools he most loves to beat.

The football coach Johnson hired reeled off victories over K-State, Missouri and Wichita State. The basketball coach he hired beat Wichita State once, Missouri twice and K-State three times.

And an athletic program embroiled in controversy and disarray for the past couple of years is now receiving donations from happy alumni in growing amounts.

"I can't imagine that it has happened too many times in Kansas athletic history," Johnson said. "Most people would be pleased to win two out of three. To win every one of them is quite a trick."

"It's just hard to conceive of a year when your people would feel better about the athletic program," Johnson added.

If the Big Eight conference gave an Athletic Director of the Year Award, Johnson would lap the field. A basketball walk-on at Kansas during the Wilt Chamberlain era, Johnson was a successful businessman and active alum for many years in Topeka and Wichita. He had worked for the Kansas athletic department for a while after graduation, then returned to his troubled alma mater almost a year and a half ago as head of the department.

Since then, a lengthy National Collegiate Athletic Association probe into the football program concluded with one year of sanctions, a lesser penalty than many expected.

And the replacements for fired football coach Don Fambrough and fired basketball coach Ted Owens — Mike Gottfried and Larry Brown — were both instant hits with media and boosters alike.

Brown, a national figure whose professional and college coaching career includes stops at UCLA, Denver and New Jersey, picked up where Gottfried's first season left off and then some. Not only did Brown go unbeaten against the top rivals, he got the Jayhawks to the second round of the NCAA Tournament. Kansasans are most proud of their basketball tradition, one of the richest in the nation. And Brown has already signed up two of nation's hottest high school prospects.

Johnson prefers to reflect all credit for the turnaround to the coaches.

"Both are very sincere, very caring people," he said. "They're both very natural. To have two young coaches with such a natural feel for other people is very refreshing."

The renewed success has triggered a corresponding increase in the alumni contributions which are vital to any school's athletic growth.

"We've asked all of our donors to increase their donations considerably," Johnson said. "We told them we'd like to see them double their donations within a two-year time frame, and we've made great progress in that direction. When you're 9-0 against your arch-rivals, that doesn't hurt at all."

But Johnson does not deny a deep personal satisfaction for the success which has followed his leadership.

"It's a compliment to our alumni and the people who care about this school. I just happen to be one of those. I'm no different from them. I was on the other side, supporting the athletic department financially before. Now I'm on the inside, continuing to support the athletic department financially but also asking other people to help."

Big Eight basketball hits low spot

Pity the poor Big Eight Conference.

The National Collegiate Athletic Association championships have reached "Sweet 16." If nothing else, the tournament has illustrated the fact that the Big Eight is one of the country's weaker major basketball conferences.

The Big Eight placed only two teams into the tournament after a confusing year, which saw only two teams win 20 games. But the conference's two representatives came into the championships highly regarded.

The University of Oklahoma Sooners dominated the conference during the regular season and came into the tournament as the nation's seventh-ranked team. Led by two-time All-American Wayman Tisdale and the rest of his high-flying teammates, the Sooners were looked on by many as a good bet to reach the Final Four in Seattle, despite losing to the University of Kansas Jayhawks in the conference tournament finals.

By beating the Sooners, the Jayhawks also gained a spot in the tourney and were one of the more highly regarded teams.

The 'Hawks had been on a roll at the end of the season, claiming a 9-5 conference record while winning eight of their final 10 games.

With young players Ron Kellogg and Calvin Thompson coming of age towards the season's end and seniors Carl Henry and Kelly Knight playing well, the 'Hawks were a dark horse pick by some to go far in the tourney.

The Sooners, by losing in the conference tournament, were forced to take potluck in the NCAA bids and were sent out to the West Regional. Oklahoma drew a first-round bye. Playing in the second round, the Sooners drew the supposedly simple task of beating the University of Dayton Flyers, an independent team, to move on to the tournament's tougher teams.

But the Sooners turned into the Swooners. Against the Flyers, Oklahoma came out flat and ended even lower, losing to the team many felt was the NCAA's final tournament bid choice, 89-85.

Kansas' showing in the tournament was equally feeble. The 'Hawks opened play against Alcorn State University, the Southwestern Athletic Conference representative. The KU team started the game as if it was just happy to be in the tournament, falling behind the Braves by as many as 14 points in the first half. Finally, the 'Hawks woke up just in time for Henry to tip in a missed shot in the game's final seconds to win 57-56.

TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

But the Jayhawks' next opponent, Wake Forest University, quickly brought Coach Larry Brown's team back to earth. Against the team from the Atlantic Coast Conference, the 'Hawks were out-manned and out-classed. They lost to the Demon Deacons by 10, 69-59.

So much for the Big Eight in this year's tournament.

To put a cap on the year, even the conference's representative in the National Invitational Tournament — the University of Nebraska Cornhuskers — made an early exit from postseason play Monday night.

After nipping state rival Creighton University, the 'Huskers traveled to Cincinnati to face Xavier University. In the contest, Nebraska fell behind early, then rallied behind center Dave Hoppen's 22 points. But it wasn't enough, as Xavier edged the 'Huskers 58-57 to end Nebraska's season with an 18-12 record.

This year's showing by the Big Eight in postseason play was a setback for a conference that was just beginning to earn a bit of respect around the country.

In last season's NCAA tournaments, the Big Eight had three teams, the University of Missouri, Oklahoma State University and Oklahoma, which all qualified for the tourney with 20-win plus records. In addition, Nebraska made it all the way to the NIT's semifinals in a surprising showing.

But with this year's results, it's clear that the Big Eight has a long way to go before it's competitive with the ACC and the Big East conferences in college basketball.

Big Eight fans can now only draw encouragement for the conference's future by looking at the Sooners' talent. Also, fans can lick their chops at the prospects of blue-chip player Danny Manning joining an already loaded front line at KU.

But until next season, we Midwesterners will have to sit back and watch as the boys from the East dominate the college basketball spotlight once again.

Edwards starting to pay off for Cavs

By The Associated Press

James Edwards is starting to pay the way Ted Stepien's checkbook thought he would.

Edwards, who once took advantage of the tendency of the former owner of the Cleveland Cavaliers to pay big salaries to free agents with unproven abilities, now is producing for the Phoenix Suns.

Edwards, a seven-foot, 235-pound center for Phoenix, played only 31 games for the Cavs and Suns last season because of ankle and knee injuries and averaged only 10.5 points.

When he fractured a knuckle on his right hand in the first game of summer league play last year and had to undergo surgery, it looked like he was in for another disappointing National Basketball Association season in 1983-84.

"I never was in shape all of last season and then my hand set me back again," Edwards said. "I've had to run and play myself into shape and get my confidence back."

But while the perennially strong Suns continue to struggle to even make the playoffs with a 32-37 record, Edwards has quietly scored 19.8 points per game in his last 23 outings. In his 37 games before Feb. 5, he averaged only 12.2 points.

"He's been real good in the last month," Coach John MacLeod said. "He's shot the ball very well after being fouled up with the bad finger. I'd like to see him rebound better, but he's done a lot of good things for us."

Edwards, who is hitting 53.6 percent of his field goal attempts for the season and 59.2 percent for the last 13 games, has had some impressive outings since his hot streak started.

Evaluations help gauge teacher quality

By KATHLEEN COLE
Collegian Reporter

Each semester, students are asked to provide input on teaching effectiveness by completing instructor evaluation forms supplied by individual departments.

In general, there are two types of forms being used for two different purposes, Donald Hoyt, director of Educational Resources, said.

One type of form is aimed at helping instructors improve their teaching effectiveness, Hoyt said. The other type is strictly for administrative purposes.

"The nine-item form is the one most commonly used in the administrative decision-making process," Hoyt said. "It can be used as a major source of input for determining tenure recommendations, salary increases and considerations for reappointment and promotion."

Hoyt said the nine-item form, which he helped develop, is designed to show how well students were able to learn from a particular teacher's instruction. The questions on the form address what Hoyt calls "the six dimensions of teaching effectiveness." These are areas believed to best reflect an instructor's ability to promote learning among students. The questions require students to rate their instructors in the areas of interest, communication, enthusiasm, knowledge, responsiveness and attitude.

There is only one area where student evaluations of instruction are required, Hoyt said. University policy states that all non-tenured faculty must annually obtain student ratings on their teaching effectiveness.

The nine-item form is generally used for this purpose, he said, but no one form has been specifically designated for the task. The responsibility of deciding how the policy will be implemented is left up to the individual departments.

"They are free to use whatever form they choose," Hoyt said. "Some departments use the nine-item form supplied by our office. Others have developed their own forms.

"We recommend that the department select a coordinator who will work with us to ensure that proper procedures are followed throughout the process," he said.

After the forms are completed, the department arranges them for computer processing. The information is interpreted and returned to the department head, who can weigh student input, along with other factors, in making administrative decisions, he said.

The emphasis for administrative decisions is commonly divided between three different areas of performance — teaching, service and research — with equal weight given to each category, but how the factors are weighed is also up to individual departments, Hoyt said.

"I tend to think student input on teaching should deserve greater consideration," Hoyt said. "Students are the clients and can best determine what works for them in a learning situation."

The information is not intended to be used as a tool to aid in instructional improvement, Hoyt said.

Enhancing teacher effectiveness requires a different form of questioning altogether.

The Instructional Development and Evaluation Assessment (IDEA) survey form, also available through the Office of Educational Improvement, was developed with diagnostic purposes in mind, he said. It is designed to help instructors assess their teaching ability and identify possible areas of improvement.

Questions of the IDEA form are related to student performance and personal development, course-work comparisons, learning motivation and instructor evaluation.

"The IDEA program is strictly voluntary as far as the University is concerned," Hoyt said. "Instructors may request the forms independent of their department."

When students have completed the IDEA forms, the information is sent back to the Office of Educational Improvement for processing, he said. Unlike the nine-item form, results are returned directly to the instructor instead of to the department chairman, so that the information remains confidential.

What is important to remember in evaluating teaching is that the purpose of instruction is not to teach, but for students to learn, Hoyt said.

House approves Carlin's proposal to classify property for tax ratings

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — An intense 12-hour lobbying effort by Gov. John Carlin and House Speaker Mike Hayden ended Wednesday with the Democratic governor winning a big victory as the Kansas House approved, 89-33, a proposal to amend the Kansas Constitution to allow the classification of property for tax purposes.

The vote marks the first time in six years — since Carlin was speaker of the House — that lawmakers in the lower chamber have been given the opportunity to cast a vote on the issue. And Hayden, R-Atwood, says legislators voting in favor of the resolution are "leading their school districts to slaughter" because of the shifts which will occur under it.

The surprising passage came after Carlin applied what his press secretary Mike Swenson called a "full-court press" to try and wrangle the necessary votes for the resolution to pass.

Carlin said passage of the resolution makes this a "historic day for the taxpayers of Kansas." And he urged the Senate to approve the resolution and give Kansas voters the opportunity to "decide the fate of their tax future."

Carlin was pitted against Hayden in his attempt to push the resolution through the lower chamber. Hayden opposes the classification resolution and was behind a last-minute attempt to remove the resolution from final action and rework the measure.

The desperate attempt to stop passage failed despite GOP arguments the bill was unfair to industry. Republicans wanted to make it more palatable to manufacturers whose inventory will be taxed heavily under the classification proposal.

"It's a terrible tax policy," Hayden said. "It's a case of parochialism reigning over reason. I just want them to know they are leading their own school districts to slaughter with this thing."

Hayden said the amendment, if it passes the Senate and is approved by voters in November, would cause a drop in the valuation of urban school districts and result in those districts receiving more state aid from the school finance formula.

"The Democrats voted for it, irrespective of the consequences because the governor wanted them to," Hayden said. "And the urban Republicans had no choice but to vote for it because of how it affects the school district formula."

Sen. Paul "Bud" Burke, R-Leawood and chairman of the Senate tax committee, agreed with Hayden's opinion of the tax policy, but he predicted some version of the resolution will pass the upper chamber.

"I believe most of what is in the resolution will remain as it goes through the Senate," Burke said after it cleared the House. "Even though much of what is in there is very bad tax policy, this is an election year. We're looking down the barrel of court-ordered reappraisal and I think (legislators) want to go back to the voters and say 'We've protected your tax position in this amendment.'"

Carlin apparently was more convincing in his lobbying effort than Hayden. He began meeting with fellow Democrats in the House Tuesday afternoon, urging their support of the legislation and his efforts turned around more than a dozen votes to reach the 89 votes which passed it to the Senate.

It needed 84 votes to advance because any resolution to amend the constitution must gain approval from two-thirds of the members of the House and Senate before it can be placed on the ballot in November.

That means, 84 votes are needed to ad-

Battle of Democratic nominee hopefuls wages during political awareness forum

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

As the race for the Democratic presidential nomination between Sen. Gary Hart and former Vice President Walter Mondale heats up, criticism between the two front-running candidates has become more intense.

This conflict moved to Manhattan Wednesday night as representatives of the Hart, Mondale and the Rev. Jesse Jackson campaigns spoke during a political awareness forum sponsored by K-State's Black Student Union.

A representative of the Ronald Reagan campaign also was asked to attend the forum, but declined the invitation.

Samuel Keys, representative for the Hart campaign and Richard Pinaire, deputy coordinator of the Kansas Mondale campaign, exchanged verbal blows several times while discussing campaign issues.

Pinaire filled in for scheduled Mondale speaker William Mondale. The candidate's son was unable to attend the forum due to illness.

In opening remarks, Keys stressed the fact that Hart receives no campaign funds from political action committees or special interest groups. The senator "doesn't want any special interest group expecting special treatment," he said.

But Pinaire refuted Keys' statement, saying Hart sought the endorsements of organized labor, the National Education Association and the National Organization of Women, but failed to get support from these groups.

The two spokesmen clashed on the topic of cuts in military spending. While both Hart and Mondale advocate cuts in the military budget, the two differ on what aspects need to be trimmed.

Keys said Hart favors reducing the number of U.S. troops deployed in Western Europe as one way to trim the defense budget. Pinaire called this solution irresponsible, saying Hart doesn't understand the United States' relationship with Western European countries.

The two speakers also disagreed on who was the front-running candidate for the Democratic party's nomination.

Pinaire, fielding a question from the audience, said Mondale is leading in the number of committed party delegates, but said he feels Hart is the current Democratic front-runner.

The statement drew an immediate response from Keys, who said the Mondale camp seems to be trying to have the situation both ways, saying its candidate is trailing despite leading in the delegate count.

While the Hart and Mondale spokesmen battled, William McNary, state youth coordinator for the Jackson campaign, said his candidate offers a new alternative for the country.

"Rev. Jackson will offer a redemptive

Submarine, carrier collision occurs during maneuvers in Sea of Japan

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A nuclear-powered Soviet attack submarine collided with the 80,000-ton U.S. aircraft carrier Kitty Hawk during maneuvers in the Sea of Japan on Wednesday without either ship suffering apparent damage, the Pentagon said.

There were no casualties aboard the Kitty Hawk, the Navy said. It was not known whether any of the submarine's crewmen were hurt, but the Soviet boat sailed away from the collision scene under its own power.

Pentagon officials blamed the submarine, which Navy sources described as a 5,200-ton boat of the Victor I class.

According to these officials, who spoke only on condition they remain anonymous, the submarine was traveling without navigation lights.

"We think the submarine hit the Kitty Hawk apparently as the sub was coming up through the sea," said one Navy official.

In a statement describing the incident, the Pentagon said that:

"Following a noticeable shudder which was felt throughout the ship, observers on the starboard side of Kitty Hawk saw the outline of the sail of a submarine resembling that of a Soviet Victor class moving away."

Although the identification of the Victor was somewhat qualified in the statement, Pentagon officials said they have no doubt the boat belongs to the Soviet Navy. Neither mainland China nor Communist North Korea owns Victor-type submarines.

"The submarine is on the surface," the Pentagon said.

"A visual sighting of the submarine by USS Kitty Hawk's SH-3H helicopter indicated no apparent damage," it added.

Other U.S. warships are "remaining in the area to render assistance if required," the Pentagon said. However, officials said, the submarine skipper had not requested help.

Meanwhile, a Soviet cruiser of the Kara class, the Petropavlovsk, was said by the Pentagon to be steaming near the submarine, which was described as traveling at a slow five knots on a northerly course in the general direction of the main Soviet naval base at Vladivostok.

The Kitty Hawk was continuing its normal operations, the Navy said.

The collision occurred about 150 miles east of the South Korean coast while the huge carrier was taking part in an annual U.S.-South Korean war game called Exercise Team Spirit '84, a Pentagon official said.

The Soviet Navy customarily keeps a close watch on U.S. naval maneuvers, using submarines, surface ships and aircraft. The United States tracks Soviet ship movements the same way.

This was the first collision between U.S. and Soviet war vessels since last Nov. 17 when a U.S. destroyer and a Soviet guided-missile frigate brushed against each other in the Arabian Sea. U.S. Navy officers also blamed that minor collision on the Soviets.

U.S. and Soviet ships tangled repeatedly in incidents of this type at sea in the 1950s and 1960s, but the number of such potentially explosive confrontations dropped significantly following a 1972 agreement between the two navies aimed at "prevention of incidents on and over the high seas."

Camping out in Washington

Homeless protest for rights

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — As demonstrators outside held a banner saying "All God's Children Gotta Sleep," the Supreme Court engaged in a lively argument Wednesday over whether the right of protest extends to homeless people sleeping in a park facing the White House.

A government lawyer who insisted it doesn't was asked by Justice Thurgood Marshall "Have you ever had to sleep on a grate?"

"No," answered Paul M. Bator, the deputy solicitor general, dressed impeccably in a morning coat.

"Well, these people want you to understand what it's like," Marshall said.

The case began in the winter of 1982-83 when the Community for Creative Non-Violence — a Washington organization that provides food and shelter to the poor — received permits from the U.S. Park Service to pitch tents in Lafayette Park and on the National Mall.

The CCNV wanted to demonstrate graphically, by bringing Washington's homeless to sleep in the park, that the plight of homeless people is serious and often ignored.

Citing regulations that ban camping at both locations, the Park Service said the homeless could be in the tents around the clock, but weren't allowed to sleep. The CCNV responded that sleeping in the park was necessary to get their point across.

A federal appeals court in Washington ruled, by a 6-5 vote, for the demonstrators. The lower court said that applying the federal "no-camping" regulations to such "symbolic speech" as a sleep-in would violate constitutional rights.

Lafayette Park, on Pennsylvania Avenue, faces the north entrance of the White House; the Park Service issues 900-1,000 permits a year for demonstrations there. The mall stretches from the Lincoln Memorial to the Capitol.

"The demonstrators want to state personally that many people haven't any place to sleep," Marshall said to Bator. "How do you do that without sleeping?"

Bator replied that "defacing the portrait of a president is a powerful way of demonstrating contempt of a president," but that it is not considered free speech.

"Nobody tried to prevent (the demonstrators) from exercising the right to speak," he said. "They could maintain continuous round-the-clock vigil." He said the question is what rules will protect the parks.

The argument pitted Bator, a former Harvard Law professor, against Burt Neuborne, a former New York University professor and a top lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union.

"The purpose of the demonstration is an attempt to jolt decent people into recognizing what it is to be homeless," Neuborne said. "The only way is to re-enact in a highly public place, at the center of the nation's consciousness, the plight of these people, to provide them with a mechanism to enter in public debate."

FAA suspends flights of Capitol Air Lines

By The Associated Press

MANHATTAN — Capitol Air Lines said Wednesday it will not appeal a one-week flight suspension handed down earlier by the Federal Aviation Administration and will suspend flights next week.

General Manager Gary Cromer Jr. said the airline, headquartered in Manhattan, decided to accept the grounding because of uncertainty about the outcome of the appeal. He said flights will be suspended March 26-April 1 and that the company is trying to help passengers reschedule with other carriers during that week.

The FAA issued the suspension because of an August incident in which a 20-passenger plane allegedly carried 21 passengers. The FAA also alleged improper bookkeeping procedures.

Capitol Air Lines has flights to Salina, Manhattan, Topeka and Kansas City.

Fighting erupts in Beirut after talks fail

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT — Christian and Moslem militiamen exchanged gunfire in the center of Beirut on Wednesday in the fiercest fighting since the cease-fire agreement reached last week in Switzerland.

The fighting followed the breakup of national reconciliation talks in Lausanne, Switzerland. The talks ended Tuesday without finding a way to end the nation's 9-year-old civil war.

Naoum Farah, an official of the Lebanese Forces, blamed the Syrians for the failure of the talks. He said Syria wanted continuing turmoil in Lebanon to increase its influence.

The Lebanese Forces, the largest Christian militia, offered to meet with rival Moslem factions "without Syrian tutelage and without the interference of any foreign countries," Farah told reporters in his east Beirut office.

Farah said preliminary contacts already had been made with the Druse and Shiite Amal leaders. There was no confirmation of that from other groups.

Syria gave strong military and political support to Druse and Shiite forces opposed to the government of President Amin Gemayel.

Four people were killed and 22 were wounded in Wednesday's battles along the "green line" which separates Christian east Beirut from the mostly Moslem west.

The crackle of automatic weapons could be heard throughout the day, although the fighting eased in the afternoon.

Many residents stayed home. The line of cars waiting to cross the green line was much shorter than in recent days.

Few residents seemed surprised that the nine delegates to the national reconciliation talks failed to agree on political reforms — the main issue in the nation's civil war.

"It was as if they never went there," said Saeed Ibrahim, a 27-year-old Shiite Moslem store owner in the southern suburb of Ouzai.

The Christian "Voice of Lebanon" radio station reported that a French ship left the Mediterranean port of Toulon to pick up 1,250 French troops, the last remaining contingent of the multinational peacekeeping force.

In Paris, a French Defense Ministry spokesman confirmed that a civilian ferry left Toulon "in service of the French military," but he refused to comment on its destination or its mission. He declined to be identified.

American, British and Italian contingents of the multinational force left Beirut last month.

Physicist awarded NATO grant

Talat Rahman, assistant professor of physics, has been awarded a year-long NATO research grant for research to be carried out in West Germany.

She will be conducting research on vibrations localized at surfaces and their dispersion in collaboration with Professor Harold Ibach of KFA Jülich.

The research focuses on the vibrational properties of metal surfaces, with or without adsorbed overlayers.

Rahman received her doctorate degree in physics from the University of Rochester in 1977. She was an assistant research professor at the University of California at Irvine for five years before joining the K-State faculty in January 1983.

Student's logo adopted by county

Steven Roark, junior in pre-design professions, recently designed a logo which will be used by Saline County as its official logo.

Roark designed the logo in a Design I class last fall. The logo was submitted along with those of 26 other students.

The class, taught by Eugene McGraw, professor of interior architecture, has previously done projects for other agencies and University units.

Architecture students win prize

A team of five K-State architecture students won the 1983 National Passive Solar Home Architectural Design Competition, which carries a $1,000 first prize.

The students were cited for the exceptional quality of their overall design concept and for the broad appeal their solution would have for single-family home purchasers.

The five students are Paul Demouchaux, David Grimes, Charles Hoffmann, Ben Powell and Daryl Rantis, all seniors in architecture. Mark Clipsham, senior in architecture, won a "merit certificate" for the passive solar elements of his design proposal.

The students prepared their entries as part of their classwork last fall in an Architectural Design 3 Studio taught by Gary Coates, associate professor of architecture.

Scholarship program established

Yelton Faulkner, Blue Rapids, has established a scholarship program at K-State in the name of his late wife. He created the scholarship program through a gift to the KSU Foundation in memory of Golda Donnelly Faulkner, who died in November 1983.

The annual scholarship, to be awarded on the basis of academic performance and need, will be given to a student from Nemaha or Marshall counties who is majoring in education. Secondary consideration will be given to a student studying in the field of medicine.

Mrs. Faulkner was a retired teacher and housewife at the time of her death at age 86. It was her wish before her death that the scholarship be established to assist students in education.

Alumna establishes scholarship

A new KSU Foundation scholarship for graduate student research on housing has been established by Vera Ellithorpe, who graduated from K-State with a bachelor's degree in architecture in 1935.

Ellithorpe undertook housing research during her studies for her master's degree at K-State and her doctorate degree at Ohio State University. She served as an Extension Service Housing Specialist from 1939 until her retirement in 1975.

Ellithorpe was the first woman to become a member of what is now the Kansas Society of Architects, AIA.

National speaker to give seminar

George Wright Sr., vice president of Service Engineering Associates Inc., will present a Supervisory Success Seminar March 28-29 in the Union.

Wright is a contributing editor to "Housekeeping Today" and co-author of the book "The Supervisor's Handbook." He is a frequent speaker for organizations such as Association of Physical Plant Administrators (APPA), National Executive Housekeepers Association and American Management Association.

His presentation is sponsored by General Services, a department of University Facilities.

Officer emphasizes Australian security

By KATHLEEN COLE
Collegian Reporter

The importance of U.S. security relations in Australia and South East Asian nations was the focus of comments made by Lt. Col. Paul Jackson at a breakfast for Army and Air Force ROTC cadets Wednesday.

The program was sponsored by the student chapter of the Association of the United States Army. Jackson, who is an Australian exchange instructor currently serving at Fort Leavenworth, began by responding to concern over the presence of U.S. military installations in Australia.

The presence of the installations makes it extremely difficult for Australia to pursue a truly independent foreign policy, Jackson said. In the event of a major conflict developing anywhere in the world, Australia can become a nuclear target. Likewise, by having U.S. installations on Australian soil, the great advantage of sovereignty is relinquished as well.

"Nevertheless, there is still very widespread public support by the Australian people for the continued presence of United States installations on Australian territory," Jackson said.

Economically as well as politically, the South East Asian nations are of increasing importance to the United States, he said.

Australia represents the largest single concentration of U.S. investments in the South East Asia region. It's also an important source of several strategic materials. Australia has about 90 percent of the world's reserves of titanium, a metal alloy used in heavy industry, which is vital to the U.S. bases, Jackson said.

In 1971, the Association of South East Asian Nations, linking Malaysia, Singapore, Thailand, Indonesia and the Philippines, committed themselves to securing recognition of their region as a sign of peace, freedom and neutrality, Jackson said.

"I believe that this was less an absolute policy requirement than an attempt by the regional states to assert some sort of independent stance in world affairs," he said.

ASEAN is important to the United States for several reasons, Jackson said. Today, it is the fifth largest trade alliance of the United States, with total trade last year exceeding $22 billion.

There is more than $5 billion of U.S. investment in the region with more on the way, he said. ASEAN also is an important source of strategic raw materials. Indonesia, for example, now provides almost 10 percent of U.S. oil imports, while Malaysia is an important supplier of tin.

"Although ASEAN is not a military alliance, I believe it is playing an increasingly important part in U.S. regional and local strategy," Jackson said. "The ASEAN nations, for example, see themselves as gatekeepers, or protectors of the strategic crossroads between the Indian and Pacific Oceans."

Whether or not the United States can anticipate that ASEAN will develop into some sort of military alliance is a question yet to be answered, he said.

"To date, such an evolution has been rejected by spokesmen from each of the ASEAN countries."

"Nevertheless, military cooperation (among ASEAN nations) continues to develop to a point which I believe is just short of a full collective security arrangement. At the present time, for example, the ASEAN nations have a free exchange of intelligence information and are also seeking to standardize items of military equipment," Jackson said.

In a 1976 formal policy declaration, the ASEAN nations agreed to "continue close cooperation on security operations, but on a non-ASEAN basis," he said.

"Although the United States has no direct commitment to ASEAN security, through its bilateral commitments to Thailand and the Philippines, I believe it has indirect commitment to ASEAN security."

"Nevertheless, the possibility of ASEAN evolving into some form of military alliance can't be ignored," he said.

Legislative funds vs. human life

Money once again comes before attempts to restore human health. The Missouri legislature recently defeated an appropriation proposal of $200,000 to help pay for a $300,000 liver transplant. The needy recipient is a 16-year-old St. Louis girl. According to the Wednesday Kansas City Times, a joint committee decided against the measure because the members feared it might set an unwanted precedent. The article also states the committee is conducting research in hopes of determining how many others might pursue state aid for organ transplants. They also are looking into the possibility of setting up a fund for transplant surgeries in the state of Missouri. This is praiseworthy. But it doesn't solve the immediate need of the girl dying with liver disease. Appropriations are always a touchy issue, especially when it involves personal lives. But immediate needs should be dealt with before other indirect needs.

For example, wouldn't it be better to appropriate money for the restoration of this child's health — and the health of others — than build a new building or new street? If money limitations are a problem, tax money should go for basic needs of society before anything else. The attitude taken by the joint committee may reflect the attitudes of the people electing them to office. If so, American society needs to readjust its thinking. Society, like a family, should take care of its members and look after their needs. Immediate individual needs should be tended to first before secondary needs of the society are met. On a state and national scale, it is the government's responsibility to provide the leadership necessary to meet society's needs. Meanwhile, the legislature in Missouri hesitates while the girl is dying, holding her future in its hands unless the needed funds are raised another way. If so, the Missouri government failed. Change needed to initiate peace

Reports from Lausanne, Switzerland indicate the Lebanese peace talks were a major failure. The talks were postponed indefinitely after leaders of the eight warring factions neglected to come to any peaceful conclusion. According to the Associated Press, the talks stalled because the leaders could not consider either changing the basic political system or giving the country's Moslem majority increased political importance. Nabih Berri, Shiite Moslem Amal leader, laid the blame for the failed talks on Lebanese President Amin Gemayel. "We don't have a president who wants really to resolve the problems of Lebanon," he said. Before adjourning, the leaders did draft a communique reinforcing the cease-fire agreement. It also established a committee to write a new Lebanese constitution, but because it is likely no neutral location could be found for the committee to meet, little importance was attached to this proposal. How long will the civil war continue if Lebanese leaders cannot make some realistic effort to achieve peace? Peacemaking is indeed a difficult process, but the talks must resume. Continued warfare could escalate not only in fierceness and brutality, but could increase to immense international proportions if foreign powers step in again to negotiate peace, whether militarily or diplomatically. But only if Lebanese leaders first recognize the need for marked change in their government will the hope of Middle East peace exist. Kecia Stolfus, editorial page editor

Detroit mistakes car-buying tastes

WASHINGTON — Every morning brings a new adventure for these two commuters. When we turn the key to start our aging automobiles, we never know if they've died in their sleep. Like many of our friends and peers, we've reached a watershed moment in our lives. The cars that we've owned since college are begging us to give them a rest and to go out and buy something new. Yet the exciting prospect of late-model wheels brings tension, too. On one hand, patriotic inclinations urge us to buy American. On the other, we bought imported cars for reasons of cost and quality that seem as valid today as 10 years ago. Despite recent surges in domestic automobiles sales, in fact, U.S. automakers continue to be plagued by consumers in our age group. One U.S. automobile marketer calls car buyers now in their late 20s and early 30s "a lost generation to the American car company." The foreign alliance of this generation could foil any limited expectations Detroit has for itself. As one might suspect, Detroit took a wrong turn with baby boom America in the early 1970s. U.S. automakers at the time still pushed the fabled gas-guzzling living-rooms-on-wheels. Implicit in the industry's targeting was the presumption that, as consumers earned more money, they preferred such "luxurious" monsters. That presumption, of course, proved rather hollow for a new generation then increasingly hostile to conspicuous consumption. It became even more so when the Arabs turned off the oil spigots in 1973, enabling American oil companies to squeeze us at the pumps. Then there were the seemingly innumerable recalls of various American models for defects incurred on the assembly line. Japan won our hearts, so to speak, and Detroit has been trying to catch up ever since. Thanks in part to plant retooling, U.S. automobiles have lost about 1,200 pounds on the average. The General Motors X-car trial now in federal court may also show unfairly on the industry as a whole, where surveys reveal fewer defects today than three years ago. Moreover, American manufacturers have adopted many of the touches with which foreign companies have cemented U.S. consumers' affections: front-wheel drive, five-speed transmissions and sophisticated sound systems. But Japanese and European firms have kept a step, if not a leap, ahead with their base constituency — the young and reasonably affluent consumer. Recognizing this market's dual passions for value and style, as well as its increased economic clout, the foreign firms have anticipated well. America makers, in turn, have tended to react as much to decisions abroad as to market demands at home. The effect is evident in the numbers. Of all car buyers in the 29-34 age group, half own foreign models. Meanwhile, a 1983 survey found that of the 10 most popular cars, eight were imported models. Within the next few years, some industry analysts suspect, Detroit may narrow or even eliminate the foreigner's edge in quality and value. It also will be dealing with a new wave of car buyers who never lived through the traumas of the 1970s and, consequently, carry fewer prejudices against American manufacturers. Market characteristics, however, don't change that much over time. Today, 64 percent of all imported car buyers own college degrees; 40 percent have some professional, managerial or technical experience. Industry spokesmen concede that these consumers tend to be more sophisticated and picky. As the baby boom generation rises into leadership positions, these spokesmen fear it could also prolong the legacy of Detroit's worst years. With their enormous numbers, newly middle-aged Americans could continue to determine the fortunes of U.S. and foreign automakers. Biases cemented years ago might force Detroit to trim its expectations. The industry is counting on a large number of Americans to forget their well-founded grievances. Yet U.S. automakers may need to emphasize not only new quality but more candor about past mistakes.

Prayer amendment protects rights

Although the Reagan school prayer amendment failed to garner a two-thirds majority in the Senate on Tuesday (the amendment did receive a 56-44 majority), the issue is far from dead; in fact, until a definite decision on the matter is reached in the form of an amendment or a Supreme Court ruling, school prayer will remain the focus of heated political controversy. The term "school prayer" itself is surrounded by ignorance and misinformation. Most people, when asked their opinion on school prayer, will reply without really understanding the issue. Simply stated, school prayer refers to the question of whether or not individuals or groups have the right to pray (aloud or silently) in public institutions. Several points need to be asserted regarding what school prayer is not: — School prayer is not state-composed or state-prescribed prayer. — School prayer is not compulsory. — School prayer is not recited group prayer led by a classroom teacher. This practice was clearly struck down in the 1963 Supreme Court ruling that declared daily readings from the Bible or prayer recitations as unconstitutional. — School prayer is not state-sponsored religion. Senator Lowell Weicker, R-Conn., the leading opponent of a school prayer amendment, stated that such an amendment would put the "government ... in this business of religion." However, the Reagan amendment in no way involved the government in a specific religion. In fact, the amendment offered constitutional protection to people of all faiths desiring to pray. Thus, school prayer is a question of rights, not religion. Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker said,

ANNE GUISLAIN Guest Columnist

"The question is whether government can prohibit the free exercise of religion anywhere. The Constitution plainly says it cannot." The important point here is that while our Constitution does guarantee freedom of religion and right to peaceful assembly, many students in public schools are being denied these rights, mainly due to the misinterpretation of a series of Supreme Court decisions in the early 1960s regarding school prayer. School administrators became so afraid of costly lawsuits that not only were Bible readings and recited prayers removed from the classroom, but also the right to voluntarily pray alone or in a group. Today, whether or not students are allowed to pray depends almost wholly upon each school's administration. Some schools do allow voluntary prayer apart from class time. However, many administrators deny students this fundamental freedom — threatening suspension if anyone is caught praying aloud, individually or with others. Thus, some sort of national uniformity is necessary to take the power of decision out of the hands of individual administrators, whether through legislation, a Constitutional amendment or court rulings. Some argue that prayer is a private matter. It is true that for many people, prayer is indeed a private or nonexistent matter, but the fundamental right of peaceful expression cannot be denied due to any subjective opinion regarding prayer. A person wishing to pray according to the demands of his conscience cannot be denied that right, regardless of how others feel about it. Of course, those exercising their right to pray must also respect the rights of others — as in the exercise of any right. Lastly, opponents of the amendment argue that school prayer violates the principle of separation of church and state. However, this principle refers to the fact that the government cannot pass legislation establishing a state religion. It is clear the Reagan amendment, rather than pushing religion, was an attempt to promote religious freedom by guaranteeing any individual group the right to pray aloud in public institutions — regardless of its religious beliefs. When considering the issue of school prayer, it is essential it be fully understood before dismissing the matter as religious imperialism. Many people misdefine or misconceive the issue, and in the process propagate myths concerning school prayer and scaring people into believing that if a school prayer amendment is passed, the government will be breathing a state religion down their necks and telling their children how to pray. Positive steps must be taken to reaffirm freedom of religion and peaceful assembly in public institutions, rights guaranteed by our Constitution. [Editor's note: Anne Guislain is a sophomore in industrial engineering.]

Unasked questions about Meese

WASHINGTON — Al Capone, may he rest in peace, knows exactly what Ed Meese is going through. After a career as a bootlegger, a murderer and even a mass murderer (the St. Valentine's Day massacre), old Scarface finally went to jail for evading his taxes. The man who lived by the gun was ignominiously mowed down by the adding machine. And now, in the city of Washington, we have a similar spectacle regarding Meese. The case against the presidential aide and presumptive attorney general hardly consists of the sorts of things that made Capone infamous, but the issues being raised are still marvelously beside the point. Did he fall behind in his payments? Did he continue to receive loans even when he was delinquent in making payments? Did a $60,000 loan he received from his tax adviser, John McKean, have anything to do with McKean later being named to the U.S. Postal Service Board of Governors? And, as long as we are asking questions, was Meese properly promoted to the rank of lieutenant colonel in the Army Reserves or did someone down at the Pentagon happen to notice that this was the same Ed Meese who worked for the commander in chief? All of this is germane and, I suppose, should be asked. This is particularly the case if it turns out that Meese did have to do something untoward to get his various and sundry home mortgages. As for his rank in the Army Reserves, as a veteran of that organization, I can testify that Meese is as well-qualified as anyone to sit at a desk and shuffle papers. More than that is not asked of a colonel. But what has all this to do with Meese's crack that the American Civil Liberties Union is a "criminals' lobby"? That is a little insight into the mentality to the man who will, the Senate willing, become the next attorney general. Does he think that criminals should not receive legal representation, and has he lost sight of the fact that it is judges and legislatures that make laws, not the ACLU? It only argues one side of a case. And what have Meese's mortgages to do with the administration's position on civil rights? Civil rights organizations feel so strongly about Meese that for the first time since the Nixon administration, they have gone on record in opposition to an attorney general nominee. These organizations include not only old standbys such as the NAACP, but more recent arrivals such as the National Women's Political Caucus and organizations representing Hispanics. They have their reasons. Meese is at least partially responsible for a policy that attempted to make Bob Jones University eligible for federal tax exemptions even though it discriminated against blacks. He is an official of an administration that, with the concurrence of the Supreme Court, has diluted laws designed to prohibit sex discrimination at colleges and universities. And on the question of hunger in America, he remains an agnostic: maybe it exists and maybe it doesn't. Meese's message, and that of the administration, is clear to the groups that oppose his nomination: the government will no longer be the champion of those who most need it. This, though, is considered "policy," and so the Senate is loath to trifle with it. A presidential aide can accumulate a record of either hostility or indifference to the country's underprivileged and that's hardly reason for disqualification. Take out a mortgage though, and that's fair game. The rules say a president is entitled to his nominee, just as he is entitled to his policy — as callous as they may be. Ed Meese can set back the cause of both civil rights and civil liberties, but that's beyond criticism. If his finances are suspicious, that's another story. In Washington, when it comes to debt delinquencies, what Meese owes banks is much more important than what he owes the people.

Prayer column abuses religious convictions

Editor, Re: Nancy Malir's column, "Vigil raises questions about prayer," in the March 19 Collegian: I realize the Collegian is a student newspaper, but I'm amazed that Malir's column ever got printed. Aren't reporters supposed to inform about an issue, not fill a column with "one-sided badinage"? It's obvious Malir doesn't know much about the issue when she fills the column with her "own stereotyped prejudices against Bible-bangers." I happen to be a Christian and a believer in the Bible, and I'm not too thrilled about reporters who use a mass medium like a newspaper to present people with religious convictions as "zealots," "fanatics" and "self-righteous, self-defined moralists" with "Neanderthal mentality." Rather than focus more attention on Malir's opinions, I'd like you to consider these thoughts on Christianity by some prominent people: "My future reaches far beyond football, and this really excites me. Christianity is the most important part of my life." — Roger Staubach. "It is my belief that unless we as Americans begin to follow Christ and love him with every facet of our being, we can never meet the grave challenges of our time. For it is impossible to equate mediocrity with the things of Jesus Christ." — Mark Hatfield, U.S. senator. "I cannot fail to be thrilled every time I read the things that Jesus said, and I am more and more convinced of the necessity of following him." — Charles Schulz, cartoonist. "Since I asked Christ to be my Lord and Savior, there are still some peaks and valleys, but I am being operated on by the greatest doctor of them all." — Julius "Dr. J." Erving. Week stresses humanity

Editor, This week is an important one, especially for international students. It is a good opportunity for representative students of each country to learn, teach and exchange ideas. Also it is the time for each individual to believe in an international philosophy, to understand the problems that each nation faces and to take responsibility to care and help in any way possible. I think that is what humanity means. So I look forward to seeing a large number of people in the International Week program. By the way, International Week begins at the same time as the first day of the new year for Iranian people. That's why I would like to congratulate all of the people in charge of the International Student Center at K-State, the people we refer to in case we face any problem. At the first day of our new year (Norooz), we wish the best for them. Shirzadi M. senior in agricultural mechanization vance from the 125-member House and 27 votes are necessary in the 40-seat Senate. Once on the ballot, it would require a simple majority to be enacted.

Of the 89 votes in favor of the resolution, 49 were Democrats and 40 were Republicans. Just one Democrat, Rep. Homer Jarchow of Wichita, joined 32 Republicans in opposing the resolution. There were three members absent when the vote occurred — all Democrats.

Rep. James Lowther, R-Emporia, made the unsuccessful motion to remove the resolution from final action. After lengthy arguments over the effects the proposal will have on industry and the state formula for distribution of financial aid to school districts, the motion failed with 52 favoring it and 68 against.

The first-round vote on Tuesday was 72-42, with 11 members absent.

The controversial proposal would amend the constitution to allow different types of property to be taxed at different rates. Currently, the constitution requires all property to be taxed on a uniform and equal basis at 30 percent of its fair market value.

However, most state officials agree the current system is not uniform and equal because there has not been a statewide reappraisal of property in 20 years. With the inequities that have developed, homeowners and farmers are taxed at much lower rates than commercial, utility and personal property.

The classification resolution is considered a companion to a bill which passed the House earlier this session ordering statewide reappraisal of real estate by 1988.

Supporters of the constitutional amendment say the change in the constitution is needed to protect home owners from massive tax shifts that will occur when statewide reappraisal is implemented.

Most state officials agree that, as the system has evolved, residential property is taxed at about 8 percent of its fair market value, instead of the 30 percent tax level required in the constitution. And farmland is taxed at about 6 percent of its market value.

Without such an amendment, Carlin and other fear there will be a giant shift of the property tax burden from commercial and personal property to residential and agricultural property.

The proposal before the House would create nine classes of property and permit the classification of property to begin Jan. 1, 1990 or earlier if reappraisal is completed before then. It would assess:

— Public utility real and personal property and inventories of merchants, manufacturers and livestock owners at 30 percent of fair market value.

— Agricultural land devoted to food and fiber production at 20 percent.

— Industrial, commercial, railroad and motor carrier real and personal property at 15 percent.

— Mobile homes at 8 percent.

— Urban and rural residential property and agricultural land not assessed on its ability to produce income at 6 percent.

In addition, the resolution contains a five-year phase-out of the tax on livestock and merchants' inventories.

Pessimism shadows election for president of El Salvador

By The Associated Press

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — In the working-class neighborhood of Santa Lucia, people say they plan to vote in Sunday's presidential election even though they think it won't solve their problems.

"The last time, I marked the ballot twice," said Juan Martinez, a student, referring to the Constituent Assembly elections of 1982. "If you don't vote, they'll think you're a guerrilla. But it doesn't matter who you vote for, it's always the same."

Leftists, fighting the U.S.-supported, conservative government for the past 4½ years, are boycotting the elections.

There is some confusion, however, about how much disruption will be attempted. Guillermo Ungo, leader of the guerrillas' political ally, the Democratic Revolutionary Front, has said the voting itself will not be interrupted. He said the front does not want to endanger civilians who feel obligated to vote.

Roberto D'Aubuisson is the candidate of the far-right Republican Nationalist Alliance. His main challenger among the field of eight candidates is Jose Napoleon Duarte, of the centrist Christian Democrats.

If no candidate wins a majority, the two top finishers will have a runoff within a month.

Sam Keys, center, representative for Sen. Gary Hart, listens intently as William McNary, representative for the Rev. Jesse Jackson, answers a question from the audience during the Black Student Union Political Awareness Forum Wednesday night in the Union Ballroom. Richard Pinaire, representative for Walter Mondale, sits in the foreground. The representatives outlined the candidates' views on major campaign issues.

spirit of hope to the people of this country," McNary said. "Jesse Jackson is not splitting the party, but on the contrary is registering more new voters than any other candidate."

McNary outlined Jackson's position on several issues.

He said Jackson favors the largest cut, 25 percent, in defense spending of the three candidates.

Jackson believes in farmer self-determination on economic issues. The candidate has traveled to Western Kansas to examine the problems facing today's farmers, McNary said.

Jackson also supports the Equal Rights Amendment, and believes abortion is an individual decision, he said.

"The president should enforce the Constitution rather than trying to enforce personal beliefs," McNary said. "Although as a minister, he is against abortion, as president, Jesse Jackson is for women's right of choice."

Keys said Hart offers a fresh approach to the country's problems.

"Hart brings new alternatives based on traditional Democratic values," Keys said. "Hart is bringing new people into the party. He has included the 'Yuppies,' the upward mobile younger generation, into the campaign and is talking in terms of where the party is going, not where it has been."

Keys said the Hart campaign centers on four main issues: lower military spending, moving industry into high technology, improved education and expanding foreign trade. Hart supports expanding financial assistance for college students and increasing science and language education in secondary schools.

Pinaire said Mondale is the most qualified candidate because of his service in Minnesota government, the U.S. Senate and as vice president in the Carter administration.

Mondale has supported several programs important to various segments of society.

Mondale's continued support of the Social Security program shows his concern for senior citizens, Pinaire said.

Ratification of the ERA and opposition to limits on freedom of choice for women have shown Mondale's serious commitment to women's issues, he said.

On civil rights, Pinaire said Mondale would provide solid leadership, pointing to his work with former Senator Hubert Humphrey in building a Democratic civil rights platform.

Pinaire said the NEA's commitment to his candidate also shows Mondale is the candidate most attuned to the needs of education.

One point on which all the representatives agreed is their opposition to President Reagan's policies.

"Ronald Reagan had a perverse coalition of the rich and the unregistered during the last election," McNary said. "It's up to the Jackson campaign to form a new coalition, the Rainbow Coalition."

"President Reagan is incapable of handling the instability of today's world and is conducting a misdirected policy in Latin America and the Third World," Pinaire said.

"We need to select a candidate who can occupy the White House in 1985," Keys said. "We need to make sure to have four years which are different than the past four years. We need to ensure the next four years are beneficial to all members of society."

Bench aids ad writer's job hunt

WICHITA — John Gates Jr. decided he needed to prove he had what it takes to be a creative advertising writer, so he took out an ad for a job on a bus bench.

"When you're looking for a job for four years, you get desperate," said Gates, 29, a Wichita State University graduate. "To catch someone's eye, I think you need something new."

Local and national advertising executives say the bench approach may be a first nationally, not to mention the first among Wichita's 275 curbside seats.

Gates has been confined to a wheelchair since he broke his neck in a 1972 motorcycle accident. He said he got the idea for the bench from an ad in the newspaper. He contacted Mobile Ads Inc. in Wichita and worked out a deal.

"I get some off-the-wall ideas," said Gates, who has worked briefly in public relations. "But originality in advertising is the name of the game."

Musician undergoes heart surgery

LOS ANGELES — Gina Schock, drummer for the Go Go's rock group, is "doing very well" after surgery to correct a small hole in her heart, a spokesman said Wednesday.

"The doctor says the operation was a complete success," said Schock's publicist, Paul Bloch. "She is doing very well and recovering normally."

Bloch said the surgery was performed at an undisclosed Los Angeles medical center on Tuesday, a week after the problem, which dates from childhood, was discovered during a routine physical.

Schock will remain in the hospital for seven to 10 days, then recuperate at home for another three weeks before rejoining the all-female band in rehearsals for a national tour, Bloch said.

Actress unhappy with production

BARDWELL, Ky. — Butterfly McQueen, who played the plantation slave Prissy in "Gone With the Wind," said she was not happy the first time she viewed her most famous movie.

"I thought they should take that thing out and bury it," the actress said. "We were going forward in those days. We weren't going back to slavery days."

McQueen, 73, spoke earlier this week after visiting a classroom of third-graders at Carlisle County Elementary School. The actress sang a verse from "My Old Kentucky Home" and talked to the students.

Although they were born three decades after "Gone With the Wind" romanticized the Civil War-era South, most of the youngsters were familiar with the movie.

McQueen said she thought Vivian Leigh stole the show as Scarlett O'Hara, who slapped Prissy when the slave confessed she knew nothing about "birthing" babies.

McQueen, who lives in New York and spends winters in Augusta, Ga., decided to visit the school after teacher Roy Hensel wrote her a letter in hopes of getting an autograph.

Scientists reject high-tech nuclear plan

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Several distinguished scientists said Wednesday it is scientifically impossible to implement President Reagan's year-old dream of a high-technology umbrella against Soviet nuclear attack.

Because of that, the administration should drop the idea and instead pursue new arms control agreements which might limit the nuclear threat, according to the report by the Union of Concerned Scientists.

"We should abandon this illusion" that a workable ballistic missile defense can be developed, said Kurt Gottfried, a Cornell physicist and one of the report's authors.

"In this nuclear world, we cannot regain safety by sawing off the thin limb on which the Russians are perched because we're on the same limb," Gottfried told a news conference.

His reference was to the concept of deterrence, the existing nuclear stalemate between the two superpowers in which a first strike is deterred by the threat that the other side could launch a devastating counter-attack.

On March 23, 1983, Reagan called for scientific study into a defensive shield that could change the nuclear focus from offense to defense and "give us the means of rendering these nuclear weapons obsolete."

His proposal has been attacked by a number of arms control groups and scientists, who argued that the goal is only an unreachable dream and any major attempt to achieve it will only make the world a more dangerous place because it will scare the Soviets. They also said it will violate existing arms control agreements.

The Pentagon is seeking $3 billion for the next fiscal year into ballistic missile defense research. The program will cost at least $26 billion through 1989 with no assurance a workable system will ever be built, administration officials told Congress three weeks ago.

Hans Bethe, a Nobel laureate physicist and another author of the UCS report, said it would cost at least $70 billion to deploy a system which might destroy Soviet missiles in their boost phase — the earliest, powered part of flight when the weapons are most vulnerable.

Bethe, a leader of the Manhattan Project team which helped develop the atomic bomb, said none of the scientific proposals put forth by the administration are likely to be workable.

Those proposals include the idea of ground-based lasers, orbiting lasers or X-ray laser weapons which might be powered by a small nuclear explosion.

As for fears voiced publicly by the Pentagon that the Soviets are at least a decade ahead of the United States in BMD research, Bethe said, "The Russians are far behind the United States" in the related technology which would be needed to deploy a defensive shield.

Richard Garwin, another author of the report and a physicist who has advised the Pentagon for three decades, said that even if a workable system were developed, "it's very easy to build effective counter-measures."

Official fights county jail terms for D, E felons

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Despite overcrowding and a constantly increasing population in the Kansas prison system, Corrections Secretary Michael Barbara on Wednesday threw cold water on a proposal to allow judges to sentence class D and E felons to county jails for up to one year.

It sounds like I'm looking a gift horse in the mouth," Barbara told the House Federal and State Affairs Committee. But I think we need to go slowly."

Although class D and E felonies are considered less-violent crimes, Barbara said, there are crimes-against-persons that are D felonies."

If this bill becomes law, counties will have to provide round-the-clock security, he said, which means having at least three deputies to cover every 24-hour period. The state would have to reimburse counties for all costs of care and custody of the inmates, and Rep. Max Moomaw, R-Dighton, estimated the proposal would cost the state $1 million.

"You can't just lock the jail up at night and go home," Barbara said. Where's the money going to come from?"

Moomaw told the committee he sponsored the bill because he believes it would slow the population flow into the prison system, allow eligible inmates to maintain local family ties and speed up a parolee's return to his local community.

However, Barbara said the department recently conducted a survey of the 83 county jails in Kansas and found 53 to be deficient and 14 to be hazardous to the safety of inmates."

And a survey of 54 counties by the Kansas Sheriffs Association showed an average of 842 county jail beds, or more than half the available 1,581 beds, are occupied, Moomaw said.

"I don't mean to say all these 739 spaces are available, but some certainly would be," Moomaw said. There were more class D and E felons, 1,684 in the corrections system as of last Dec. 23 than total beds, according to Moomaw's own figures.

The committee took no action on the jail bill or on another bill which would toughen the state's law against dog fighting.

The Senate-passed bill would toughen existing law to make it illegal to train, own, keep, sell or transport dogs for the purpose of dog fighting.

The bill increases the penalty for attending a dog fight to a class B misdemeanor, punishable by six months in jail and a $1,000 fine. Currently, the penalty for attending a dog fight is a class C misdemeanor, punishable by one month in jail and a $500 fine.

It would also require law enforcement officers to confiscate any dogs kept by a person arrested for violating the dog-fighting law and prohibits the dogs' return to their keeper if the person is convicted.

The changes in the law were requested by Wichita Humane Society officials. They testified that they had to return 12 dogs to their owners even though the owners pleaded guilty or were convicted of dog-fighting violations last winter.

Fourteen dogs were confiscated after Sedgwick County law enforcement officials arrested 10 people on various dog-fighting charges.

Lafene tests students for tuberculosis

Lafene Student Health Center screens all incoming freshmen and transfer students for tuberculosis, although it is not required by the State of Kansas, said Dr. Robert Tout, director of student health at the center.

Tuberculosis is a communicable bacterial disease typically marked by wasting, fever and tubercles in the lungs.

"TB isn't that much of a problem because it's pretty rare," Tout said.

"I have 30 students who are being treated for positive tuberculin skin tests," Jan Carl, registered nurse at Lafene, said. "This does not mean that they have active TB."

All of these students have negative chest X-rays, she said.

TB is diagnosed through two tests, the tuberculin skin test and a chest X-ray, she said. When a skin test comes back positive, a chest X-ray is done to check for lesions on the lungs. If there are lesions, a culture is taken. Results come back in six to eight weeks.

Tout said the actual diagnosis of tuberculosis is based on identification of the organism. The identification of the organism is usually based on identification from sputum or gastric washings that are then cultured for about six weeks.

A positive TB skin test means a student has either been exposed to someone who had TB or he has been previously immunized with BCG vaccine. According to a Lafene pamphlet, once a person has had a positive skin test, he will most likely have positive skin tests from then on. Yearly check-ups should be done with X-ray because the skin test is no longer of any value.

Students who have a positive TB test are called "converters," persons who have become reactors to the testing, and are given oral medication for about a year. Tout said that an example of a converter would be a student who had a negative TB test as a freshman, but when tested later, had a positive test which proves that he is carrying the organism.

Medication for TB is furnished by the state for anyone living in Kansas. A person does not have to be a taxpayer or a citizen of Kansas to receive the medication, Carl said.

In developing countries, the tuberculosis rate is much higher because there is no program for eradication, Tout said.

"In countries where TB is endemic (not eradicated), the BCG vaccine is given," Carl said.

Because of the prevalence of TB in developing countries, the vaccine is recommended, Tout said.

In 1983, Kansas reported eight new cases of confirmed TB, and in 1984 there were seven new confirmed cases of TB. In 1983, there were 23,532 new, confirmed cases of active TB. Although the disease has not become an epidemic in the state, it is still a concern, Carl said.

OU officials discover 8 cases of tuberculosis

By The College Press Service

Eight University of Oklahoma students have come down with tuberculosis, and there are 80 dormant cases of the disease on the campus, university officials have found after a year of screening.

Despite the unusually high incidence of the illness, health officials say no epidemic is probable.

"There's no reason to panic," Barbara McEndree, a Norman nursing supervisor, said. "It's such an easily treatable disease, and there's no reason to think it'll spread widely."

The students who had the active cases already had tuberculosis before coming to the university, Dr. Lee Lyon, director of Oklahoma's TB screening clinic, said.

Most of the infected students, moreover, were Southeast Asian. Lyon said there is still a relatively high incidence of TB in Asia.

In the United States, the airborne bacterial infection rate is one person in 30,000.

OU's student population is 22,000. "TB is not that common in younger age groups, so I would not expect to find it much at the college campus," said Dr. Laurence Farer, head of the Tuberculosis Division at the Center for Disease Control in Atlanta.

Without treatment, tuberculosis can result in lung damage and even death, Farer said.

Lyon said TB is only "mildly contagious," and is transmitted primarily through close physical contact. Kissing and sharing the same dishes are two common ways it spreads. With treatment, infectiousness declines rapidly, she said.

Lyon said the disease is well under control in Norman.

The first cases were revealed in 1982, and set off a "small amount of panic," Lyon said. The university began regular screening of students last February.

Since then it has found an additional 80 dormant cases, in which the student is not contagious, among the 8,000 it has screened.

"We didn't feel there was any spread of the disease on campus," Lyon said.

KCC requires utilities to pay fuel costs

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Corporation Commission on Wednesday prohibited three utilities from charging customers for nearly $2.4 million in costs incurred last December when a coal pile froze at the Jeffrey Energy Center and the companies were forced to obtain power elsewhere.

The KCC, which regulates utilities in Kansas, also ordered a pipeline company in southeast Kansas, the Zoandra Petroleum Co., to pay its 39 customers $300 for costs of converting to other fuel sources. The commission stopped gas service by the company last October because of unsafe pipeline conditions.

The commission, which made tentative decisions on the two cases last week, issued final written orders Wednesday.

The frozen coal order applies to Kansas Power and Light Co. of Topeka, Kansas Gas and Electric Co. of Wichita and the Western Power Division of Centel, all partners in the Jeffrey power plant near St. Marys.

The coal pile froze during the Christmas weekend, and caused the utilities to incur higher fuel costs as they turned to other power plants to meet the electrical needs of customers. The KCC ruled that the three utilities should have anticipated problems from the extremely cold weather.

KPL cannot charge customers for $1.3 million; KG&E, $986,000, and Centel, $64,000.

As part of the same order, the commission allowed Kansas City Power & Light Co. to pass along $1.3 million and the Empire Electric District $200,000 in higher fuel costs caused by frozen coal at the La Cygne power plant in east-central Kansas.

Assuming residential customers use 750 kilowatt hours of electricity, the commission's action will save KPL customers $2.76 on their April bills, $1.28 for KG&E customers and 39 cents for Centel customers.

In the case of people with electric heating systems who use 2,000 kilowatts, the savings will be $7.36 for KPL customers, $3.40 for KG&E customers and $1.04 for Centel customers.

Under regulatory policies, utilities can charge customers monthly for higher fuel costs through automatic price adjustments in bills. During February and March, the five utilities passed along higher costs to customers because of the extremely cold weather.

During April, more fuel cost increases will be charged to consumers: $950,000 by KPL, $700,000 by KG&E and $420,000 by Centel. For 750 kilowatt hours, that will add $2.01 to monthly bills of KPL customers, $1.23 for KG&E customers and $2.25 for Centel customers.

The commission, in denying the frozen coal charges, recommended that the three utilities divide the higher fuel costs among themselves in a different manner, with more assessed to KPL because it is the lead partner in the Jeffrey plant.

In the Zoandra case, the commission levied a $12,500 fine on the company for pipeline safety violations. However, the company has a choice of paying the full fine to the KCC or making $300 payments to its 38 residential customers and one church.

Previously, a dozen Zoandra customers received $96 from the company to pay for the installation and one-year's rental of a tank for propane. In those cases, the company must make another payment to bring the total to $300.

The 31-mile gas pipeline is a gathering system for wells in Allen, Wilson and Woodson counties. The commission ordered the disconnection of Zoandra customers after an inspection by the KCC staff determined the line had dangerously low pressure and the company did not use an ordnance in its gas. As a result, the flow of gas to some homes periodically stopped and residents could not smell the gas if there was a leak.

Also in its order Wednesday, the commission ruled that Zoandra was under its regulatory jurisdiction as a public utility and could not resume operation of the pipeline until the safety standards were met. Repairs are estimated to cost $721,000.

Wife charged with aiding, abetting in husband's killing

By The Associated Press

JUNCTION CITY — The wife of an Emporia man shot to death in November was charged with aiding and abetting a first-degree murder Wednesday after a lesser charge was dismissed.

Geary County Attorney Steve Opat dismissed a charge of criminal solicitation of murder he had filed earlier against Lorna Anderson, 30, and filed a new complaint charging her with one count of aiding and abetting and two counts of conspiracy to commit first-degree murder.

Anderson remained free on $50,000 bond pending an April 13 hearing in Geary County District Court. The aiding and abetting charge carries a life sentence. The maximum sentence on the criminal solicitation charge is three to 10 years.

Anderson's husband, Martin K. Anderson, 34, was shot to death in a farm field south of Manhattan. She told authorities her husband was shot by an unknown man while they were looking for van keys she said she had dropped and while their four daughters watched from the van.

Two men, Daniel Carter, 35, Emporia, and Gregory C. Curry, 26, Mentor, Ohio, pleaded guilty to solicitation charges in the case earlier this year. Both were sentenced to two to five years in prison.

Gibbs proposes instant replay usage

By The Associated Press

HONOLULU — Since millions of fans watching television know immediately when a game official makes a bad call, so should the officiating crew, Washington Redskins Coach Joe Gibbs said Wednesday.

Gibbs is spearheading a renewed drive to bring National Football League officiating into the television age, with an extra official monitoring instant replays and instantly correcting bad calls.

His proposal, which covers only limited situations, is being considered by the NFL owners during their winter meetings here.

Gibbs, explaining his support for an instant replay review, said, "When a busted call is made, television runs it again and again for everybody to see. They (television crews) feel they have to present that side of it, say 'Look, they blew this.'"

"I think what we have to do is give the referees all the help we can. The game goes so fast. I just think we need to move in the direction of using instant replays."

The official would review only controversial calls on change-of-possession plays, such as fumbles, and sideline and endline calls.

The United States Football League does not use instant replays, but places observers in the press box to monitor calls on the field.

Gibbs said of his proposal, "My push on this includes two considerations, that it would not cost a lot of money and that it would not slow down the game."

"There have been many different proposals for using the instant replay, but most would have required a great number of cameras and therefore would have cost a lot."

Under his proposal, the official would watch the video replay the same as would television viewers — regardless of whether the game was being broadcast live or taped for later viewing.

Gibbs said it was extremely important that the review and any call changes not delay play.

"We can't slow it down or we're dead," he said. "I think that, if there were a guy in the booth and he only came in to override busted calls, it might happen only once or twice a game."

"All I want as a coach is to have the game called correctly. A good pilot study of instant replays is what we need."

Softballers sweep pair, falter in tourney play

By HUEY COUNTS
Sports Editor

The K-State women's softball team kicked off its spring season during spring break by sweeping Butler County Community College March 13 at El Dorado in a twin bill, 10-0 and 3-0.

The Wildcats jumped on the Cougars for three runs in the fourth inning. Annette Kirkham led off the inning with a triple and scored when a Butler infielder mishandled a grounder hit by Rachelle Borders. Borders scored on the second Butler error of the inning, and Pam Rufener scored on a sacrifice hit by Sherri Chacey.

Leslie Taylor started the fifth with a double, advanced to third on a fly out by Joyce Hawley and scored on a Cougar error. Kirkham scored her second run of the game on a groundout by Rufener.

K-State exploded for its final five runs of the contest in the sixth inning on just two hits and four Cougar errors. Kirkham and Borders provided run-scoring singles in the inning.

Kathy Gillpatrick picked up the victory on the mound for K-State, limiting Barton to just one hit — a third inning single — in seven innings and striking out four batters in the contest.

In the second game of the double-header, the Wildcats got all the runs they needed in the first inning.

With one out, Borders walked on four straight pitches, and Rufener followed with a single. Alise Willson reached base on an error which scored Borders, and one out later, Mary Sivyver slapped a double to drive in Rufener and Willson.

The three first inning runs by the Wildcats proved to be more than enough as K-State hurler Lisa Tarvesiad retired the nine batters she faced to pick up the victory in a game that was called after three innings on account of darkness.

The two-game winning streak ended March 15 when the Wildcats were handed a 7-0 setback by No. 7-ranked Central Michigan University in an opening round game at the Sooner Invitational Tournament at Norman, Okla. There were 24 teams in the tourney, several of which were among the nation's top-ranked squads.

CMU jumped all over Wildcat hurler Gillpatrick for 12 hits, while K-State was held to just three hits — singles by Susie Buchman and Rufener and a triple by Hawley. The loss dropped Gillpatrick to 1-1 on the season.

On March 16, the Wildcats lost a pair of tournament games — one against Texas Tech University and one against the University of Arizona.

Once again, a lack of hits by K-State coupled with good hitting by the opposition proved fatal to the Wildcats.

Texas Tech accumulated 12 hits to bury the Wildcats, 11-1. In the fourth inning, the Red Raiders broke open a close game by erupting for eight runs on seven hits. Sas Trotter provided the big blow with a three-run homer.

Rufener provided the lone K-State hit in the contest — a fifth-inning single.

Arizona drubbed K-State in the 'Cats' final game of the tournament, cracking out eight hits on their way to a 9-1 victory.

Gillpatrick again was the pitcher as her record dropped to 1-3.

Twin bill cancelled

A double-header between the K-State and Marymount College baseball teams scheduled for 1 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field has been cancelled due to the wet condition of the playing field.

The game has not been rescheduled.

The Wildcats, who are currently 6-4, are scheduled to host William Jewell University at 1 p.m. Friday.

Bankruptcy measure clouds future of grain elevator bill

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House Wednesday took up legislation aimed at helping farmers when grain elevators go bankrupt, but passage was far from certain because the measure was part of a controversial bankruptcy package.

Stalled for two years, the grain elevator issue finally made it to the House floor because it was seen as a way to attract farm-state votes to a bill extending the life of the nation's bankruptcy courts, said Rep. Dan Glickman, D-Kan.

"What this is going to do is get enough farm-state Democrats to vote that it may help" pass the bankruptcy bill, said Glickman, D-Kan., who headed a House Agriculture Committee task force on the issue. Final action on the bill was not expected until today.

The bill's provisions give producers with stored grain special priority for recovery of the first $2,000 of their claims. For amounts in excess of that, they join other unsecured creditors of the elevator in receiving prorated shares of the remaining assets.

In addition, the bill sets up a 120-day timetable for the disposition of grain in a bankrupt elevator; limits a trustee's fees to the costs of preserving and disposing of grain; and establishes warehouse receipts or scale tickets as evidence of grain ownership.

The Senate has passed similar legislation several times but the bill has been bottled up in the House Judiciary Committee, where chairman Peter Rodino, D-N.J., objected to giving any creditors preferential treatment.

Glickman said Rodino's resistance to the bill evaporated when it became evident the authority behind the nation's bankruptcy courts would run out March 30, and that farm and consumer provisions would attract much-needed votes.

He said Rodino decided about two weeks ago to make the grain provisions part of the bankruptcy package. In return, Glickman agreed to help work for passage of the bill.

The elevator bankruptcy issue gained national attention in 1981, after the James Brothers Elevators in Missouri and Arkansas declared bankruptcy.

Farmers who needed to sell grain to raise money for planting a new crop were frustrated in efforts to get back their stored produce, and Wayne Cryts, a Puxico, Mo., farmer, barged past federal marshals at the elevator in Ristine, Mo., and hauled away about 33,000 bushels of soybeans he said were his.

Jurors deliberate second verdict in New Bedford tavern rape case

By The Associated Press

FALL RIVER, Mass. — Four men committed "an explosion of violence and brutality against that small woman," a prosecutor said Wednesday in urging a jury to convict the men of gang-raping a woman on a barroom pool table.

But defense attorneys argued that the woman was "committed to the path of a lie" when she testified against the men.

Jurors were expected to begin deliberating the case Thursday after receiving instructions from Superior Court Judge William Young on Wednesday afternoon.

Two other men charged in the same incident were convicted of aggravated rape Saturday after a separate trial, and they face possible life terms when they are sentenced Friday.

"I ask you to speak to a verdict that says what happened, that speaks to all the outrageous brutality and speaks to (the victim) in a quiet way," assistant Bristol County District Attorney Robert Kane argued in his closing statement.

He said the four men charged in the March 6, 1983, attack in New Bedford acted as a "mob" when a woman was attacked on a pool table while others cheered.

Kane said jurors should not be swayed by testimony that the woman had several drinks and flirted with the men before the attack.

The prosecutor said there is "a natural...outrage" against what happened in the tavern.

"It is an outrage that's drawn upon the American tradition and experience," he told jurors. "It's a tradition that says we don't tolerate bullies."

The defendants are all Portuguese immigrants. Some members of the city's Portuguese community attributed the earlier convictions to the men's nativity. Protest marches are planned in New Bedford on Thursday night and in Fall River on Friday.

District Attorney Ronald Pina, a Portuguese American, rejected the claim. The victim also is a Portuguese-American, and at least five of the 16 jurors have Portuguese surnames.

Defense attorneys attacked the woman as a liar.

"She had no way to be deterred from the track of a lie," said attorney Kenneth Sullivan, who represents defendant John Cordeiro.

Sullivan argued the woman lied about the events in Big Dan's, a New Bedford barroom, more than a year ago because she feared what family and friends would do if they knew the real story.

Cordeiro, 24, was charged along with Victor Raposo, 23, Jose Medeiros, 23, and Virgilio Medeiros, 24.

Convicted earlier on aggravated rape charges were Daniel Silva 27, and Joseph Vieira, 28.

Proprietors oppose beer, gas bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — People who drink and drive will not be dissuaded by a proposal to prohibit them from buying 3.2 percent beer and gasoline at the same store in Kansas, a House committee was told Wednesday.

Instead, the proposal would put people out of work and force some convenience stores out of business, several store officials told the House Federal and State Affairs Committee.

"You cannot legislate morality," said Frances Kastner, lobbyist for the Kansas Food Dealers' Association. "Neither can you prevent those who want to drive while under the influence of alcohol or drugs from doing so just by limiting the places where these purchases can be made."

Kastner urged the committee to kill the bill which would prevent stores that sell gasoline from also selling 3.2 percent beer.

The committee heard testimony, but did not act on the bill.

But the Rev. Richard Taylor, leader of Kansans for Life at Its Best, the state's dry forces, supported the measure and warned the committee that killing the bill "will just be killing more people."

"What is more important — selling beer or saving lives?" Taylor asked. "This bill is so logical and it makes so much sense, it should sail through the Legislature."

Kastner was joined in her opposition by Robert Meyers, president of Kwik Shop Inc., and Larry Sullivan, district manager of Love's Country Stores.

"The combined sale of beer and gasoline represent over 50 percent of our total sales," Meyers said. "If either were restricted from our sales mix, many marginally profitable stores would be forced to close."

Saturday's caucuses to show state's support

Presidential campaigners discuss strategies— State Democrats to select local delegates—

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — With Kansas Democrats scheduled to attend local caucuses in less than 48 hours, representatives of Gary Hart, Walter Mondale and Jesse Jackson said Thursday they are hopeful their favorites will do well in corraling delegates but admitted they don't know what to expect.

"My sense is we are still playing catchup as of today," said Kathleen Sebelius, Topeka, state coordinator of the Hart campaign.

"I don't think we have such an advantage here that I can predict we'll be the winner," said Tom Cosgrove, also of Topeka, who is state coordinator for Mondale.

"I wish we could have done better, but you do the best you can," said Dorothy Nelson of Kansas City, Kan., Jackson's coordinator in the state.

They were talking about their efforts to turn out supporters for their candidates at Saturday's 117 county and state senatorial district caucus meetings across Kansas, at which 768 local delegates will be elected.

The key is for the supporters of the three contenders to get their people to the caucuses to elect local delegates going to the district and state conventions who are pledged to their man.

"We are blind in a lot of areas in terms of getting feedback from the field," Sebelius said Thursday. "The key question is what's going to happen with the uncommitteds."

Gov. John Carlin, who was state chairman of the campaign of Sen. John Glenn before he dropped out of the race, has taken a neutral position. There has been speculation Carlin was urging the election of unpledged slates of candidates at Saturday's caucuses. His press secretary, Mike Swenson, denied that.

Cosgrove said he hopes Mondale's more established organization will serve the former vice president well Saturday. Mondale has been organized in the state about five months, while Hart had nothing but a handful of volunteers doing some calling until two weeks ago when his campaign took off following a strong showing in Iowa and a primary victory in New Hampshire.

"I think our better organization has cut into the Hart fad in other states; maybe it will here, too," said Cosgrove. "I think people are trying to find out now who would be the better president."

Nelson said Jackson's campaign is an all-volunteer effort which has concentrated on seven cities — Wichita, Topeka, Kansas City, Kan., Lawrence, Junction City, Manhattan and Leavenworth. She said she thinks Jackson will reach the 20 percent threshold in several senatorial districts in Wichita, Topeka and Kansas City.

Hart is running three days of heavy media advertising through today to try to stir his potential supporters into going to the caucuses Saturday, while the Mondale campaign sent the former vice president's wife, Joan, to Wichita and his son, William, to Topeka Thursday for personal appearances.

By LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

The presidential preference caucuses held across the state on Saturday will give the first indication of which candidate Kansas Democrats will support for the presidential nomination.

Riley County Democrats will meet in the Manhattan City Auditorium to pick the 12 delegates and 12 alternates to the district convention April 14 in Topeka.

Registration for the Riley County caucus begins at noon Saturday. At 1 p.m. the doors are closed and no more participants can register, said Ruth Schrum, Riley County Democratic Party chairman.

After registration closes, the participants must vote to adopt the local caucus rules. A representative of each candidate will give a five-minute speech, then the process of delegate selection will begin.

Participants will divide themselves into groups to show support for Mondale, Hart, Jackson or to show they are uncommitted. A candidate must have at least 20 percent of the participants at the local caucus to be eligible for a delegate or alternate, Schrum said.

"If one group doesn't have 20 percent, they are given a chance to regroup," she said. "They can either choose to support another candidate or not participate."

When all remaining groups have at least 20 percent of the participants, the number of delegates and alternates for each candidate is determined. Members of each group vote for the delegates.

"They vote by secret ballot, first for the women and then for the men," Schrum said. "This is to get as close as possible to having equal numbers of men and women delegates."

Similar procedures will be used at the other 117 local caucuses held in the state Saturday. Delegates and alternates from these caucuses will attend the five district conventions to choose delegates to the state convention. The 26 delegates and 11 alternates selected at the district level will be delegates to the national, as well as the state, convention. Riley County is part of the 2nd District, which will select five delegates and one alternate.

The Kansas Democratic Convention will be held May 12 to select the remaining delegates to the national convention. At the convention, 10 delegates will be selected from the ranks of party and elected officials.

Eight at-large delegates and five alternates complete the state's 44 delegates and 15 alternate representation for the Democratic National Convention which begins June 16.

According to state Democratic Party rules, only registered Democrats can participate in the local caucuses. Schrum said voters may register until the day of the caucuses. Voters can register at the county clerk's office, the city municipal building, banks in the Westloop and Village Plaza shopping centers, Manhattan Public Library, Kansas State Bank on Blue-mont Avenue, Douglass Center Annex, Dillons on Anderson Avenue and Blue Hills Supermarket.

White House guards seize man with sword

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A casually dressed man was seized at gunpoint by White House police Thursday night outside the northwest gate after he pulled a samurai sword from its scabbard and brandished it in the air, eyewitnesses reported.

One of the eyewitnesses, Dennis Whitehead, 31, said he saw the man drive his car up to the gate, get out, walk toward the White House fence and calmly pull the sword from its cover.

Whitehead said the encounter lasted two or three minutes and uniformed White House guards approached the man, asking him to put down the sword.

"Finally, after 30 or 45 seconds, he raised the sword up in the air, brought it down, put it into the scabbard, laid it on the ground and stepped away," Whitehead said.

At that point, police searched the suspect and led him away for questioning, Whitehead said.

The incident occurred while President Reagan was entertaining President Francois Mitterrand of France and his wife, Danielle.

Congress delays Salvadoran aid plan

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration Thursday bowed to Democratic demands to delay congressional action on further military aid to El Salvador until after Sunday's Salvadoran elections and accepted a compromise on the amount of assistance.

The agreement, announced in the Senate by Republican Leader Howard Baker of Tennessee, calls for the Senate to act Tuesday or Wednesday on an aid package providing an extra $61.7 million for El Salvador in the current fiscal year.

Reagan sought supplemental aid of $178.7 million, on top of $64.8 million that was approved last fall. The Senate Appropriations Committee, by a 16-13 vote, approved $93 million, subject to periodic reports by the president that the Salvadoran regime is making human rights and other reforms.

On Wednesday, Baker moved to bring the committee measure up on the floor, but was blocked by Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and other liberal Democrats who said no action should be taken until after the presidential election in El Salvador.

Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, senior Democrat on the appropriations subcommittee on foreign aid, had planned to offer an amendment to reduce the $93 million to $49.2 million.

As part of the compromise, Inouye agreed to increase this to $61.7 million. He said the extra money was needed for medical supplies and training. He said 67 percent of the wounded in El Salvador's civil war die, compared to 11 percent in World War II.

Baker said the administration would support this new financing.

Senate Democratic Leader Robert Byrd of West Virginia said he would support the Inouye amendment, but reserved judgment on the bill as a whole. Besides funds for El Salvador, it contains $21 million to assist rebels against the leftist government of Nicaragua and $150 million for drought relief in Africa.

Baker said that with the agreement "we have moved an inch in the direction" of a bipartisan Central American policy.

Lois Lewis, extension nutritional assistant at the Shawnee County Extension Office, receives congratulations from friend Altha Perkins, Topeka, as her husband Loran C. Lewis watches. Lois was named K-State Classified Employee of the Year Thursday afternoon in the Union Cottonwood Room.

Nutritionist wins Employee of the Year award

By TONA TURNER
Collegian Reporter

Lois Lewis was recognized as Classified Employee of the Year with a plaque and $500 Thursday afternoon at the seventh annual Classified Employee Recognition Program in McCain Auditorium.

Lewis was one of 226 K-State employees recognized for her years of service to K-State.

She has served the University for more than nine years as a nutrition assistant with the Expanded Foods and Nutrition Education Program in the Shawnee County Extension Office.

Lewis' peers describe her as "a person with a real desire to help the less fortunate."

In a character summary of Lewis, K-State President Duane Acker said, "Co-workers of Lewis respect and admire her ability to teach the program's clients new information and skills which they can use to make a better life for themselves. As a result of the genuine concern and sensitivity Lewis has toward her clients' situation, they have developed a confidence and trust in her which is necessary for her job to be effective."

As a nutrition assistant, Lewis works with low-income families. She teaches them nutritional needs for good health, wise buying and storing of food, and methods of growing and preserving foods. Many state and community leaders have contacted Lewis for advice and solutions to problems in her field.

"Lewis has always had a strong interest in the development of youth, including them in the education of good nutrition when working with families. In addition, each year she teaches an average of 150 youths about foods and nutrition through Day Care Centers, Day Camps, Girls Clubs and other community projects," Acker said.

Lewis describes herself as a "natural mother," having raised 14 children with the encouragement and support of her husband.

Thirteen of their children have gone beyond a high school education and the last is finishing high school this year.

Lewis also is active in her community. She is a leader in church activities, the Girls Club Board, the Topeka Unified School District No. 501 Parent Committee and special committees to coordinate public services in Topeka.

Of the 1,800 K-State employees, 200 were nominated for the award. Eighteen semifinalists were chosen in December by the Classified Affairs Committee. After nine interview sessions, the committee selected six finalists in January.

Past Employees of the Year awards have gone to Andy Heldenbrand (1978), Mildred Moore (1979), Barb Pretzer (1980), Marlene Hightower (1981), F. Gayle Bertwell (1982) and John V. Frese (1983).

Tax reform legislation creates voter concern

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

Tax reform legislation creates concern among taxpayers that one person's taxes will be lower while another's will be higher, said Sam Schmidt, Riley County appraiser.

This concern extends to Kansas legislators who have been in heated debate over a proposal to amend the Kansas Constitution to allow the classification of property for tax purposes.

A state statute states that all property is to be assessed at 30 percent of fair market value, but, Schmidt said, the latest available figures for Riley County, dated 1982, state that commercial property is appraised at 12 percent, residential at 10 percent and agricultural investments at 4.4 percent.

Schmidt said the reason for these figures is to keep a "uniformity" among taxed property.

Under the leadership of Gov. John Carlin, the House on Wednesday approved the classification proposal, and if it passes the Senate, the question will be brought to Kansas voters in the November election.

Schmidt said that as an appraiser, he doesn't necessarily like the idea of the classification proposal.

"There are some people who don't want to set the appraisal rates into law, but want to allow for classification," Schmidt said.

"With that you'll probably run into the thing that happened in Wisconsin. They started out with a small number of classifications, now they have up to 80 and 100."

Schmidt said classification would make appraisal a much more complex issue and begin more heated debate.

"You're grouping a bunch of property, and then you're splitting that further and further at different tax levels," Schmidt said. "Now we argue valuation. (With classification), now the fight would be, 'I don't belong in this classification, I belong in this one,' because they're going to try to get in the lower levels."

But Schmidt said he doesn't foresee as big of a problem with classification in Riley County as other counties might face because the county doesn't have several diversified markets.

"We basically have residential, rural, housing and farming," Schmidt said. "We don't have any large industrial area. There's the area around K-Mart, but thank goodness that's in Pottawatomie County."

The fear shared by Carlin and others is that residential and agricultural property would be taxed more as the shift takes more burden off commercial and personal property.

The current proposal would create nine classes of property and permit the classification of property to begin Jan. 1, 1990.

Republican announces bid for 2nd District nomination

By LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

James Van Slyke of Topeka formally announced his candidacy for the Republican nomination for 2nd District Congressman at a press conference Thursday morning in Manhattan.

Van Slyke, 26, is the only announced candidate for the GOP nomination for the seat now held by U.S. Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Topeka. Slattery has indicated he will seek re-election to a second two-year term.

In 1980, Van Slyke worked on the successful re-election campaign of former Congressman Jim Jeffries. However, he was fired before the November election after being accused of misrepresentation in obtaining semi-private documents from K-State relating to Jeffries' Democratic opponent, Sam Keys.

At that time, Van Slyke said he acted on his own in posing as a graduate student in order to obtain information about Keys, who was a former dean of the College of Education.

Today, however, Van Slyke said the decision to obtain information about Keys was made by Jeffries' campaign manager.

"The Jeffries campaign incident was a campaign management decision," Van Slyke said.

Visiting professor to give seminar

Dale Blevins, professor of agronomy at the University of Missouri-Columbia, will present a seminar at 3 p.m. today in Ackert 221.

His topic will be "Ureide Metabolism in Nitrogen-Fixing Soybean Plants."

Ureides are the nitrogenous compounds synthesized in the nitrogen-fixing root nodules, which are translocated to other parts of plants. Blevins and his associates have explained the key reactions in the biosynthesis of these compounds and have contributed significantly to the understanding of their roles in the nitrogen metabolism of soybeans.

Blevins received his graduate training from the University of Kentucky. In 1974, he took an assistant professorship at the University of Maryland and began to investigate the nodulation process in soybeans. He then moved to Missouri in 1976 and began to study ureide biosynthesis in soybean root nodules.

Legislative panel to present views

A panel of Kansas legislators will give their views of recent activities in the state capitol and on legislation affecting business, agriculture and education in Riley County at 3:30 p.m. today in Union 212.

Speakers during the program will include representatives Joe Knopp, R-Manhattan; Don Rezac, D-Onaga; Ivan Sand, R-Riley; and Senator Merrill Werts, R-Junction City.

The program is one in a series planned this spring by the K-State chapter of the American Association of University Professors.

The public is invited.

Hispanic scholarships offered

The Office of Minority Affairs in partnership with the Manhattan League of United Latin American Citizens Council No. 09501 and the National LULAC Scholarship Fund (NLSF) will offer several academic merit and financial need scholarships to K-State students for the 1984-1985 academic year.

The goal of the LULAC Scholarship Fund is to financially assist outstanding hispanic students. Students from all academic disciplines may apply.

The NLSF utilizes a matching funds concept in which local funds, from the University and from individuals, are matched by LULAC national funds. The local goal is $10,000.

Summer research program offered

The National Endowment for the Humanities has announced a program for individuals under 21 to spend a summer carrying out their own non-credit humanities research projects.

The Younger Scholars Program will award up to 100 grants nationally for outstanding research and writing projects in such fields as history, philosophy and the study of literature.

These projects will be carried out during the summer of 1985. The application deadline is Sept. 15, 1984.

Award recipients will be expected to work full-time for nine weeks during the summer, researching and writing a humanities paper under the close supervision of a humanities scholar. This is not a financial aid program and no academic credit should be sought for the projects.

Super Dance to raise funds to fight muscular dystrophy

Eighty people from four living groups are dancing to raise money for muscular dystrophy at the Super Dance from 8 a.m. to 11 p.m. Saturday at the Avalon.

Members from Alpha Chi Omega, FarmHouse, Gamma Phi Beta and Tau Kappa Epsilon will be raising funds through pledges made by businesses and individuals for each hour danced.

An obtainable goal of $10,000 has been set, Matt McMillen, junior in journalism and mass communications and manager of the Super Dance, said. He said this is a reasonable goal for the first Super Dance, since the Bump-A-Thon, which was held in previous years, raised $20,000.

"We expect the first year to be kind of tough," McMillen said. "But we wanted to get the tradition started again."

There will be prizes given away during the day, Becky Davis, freshman in elementary education and person in charge of prizes, said. "We want to keep people motivated all day long."

Prizes include a flight to Kansas City, a night at the Holidome, a home computer, a set of car speakers, food and floral gift certificates and food. Area businesses contributed the prizes.

A $100 gift certificate from Ramada Inn will be the prize for the living group raising the most money. They can throw a party with that, Davis said.

John Triggs, manager of the Avalon, said Jim Sweeney and the Jumpshotz will play for a couple hours during the day, and also Saturday night.

"From 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. there will be happy hour-priced beer and the cover charge also will go to M.D.," he said.

Official defends weather policy during Student Senate meeting

The administration's reasons for not closing K-State on Monday during severe weather conditions were discussed by Charles Hein, director of communications, during the open period of the Student Senate meeting Thursday night.

Hein said the University's policy is subject to the state policy on inclement weather. He said the governor can declare a state of emergency for the entire state or for a specific geographical area. If the governor declares a state of emergency for the Manhattan area, K-State would close.

If the governor does not make such a declaration, K-State President Duane Acker can decide to activate the University's inclement weather policy, but he must get the governor's approval, Hein said.

Hein said Acker's decision not to activate the inclement weather policy is based on weather forecasts, road reports from the Kansas Highway Patrol and estimation of the number of students able to return to Manhattan.

tan.

The decision to keep the University open Monday was made because enough students had returned from spring break to warrant holding classes, Hein said. He said K-State administrators did not consider closing the University.

Brian O'Neill, graduate student senator, expressed dismay at the administration's decision to hold classes as usual.

"You had two inches of ice on the ground, predictions of six-to-eight inches of snow — later reduced to one-to-three inches — power lines coming down right and left and the Kansas Highway Patrol discouraging all travel," O'Neill said. "And you're saying no one even considered closing the University?"

Hein said while the University did care about the students, it was up to each person whether or not he attended class. Faculty members are subject to penalty if they do not attend classes when the University is open, he said.

O'Neill said there was no value in keeping the University open when many students were not able to attend classes.

"The educational benefits to the half of the students who can attend are far outweighed by the disadvantages to the rest of the student body," he said.

In other business, senators passed a bill revising the requirements for wearing senator identification buttons. All members of student government will now have identification buttons, but are not required to wear them.

Senators also approved appointments of standing committee chairmen. The new chairmen are Laura Butler, academic affairs; Mark Jones, communications; Steve Line, personnel selections; Kendra Ponte, senate operations; Greg Pestinger, state and community affairs; and Cindy Leighton, student affairs. Senate Chairman Tracy Turner said the appointment of the social services committee chairman is pending.

Jury convicts 2 more of rape

By The Associated Press

FALL RIVER, Mass. — A jury on Thursday convicted two men of aggravated rape and acquitted two others of all charges in the case of a woman who was gang-raped on a barroom pool table while spectators cheered.

Two other men were convicted earlier of aggravated rape in a separate trial before a separate jury in a highly publicized case after a 22-year-old woman was attacked a year ago in Big Dan's saloon in New Bedford.

The jury convicted Victor Raposo and John Cordeiro, who witnesses testified tried to have oral sex with the woman while she was pinned against the table. It acquitted Virgilio Medeiros and Jose Medeiros. Witnesses said they tried to interfere with efforts to stop or report the assault, but no one directly linked them to the rape.

The guilty could receive life terms, and federal authorities may move to deport them.

All four were charged with aggravated rape in the March 6, 1983, attack. Aggravated rape is applied in gang rape cases.

Two other men, Daniel Silva 27, and Joseph Vieira, 28, were convicted of aggravated rape by a separate jury on Saturday. The case was split into two trials because some of the defendants gave police statements implicating Silva and Vieira.

The rape became a focal point for women's rights groups. A week after the attack, more than 2,500 people staged a candlelight march to New Bedford city hall to protest violence against women.

More marches were being planned Thursday — but in support of the defendants. The Committee For Justice, made up of members of the area's Portuguese community, organized a candlelight march Thursday night in New Bedford.

The group has claimed that wide news coverage of the trial and the swiftness of Saturday's verdict were the result of bias against recent Portuguese immigrants.

The jury in the second case heard from 28 witnesses over 19 days of testimony. The chief prosecution witness was the young mother of two who said she was attacked by strangers at the bar.

She testified she had one quick drink in the bar and was on her way out when she was knocked to the floor and dragged to the pool table where she was raped by Silva and Vieira. She also said Cordeiro tried to force her to perform oral sex while others in the bar cheered.

Another witness, bartender Carlos Machado, said he saw Raposo and Cordeiro try to have oral sex with the woman while the two Medeiros men cheered them with shouts of, "That's how it's done."

Machado said Virgilio Medeiros blocked his path when he tried to come to the woman's aid. Another witness said Virgilio Medeiros intimidated him when he left the bar carrying a dime and the phone number of police.

Former K-State student dies of leukemia

Former K-State student Loyal Bret Morgan, 20, of Topeka, died Thursday morning at the University of Kansas Medical Center in Kansas City, Kan.

He was being treated for complications following a bone marrow transplant. Morgan was a K-State student from fall 1982 to May 1983, when he entered a Topeka hospital for treatment of acute leukemia.

He was born Nov. 12, 1963, in Wichita, the son of Arlin and Thelma Morgan.

As a freshman at K-State, Morgan studied mathematics and education. He was active in Interservice Christian Fellowship and attended Grace Baptist Church in Manhattan.

A memorial service will be held at 2:30 p.m. Sunday at Washburn Rural High School, Topeka.

A graveside service will follow at the Dover cemetery.

In lieu of flowers, the family is asking that gifts be used to establish a memorial scholarship fund at Washburn Rural.

Utility crews deserve thanks

When the power suddenly went out last weekend due to the wind, ice and snow, many of us were left in cold darkness. Some of us couldn't help but absent-mindedly flick light switches as we went from room to room, even though we knew the power was off.

It only goes to show that many of us take for granted the benefits of water, electricity and heat, especially during the winter. But the recent power outages should make us all thankful for the utilities we use every day.

But while we were complaining about having to walk through the snow and ice to get to school and cursing the administration every step of the way, the crews at Kansas Power and Light were hard at work correcting downed power lines and transformers.

Work began for KP&L crews about noon Sunday and continued straight through until 9 p.m. Monday. After a brief respite, they started work again at 5 a.m. Tuesday.

Since then the line crews have been working in 16-hour shifts to restore power. These people deserve a big thanks for all the extra work they did this week so the rest of us could complain about the weather in a warm and well-lit home.

During one of the harshest storms of the winter, radio stations told us to stay inside except in emergency situations. But at the same time, the crews were busy at work, trying to hook up ice-caked power lines while dodging falling tree limbs.

So here's to the crews and everyone else at the power companies who worked extra this week. You deserve a big pat on the back for suffering in the cold darkness this week so we wouldn't have to any longer than necessary.

Andy Ostmeyer, for the editorial board

Questions about canceling class

Charles Hein, director of communications, said after Monday's storm that "K-State never closes." He meant, of course, in the event of bad weather. But afternoon classes for Friday, March 30 have been canceled for All-University Open House.

True, K-State will not be closed for open house. But this week's storm invites analysis of class cancellation policy. Is canceling classes after 1:30 p.m. for open house a good idea, especially in view of student, faculty and staff displeasure that classes met in spite of a serious storm?

Classes on Friday afternoons traditionally have suffered in competition with the inevitable TGIF attitude. So if most students tend to skip class anyway, actually canceling the classes they might attend to promote open house could arouse their interest in the event.

But what makes a Monday more special than a Friday afternoon if students will stay home because of hazardous weather conditions? A poor attitude toward learning can be seen here. The University is promoting itself with open house, but the irony that classes will not meet Friday afternoon but must continue during a severe storm Monday gives cause to wonder where the value lies between necessary University financing and equally imperative academic activity.

LaRue, Andy Ostmeyer, Karra Porter, Dan Robison, Mike Turner, Lee White and Connie Woodard.

A tale of sudden snowstorm woe—

I'm tired of hearing from everyone that K-State President Duane Acker should have called off all classes Monday. Heck, the roads weren't that bad. Everyone should be proud of Acker's example of not bending to the pressures of a few crybabies.

I work and take a class at night, but my wife is a full-time student. I wish the people at work would look at Acker's example. I went in at 7:30 a.m., but no one showed up by 8 a.m., so I called my boss.

I won't repeat the exact words used, but it went something like, "Haven't you been out on the roads? Don't you know the highway patrol says it's extremely hazardous to be driving? People could be killed or injured trying to make it in to work. Where's your common sense?"

Well, I just told him I didn't have any trouble getting to work.

"Sure," he said, "but you only have a block to walk to get to work. Try getting out on the roads."

I wasn't happy about that little conversation at all. I thought as I trudged back home that good of Duane wouldn't have abused me like that. I looked down Seth Childs Road and saw a car whirl around in the road by Pizza Hut. But I knew the driver's real problem: he just could not drive. He was probably from Florida.

My wife had class at 8:30 a.m. and wanted to skip. I sure set her straight. "Did the president call off classes?"

"No, but..."

"No buts, you're going to class."

I yelled, "You've got life insurance don't you?" as she drove out the lane. Ten thousand dollars worth, to be exact. (I decided I should check it out after she left.)

Just as I was beginning to wonder

JOHN RIDENOUR
Guest Columnist

if I should have awakened our little 2-year-old son to hug his mommy goodbye, she was back in the drive.

"Glad you went, right?" I said smugly.

"Oh, very glad," came her almost-as-smug reply. "Out of four classes I only had one. And that teacher said she would be going over the same thing again Wednesday for those who missed."

You can imagine how my mind was burning with disgust. What kind of teachers are these? School wasn't called off. My class was that night, so I decided that before I wasted my time, I'd better check and make sure it wasn't canceled. I called the administrative office at K-State and was assured classes weren't called off. The woman I spoke to did, however, say they were telling people to stay home if they didn't want to get out, but classes would be held as usual since there were students living on campus.

I wondered, as I drove to my class, why they just didn't cancel classes or tell everyone to be there. But the answer came to me quickly: Duane didn't want the monkey on his back. He sure is a thinker.

Suddenly, I noticed my car was not slowing down when I put on the brake. Darn foreign cars, I thought, they make them too light. I sailed by the stop sign and came to a halt in the rear end of a Mazda parked across the street.

As I walked on to class while a wrecker hauled my car to the shop, I wondered why the police couldn't understand the real reason for the incident, instead of insisting on giving me a ticket.

Arriving at class, I found no one there. You can imagine what I thought. What's wrong with everyone? No one said they could loaf like that. Everything was operating normally, right?

Next, I walked over to the library to do some reading from the reserves. Guess what — no one was at the reserve desk. So, I just moseyed up into the stacks to look for a journal article I needed. Darned if it wasn't gone. I went down to the front desk to see if it was checked out. The people there said they couldn't check because the computers were down due to the ice.

Boy, I sure hate computers. I thought as I walked home. No sooner had I walked in the door when our lights went out. Since our thermostat and forced air fan couldn't operate without electricity, we headed over to a friend's home to stay warm until the lights came back on.

But I'm getting a little off the subject. Isn't it a well-known fact and tradition that K-State never closes? Mount St. Helens didn't blow up here, did it? The school's still there, right? Besides, now I won't have as much trouble finding a seat in my class. One of the students was in an accident and won't be coming back anymore.

Life as an intern has its rewards—

WASHINGTON — It's true. This city contracts total paralysis when it snows.

The Washington Post called it a "storm" and a "blizzard." I called it two inches of accumulated mush.

But whatever it was, it backed up traffic for three hours and the seven of us — groggy from all the egg rolls, strawberry cremes and chicken wings we'd just copped at a banquet — headed for the underground mall known as Crystal City.

A glass of red wine in a small French cafe beats the heck out of fighting impatient mobs at a bus terminal.

Friday was a tough one in the office.

We all settled ourselves around two pizzas and a six-pack to watch Clemson play North Carolina. (I had wanted to watch "The Young and the Restless.")

"This is what my Dad always told me bureaucrats do," I said.

"Yep," they mumbled between mozzarella and mushrooms.

The members' offices have been inundated with constituent calls on school prayer as of late, and I've been awarded the dubious honor of handling the issue in my office.

I'm very diplomatic. It's after I get off the phone I say what I think.

NANCY MALIR
Washington Correspondent

As for the battle against Kansas stereotypes, I think I'm gradually losing to this war of attrition.

Every time I pull a brilliant faux pas in the office, my homeland is attacked.

"Where's the phone book?"

"Right in front of you — don't they have phone books in Kansas?"

And even when I'm minding my own business:

"Do they have apples in Kansas?" my supervisor asked with a malicious grin as he prepared to munch one.

And the inevitable Oz exchange continues to take place.

"You're from Kansas? You don't look like Judy Garland."

"Hey Miss Kansas, where's your little doggie?"

But while it may be impossible to convince everyone the rest of the state is not illiterate, I've decided it's every woman for herself once you stray out of home territory.

"You aren't at all like what I picture a Kansas farm girl to be," Ken, from Chicago, said.

That was after he informed me that he imagined Kansas women resembled the girls on "Hee Haw" and didn't have the intelligence to balance a checkbook.

OUCH!

I took the compliment and ran.

One of the "musts" for Congressional interns is the crashing of receptions — food and drink events staged by various organizations to attract Congressmen or their representatives in the hope of influencing votes.

They also attract hungry, poorly budgeted interns. I only go where invited, but I make the most of it while I'm there.

Sears Roebuck & Co. (my sponsor as well as that of 19 other interns) invited us to their reception, and a dozen of us made fools and gluttons of ourselves for more than an hour.

Shaved ham, turkey and beef, chocolates and clam cakes, Bloody Marys and Whiskey Sours — being a sponge has its advantages.

Faculty committee made correct decision

Editor,

Re: Kecia Stolfus' editorial, "Faculty ruling raises questions," in the March 21 Collegian:

Your editorial questioning the findings of the Mahaffey hearing left me stunned. I sat in on as much of the hearings as I possibly could, and the things I heard in the hearing and read in the paper lead me to strongly disagree with you.

It is my understanding that the panel's findings included two points: the administration failed to present a clear and convincing case for Mahaffey's ouster, and Mahaffey needs to make a concentrated effort to improve his relationship with his superiors. I personally applaud the panel's decision on both counts.

While sitting in on the hearings, I listened to Provost Owen Koeppe testify that he recalled very little of the discussions concerning the proposed firing, that he took very few notes about the meetings in which the discussions took place, and that he barely considered proposals to transfer Mahaffey to another department.

I listened to the former head of the Forestry Department testify that he reprimanded Mahaffey on more than one occasion without bothering to investigate the incidents, and that those incidents appeared on evaluations for several years running despite the fact that those incidents were not repeated.

I listened to the testimony of the head of a committee which investigated Mahaffey, and his testimony was that the committee carried out only one or two of their four or five responsibilities when it recommended firing Mahaffey.

I listened to an employee in the extension portion of the Forestry Department testify that he signed and circulated a petition calling for Mahaffey's ouster, driving for two days in a state vehicle and using a state voucher to cover expenses in order to obtain six of the signatures appearing on that petition. This same individual testified that he had never met Mahaffey.

I listened to a seemingly very competent young lady testify that Mahaffey's "sexist" comments were taken out of context, but I did not listen to the young lady who complained most vociferously about the comments, because she failed to testify.

If I am not mistaken, the panel's findings do not say Mahaffey absolutely did not deserve to be fired. The panel said the administration failed to present a clear and convincing case for firing Mahaffey for professional incompetence. There is a difference between those two statements.

Your editorial gave no specific reasons to back up the implication that the panel was unfair in its findings. If you do know of specific reasons, I would certainly be most interested in hearing them. If you cannot give specific reasons for implying the panel's findings are unfair, then I think you owe the panel an apology. I personally feel the hearing panel in particular and the Faculty Senate in general is to be commended for the manner in which they carried out their responsibilities.

To prove Mahaffey guilty of professional misbehavior.

Translate these same issues to other circumstances, and see where you come down. For example, should a student be dismissed from the University for cheating on an examination (clearly a condemnation of the student's integrity) based solely on suspicions and assertions of an instructor? Don't we demand objective evidence before publicly condemning a student's academic career?

Mahaffey editorial implies unknown facts

Editor,

Re: Kecia Stolfus' editorial, "Faculty ruling raises question," in the March 21 Collegian:

I am concerned by innuendo implicit in Stolfus' editorial. The article insinuates that the Faculty Senate committee charged with hearing facts and issues surrounding Mahaffey's dismissal might have reached its decision based on less than objective, professional criteria. Does Stolfus have sound reason for questioning the committee's integrity? Or, is she shooting from the hip to see what happens?

Many important issues surround Mahaffey's dismissal, not the least of which are the observance of "due process" and fair rules of evidence in public actions against an individual. These are ensured by the Bill of Rights. No American, neither a professor nor a student nor a member of the Faculty Senate committee can be stripped of this protection.

Does Stolfus know something about the committee or its action which we do not? Her suspicions and assertions are not fact, just as assertions and innuendo were insufficient to prove Mahaffey guilty of professional misbehavior.

Translate these same issues to other circumstances, and see where you come down. Clear sidewalks necessary to get to class

Editor,

I am not writing this editorial about why our University should have been closed Monday, although we all know that it should have.

But I am instead writing about the condition of sidewalks around campus.

If we are required to go to classes, the administration should at least help to make the trip feasible. The conditions of the sidewalks on Monday were unbearable. The amount of ice and snow that was left on the walkways was incredible. On quite a bit of campus there was a good inch of ice, which made walking very hazardous.

Which brings up the question, how do the handicapped make it around campus? With an inch of ice on the walks there is no possible way that a wheelchair could roll up or down any type of a hill. This is deplorable!

And I must seriously question the ability of those "brush machines" that attempt to clean up the snow and ice. All they seem to do is to knock off the loose snow and expose the slick ice. Frankly that loose snow is what I use to grip my shoes on if I have to walk on the ice. I don't think these machines do one bit of good, and the grounds maintenance department needs to re-evaluate the methods by which they clean our campus.

I sincerely hope the next time we have a storm of this size, the administration has the decency to have the walkways ready for students to walk on.

International Week fosters understanding

Editor,

This week the foreign students at K-State have freely shared some aspects of their many cultures. For foreign students, International Week is always the culmination of hard work, frustration, fun and the desire to give Americans some insight into the variety of cultures represented on our campus.

In order for the citizens of this planet to be able to live in peace, it is necessary for us all to become better acquainted and reach a better understanding of each other. As we have more contact with one another, we realize that we have much in common, and we learn to appreciate our cultural differences rather than fear them.

This is the spirit of International Week. In this spirit, it seems appropriate to share a poem written by Hashem Mohseni, a former K-State student from Iran.

Unity

Black, White, Yellow...
I am proud,
I am a person:
African, American, Asian...
I am proud,
I am a person from East, West, South, North
You and I live in one home, earth
You and I own one roof, the sky
We have one destiny, eternity

We should be proud and happy
We have each other.

Nominee needs party support

Now that the race for the Democratic presidential nomination has narrowed to three candidates and a more analytical approach can be taken of these candidates' political ideologies, the Collegian Editorial Board presents an overview of the policies of Gary Hart, Jesse Jackson and Walter Mondale.

Because exact information of each candidate's opinions on critical issues may not be complete or conclusive in every media report, or may be too technical or specific to afford maximum clarity, members of the board have constructed their own analyses of the campaigns of Hart, Jackson and Mondale. It is hoped this additional editorial insight will prove effective in increasing interest in and discussion of the long battle to determine the Democratic Oval Office challenger.

Mondale was right when he said after Super Tuesday that the race will become a "marathon to San Francisco," the site of the Democratic National Convention this summer. Both he and Hart are determined to secure the nomination, while Jackson has attempted to rally support and encourage political participation.

Jackson espouses the ideals of the Democratic party with an honest and concerned approach to effecting change. He remains a viable candidate, but media focus has shifted to the disparity between different realms of the Democratic party — the "old order" as represented by Mondale and the new "neo-liberals" as characterized by Hart.

This unique ideological clash threatens to split the party vote at the convention. Compromise between both sides should not be ruled out as a final political consequence, but the outcome of the race may alienate some party faithful. Democrats should not be offended if their favored candidate loses the nomination. Party faithful should support and campaign for the nominee, whether "old order" or "neo-liberal."

The Democratic party is experiencing great change, and it must adjust for the future. Its members should carefully evaluate their aims by considering what is best for the country, not only for the future, but specifically with the November election in mind.

Democratic voters and delegates must determine which candidate has the best chance of defeating Ronald Reagan, the unchallenged Republican candidate. A large, strong conservative force supports the president, and for the Democrats to expect victory over Reagan, a solid party consensus is necessary.

Caucus gives Kansans influence

The race for the Democratic Party nomination for president will move to Kansas on March 24.

So what? Kansas is usually not an important state in the nomination process. Candidates spend little time or money in the state because the caucus is not early enough to get national media attention. The nomination has often been decided before Kansans get a chance to vote.

But this year the Kansas caucuses can make a difference.

Results of early primaries and caucuses have proved inconclusive. Despite predictions that Mondale has the nomination wrapped up, Hart's momentum can't be stopped, and Jackson may soon drop out of the race. It is still anyone's guess who will be the Democratic nominee.

The candidates will slug it out, state-by-state, trying to build support. Now in this close race, the 44 Kansas delegates to the national convention cannot be overlooked.

Credibility is the real reward in this year's Kansas caucuses. Much of Mondale's support comes from union members and traditional Democratic voters. It came as no surprise when Mondale won in the south and in northern industrial states where these types of voters predominate.

Hart's support comes from independents and the younger, higher-income Democrats. The campaign based on "new ideas" took off in northeastern states where voters tend to be more liberal.

But these states are not typical. Democrats across the country are not as liberal as those in the northeast. They are not as union-dominated as in industrial states or as traditional as in the south. No candidate has yet proved he has the broad support necessary to compete with President Reagan in the November general election.

The Iowa caucuses might have been expected to give a candidate this credibility, but when Mondale won in Iowa, the question was "Gary Who?" Hart has since become a nationally-known figure. If the Iowa caucuses were held now, the results might be very different.

The Kansas caucuses Saturday provide candidates with a chance to build credibility. And it gives Kansans a rare opportunity to make a real choice about the person who may be running the nation.

Hart's new ideas attract interest

By DAVID BEVENS
Staff Writer

Gary Hart was lost in the field of candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination until the New Hampshire primary. Today he is a leading contender for the nomination with former Vice President Walter Mondale.

Hart has characterized himself as a "new idea" man. Critics and analysts call him an "Atari Democrat" and a "neo-liberal." Hart is given this label because he is an untraditional Democrat, part of the "new" Democratic Party. He isn't purely conservative, liberal or moderate.

Hart, George McGovern's 1972 presidential campaign manager, claims he never held the same extremely liberal views as the man whose presidential campaign he controlled. Others say Hart has moved from a liberal to a "neo-liberal" stance since he took office in the United States Senate in 1975.

The Senate "Atari Democrats" are the cutting edge of a movement away from the old Democratic Party. They are looking into the future — the high technology future.

Hart and other Democratic reformers propose cooperation between business and labor in solving problems incurred by high technology. This would include a program he calls "individual training accounts."

Under this concept, the accounts would be patterned after Individual Retirement Accounts. Employers and employees alike would contribute to a tax-exempt, government trust fund for retraining workers displaced by high technology equipment.

In the past, Hart has voted against government intervention in business. For example, he voted against legislation that ultimately bailed out the Chrysler Corp.

According to a leading business journal, Hart favors indexation to the inflation rate — cost adjustments for the military and Social Security recipients. He also would impose a 5 percent surtax — an extra tax on property and income already taxed — on wealthy individuals.

Hart has collected his proposals to improve education into an "American Defense Education Act." Under such a plan, schools would be federally subsidized for improvements in math, science and foreign language programs. He also supports improving science education on the college level.

Hart believes he can reduce Reagan's 1985 federal budget proposal during the next five years.

He proposes to increase federal coffers through individual taxation of $66 billion and corporate taxation of $35 billion annually. He would cut defense spending by $139 billion and reduce entitlement spending — cost of living adjustments for people tied to federal pensions and Social Security — by $13 billion a year.

Hart criticizes the Reagan administration's defense buildup. He believes in a smaller, more efficient military.

Hart proposes a 3 percent increase in defense spending over the next five years. This is 10 percent less than proposed under the Reagan administration. Hart recently trimmed his defense spending figure from 4 percent to propose further deficit reductions.

Hart favors a fleet of small Navy carriers as opposed to the huge carriers now in use. Two carriers costing $3 million each currently are contracted to be built. Hart is against such projects.

Complex current defense systems also are on Hart's elimination list. He thinks money for defense should be spent on more conventional, practical weapons with lower price tags.

Hart supports a nuclear "build-down." Under this concept, for every missile the Soviet Union and the United States build, each side would dismantle two older, outdated missiles. Hart would also eliminate the B-1 bomber, the MX missile and replace the F-18 fighter with the less sophisticated F-16. Surprising as it may seem, Hart supported European missile deployment, although reportedly he did so reluctantly.

Hart opposed sending troops to Lebanon and Grenada and favors cutting off aid to El Salvador unless the death squads are abolished. He believes in joining with allies to keep the Persian Gulf open if its access is threatened.

Hart believes in fuel efficiency. He favors trimming $28 billion in nuclear power development funds for fiscal 1985. This figure also includes the development of synthetic fuels.

Hart favors decontrol of natural gas prices and, if elected, has said he will let gas control phase out as planned by the current administration. Hart also has offered legislation to aid the elderly and the poor in paying higher natural gas prices.

On environmental issues, Hart supports a strong Clean Air Act and legislation against acid rain.

Hart is an alternative to Mondale or Reagan, although his popularity may be due to general dissatisfaction with the other candidates. Many voters obviously don't care for the old party politics that Mondale represents or his association with the Carter administration.

Ironically, Hart is the alternative to Mondale and Reagan just as Carter was the alternative to Ford in 1980. People are looking for a change, and Hart is seen by many as a refreshing change.

Also in Hart's favor is his age, 47, and his proclamation of new ideas — anything sounds good if it means reduced world tension and an alternative to Reaganomics.

While Mondale is selling hamburgers for Wendy's, Hart responds by giving the public "the beef," the heart of what he stands for. Whether his meaty issues will receive the USDA (United States Democratic Acceptance) seal of approval will determine whether voters will buy his ideology in November.

Mondale captures party essence

By KAREN BELLUS
Staff Writer

Cautious, professional, traditional, liberal.

These words aptly describe former Vice President Walter F. Mondale and his campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Since almost immediately after Ronald Reagan's inauguration, Mondale has put together the most smoothly run campaign in political history. He and his campaign aides and volunteers have worked diligently and with single-minded determination to make the Mondale machine successful. To their credit, Mondale has compiled a list of endorsements that very early established him as the front-runner among Democratic presidential candidates.

Mondale, 56, is a veteran Democratic party member and a representative of the traditional party constituency. During his campaign he has wooed the elderly by promising he would leave Social Security alone; he courted black and women's votes by promising them a record amount of significant political appointments and he quickly garnered the endorsement of AFL-CIO leaders. In an appeal to the National Education Association, he declared education and teachers' salaries a major goal of his candidacy.

This has caused some to criticize the candidate as a "lap dog" or "the candidate who promises everyone everything."

But supporters argue that the endorsements by the National Organization for Women, the AFL-CIO, the black Alabama Democratic Conference, United Mine Workers and the National Education Association demonstrates public support for the man and his liberal politics (or demonstrates Mondale's persuasive expertise at public speaking.)

However, experts are wondering if his early lead in the race for the nomination isn't running out of steam. True, he has compiled an impressive list of endorsements. But recent surveys of voter trends reveal support from group leaders doesn't guarantee votes from the rank-and-file at the polls. Sen. Gary Hart's primary victories, first in New Hampshire and again on Super Tuesday, are proof that Mondale's early support may not be as significant as previously thought.

Endorsements of Mondale by different interest groups seem to stem from his reversal of Reaganomics, which has economically hurt many of these groups' constituencies.

Mondale said he believes the key to long-term economic growth is reducing the budget deficit. He would accomplish this by tax hikes and cuts in defense spending. Mondale said he would slash $38.6 billion from the proposed 1986 defense spending budget.

Mondale holds that his budget plan would cut the deficit by $20 or $30 billion in 1985 or 1986. But the Congressional Budget Office said in order to reach Mondale's goal, substantial tax hikes would be necessary. As consumers spend more money on taxes, however, less money is pumped into consumer goods and services, thus weighing down Mondale's primary goal of economic growth.

In contrast with Reagan's own supply-side economic policies, Mondale said he would seek to establish with the Federal Reserve Bank a growth rate for the money supply of 4 percent to 4.5 percent.

Mondale supports tax simplification, saying "we need tax reform." He also favors increasing the progressivity of individual income taxes, whereby tax rates increase as an individual's income rises.

and B-1 bomber. He also is in favor of immediate ratification of the SALT II treaty and is a strong backer of Israel in the Mideast.

Environmental groups favor Mondale. He has spoken for tougher regulatory controls on pollutants.

Mondale would seek to replace Reagan's farm program with his own new plan that he hopes would decrease the need for subsidies. He favors balancing supply and demand of farm commodities to accomplish this goal.

Mondale vowed to raise teachers' salaries and strengthen the programs in American schools with increased emphasis on preparing students for high technology careers. He also promises to increase assistance and scholarship funds at all levels of education.

Mondale has attacked Reagan's foreign policies in Central America. He stresses human rights as fundamental to his foreign policy concerns.

Mondale also favors improving U.S.-Soviet relations. However, he would work more for arms control than diplomatic and political policy changes.

Mondale's campaign machine has made many believe his search for the Democratic presidential nomination is invincible and his success inevitable. If Mondale wins his party's nomination, his campaign would be heralded as an example of professional and public relations expertise at getting "our man in the White House."

On the other hand, if Mondale doesn't become the Democratic presidential candidate, which in recent weeks seems to be a real possibility, his saturation of the public and media with early, extensive campaigning may cause new criticisms of the American political process. Many are frightened of the careful, calculated actions of the man who seeks the presidency but allows nothing that could damage his public image to taint his political career.

Whatever the outcome, the campaign and efforts of Fritz Mondale will be remembered in political circles as the most thought-out and cautious campaign in history. However, it remains to be seen if the candidate is too cautious to become our country's leader — a position in which possibly split-second and frequently assertive decisions are inherently necessary.

Jackson offers viable alternative

By MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

The Rev. Jesse Jackson's campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination has largely been an appeal to get black citizens to register to vote and participate in elections.

For this reason, Jackson's hopes of gaining the presidential nomination have been referred to as "part campaign and part crusade."

He also seeks to inspire blacks to run for office on the local, state and national levels.

Jackson's campaign has been developed around his idea of a "rainbow coalition," with which he hopes to unite blacks, hispanics, women, the elderly and other "oppressed" people. This coalition would work together with Jackson, as he and his supporters describe it, to "restore a high moral tone to government."

Supporters of Jackson point to his commitment to public service as one strong point of his campaign. Jackson has been instrumental in areas of public service for more than 20 years.

Perhaps his most noticeable public service is his development and leadership of the Chicago-based People United to Serve Humanity. PUSH seeks to foster economic development among minorities.

Further demonstration of his public service ability is his successful negotiation of the return in January of Navy pilot Robert O. Goodman Jr. from Syria. Jackson supporters believe this feat also points up his skill as a world negotiator.

Jackson also appeals to potential voters and minorities with his oratory talent and charismatic personality.

In his unique oratory manner, Jackson fights for a return of idealism and decency to the office of define his political stand on several campaign issues.

In farm policy, Jackson believes the idea of paying farmers not to work while local businesses face foreclosure is inconsistent. He also says every farmer should have a right to self-determination and believes economic policy should promote farmers' rights.

"I'm convinced there must be a commitment by government to save small farmers," Jackson has said, and he is currently drafting position papers on specific farm policy.

National security is of utmost importance to the Jackson campaign. He supports a mutual and verifiable arms reduction and a 25 percent cut in military spending. Jackson contends the United States has enough weaponry, and uses this platform to promote his ideal of peace instead of preparation for war.

Jackson said nuclear power is more costly and dangerous than has been projected. He believes alternate energy sources such as the sun have not been properly harnessed.

Jackson lacks both experience with and a definite stance on environmental concerns. He does not see this as a detriment to his campaign, however, as he intends to work toward extensive clean air regulations if elected.

His position on education also is quite unspecific. Jackson believes education of the young to be the key to charting a new course for the nation.

Although Jackson lacks background in several areas which concern the presidency, his supporters see him as a qualified candidate for the Democratic nomination. They maintain that Jackson has the intrinsic qualifications to be what they consider the highest public servant in the nation: he is an organizer, a world leader and an able negotiator.

the president. He plans to rekindle hope for the poor and dispossessed of the nation. Human rights are to be a main goal in his presidency.

If elected, Jackson plans to fight for the ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment. He believes this is a priority for the protection of human rights. Because he is a minister, Jackson says he cannot morally approve of abortion, but he supports women's right of choice and the separation of church and state in this issue.

Some Jackson critics argue that these stands contradict themselves, but Jackson advocates say it indicates Jackson is a candidate who will not let his personal beliefs become more important than what is best for the nation as a whole, as they contend the current administration does.

Although Jackson's stand on human rights is clear, and his campaign for a "rainbow coalition" is gaining support from minorities, it is true that he has yet to clearly

Centenarian shoots, kills wife

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — An elderly woman died Thursday when she was hit by one of several gunshots her 108-year-old husband sprayed around the couple's bedroom, police said.

The victim was Zepora Franks, 91. Police are questioning the man, who will be 109 today.

Mrs. Franks, an invalid, was hit in the face with one of several gunshots fired in the bedroom and died in her bed, police said. Police who arrived at the house found the man holding two pistols, but he dropped them at the order of officers, Lt. Michael Dailey said.

Police were called about 6:30 a.m. by a housekeeper, who lives in the home with her husband and 12-year-old son, Dailey said. They were not injured.

Ex-hostage joins Denver's police

DENVER — Three years after he was freed as a hostage of the revolutionary forces of the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini in Iran, Billy Gallegos, 25, has been sworn in as a police recruit.

Police Capt. Tom Lahey, commander of the Denver Police Academy, said Gallegos is one of 32 recruits in the class, which was sworn in last week.

As a member of the Marine Corps security detachment at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran, he was taken hostage when revolutionary students overran the embassy compound on Nov. 4, 1979.

Gallegos, who held the rank of corporal while he was a captive, left the Marine Corps in July 1981 as a sergeant.

Council folds from lack of support

NEW YORK — The National News Council, an independent group that examines complaints against the media, voted Thursday to end operations at the end of this month.

Richard Salant, president and chief executive officer of the council, told reporters after the vote that the main reason for ending the council's 11-year existence was not money but "lack of press support."

He said the remaining resources, files and records of the council are to be transferred to the University of Minnesota's Walter Library.

The council, which was proposed by a task force of the Twentieth Century Fund in 1972, issued non-binding decisions in issues involving the news media. Its rulings carried no penalty. It investigated 242 complaints and said 82 of them were warranted.

Gandhi recalls romantic meeting

NEW DELHI, India — In a rare glimpse into her private life, Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, a widow for 24 years, recalled her romantic days in the independence struggle, saying her husband-to-be fell "in love with me at first sight."

The 66-year-old prime minister, addressing a New Year celebration Wednesday, reminisced about her first meeting with her late husband, Feroze Gandhi, when she was just 12.

Gandhi, who seldom speaks about her private life, said she and her husband met when her friends defied riot police and unfurled the Indian flag — then an illegal act.

Feroze Gandhi, who watched her hold the flag, told her later that he had decided then that he would marry her. They were married in 1942, and after their wedding both the young freedom fighters went to jail for their civil disobedience against the British.

Ten years later, Gandhi and her husband drifted apart.

Regulations slow heart researchers

Doctors eager to try second implant

By The Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY — A year after the death of artificial heart recipient Barney Clark, doctors who once hoped to save thousands of dying patients with the plastic organ are still trying to get their program off the critical list.

Still seeking clearance from various regulatory agencies, the researchers are impatiently waiting to do their second implant.

"If we don't get the approval in this country, we'll do it abroad," says the heart's inventor, Dr. Robert Jarvik. "The United States is not going to be the leader in this thing if it sits back and has regulatory mechanisms that take a year between cases."

He believes at least 50,000 people a year could benefit from the artificial heart, but says researchers must perform many implants before they can properly evaluate the device. Once that happens, Jarvik said, the mechanical heart could be available for clinical use at several hospitals within a few years.

Clark, 62, a retired dentist from suburban Seattle, died a year ago today after 112 days at the University of Utah Medical Center as the first recipient of a permanent artificial heart.

He had suffered from a degenerative, incurable heart disease called cardiomyopathy and was considered a poor candidate for a heart transplant. After Clark's operation, he grudgingly insisted the implant was worth it, but he was never able to exchange his hospital room for the quiet life of writing and playing with his grandchildren he had sought.

Instead, his sojourn on the heart was a minefield of repeated surgeries, seizures, severe nosebleeds, pneumonia, emphysema and kidney problems.

The heart's steady, air-driven beats could do nothing to prevent the failure of Clark's other organs and circulatory system that eventually killed him.

Nonetheless, researchers were elated by the heart's performance and predicted that more implants soon would follow. But their request to perform the next operation on a patient with less advanced heart disease has bogged down.

Implant surgeon Dr. William DeVries fumed as the university's federally mandated Institutional Review Board deliberated nine months before deciding Jan. 10 to approve a second implant.

Then the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, after considering DeVries' proposal three weeks longer than the 30 days called for in federal guidelines, last week declined to approve it without more information.

"We're very sure we will get approval in the United States," Jarvik said, because none of the FDA's questions involve fundamental issues. But he said the reviewers have been "very, very slow. There's no reason that it has to be so slow."

The FDA questions could delay a second implant an additional two months or more, said Dr. Richard Lee, coordinator of the heart team and acting dean of the school's College of Medicine.

Lee said the FDA's concerns focus on use of a stronger heart valve, experiments with a portable drive unit and on Clark's medical records. The agency also made suggestions about the patient consent form and had questions about how the IRB reached its decision.

DeVries, who angrily criticized the IRB for taking so long "while patients were dying," has declined comment on the FDA delay.

Dr. Lyle Joyce, who assisted DeVries in replacing the failing ventricles of Clark's natural heart with the Jarvik-7 in a seven-hour operation Dec. 2, 1982, said he is "very optimistic" about the future.

Still, Joyce said, "It's a shame we have gone a whole year now...It's almost disrespectful to him (Clark) that we haven't done any more implants."

After receiving IRB approval, DeVries began evaluating potential recipients, but now has stopped until the FDA decides.

"The nature of (heart) disease is such that patients don't have very much time. It's quite discouraging when...they die," Lee said.

DeVries is still conducting training for the heart team and has trained other surgeons in case Joyce, who has moved to Minneapolis, is unavailable.

Clark's widow, Una Loy, says she's "a little disappointed" that the FDA hasn't yet approved a second implant. "I'm dedicated to the artificial heart. I'm very eager to see the program go forward," she said. "It was through no fault of the artificial heart that my husband passed away."

Since Clark's death, the heart has been criticized by researchers who say other scientific advances will make it unnecessary. They also question the practicality of its bulky drive system — although doctors hope to test a portable system in the next implant — and wonder if Clark's implant can be termed a success.

"Nobody would regard Barney's situation as a triumph," Lee said. "I don't think it was a real human achievement. But it is a real scientific achievement."

The researchers say the university review board's decision to authorize only one more implant, at least for now, places an unfair burden on them and the artificial heart.

If a second patient dies during or shortly after the implant, Joyce said, "it's going to make it a little bit tougher (for the program) to survive."

But he added, "I think it's going to take more than even two or three failures to kill the interest."

Solid acting, directing make effective 'Splash'

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Can a movie really be any good that stars Tom Hanks from television's "Bosom Buddies" and John Candy, who almost invariably has chosen film roles that allow him no opportunities to show his considerable comedic talents?

And can a movie really be any good that is directed by Ron ("Eat My Dust") Howard? Can a movie with such an unimaginative title as "Splash" really be expected to have an imagination in its screenplay?

The answer to all of these questions is yes.

Hanks is surprisingly effective in the lead role, supplying an adolescent charm that allows the audience to sympathize with his yearning for love. Candy, at long last, is given more to do than just become part of the decorations on a scene. Howard gives the film a Hollywood gloss that makes it more than just a ripoff of the film's obvious source — "E.T."

While the screenplay may bear more than just a passing resemblance to "E.T.," "Splash" doesn't simply rely upon its borrowed plot elements to create the interest: the film very effectively creates what it means to be a love-sick adolescent.

Allen Bauer (Hanks) is well into his 20s, but the love crisis he faces when his lover leaves him causes him to behave more like a teenager than an adult. "Splash" is concerned with creating the feeling of what it means to hope that you will one day meet someone who understands your problems.

The first release of Walt Disney's new Touchstone Films, "Splash" begins with a sepia-toned flashback to an eight-year-old Bauer's vacation with his parents in Cape Cod. He watches over the railing of an excursion boat in a dreamy-eyed trance, then leaps into the water, where he thinks he is saved by a small mermaid — a beautiful little water baby who swims by his side. He is then jerked out of the water by one of the boat's crewmen.

Twenty years later Bauer has almost forgotten the experience. He now lives in New York and operates a fruit and vegetable market. After his girlfriend leaves him, he laments at length, thinking there is no way he will ever find love. He eventually is led subconsciously to travel back to Cape Cod, where he conveniently falls out of a rented boat and is saved by a now fully grown mermaid. She carries him to the shore, and when he awakens, he catches sight of a blonde, naked woman running back into the water (the mermaid's fins turn to legs when out of the water.)

Soon after he returns to New York, the police call to say that they have found at the Statue of Liberty a mute naked woman carrying his wallet. When Bauer arrives at the police station, he is met by a young woman who instantly wraps her arms around him as if they were lifetime friends and gives him a kiss unlike any that he had ever had. Thus begins the relationship between Bauer and the mermaid. The only question remaining is how long she can keep her identity a secret.

Of course they cannot last long, because there is a crazed scientist (Eugene Levy) who firmly believes that Madison (the name chosen by the mermaid from a street sign) is a mermaid. This leads to a series of plot developments that are virtually identical to the second half of "E.T."

What makes this fantastical story so readily believable is the charm in the performances and the imagination in the screenplay. Not much in the film makes sense if you try to find rational reasons for the actions, but those people who can remember what it is like to be a love-sick teenager, it is easy to suspend disbelief. Daryl Hannah, who portrays Madison, and Hanks give their roles a very alluring childlike awe.

Those people with little imagination might interpret Hannah's blank face naivete as being poor acting. Actually, though, by her carefully controlling the emotions she shows, she gives the role innocence and warmth.

Hanks is given very few punch lines to deliver. Most of the humor rises out of the situations created by screenwriters Friedman, Ganz, and Mandel, and the humor does not take the form of skits that are loosely tied together by the vague semblance of a plot — the form used most often in comedies of the last decade. While those films always fell apart when they were forced to resolve the plot, "Splash" is most successful when the plot is unfolding.

"Splash" is a superior piece of Hollywood entertainment that contains a great deal of charm. While at times the film may ask you to suspend some very hefty loads of disbelief, the results are always surprisingly warm and affectionate.

Graphics students exhibit best works

By DENISE WILLSON
Collegian Reporter

The second exhibit in a series of five for seniors in fine arts will be on display through April 1. The BFA exhibit, being shown in McCain Auditorium Galleries and Room 6 of the Art Building, began March 19.

The exhibits are a requirement for seniors receiving a bachelor's degree in fine arts.

This exhibit includes the work of seven students with an emphasis in graphics. The students are Cathy Baldwin, Alice Disney, Rod Hostetler, Powell Michael, Eric Rodriguez, James Smith and Mari Jo Young, all seniors in fine arts.

The students are required to display their work in a professional manner, install their work, attach name labels, manage the publicity and handle any openings and receptions during the exhibit.

Smith is currently the only student to display his work in Room 6 of the Art Building. The display area is assigned to the students on a sign-up basis.

"I have more room in the gallery because I'm showing by myself," Smith said. "I can have things my own way."

Smith is showing approximately 15 pieces, most of which are realism works. He uses various media, including paint, lithography and sculpture. Smith has some self-promotional pieces in the exhibit. These are pieces done to reflect his ability rather than for publication or advertisement.

The remaining six students are presenting their work in the McCain galleries.

Baldwin is showing a total of six pieces, including three oil paintings, two graphics pieces and one drawing. She created one airbrush piece expressly for the show.

Disney is displaying 10 pieces in the exhibit. They are a collection of her best works from her various graphics experiences, she said.

She is displaying several different media, including airbrush, silkscreen and a raku ceramic pot. "It's good experience to learn how to hang a show and get the experience of doing it. It's also interesting to see other people's work out of a classroom situation," she said.

Hostetler is showing 10 pieces in his exhibit. Most are graphics and illustrations, and several are airbrush designs.

Hostetler said most of his work isn't displayed in this manner as a show, but in portfolio style.

Since the show is prepared by seniors during about the same time that portfolios are being prepared, Hostetler said he discovered that he didn't want to take his pieces out of his portfolio to present in the show.

The show is still worth doing, Hostetler said.

"It's nice to see your pieces behind glass. It kind of gives them a sparkle," he said.

Michael said he also is in favor of doing the exhibit.

"It gives everyone a chance to see their work and get an idea of how it comes across overall," he said.

Michael is showing eight to 10 pieces, mostly works he created during his sophomore and junior years at K-State.

Michael said one of his strongest pieces is an airbrush piece done expressly for the BFA exhibit.

Other media he used in pieces for the exhibit include cut and torn paper and oil painting.

Rodriguez is displaying 10 pieces. He will include three photographs, two poster designs, two book covers, one silkscreen and two drawings.

"The exhibit is good for us," Rodriguez said. "It gives us an idea of how to put a show together and what's involved in it."

Young is displaying approximately seven pieces in her exhibit, all of which have been done in classes.

Young is including a special piece in her exhibit on "The Wizard of Oz," focused on its creator, Frank L. Baum. She completed the piece two years ago.

The students will have an opening of their exhibits at McCain from 1 to 3 p.m. Saturday

A national print exhibition will be hosted by the Union National Bank and Trust, 727 Poyntz St., beginning this weekend.

The invitational opening is scheduled for Saturday, and on Sunday the exhibition will be open to the general public.

The exhibition will feature 46 prints, monoprints and relief prints which were selected by a juror to be shown. These are 46 of 520 prints which were entered in the "Manhattan National Print '84" competition sponsored by the K-State Department of Art and the Manhattan Arts Council.

Final judging on the prints will be done on Saturday by Antonio Frasconi, a well-known print maker from New York, and $2,000 in awards will be given to the artists of the winning prints.

Woodcuts, linocuts, collagraphs and wood engravings are the specific monoprints and relief prints being displayed.

"The reason for this national competition and exhibit is to recognize and promote printmaking," Charles Stroh, head of the art department, said.

"It is seen as the first part of four exhibits which will demonstrate printing processes artists use," he said.

"Next year's exhibit will be Intaglio, which is etching and engraving. We don't know what the 1986 and 1987 exhibits will be," he said.

Tennis squads set for tournament play

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

K-State's tennis teams will swing back into action, competing in meets beginning today.

After compiling a successful 3-1 road trip record over spring break, evening their spring season record to 3-3, the women's team will travel to Wichita to play in the Sheldon Coleman Mid-America Invitational today through Sunday. In the meet, the Wildcats will face the Oklahoma City University and Southern Illinois University as well as host Wichita State University.

The men's teams will play Arkansas Tech University, Oklahoma Baptist University and Oral Roberts University in Tulsa, Okla. in the Oral Roberts Quadrangular today and Saturday. K-State owns a winless 0-5 duel record this spring and comes into the meet after finishing seventh in the 10-team Southern Arkansas Invitational last weekend.

K-State Tennis Coach Steve Webb said he has been happy with the performance of his women's squad and is hoping for a good showing this weekend.

"Our singles play has been real strong," Webb said. "Now we need to improve in our doubles play. If we can do that we should be able to make a pretty strong showing."

Assistant Coach Joyce Allen said the women's team may be a surprise after its early strong showing.

"We're looking forward to one of the better years we've had," Allen said. "Our singles are really strong, which is nice."

The team will be hampered in the Wichita meet by the loss of No. 4 singles player Caryle Madelen, who will miss the meet due to illness, Webb said. To take Madelen's place, Erica Anderson will move into the No. 6 singles spot with everyone else moving up one spot.

Webb said he expects his team to do well today against Oklahoma City, a team the women beat 7-2 in a duel earlier this season.

Webb said his team should have a more difficult contest Saturday against Wichita State and Southern Illinois, two Missouri Valley Conference powers.

"I know Southern Illinois has had a strong team in the past, but I don't know how good they are this season," Webb said. "If they are a little weaker than WSU, we might have a chance to beat them."

"Wichita State is usually about the best team in the Missouri Valley," Webb said.

On the men's side, Webb said his team is showing continuing improvement, especially players at the bottom of the lineup, and he is hoping for a few wins in Tulsa. Webb said the best chance his team has for a win comes against Arkansas Tech, a team the Wildcats placed behind in the Southern Arkansas meet by just three points.

Track teams to open outdoor season

By JUDI WRIGHT
Staff Writer

The outdoor track season for the K-State men's and women's track teams is scheduled to begin Saturday as the Wildcats host five men's teams and six women's teams at R.V. Christian Track.

Besides K-State, athletes from Fort Hays State University, Wichita State University, the University of Ottawa and Kansas Wesleyan University will be competing in the men's events.

For the women, K-State will be up against Fort Hays State, Northwest Missouri State University, Ottawa, Kansas Wesleyan and Wichita State. The meet is an open meet and no team scoring will be kept.

Field events and preliminary running events are scheduled to begin at 11 a.m., with running event finals scheduled for a 1 p.m. start. Considering the possibility of adverse weather conditions, a determination will not be made until Friday afternoon in regard to whether or not the meet will be held.

"This meet will be a chance for us to get outdoors and get in some good competition with other schools," Head Track Coach Steve Miller said. "It will be a very low-key meet. We're just trying to see how we do against some other teams and get in some good training."

In the outdoor season, as compared to the indoor season, the competition changes with the addition of the javelin and discus events. Also, the distances increase for some of the running events, and they are measured in meters instead of yards.

Miller said he thinks the freshman sprinters who had trouble in the indoor season will come on strong in the outdoor meets.

"All of our freshman sprinters coming from Texas (including Gary Jefferson and Mark Toliver) have never run in an indoor race until this season, so they had a bit of a struggle," Miller said. "They're used to running in outdoor meets, so they should do really well."

K-State will be strong in the javelin competition this year as Ray Hansen returns to continue a long legacy of outstanding Wildcat throwers, and he has already qualified for the Olympic trials. Hansen was an all-American javelin thrower in 1982 but was hampered last season by injuries.

The Big Eight Conference's fifth-place finisher a year ago in the javelin, Gary Arpin, suffered a torn cartilage in his knee last week in a pickup game of basketball. His performances will be lost for the entire season, and he will be redshirted.

Also injured for the men's squad is shot putter Andy Gillam. Gillam, the Big Eight's indoor champion this season, will be redshirted this spring. A junior college transfer, he will have an additional year of indoor competition because his junior college did not have an indoor program.

Thus, he is being redshirted for this outdoor season so that he can use an indoor and outdoor season concurrently next year.

After suffering a stress fracture at the Missouri Quadrangular early in the indoor season, triple jumper Kenny Harrison will make his first appearance in quite some time this Saturday. Harrison previously qualified for the NCAA championships while posting the conference's best jump of the indoor campaign (51 feet 10 inches).

On the women's side, the javelin competition returns to K-State after an absence from last year's outdoor season with two athletes looking for strong finishes this year. Julie Waage, a freshman from Portland, Ore., is one of the top freshman javelin prospects in the country. Waage had the top throw in the nation in 1982 and the sixth-best throw in 1983.

Waage will be joined by Roxie McKee, a freshman from Salina. McKee was hampered in high school by the fact that Kansas prep girls do not throw the javelin, but she made FORT MYERS, Fla. — Jack Morris limited Kansas City to two hits over seven innings and Ronald Rollin slugged a three-run home run as the Detroit Tigers shut out the Royals 7-0 in an exhibition game Thursday.

Morris, who struck out five, combined with Dave Gumpert on the three-hitter.

Rollin homered in the eighth inning off Derek Boteelho.

Detroit scored an unearned run in the second off losing pitcher Danny Jackson. Marty Castillo stroked an RBI single in the sixth inning.

Greg Pryor had two singles and Butch Davis had one for the Royals' hits.

The Royals have reassigned nine players to their minor league complex at Sarasota, Fla., including rookie outfielder John Morris.

Virginia shocks Orangemen, 63-55

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA — Freshman Olden Polynice scored six points during an early 12-0 run and Ricky Stokes tallied six straight to stop a Syracuse comeback in the second half as the Virginia Cavaliers upset the 18th-ranked Orangemen 63-55 in the semifinals of the National Collegiate Athletic Association East Regional basketball tournament Thursday night.

Virginia's third straight victory in the tournament moves the Cavaliers into Saturday's regional championship game against the winner between the top-ranked University of North Carolina and Indiana University.

Virginia, 20-11, missed its first eight shots from the field. But the Orangemen were able to hit only one of their first six in the sloppyly played first half and led only 2-0 before Rick Carlisle tied the game with the Cavs' first basket, an 18-footer, 5:10 into the contest.

Polynice started the 12-0 run on a layup with 13:12 remaining and freshman Tom Sheehy ended it with a 15-footer from the left side with 9:06 to go, giving Virginia a 16-6 lead.

Syracuse, 23-9, trailed 26-16 at halftime after shooting only 28 percent from the field. Virginia had a commanding 28-15 rebounding edge at intermission.

complex were outfielder Joe Simpson, catcher Steve Hammond, infielder Jim Scranton, and pitchers Tony Ferreira, Vince Yuhas, Mike Jones, Charlie Leibbrandt and Mike Parrot.

Morris, the player of the year in the Class AA Southern League last year, had been in contention for the starting right field job with the Royals. However, veteran Jorge Orta has had a good spring, and Manager Dick Howser now says he might platoon Orta, a left-handed hitter, with Lynn Jones and Leon Roberts in right.

Simpson was being kept with the major league club, and Howser and General Manager John Schuerholz were trying to make a deal for him.

"What we're doing is trying to get him a job," Howser said. "I've got calls into two managers and John has talked to some other clubs."

Brown, Brown to perform musical humor in Catskeller

Acoustic guitarists and vocalists Dave and Doug Brown, brothers who have performed together "since they met," will appear today in the Union Catskeller at 8 p.m.

Brown and Brown, as the duo is formally known, will perform "music from the heart, from the soul, and from other people's albums," according to Marilyn Gilbert, adviser to the Union Program Council Coffeehouse Committee, sponsor of the performance.

Gilbert said the duo's material is mostly original, interspersed with their arrangements of other recording artists' music.

"We're really excited to be bringing Brown and Brown to K-State," Gilbert said. "They bring a lot of humor in with their music. Their use of humor adds a lot to their performance. We think people will really enjoy the show."

The duo, native to South Dakota, is known primarily for performances at colleges and universities throughout the United States. They have been featured on various radio programs, and recorded their first album in spring 1983.

Tickets for the performance will be $2, and will go on sale at 7:15 p.m. at the door.

sion that was wrong and, in retrospect, it was a mistake for me to go along with it," he said. "The 2nd District has seen far too many negative campaigns and the voters are sick of it."

Van Slyke said he is a firm supporter of Reagan's policies.

"As a member of Congress, I will work with President Reagan to restore a sense of America's values," he said. "America has never lost sight of those basic values, but Congress has."

Federal budget deficits, agriculture policy and prayer in public schools are the major issues which will be addressed in Van Slyke's campaign.

Van Slyke said he opposes tax increases to decrease the budget deficit.

"I've offered a three-pronged approach to the deficit problem," he said. "I believe that we should pass a balanced budget amendment, that the president should have the line-item veto power so that he doesn't have to take the bad with the good and that we should place tighter controls on all government contracts so cost overruns are paid by the contractor, not by the taxpayers."

Because farm programs of the past have contributed to the problems faced by farmers today, Van Slyke said he supports self-determination for farmers.

Van Slyke is a graduate of Topeka High School and Yale University. He has served as a Reagan appointee in the office of the Secretary of Commerce, as northeast Kansas representative for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and as district manager for the National Small Business Association. He is currently associated with Pre-Paid Legal Services Inc. in Topeka.

Sooner Or Later You'll Get Responsibility Like This. In The Navy It's Sooner.

You're maneuvering 445 feet of guided missile frigate through the navigational hazards and non-stop traffic of one of the world's busiest ports.

But you'll dock safely. Because you know your equipment. You know your men. And even when the responsibility weighs in at 3,600 tons... you're ready.

After four years of college, you're ready for more responsibility than most civilian jobs offer. Navy officers get the kind of job and responsibility they want, and they get it sooner.

Navy officers are part of the management team after 16 weeks. Instead of boot camp, officer candidates receive four months of leadership training. It's professional schooling designed to sharpen their technical and management skills.

Then, in their first assignment, Navy officers get management experience that could take years in private industry. And they earn the decision-making authority it takes to make that responsibility pay off.

As their management abilities grow, Navy officers can take advantage of advanced education and training in fields as varied as operations management, electronics, and systems analysis. In graduate school it would cost you thousands; in the Navy we pay you.

And the Navy pays well. The starting salary is $17,000 (more than most companies pay). And that's on top of a comprehensive benefits program that can include special duty pay. After four years, with regular promotions and pay increases, the salary is up to as much as $31,000.

If you qualify to be an officer in the Navy, chances are you have what it takes to succeed. The Navy just makes it happen faster.

Gunfire, blackouts encumber election

By The Associated Press

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — Salvadorans voted Sunday in a presidential election scarred by bureaucratic flaws that kept thousands from voting, charges of bias and gunfire of the civil war.

Counting the ballots stopped in the evening before any returns were announced in a dispute over the impartiality of those counting votes.

There was a lack of ballots and ballot boxes in many precincts around the country, including some in the capital. Many election officials did not receive voter lists and simply let everyone vote.

Leftist rebels, who called the election a farce and refused to take part, blacked out the capital and parts of eight northern and eastern provinces by dynamiting power plants early Saturday. Most service was restored later in the day. But guerrilla activity appeared light, aimed more at harassment than at preventing the vote.

Six soldiers and 10 guerrillas were reported killed in scattered clashes, but there were no reports of attacks on voting stations.

Polls closed at 4 p.m. where there was no electricity, and at 6 p.m. elsewhere. In some areas many people who had waited patiently in the tropical heat were left standing in lines, unable to cast ballots.

The issue of who would win this Central American nation's first presidential election since 1977 was overshadowed by the bigger question whether any candidate could bring an end to the 4½ years of war that has cost more than 50,000 lives.

There were eight men in the contest, but it appeared to be a race between two leading candidates — Roberto d'Aubuisson, an ultrarightist who vows to crush the leftist guerrillas militarily, and Christian Democrat Jose Napoleon Duarte, who favors negotiations. If no one wins a majority, there will be a runoff in a month between the top two finishers.

Results probably will not be clear until sometime Monday because of a cumbersome reporting system designed to prevent fraud.

The counting of ballots was halted when Roberto Meza Delgado, a Christian Democrat on the Central Election Council, accused the chief technician for the election computer system of favoring d'Aubuisson's Republican Nationalist Alliance.

Meza Delgado ordered the removal of the technician, Morgan Bojorques. Other technicians walked out in protest, and the vote counting stopped. There was no indication when it would resume, or how much of the vote already had been counted.

In the eastern city of San Miguel, U.S. Rep. Jim Wright, D-Tex., said the election was "a very necessary beginning, but I'm not sure it alone will solve the problems."

Some local Democrats gather around a table for presidential candidate Gary Hart before the Riley County caucus Saturday at the Manhattan City Auditorium. Although Hart received the most delegates locally, candidate Walter Mondale won in statewide voting with 48.9 percent.

Hart wins in county, loses in state

By LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

A diverse crowd filled the Manhattan City Auditorium Saturday afternoon. Whether young or old, wearing a business suit or blue jeans, all had one thing in common — they wanted to select the man who may be president.

Sen. Gary Hart, D-Colo., won the Riley County Democratic presidential preference caucus. At final count, he had 59.42 percent of the participants in his group. Walter Mondale had 40.58 percent. Hart will have seven Riley County delegates at the district convention and Mondale will have five.

Mondale's showing was stronger than Hart's on a statewide basis. Mondale received 48.9 percent of the state's delegates, Hart 41.7 percent and Jackson 3.3 percent, while 6.1 percent were uncommitted.

The Riley County caucus began with registration at noon Saturday. As Democrats from across the county registered, Hart and Mondale backers handed out stickers and tried to gain support for their candidates.

The formal process of gaining support began with speeches by representatives of each candidate. Samuel Keys, Hart representative and professor of administration and foundations, spoke about the "new ideas" campaign theme.

"Gary Hart is committed to the traditional values of the party," he said. "But he is trying to involve new people and new ideas."

James Butler, Jackson representative, said his candidate represents the "moral force" in the presidential campaign.

"I like Gary Hart and I like Walter Mondale, but I want to tell you there's a third candidate out there," he said. "Jesse Jackson is the moral representative of the people."

Mondale's positions on the issues have been clear, said Vincent Gillespie, Mondale representative and assistant professor of English.

"He (Mondale) is no enigma," he said. "His stands have emerged in a lifetime of fighting for civil rights."

After the speeches, participants divided into groups in support of each candidate. Hart had 49 percent, Mondale 31 percent, 11 percent were uncommitted and Jackson had 9 percent in this initial count.

According to state Democratic Party rules, candidates with less than 20 percent of the participants at the local caucus are not eligible for delegates. Uncommitted participants and Jackson supporters were given 15 minutes to join one of the other candidates or not participate in delegate selection. A recount of the Hart and Mondale groups led to determination of the final delegate total for each candidate.

John Exdell, associate professor of philosophy, said the local caucus should adopt resolutions on a nuclear freeze and Central America.

The resolution passed on nuclear arms stated the United States should negotiate with the Soviet Union a "bilateral, verifiable freeze on the testing, development and deployment of all nuclear

Lebanese leaders meet while French withdraw

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — French troops began withdrawing from Beirut Sunday and Lebanese political leaders stepped up efforts to fill the security vacuum in the heart of the city.

In Amman, the Jordanian Parliament condemned U.S. congressional opposition to new military aid for Jordan and criticized congressional proposals for moving the U.S. Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, a city holy to both Moslems and Jews.

Last Wednesday, President Reagan withdrew a request for Congress to approve the sale of 1,614 shoulder-fired "stinger" anti-aircraft missiles ordered by Jordan three years ago.

In Damascus, Syrian and Saudi mediators met with Lebanese government and opposition leaders to discuss avoiding a showdown in Beirut once the French are out. The French are to be gone by Saturday.

The talks also sought to stabilize the Moslem part of Beirut, where Druse militias ousted Sunni Moslem gunmen of the Mourabitoun party in battles Thursday and Friday that killed 28 and wounded 100.

Druse chief Walid Jumblatt met with former Lebanese Prime Minister Salim al-Hoss, a key Sunni Moslem, and won a truce for west Beirut.

Jumblatt said he agreed to withdraw his militias and turn over security duties to police and the Lebanese army's 6th Brigade. It was not immediately clear when the agreement was to go into effect.

The French have manned positions along the four-mile "green line" separating Christian and Moslem sectors, and Lebanese leaders fear Moslem militiamen would try to take control after the French withdrawal — an issue that could touch off a battle with Lebanese army troops and Christian militiamen on the other side of the line.

A Lebanese security committee of the warring factions plus the Lebanese army met Sunday near the green line to discuss how to disengage combatants in the area.

As a long line of French soldiers boarded the white ferry boat L'Estrel, the rumble of rocket-propelled grenade and sniper fire echoed along the green line.

Radio stations also reported sporadic artillery and rocket exchanges between the Lebanese army and Druse militias in hills overlooking the city. They said shells hit the Christian eastern suburbs of Hayzmieh and Yarz, as well as in Baabda, site of the presidential palace.

French officials would not comment on the number of peacekeepers evacuated, but state-run Beirut Radio said 500 of the 1,300-man force and 30 military vehicles were aboard the civilian ferry.

Candidates look to Connecticut after New York vote campaign

By The Associated Press

Gary Hart and Walter Mondale appealed Sunday for the Jewish vote in New York before turning their attention briefly toward Connecticut, while Hart picked up a victory in Montana's Democratic caucuses.

Both were looking to Tuesday's presidential primary in Connecticut, where Hart hoped to complete a clean sweep of New England, and on to New York's Democratic primary April 3.

In Montana's caucuses, with 88 percent of the counties reported, Hart had 49 percent of the vote to 36 for Mondale. The Rev. Jesse Jackson had 5 and there was 9 percent voting for no preference.

Mondale and Hart spent Sunday in New York seeking its large ethnic vote. Hart drank beer with local Irish political leaders and Mondale told black church-goers that Reagan policies are "a sin."

Jewish voters, key to the New York primary, got another look at Hart and Mondale. Mondale appeared first before the Young Israel group, and Hart planned an evening address to the group.

Mondale told the gathering Hart had taken inconsistent positions on an issue of importance to Israel, the sale of advanced F-15 planes to Saudi Arabia. "He will tell you he always opposed the sale...But in fact on the day the approval was given, he said that — if it had been sent up just a little bit differently — he would have strongly supported the sale of F-15s."

Hart, in his prepared remarks, said he had "no apologies to make" about his record on Israel. He said he opposed the "Carter-Mondale administration's efforts to sell F-15s to Saudi Arabia."

Mondale has said he privately opposed the sale of the planes while Carter's vice president, but that he supported it in public once the decision was made to go ahead with the transaction.

Hart, smarting from a loss to Mondale in his native Kansas Saturday, needs a boost to stay up with the wins Mondale gained there and in the Illinois primary last week.

Hart coasted in third behind Mondale and the Rev. Jesse Jackson in Virginia caucuses, which halted mid-stream Saturday with a very fragile Mondale lead in delegates and a just as slender margin for Jackson in the popular vote. Caucuses continue tonight.

Hart refused to concede defeat in Kansas and Virginia, saying "I think it's too early to say they were losses."

In Virginia, Mondale held a slight lead in elected delegates. Mondale had 741, or 31 percent, to Jackson's 730, or 31 percent; 445, 18 percent, were unpledged. Hart

Regional teams compete in rodeo

By RHONDA WESSEL
Agriculture Editor

Two hundred-fifty contestants from 26 universities and junior colleges in Kansas and Oklahoma competed in the 28th Annual K-State Rodeo in Weber Arena on Saturday and Sunday.

Vernon Gardner won the men's all-round champion title, leading Fort Hays State University to the first place finish in the all-round men's team competition. Panhandle University won the women's team competition, with Jackie Koenig named as the women's overall champion.

The K-State Men's Rodeo Team, although ranked fourth in the Central Plains Region before the competition, didn't place in the rodeo.

Mark Huntington, senior in agriculture education, lead the K-State team. Huntington entered the final competition Sunday afternoon but failed to place.

The new Miss Rodeo K-State also was named at the Sunday afternoon performance.

Denise Shepherd, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine, received the Miss Rodeo title. She will travel to various rodeos across the region promoting the sport of rodeo and K-State.

"The only thing I was thinking when they announced the winner is if my hat would stay on or not. I had problems with it not staying on. Naturally, I was very excited," Shepherd said.

She will represent K-State in the National Collegiate Rodeo Queen competition this summer in Bozeman, Mont.

"The expense of traveling to all these rodeos comes from my own pocket. I will probably look for sponsors to help out with the travel costs," she said.

The competition divisions in the national contest will be similar to the way the K-State queen contest was constructed. The contestants will compete in public speaking, personal interviewing, western apparel modeling and horsemanship. Although the contestants compete in horsemanship, they do not have to own their own horse to compete.

"The rodeo queen contest committee tried to make our contest as similar to the nationals as possible so the winner would know what to expect of the national competition," she said. The K-State rodeo team consists of nine members.

"We have about 13 people riding for us, but the team is made up of three girls and six guys. They are chosen on their placing and ability," Nyla Wilson, K-State Rodeo Team Women's captain, said.

"Anyone who is a K-State student and is a member of the K-State Rodeo Club may compete for K-State in the rodeos and matches the club attends during the rodeo season," she said.

The rodeo team competed in four rodeos and rodeo matches last fall, two this spring and has seven more to attend before the end of the season.

"We try to practice an average of 10 hours a week as a team. The members usually practice a little more than that per week individually," Wilson said.

The traveling expenses for the club are not paid for by the University because the rodeo team is not designated as a sport in the athletics budget. The team makes all the money needed to pay for traveling

Landon Lecture re-scheduled

Hodding Carter III, who postponed a scheduled Feb. 13 Landon Lecture because of illness, will visit campus April 6.

His lecture, to be presented at 10:30 a.m. in McCain Auditorium, is free and open to the public.

Carter is anchorman and chief correspondent for "Inside Story," the first nationally-televised weekly series on press performance. He began his career on his family's newspaper in 1959 and became editor and associate publisher in 1965.

He became a national figure as spokesman for the U.S. Department of State during the Jimmy Carter administration.

Also announced as an Alfred M. Landon Lecturer this spring is Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley, who will speak April 16.

Photographers finalists in top 10

Two Collegian photographers were named among the top 10 national college photographers by the William Randolph Hearst Foundation.

John Sleezer, junior in journalism and mass communications, and Jeff Taylor, senior in journalism and mass communications; and eight other finalists will submit additional photographs next month to complete their portfolios.

Following the second round of judging, the three highest-scoring students will fly to San Francisco for an on-the-spot assignment. The finalists will receive scholarship awards, ranging from $2,000 to $500, with matching grants awarded to their respective schools.

Carlin to speak at open house

Gov. John Carlin will participate in the K-State All-University Open House this year.

Carlin is to speak at 1:30 p.m. Saturday in the Union Cafeteria. His appearance is in conjunction with a program and exhibit planned by the Department of Political Science and the political science honorary, Pi Sigma Alpha.

Theme of the political science open house exhibit is "Election '84." In addition to Carlin's address, there will be a video presentation of presidential candidates as they have been taped in TV appearances, and a debate about "Reagan's Civil Rights Record." The debate is sponsored by two local groups, the American Civil Liberties Union Chapter and the Coalition for Human Rights.

Representatives of each presidential candidate will distribute information sheets about their candidate's views during the day.

Young Democrats and College Republicans also will sponsor information tables.

Art contest winners announced

Award winners in the K-State Undergraduate Art Student Comprehensive have been announced by Charles Stroh, head of the Department of Art.

Tod Machin, senior in art, was judged "best in show."

Class winners included Powell Michael, senior in fine arts; Kim Taggart, junior in art; Therese Harter, sophomore in fine arts; and Laura Fatemi, freshman in fine arts.

Honorable mentions went to Kevin Bailey, senior in fine arts, and Don Terhune, junior in fine arts.

In all, there were 59 pieces of art work accepted for the show, which was exhibited March 10-20 at the Union National Bank and Trust, 727 Poyntz St. Kate Krasin, a professional artist from Santa Fe, N.M., now of Manhattan, was the juror. Award monies were donated by the bank.

Faculty members to read poems

Phil Royster and Ben Nyberg, both associate professors of history, will read poems from their works at 4:30 p.m. Tuesday in Union 207.

Royster has published two books of poems: "Songs and Dances" and "The Back Door."

Nyberg is an editor of "Kansas Quarterly" and has had short stories published in "Quartet" and "Texas Review."

The reading is free and the public is invited.

Super Dancers raise $2,000 for MDA

By LAURIE SHEPHERD
Collegian Reporter

Thirty-five participants danced for 15 hours in the first Super Dance for muscular dystrophy Saturday at The Avalon.

Members of Alpha Chi Omega, Gamma Phi Beta, FarmHouse and Tau Kappa Epsilon sponsored the dance, which lasted from 8 a.m. to 11 p.m. The event will take the place of the annual Bumpathon which was last held two years ago at Mother's Worry (now The Sports Fan-atic).

Matt McMillen, junior in journalism and mass communications and coordinator of the Super Dance, said he was contacted about sponsoring the dance by Randy Bay, district director for the Muscular Dystrophy Association, after the Panhellenic and Interfraternity Councils decided not to sponsor the dance.

"I'm a little disappointed in the actual turnout; there were 80 participants signed up and about 35 are here dancing," McMillen said. "I can't expect 100 percent the first year, but I was just hoping for more support. Everyone is having a good time, so we're hoping we get a lot of the same people back next year."

"Although we set our goal at $10,000 and raised only $2,000, I still feel it was a success," he said.

Bay said he thought the dance had a good turnout, considering it was the first time for the event.

"It (the program) does tremendous things for the people who are helped through the MDA. It's important for people to know that neuromuscular disease does not affect only children, but teenagers and adults as well. The money will buy someone a wheelchair, leg brace or aid in clinical research," he said.

Dancer Dianne Bortz, junior in mechanical engineering, said, "We're not just dancing the whole time. We've been doing a variety of activities like musical chairs, a limbo contest and the Mickey Mouse roll call. We're all excited now, but we've only been dancing for three hours with 12 more to go yet."

Shelly Henderson, junior in political science and co-sponsor representative from Alpha Chi Omega, commended the help of the community.

"The cooperation we got from everybody — especially the employees of The Avalon, the food establishments and the local stores has been really outstanding," she said. "The Avalon has given us free soft drinks and 50-cent draws all day and night, and the cover charge at the door goes to the Muscular Dystrophy Association. The food establishments that donated food for the dancers we can't thank enough for their help on such short notice."

Every half-hour the disc jockey, Paul Armbrust, freshmen in pre-medicine, drew a name for someone to win a prize from local merchants. Other entertainment was provided by the band Jim Sweeney and the Jump Shotz.

McMillen said some dancers had to leave during the late afternoon and evening due to prior commitments, but no one dropped out due to fatigue.

Voter apathy may result from inconveniences

By SUZANNE LARKIN
Staff Writer

Voter apathy, complicated voting procedures and voters' personal characteristics have caused a steady reduction in the number of people who vote in elections.

Of those eligible to vote, 66% percent are registered. Only a little more than half of those registered — one-third of the population — voted in the last presidential election, William Waugh, assistant professor of political science, said.

"And a little more than half voted for President Reagan — 17 to 18 percent of the population," he said.

The process of voting is so complicated that many people don't bother to vote, Joseph Hajda, professor of political science, said.

"The voting process is not as convenient as it should be. And as a result, a large majority of people just don't vote. The system needs to be convenient for the voter, not the people running the process," he said.

Voter apathy may not be the total explanation for the low voter turnout in the United States, though. Obstacles placed before the voter may be a determining factor. Voting costs are one of these factors.

Hajda said costs to the voter include money and time in the forms of:

- Registration, often weeks in advance of the election and several blocks or miles from one's home, such as a city hall or county court house.

- Learning enough about each candidate when there are dozens of names on a ballot.

- Taking time off from work or other duties to vote because elections are always on weekdays.

- Getting to the polls without assistance.

- Waiting in line at the polls.

Waugh said if voters feel their votes don't mean anything in an election, they won't vote.

The political party system in the United States lacks the influence the system has in Europe and other countries, Hajda said.

"Political parties in the United States are not strong. They do not influence voters to vote, and voting is not a tradition as it is in other countries. The incentive factor is important in voting, but the United States just doesn't have one," Hajda said.

"Political parties need to capture the interest and attention of the voter, but they also need to take into account the lack of tradition in voting in the United States, a tradition which should influence younger voters. But in turn, these younger voters are not voting."

There is a definite crisis in American government, Waugh said.

"There has been a decline in party influence and political participation in American government," he said.

"The best study of voter turnout, according to 'Who Votes?', the Wolfinger-Rosenstone study, said people are more likely to vote when they have personal qualities that make learning about politics easier and more gratifying," Waugh said.

The single most important quality is education, the study reported.

Even after controlling for differences in income and occupation, the more schooling a person has, the more he is likely to vote, he said.

Education, or the personal attributes leading to success at formal education, is associated with a stronger sense of civic duty and a greater interest in and knowledge about politics.

The next most important factor is age, according to the study.

Other things being equal, older people vote more than younger ones, perhaps because politics seem less important or relevant to young people. The only occupational experience that affects voting is public employment. People who work for the government are more likely to vote than those who work in the private sector, the study stated.

Region also has an effect on voter turnout.

People who live in the South vote less frequently than those who don't. Race, however, does not make a difference by itself. For example, when taking educational and regional influences into account, being black seems to have little effect on voting except to make persons slightly more likely to vote, the study stated.

According to the study, registration requirements do have some effect, but not nearly to the extent that the personal qualities have.

The voter turnout for the 1984 presidential election will be hard to predict, Waugh said. Because it's a presidential election, more people will tend to vote.

"Many people just don't regard voting as a civic activity," Hajda said, "and unless this changes and the process is simplified, this trend of low voter turnout will continue."

Diet programs: winning at the losing game

Dietitian finds pros, cons in diet methods

By JANET HELM
Contributing Writer

As society has become more health-conscious, Americans have sought the ideal means of shedding excess pounds. Rapid weight loss has become the focus of best-selling books and popular weight-loss programs.

Katharine Grunewald, registered dietitian and assistant professor of foods and nutrition, has evaluated popular diets such as the programs offered by the Diet Center Inc., Nutri/System Weight Loss Medical Centers and the Cambridge Diet.

According to the Health and Nutrition Examination Survey (HANES) study, conducted by the U.S. National Center for Health Statistics from 1971-1974, an average of 25 percent of adult women and 12 percent of adult men are obese. The problem of obesity has fostered many diet books and programs, Grunewald said.

"There may be some truth to practically any diet that we look at," she said. "But, you also have to weigh the advantages — the good things against the risks."

The Diet Center was founded in 1970 by Sybil Ferguson, a once overweight woman from Idaho. Her Diet Center program has grown to more than 1,700 franchises across the United States.

Grunewald said the cost of the program depends on the amount of weight the client wants to lose, but a local Diet Center charges $35 a week, following an initial consultation.

Grunewald said she knew a girl who, after losing 50 pounds at the Diet Center, had come to her because she was in the process of gaining it all back.

"Can you imagine spending $35 a week for that length of time and then gaining it back?" she asked.

The Diet Center program consists of several phases, including conditioning, reducing, stabilization, maintenance, nutritional education and behavior modification. The reducing diet involves daily visits with a Diet Center counselor, according to a Diet Center brochure.

Daily diet supplements sold by the counselor are required, and a list of acceptable and forbidden foods is provided. The calorie level ranges from 950 to 1,200. Deer or elk are acceptable, while beef is not; two tablespoons of lemon juice and one apple must be consumed daily; tuna, cod and several other fish are not allowed; and raw and cooked vegetables cannot be eaten at the same meal, according to the brochure.

Many of these recommendations are unfounded, Grunewald said. The cost, Grunewald said, is an additional disadvantage of the program, however, she did list some benefits of the Diet Center diet.

People will lose weight on the diet because it is low in calories, she said. In addition, some people find it helpful to receive personal counseling, "however, the people doing the personal counseling might not necessarily be reliable sources of nutrition information," she said.

The Nutri/System diet program consists of replacing all regularly eaten meals with the Diet Center's "space-age" foods — all pre-packaged and ready to heat and eat.

Grunewald said this heavy reliance on Nutri/System foods is a serious drawback of the program. It does not teach clients portion control or proper eating habits. A person could easily gain back the lost weight after discontinuing the Nutri/System program because they have not learned to eat "grocery store" food, she said.

The diet seems to be fairly well-balanced, she said, but is too low in calories. Grunewald said a weight-loss program should allow at least 1,000 calories, and most Nutri/System programs provide only 800 calories per day. The program is medically supervised and individualized, which she said are advantages. However, the cost of the consultations and the required food can be prohibitive.

The Cambridge Diet is named for its birthplace, Cambridge University in England. The diet was originally designed for obese people in a hospital setting receiving constant medical supervision. Today the diet is marketed person-to-person by a network of "Cambridge Counselors" who have lost weight on the program themselves. Counselors participate in a seminar to prepare themselves for this role, however, no formal training is required.

The diet is sold as a powder to be mixed with water and used three times a day in place of meals for up to four weeks at a time. The formula provides 330 calories a day. A week's supply usually costs about $17 to $18.

Grunewald said individuals will lose weight on the diet, "obviously on 330 calories a day." Easy preparation of meals also is one of the diet's advantages, she said.

"There is something to be said for that because a great deal of your temptation comes in preparing your meals, and, in a manner of speaking, you reduce your temptation if you don't have to prepare as much food," she said.

Grunewald said she does not question the effectiveness of the diet. Its safety, however, is a significant concern.

The Cambridge Diet is extremely low in calories and fat and marginally low in protein. The program is not endorsed by the American Society of Bariatric Physicians (specialists in treating obesity) or The American Dietetic Association. The Food and Drug Administration is investigating deaths that may have resulted from use of the Cambridge Diet plan, she said.

Losing weight is not a case of finding some magical diet. Grunewald outlined the features of a good weight loss program and suggested using the following criteria when judging diets:

Counselors aid in better health of dieters

America might be labeled by some as a nation fond of following fads.

Now, while some frenzied Hoala-Hoopers have stopped spinning and become "Curly" shufflers, another nationwide trend has also got people moving — away from their refrigerators and toward better health through dieting.

Employees of a local Diet Center Inc., Nutri/System Weight Loss Medical Center and with the Cambridge Diet, said they feel their respective programs are dedicated to making this trend toward better health a habit.

"It (weight loss) has to be based on a balanced diet, that is what we stress," Leah McMunn, of the Diet Center in Junction City, said. "We (counselors) teach them to take it (weight) off, stabilize it and then maintain it."

"Conditioning" is the first stage the dieter goes through. This begins with a two-day diet in which a lot of protein and fruit is introduced into the diet to expel all refined sugar from the system, McMunn said.

"Reducing" is the second stage and continues between two and six weeks, depending on the amount of desired weight loss, she said. Daily food intake is monitored, progress is recorded on charts and dieters are encouraged to come to the center every day and no less than three times a week to obtain encouragement from the counselors. Dieters eat only pre-packaged food they buy from the centers while they are on the diet.

"Stabilization" follows after the weight loss goal has been obtained. Dieters are encouraged to visit the center three times a week for weigh-ins and counseling.

"Maintenance" places the dieter on a well-balanced diet, reintroduces him to natural foods and teaches him how to keep that diet in his lifestyle, McMunn said.

"Nutritional Education and Behavior Modification" is taught in the final stage. Classes inform the dieter about foods and how to eat those that contain the nutrients that the body needs.

Counselors for the Diet Center are certified and must complete a training program.

"To be certified, you must follow the diet yourself. You must also work with an experienced counselor during the time you are losing and then after weight loss and help other dieters," Jerry Hall, counselor at the Diet Center in Wamego, said.

Counselors must also attend the Diet Center School in Rexburg, Idaho, for one week.

The food consumed by a Diet Center dieter might seem unusual to the lay person. But, Hall said, there is a purpose for each of the food specifications.

For example, deer or elk are two of the recommended meats while on the diet.

"Deer and elk, as a general rule, have less mottled fat than beef. Consequently, you can digest it better and not consume as much fat," she said.

Hall said as the dieter maintains his weight, beef is gradually allowed back into the program.

"When she, (Sybil Ferguson, the founder of the Diet Center), planned it (the diet) she originally conferred with her family doctor at the time to make sure one could have the maximum amount of weight loss with nutritional soundness," she said.

The cost for the program, depending on the length of the dieting process and the amount of weight loss desired, may seem high, but Hall said the cost is justified by the quality of help offered by the center.

Nutri/System Weight Loss Medical Centers offer another possible weight-loss solution.

"We want you to come in, lose your weight and learn good eating habits. We want you to never have to diet again," LeAnn Hodges, manager of the Manhattan center, said.

"We are a complete program. We try to promote good nutrition," she said. "There are a lot of doctors in town who send their patients to us."

Nutri/System employs a staff of two licensed nurses, a licensed practical nurse and two licensed physicians. In addition, the counselors who teach behavior education all have master's degrees from state universities.

"Right before they (dieters) get to maintenance (the process of keeping lost weight off), we do a 'main diet teach' that explains to them how to get back on table food and to reduce their dependency on us," Hodges said.

Hodges said she doesn't feel that the fact that the Nutri/System diet uses pre-packaged food is a drawback.

"People don't have to count calories, and our success rate has been pretty high," she said.

The fact that Nutri/System contains only approximately 950 calories per day has been questioned by some nutritionists who say a minimum of 1,000 calories is necessary for good health. Hodges said she doesn't feel this is hazardous.

"First of all, if you are doing the diet on your own without medical supervision, I would agree. But when you have licensed physicians who are sending people to us, I would say we are accommodating them (patients and physicians) well," she said.

Hodges said the center has helped people with various health problems, including those who are diabetic, hypoglycemic and allergic.

The cost of the Nutri/System program can be high, but she said she feels the dieters get what they pay for.

"After the first six months of maintenance, they (dieters) get back 25 percent of the program cost, and during the second six months they get back another 25 percent,

Truth only factor in rape verdict

Last week national attention was focused on the trials of six men in New Bedford, Mass. The men were accused of gang raping a woman for more than two hours on a pool table at Big Dan's tavern in the town, while patrons of the bar cheered them on.

The jurors in the two trials convicted four of the men of aggravated rape. Feminists, psychiatrists, lawyers and others concerned with the outcome of the trials (or who wanted to seem important and say something trivial about a nationally well-known case) declared the verdicts to be courageous and a true victory for women and other victims of violence.

True, this verdict exemplifies the increasing amount of rape convictions and the success of victims in seeking punishment of attackers. Perhaps this is proof the public is beginning to realize rape is not an act of sex, but rather an act of extremely violent personal invasion.

However, in no stretch of the imagination should the verdict of the juries be called courageous. To do so is to retreat to the times when rape was a closet subject and victims were persecuted for their unwilling participation, while rapists got off with a slap on the wrist.

Since when is handing down guilty verdicts after testimony from eyewitnesses courageous and precedent-setting? Is the justice system of this country so prejudiced against the victims of rape that proof and eyewitness testimony no longer are enough to convict violators?

During this trial, as in other rape trials, the defense attorney attacked the victim's character instead of defending his client's actions against the evidence of the prosecutor. The woman's welfare support and alleged promiscuity seemed to be the only evidence or defense the defendants could present.

As this proves, our justice system still has a long way to go to be a system of truly fair and objective decisions. The jurors determined the defendants to be guilty of the crimes with which they were charged. This was simply determining and stating what they thought was the truth as it was presented to them.

Although in any other situation this might be deemed courageous, in a court of law there should be no room or place for anything but the truth.

Guest spot a McGovern scoop

What do statesmen do for a living once they've left the political arena?

One rebounded from being governor of California to renewing an acting career. Jimmy Carter wrote his memoirs. Gerald Ford plays golf. And George McGovern hosts "Saturday Night Live."

Does what?

Although it may seem surprising at first, it is not implausible that former Sen. McGovern, twice now an unsuccessful presidential contender, will host the infamous comedy show April 14. After all, what better avenue could he follow to stay in the public eye of the generation he appeals to?

McGovern may have agreed to host the show as a joke, using an unconventional medium to parody extensive press coverage of the battle for the Democratic presidential nomination he casually left after failing to muster substantial support.

But, rather unwittingly, McGovern also has included himself in that exclusive realm of "retired" politicians who do their best to continue influencing public opinion and policy after leaving office. McGovern's means of doing so, beyond a second attempt at the presidency, is not only humorous, but innovative and original as well.

Girl's death reflects poor priorities

What is the true concern regarding child abuse in this part of the country?

If the response to Bob Keeshan's speech Saturday at the Fourth Governor's Conference on Education for Parenthood was any indication, the outlook may be bleak.

In a speech lasting more than 30 minutes, Keeshan told of the millions of young people "thrown away," beaten, or otherwise abused. He told of a refuge for runaways in Times Square, operated by Father Bruce Ritter, where pimps show up demanding the return of their "merchandise."

At the end of his speech, Keeshan opened the floor to questions. But were the questions concerning what can be done to prevent child abuse, legalities involved in reporting child abuse or questions regarding child abuse education? No!

The questions were what was the "Captain" doing, was there a chance his programs would be syndicated for re-broadcast, and if "Captain Kangaroo" had heard from the "Banana Man."

I do not mean to imply that those attending the speech, or even more specifically those asking the above questions, were not concerned with the welfare of children. Their attendance alone indicates some degree of interest. But I certainly hope those in attendance remember more of the speech than the age of Mr. Green Jeans.

Unfortunately for the children of America, this concern, or lack of it, may be nationwide. An example of this was shown in the front section of the March 18 edition of the Kansas City Star.

TOM SCHULTES
Guest Columnist

One story was about a 17-year-old dog with cataracts and kidney problems that a family had been forced to leave at an animal shelter in Rock Springs, Wyo., when their truck broke down, forcing them to take a bus home to Fort Wayne, Ind.

A chain of humane society volunteers transported the dog home and reunited "Snoopy" with her owners.

This story is quite nice and had a happy ending. I have nothing against a dog being returned to its rightful owner, especially when the dog is near death.

But the front section also contained a story that didn't have such a happy ending.

This was the story of a little girl from Pughtown, Pa., only 30 miles west of that City of Brotherly Love, Philadelphia, who is now dead because of abuse and neglect.

No, this little girl, Anna May Rodgers, was not locked away in a dark closet. She went to a day school program and rode the bus. But she still died.

She was well-watched. Teachers were taking notes on her weight loss, bruises and change in attitudes. Child and Health Services of Chester County arranged for health care. County health officials were well aware that she was living in a literal junkyard, sleeping in a salvaged van, with her only bathroom facilities in an outhouse 30 feet from the van.

In fact, at times her teacher would bathe her at school.

Isn't it strange that with all the attention this little girl was getting, no one could set up a "rescue line" for her?

As Keeshan noted in his speech, in only the last two years has the Federal Bureau of Investigation been able to use the same technology to track a lost child that it has used for years to find stolen automobiles.

But this couldn't save the little girl in Pennsylvania.

Malnutrition was listed as the cause of death, with beating attributed as a contributing cause.

What do the questions to the Captain, a homeless (albeit temporary) dog in Wyoming and a little girl's death in Pennsylvania have in common? They all are reflections of society's priorities.

I certainly hope the listeners at Keeshan's speech, along with the rest of this advanced society, will rethink their priorities.

No secrets with cordless phones

If you're talking on a cordless telephone, make sure you're not saying anything you don't want someone else to hear.

The Kansas Supreme Court ruled Saturday that conversations on cordless telephones which can be heard on an ordinary FM receiver are oral communications and not subject to wiretap laws.

The ruling means police can lawfully monitor and record wireless telephone conversations which are heard over an ordinary FM receiver.

The Associated Press reported the high court overturned a Reno County District Court judge's ruling involving Timothy and Rosemarie Howard of Hutchinson, who were charged with possession of cocaine and conspiracy to sell marijuana. The Supreme Court ordered the lower court to hold a new trial.

Prosecutors alleged the Howards used their cordless telephone in drug dealings.

The high court ruled a cordless telephone is basically a FM radio

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

transmitter, which makes communications made on it public.

The ruling means the Howards had no valid expectation of privacy when they used a cordless telephone which was advertised as having a range of 50 feet and is basically a radio unit, the AP reported.

Kansas Attorney General Robert Stephan called the ruling "a great decision for victims and law enforcement."

"Owners of a cordless telephone located in a private residence who had been fully advised by the owner's manual as to the nature of the equipment, which involves the transmission and reception of FM radio waves, had no reasonable expectation of privacy," Judge David Prager wrote for the court.

I agree with the decision. The airwaves belong to the public. If you use a cordless telephone, you are transmitting a radio signal. If someone has a receiver which can pick up your signal, too bad. You're on the air.

This ruling also could apply to citizens band radios and other broadcasting devices. The court's ruling could mean CBers may have to watch their mouths. I say 10-4 to that idea.

An interesting situation may arise from this decision. Will new cordless telephones scramble their signals to avoid monitoring of communications? If so, will police have the right to buy an "ordinary" descrambling device to monitor the scrambled signals? Stay tuned.

A history of senate allocations

The last of button bickering, we hope. After 15 minutes of deliberation, Student Senate voted to replace the original button bill, which held the penalty of impeachment for non-compliance, with a new bill which only encourages wearing of a student government identification button.

With the button issue resolved, senators now have time to research requests for student activity monies to be allocated beginning April 10. Of the 26 requests, consideration of three will likely be guided by often unwritten commitments.

One of the strongest senate commitments occurred two years ago when the student attorney lobbied for a salary increase from $16,000 to $20,000. She pointed to studies of comparable pay. Senate approved the raise, but could only find money for half the increase. Senate assured her it would communicate their commitment to an increase to the next Senate in hopes that Senate would continue the raise to the $20,000 level.

Because a new attorney, Dianne Urban, was hired last year, senate simply reaffirmed the $18,000 level. This year, Urban is requesting $21,000 based on comparable pay studies and the strong verbal commitment of senate two years ago.

CATHERINE SAYLER

The 1980-1981 senate set the trend for reducing University for Man funding when it decided that UFM was more community oriented and therefore should not be funded by the student activity fee. UFM argued that the immediate $15,000 loss in revenue would severely cripple the organization. The 1980-1981 senate agreed to reduce UFM funding by 10 percent per year. If senate honors that commitment again this year, UFM will receive about $11,000.

Last year's senate decided the Early Childhood Development Laboratory should no longer receive funds. Senate initially denied the $4,000 request, but later appropriated $800 to maintain the laboratory until it could increase its fees and change to a community program. This year the laboratory is requesting $2,470, maintaining it is a student service worthy of funds.

Two essentially new groups have requested funds.

The saga of sports club funding has a long and complicated history: a ban of all funding (totalling $10,000) in 1974; a $500 allocation to Parachute Club in 1981; a $700 Crew allocation in 1982; and the formation of a Sports Club Council, including Parachute Club, Rugby, Crew and Soccer, which received $2,700 in 1983. For the first time this year, all University Activities Board-approved Sports Clubs were notified of eligibility and asked to submit requests. The Racquetball, Sailing and Water Skiing clubs responded by joining the council. This year's council request is $4,200.

Finally, there is the student group BACCHUS — Boost Alcohol Consciousness Concerning the Health of University Students. It derives its name from the mythological god of wine and revelry. BACCHUS' request is $50, for postage. Mercury must be on strike.

Big Eight basketball teams far from inferior

Editor,

Re: Tim Filby's column, "Big Eight basketball hits low spot," in the March 21 Collegian:

The word is parity, not pity. Tim Filby obviously missed the point in his capsulization of this year's Big Eight Conference basketball season. Just because the Big Eight Conference could not place a team in Seattle does not warrant a proclamation heralding the inferiority of conference members.

On the contrary, several Big Eight teams had fine seasons. "Inferior" Big Eight teams managed to crush fine squads from the University of Arkansas, the University of Nevada-Las Vegas, Syracuse University and Marquette University among several others. The cellar-dwelling Missouri Tigers even managed to play the No. 1 Tar Heels to the wire, while the sixth place 'Cats were barely staved off by tournament survivors Indiana and UNLV.

As for the University of Kansas being "out-manned" and "out-classed" by Wake Forest in Lincoln on Sunday, I believe a little more effort should be given to concealing Filby's anti-Jayhawk sentiment. Kansas led the game at halftime and lost the game only because they suffered from a sub-par shooting performance in the second half. They were no more out-classed by Wake Forest than John Wooden is by Huey Counts' favorite, Billy Tubbs.

I would also like to offer a simple explanation for the Big Eight's supposedly "confusing year, which saw only two teams win 20 games." What else would one expect to happen when similarly talented teams play each other? Comparable Big Eight squads competed well against one another, and thus prevented each other from reaching the twenty-victory plateau. It is an unfortunate, yet rational, explanation for not placing more Big Eight teams in the National Collegiate Athletic Association tournament.

All factors considered, the Big Eight season should not be considered an embarrassing one. Every Big Eight team except K-State finished with an overall winning record. It is true that Kansas and Oklahoma provided a disappointing season finish, but not as a result of possessing inferior teams and athletes. Instead, these losses display the vast number of high-caliber teams competing in the NCAA college basketball today, including those in the Big Eight Conference.

Parity among the nation's collegiate basketball teams was never more evident. I'm sorry, Filby, the word best describing the Big Eight Conference basketball season is parity and not pity.

Three killed in weekend accidents

Three people were killed in weekend traffic accidents in Kansas, including a Kansas City, Kan., man who died when he was struck by a hit-and-run driver, police said.

Police said George Mortell, 30, was struck by a car as he walked in the city late Friday night. Mortell died later at the University of Kansas Medical Center.

A 21-year-old Havensville man died in a one-car accident near Holton early Saturday, according to the Kansas Highway Patrol.

A patrol spokesman said James B. Armstrong was alone in his car when it went out of control and crashed into a guardrail about 1 a.m.

A Joplin, Mo., woman — Eva C. McHorney, 59 — was killed early Saturday when the car she was driving collided head-on with a tractor trailer on U.S. 66, just west of Riverton in extreme southeast Kansas.

Paper considers European edition

FORT WORTH, Texas — A special task force at USA Today, which calls itself the nation's newspaper, is working on a proposed European version, the managing editor of the paper's financial section said last week.

Taylor Buckley said the European edition — which is only in the talking stages — would be "substantially the same, but scaled down."

"In large measure, it would be the section fronts that you see now, but maybe not as much weather," Buckley told the convention of the Texas Associated Press Managing Editors.

Carter slams classification process

DENVER — The news media is an "unregulated public utility" shackled by a government that practices censorship by regularly classifying routine information, a former Carter administration official says.

Hodding Carter III, chief correspondent for public television's "Inside Story" and former assistant Secretary of State under President Jimmy Carter, made his remarks March 17 at a First Amendment Congress meeting. The congress' intent is to promote better understanding of First Amendment rights.

Criticizing government censorship, he said that during his time in the Carter administration, 90 percent of classified information should never have been classified.

"Information is the key to power," he said. "The use of the classification process by the government really means 'If we can only maintain this information within a tight enough group, we can control it totally.'" Carter said.

Carter said the Reagan administration has "initiated a whole set of steps" to reverse the flow of information to the press.

Thatcher's son to head U.S. firm

LONDON — Mark Thatcher, whose business career has soared since his mother, Margaret Thatcher, became Great Britain's prime minister, has landed a $64,600-a-year job as a director of a car company in the United States.

A London newspaper reported Sunday that Thatcher, 30, has been appointed a director of Lotus Performance Cars, the American subsidiary of the British sports car company.

AT&T problems increase after breakup

By The Associated Press

American Telephone & Telegraph Co. service problems are serious and nationwide, although they appear restricted to specialized business services such as WATS lines and private phone circuits, a survey by The Associated Press indicates.

The survey also found the Federal Communications Commission has launched a monitoring program, that many state regulators were receiving more complaints since the Jan. 1 breakup of the Bell System and that AT&T has formed a special "strike force" to attack the problems.

At the local level, the survey found no evidence of new delays in providing residential customers with dial-tone service. Corporate executives warn, however, consumers shouldn't assume they're home free. If a special private circuit used by a bank for its automatic teller machines breaks down, for example, and it takes AT&T and a Bell company two days to repair it, consumers as well as the bank are inconvenienced.

"In 17 years, I've never seen this before," says Dennis J. King, the vice president and communications manager at Wells Fargo Bank in San Francisco. "Frustrating is not the word."

AT&T executives say they are frustrated. They acknowledge the breakup wasn't supposed to affect service. They also acknowledge the problems can be traced to a lack of coordination between AT&T and the Bell companies, while denying any wish to "pass the buck" or take advantage of captive customers.

Thanks to the antitrust pact that split the Bell System, AT&T is now responsible only for long-distance links, notes Gus Blanchard, the AT&T vice president tapped to head the company's strike force. The Bell companies must provide local connections. If the Bell company doesn't complete its work at the same time AT&T does, or vice versa, the result is an unhappy customer.

The AP survey found plenty of unhappy customers. It also found: — AT&T has significantly inconvenienced.

creased the wait for customers who want new private lines and ATS circuits. Despite those increases, from 28 working days to 48 working days for private lines for example, AT&T is still completing on time only one of four such private-line orders. Its backlog for private lines is 14,000. AT&T is meeting 75 percent of its startup promises for new WATS circuits and faces a backlog of 15,000 to 20,000 orders.

— Although AT&T says most of its problems stemmed from handling new orders, evidence of repair delays for existing customers also abounds. Those problems are not laid solely at AT&T's doorstep. Companies with large networks that require both local Bell and AT&T long-distance circuits claim they've experienced a dramatic increase in repair time. John Wulf, the communications chief for the Portland-based Pacific Power & Light Co., says the utility recently had to wait two days for repairs after an outage, compared to an almost immediate response in the past. Adds Phil Onstad of the Control Data Corp.: "There is a serious lack of coordination between AT&T and the Bell companies in getting things fixed."

— The FCC is receiving unsolicited complaints about service shortfalls. The complaints have forced the agency to start a special monitoring effort, raising the prospect of regulatory involvement that neither AT&T nor the Bell companies want.

— State public service commissions across the country — from Maryland to Michigan and South Dakota to New Jersey — report complaints are up. In Maryland, consumer complaints "are up an alarming 40 to 50 percent," says Joseph Ismail, the chief communications engineer for Public Service Commission. David Lewis of the Public Utility Commission's Bureau of Consumer Services says calls have tripled to 50 to 60 a week. Both say consumers are complaining about their inability to understand new bills or to figure out where to turn with problems.

The AP survey was conducted earlier this month through interviews with corporate managers, government officials, consumers and telephone executives across the country. The news was not all bad.

Those interviewed generally agree the nation's basic telephone system continues to operate well. There has been no measurable increase in complaints of busy signals, poor voice quality, no dial tone or disconnected calls. But that doesn't help the large business customer who needs new service.

What troubles AT&T executives is that they know their customers are right. They worry not only about lost revenue through service delays — they won't discuss dollar amounts — but also a loss of goodwill and the need to divert managerial attention to existing services instead of new business ventures.

To resolve the problem, AT&T is increasing the number of computer terminals at its engineering centers. By April 3, it will have transferred 750 to 1,000 employees to the terminals from other jobs and will go to a 16-hour workday compared to 10-to-11 hours now.

Hawaii island volcano alive, poses no immediate threat

By The Associated Press

VOLCANO, Hawaii — Streams of lava spilled down the flanks of Mauna Loa as the world's largest active volcano burst into life Sunday for the first time in nearly nine years, lighting up the night sky with a glow visible all over the island of Hawaii.

"You could just see it (lava) walking along, dancing," said Frank Cheijh, a telescope operator at the University of Hawaii's Institute of Astronomy on Mauna Kea, about 20 miles from Mauna Loa's 13,667-foot summit.

A "curtain of fire" spewed lava about 600 feet into the air along a roughly two-mile line at the summit at one point, said Dr. Robert Decker, scientist-in-charge of the U.S. Geological Survey's Hawaiian Volcano Observatory.

The volcanic activity posed no immediate threat to inhabited areas, Decker said.

County Civil Defense officials were monitoring the volcano, but emphasized that no evacuations had been ordered.

The eruption, which began about 1 a.m. (5 a.m. CST), was "visible as a pulsing glow from just about anywhere on the island. Just about everybody who was up at the time could see it," he said.

Decker said the lava was spilling to the east and south in two flows. The larger flow was to the east, crawling over uninhabited park land above the tree line.

Last December, the USGS said that an eruption was likely within the next couple years.

The mountain is located in an isolated area on the island of Hawaii, which has about 98,000 residents.

Mauna Loa's last eruption was in July 1975.

State public service commissions across the country — from Maryland to Michigan and South Dakota to New Jersey — report complaints are up. In Maryland, consumer complaints "are up an alarming 40 to 50 percent," says Joseph Ismail, the chief communications engineer for Public Service Commission. David Lewis of the Public Utility Commission's Bureau of Consumer Services says calls have tripled to 50 to 60 a week. Both say consumers are complaining about their inability to understand new bills or to figure out where to turn with problems.

THE SCHOLARSHIP THAT LEADS ENGINEERING STUDENTS RIGHT INTO MANAGEMENT

There's a lot more to an Army ROTC scholarship than tuition, books, lab fees, supplies and up to $1,000 per school year for living expenses.

There's leadership. You start sharpening your ability to lead while you're still in engineering school. So when you graduate as a second lieutenant, you're ready to take charge.

You're trim, fit. You know how to motivate people. And you're capable of managing the thousands of dollars worth of equipment you're in charge of.

And as you progress, you'll discover increasing opportunities to advance your engineering skills, to attend graduate school, while you serve your country.

All the while, you'll be acquiring the management skills that industry leaders look for. So look into an Army ROTC scholarship. Talk it over with the Professor of Military Science on your campus.

ARMY ROTC.

Pat Jewett affectionately holds Merlin, a 39-year-old salmon-crested cockatoo, as Merlin's mate, Molly, watches from across the cage. The two birds share a temperature-controlled aviary in the Jewett's basement.

Jesse, a blue and gold macaw, greets basement visitors by sticking his head up and out of his cage.

Winged hobby soars

Bird lover calls aviary home

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

Merlin arrived at 3 a.m. one winter in the middle of a blizzard. To get him out of the Volkswagen Rabbit, they had to flip his cage upside down and when they did that, the bottom fell out.

"All I know is that I was nose to beak with this bird that is approximately two feet tall, very pink, very unhappy and totally wild," said Pat Jewett, who turned her hobby of raising birds into a business.

Merlin, a salmon-crested cockatoo, was payment in exchange for some packing crates Jewett built for a man who imported birds. It reacquainted her with a hobby she had maintained for 10 to 15 years in California but had given up when she moved to Kansas. It was Merlin who began her association with big birds.

By walking down Laramie Street, one would never guess that inside the house at 925 Laramie St. there are seven cockatoos, three macaws, several lovebirds and budgies (small parakeets), two family dogs and several aquariums.

But after stepping inside, a visitor is instantly acquainted with Cassidy, a 4½-year-old cockatoo who is aggressively friendly.

Mr. D, whom Cassidy helped choose as her mate, is another totally wild cockatoo and a natural born coward, Jewett said. He only really trusts Cassidy.

"If he can't see her, he goes looking for her. Normally he's afraid of just about anything, but he'll stand up to the two dogs we've got to keep hunting until he finds her," Jewett said.

"She displays for people," she said of Cassidy. "She will go up and show off for anybody who will sit long enough."

When Cassidy "displays," her crest will go up, her wings will go back, she'll stomp her feet, bob her head up and down and stretch her neck out, Jewett said.

The Jewetts have designed a temperature controlled area in the basement where most of the birds are kept in and out of cages. Inside one of the six-foot cages sits Merlin and his new mate, Molly. It took Jewett a long time to find a mate for Merlin.

"A lot of moluccans (a type of cockatoo) aren't as pink as Merlin is, and I wanted to get one that was close in size and color so we could try and maintain the intensity of the color and size. A lot of birds were smaller or really washed out in color," Jewett said. "This is their first winter breeding season together, so they basically spend the time getting used to each other."

A large stump sits in the bottom of Merlin's cage. It was placed there two years ago when the Jewetts decided they wanted him to mate.

"He hollowed it (the stump) out himself. Now when he's feeling especially amorous he chases the female into the log. She spends a lot of time in the log stamping her foot. It's what they do when they're angry," Jewett said.

The birds that are the personal pets receive most of Jewett's attention, while the birds that are for sale receive care.

"If I do sell a bird, I'll give it minimal training (so it's not frightened) and then I'll work with the owner to finish the process. It seems to work best. That way the new owner has an idea of exactly what the bird is like in the worst of conditions and the bird tends to relate more to the new owner," she said.

When a bird is selected by a buyer, it is moved upstairs to get used to kids running back and forth, television, video games and dogs running around, as well as other aspects of family lifestyle. It makes the bird nervous at first, but basically calms it down so that no matter what kind of household it is moving into, it is prepared, she said.

Training a bird is "basically like working or living with a toddler," Jewett said. "You have to remember that their attention span isn't any longer than a small child's, so once they're tired of working or playing, that's it. They're just going to be real grouchy and it's best to leave them alone.

While sitting on top of their cage, Dee, a female Goffin cockatoo, receives a grooming from Herbie, who is also a Goffin cockatoo.

"Food is recreational more than anything else. Celery has little nutritional value, but they like to crunch anything. Corn on the cob is great because that way they get to play with the cob when they're done," she said.

Peanuts can be used as a reward when training a bird if it is not overdone, she said. Getting a bird to be as friendly as Cassidy is a matter of time and trust.

"The thing is to be consistent like in anything else. Some birds work well the first time for 15 minutes, and for other birds it's a half an hour. But if you find out that after five minutes your bird is real cranky, then back off and give him a rest," Jewett said.

"When a bird does bite, you never slap it," she said. "All you do is immediately lock it back up in its cage for misbehaving because, by and large, a bird will want attention, your affection and just like a little kid, you send it to its room."

Library may add collections area

Farrell Library may have a designated special collections room in the future.

Antonia Pigno, coordinator of specialized collections and University archives, said Farrell 315, which is now used primarily by students as a study area, has been designated a special collections reading room by Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries.

"At the present time, the special collections and the archives are both housed on the fifth floor of the library," she said.

The special collections take up most of the space provided on the fifth floor, leaving little room for the archives.

"There are numerous papers, important papers, that cannot be processed into the archives because of the lack of room," Pigno said.

Proposed plans for remodeling the room have been drawn up and are on display on the third floor of Farrell.

"This is all in the very early planning stages," Pigno said, adding that the actual work probably would not begin for a couple of years.

"The plans, as they have been tentatively drawn, now show a structure within a structure. A room would be built in one wing of Room 315 to house very rare books. Such rare books bring about the need for security and for humidity controls and other technical equipment necessary to maintain the books," she said.

The room would be designed to hold the maximum number of books possible, yet still remain aesthetically pleasing.

"The rest of the room would be for other books and collections," Pigno said.

If the room was converted for special collections, the bookcases would need to be fitted with doors so books could be stored safely.

The cost for completion of this project has not been officially determined, but is estimated at $250,000. Funding for the project has not been established.

"In the future, a Friends of the Library program may be established to help raise funds for this room," Pigno said.

Diet

which makes a total refund of 50 percent," she said. "Also, the cost pays for the professional services. When you have doctors and nurses, you end up paying more. You are paying for professionals."

Another popular diet, The Cambridge Diet, which features a powder that is added to water, is one of the simplest diet products to take, Barbara Soetaert, a Cambridge counselor based in Kansas City, Mo., said.

"They (the overweight) have now found a product that is palatable, reasonably priced, has all the proper ratio of vitamins and minerals and protein, carbohydrates and fat with the correct electrolyte balance, and is convenient and easy to take," she said.

Soetaert said the Cambridge Diet has been lab tested and proven safe for use up to 28 consecutive days without the intake of other food. The elimination of other food for this period of time isn't mandatory, but possible.

"(But) we always warn them (prospective Cambridge dieters) to get a doctor's OK. All good diets warn them to see a doctor," she said.

The advertised weight loss of up to twenty pounds per week is safe, Soetaert said.

"I think that 16 to 20 pounds is an average weight loss that some people will achieve, and it's safe if they drink Cambridge and follow the book we give them," she said.

"I wouldn't consume it myself if I didn't feel it was safe," Soetaert said. She said she has been taking the diet mix since February 1981.

The first requirement for training Cambridge counselors is that they must be on the diet themselves. Also, the prospective counselor must come to at least five support meetings. They aid dieters by teaching them snacks that are suitable and discussing any problems the dieter may be experiencing with the program.

Jump ropers aid heart association

By KIMBERLY STOLLE
Collegian Reporter

A total of $540.19 was raised for the American Heart Association by 25 K-State students who jumped rope for three hours non-stop in the fourth annual Jump Rope for Heart on Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

David Taphorn, junior in physical education, brought in the largest amount of contributions with $109, said Brenda Wiggins, coordinator of the event and instructor of health, physical education and recreation. Randy Kirkendall, sophomore in physical education, came in second with $84.60, and Janice Hanger, freshman in social work, was third with $75.60.

Each participant received a jump rope and t-shirts. Sweat shirts and canvas carrying bags were also awarded as prizes.

Susan Miller, former coordinator of K-State's Jump Rope for Heart and assistant professor of health, physical education and recreation, explained the procedures of the jump rope-a-thon.

"Students form groups of six to form teams, and one member of the team jumps at all points of time or varying points of time. One person will jump until she gets tired, then she'll pass the rope to another person who jumps," she said.

"Most everyone (as a team) goes the whole three hours. We've never had anyone quit in advance of that," Miller said.

Sponsors pledge money for each minute a participant jumps or for a set amount. In 1982, the jump rope-a-thon participants set a school record high of $3,111 worth of pledges, Miller said.

A certain percentage of the money collected is used throughout the state for research funds. Five K-State faculty members have received research grants from the Jump Rope for Heart, Miller said.

The Jump Rope for Heart does not only raise money for the heart association, but also is beneficial for the participants.

"It's a service project, and the whole intent is not only to collect money for the heart association, but also to point out the value of physical fitness and preventing heart disease, Miller said.

Carolyn Bender, junior in accounting, participated in the fund-raiser for the second year in a row.

"It was fun. We enjoyed raising money for the heart association and having fun at the same time. The benefit was getting together with other people and participating in an activity that was a lot of fun, and at the same time raising money for a good cause," she said.

The Jump Rope for Heart was managed by Salley Collom, sophomore in recreation; Deb Anderson, senior in leisure studies; and Doug Sommer, senior in recreation.

Donations were provided by Speciality Sound and Light, Swanson's Bakery, McDonalds and Sports Fan-atic.

Jump Rope for Heart was sponsored by Delta Psi Kappa and Phi Epsilon Kappa, professional fraternities for health, physical education and dance, and Recreation Club, an organization for recreation majors.

Olajuwon leads Cougars with 29

Dayton no match for No. 2 Hoyas

By The Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — An unstoppable Akeem Olajuwon poured in 29 points and fifth-ranked Houston stamped past an undersized Wake Forest 68-63 Sunday in the final of the Midwest Regional, sending the Cougars into the National Collegiate Athletic Association Final Four.

The Cougars, 31-4 and the runner-up to North Carolina State University in last year's collegiate basketball championship, will meet the University of Virginia, the East Regional champion, in the semifinals in Seattle on Saturday.

"It's just as big a kick as it was last year and just as thrilling as it was two years ago," said Coach Guy Lewis of Cougars, who are storming into the NCAA Final Four for a third straight year.

On every Houston player's mind seemed to be the upset loss in last year's championship game to North Carolina State.

"I'm so proud of this team," Lewis said of the Cougars, which includes three starters from last year. "This team is tired of being compared to last year's team. This year's team is this year's team, and last year's team was last year's team."

Olajuwon, expected to forego his senior year to play in the National Basketball Association, predicted the 31-4 Cougars would whip Virginia in the semifinals next Saturday at Seattle.

Olajuwon's 8-for-8 first-half shooting and forceful defensive presence inside dominated the first half. In the second half, the Deacons, who were at a height disadvantage at almost every position, were forced to shoot more from the outside than they wanted.

"We didn't do a very good job of stopping their inside game," said Wake Forest Coach Carl Tacy. "Akeem is a great talent. Because of him, we changed our shots in the second half."

Olajuwon finished with 14 of 16 from the field, two assists, two steals and three blocked shots.

"He is a great threat, and you have to think about him when you take it inside," agreed Wake Forest's Kenny Green.

Olajuwon, the 7-foot all-American junior who led the nation in rebounds, field goal percentage and blocked shots, was 8-for-8 in the first half, and his intimidating presence under the basket forced the Deacons to spread their offense and try to bomb away from long range.

Wake Forest, 23-9, which beat DePaul in the Midwest semifinals to shatter retiring Coach Ray Meyer's dream of an NCAA championship, mounted a five-point lead, 29-24, late in the first half. But Olajuwon scored nine of the Cougars' last 14 points, including three consecutive dunks, as Houston led 34-31 at intermission.

Wake Forest, one of five Atlantic Coast Conference teams to make the 53-team tournament field, fought to within 57-55 with 5:24 left. But a jump shot by Michael Young and another Olajuwon bucket quickly restored the Cougars' lead to 61-55.

Kenny Green led Wake Forest with 18 points.

There were five lead changes and 10 ties in the crisply played first half, which saw the Cougars outscore the Deacons 10-0 in the final four minutes.

LOS ANGELES — Now that Georgetown has gotten rid of the little people, the Hoyas will be taking on someone their own size in the National Collegiate Athletic Association Tournament basketball semifinals.

"I think it will be a matchup between the Rockies and the Alps," said University of Dayton coach Don Donoher Sunday after his unranked and undermanned team was disposed of by Georgetown 61-49 in the West Regional title game.

That put the Hoyas, 32-3, in the Final Four against the University of Kentucky, the Midwest champion, which presents a front line of 7-foot Sam Bowie, 6-11 Melvin Turpin and 6-8 Kenny Walker.

The Hoyas, who are seeking the national title which narrowly escaped them in 1982 when Patrick Ewing was a freshman, were led by Ewing against Dayton.

"I haven't been thinking about my freshman year," said the 7-foot All American. "It's great to be in the Final Four because we have worked so hard all season."

Georgetown Coach John Thompson said he was nervous before the Royals defeat Rangers

By The Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Orlando Sanchez doubled home the tying run and scored the winning run in the bottom of the ninth inning Sunday to lead the Kansas City Royals to a 4-3 exhibition baseball victory over the Texas Rangers.

Texas took a 3-2 lead in the top of the ninth on a double by Dave Hostetler and a sacrifice fly by Don Scott off rookie Mark Gubicza.

But the Royals came back with two runs in their half of the inning. Butch Davis walked, stole second and scored on the double by Sanchez. Greg Pryor sacrificed Sanchez to third, and Sanchez then scored on a sacrifice by Onix Concepcion.

The Royals had led 1-0 in third inning on Pat Sheridan's solo homer. Sheridan was three-for-three on Sunday, with a homer and two doubles. He also had an RBI double.

The winning pitcher was Gubicza, while the loss went to Tom Henke.

Curtis Wilkerson had an RBI single in the fifth for Texas, and the Rangers' Larry Parrish had a solo homer in the sixth.

Ex-Viking to give talk

As part of the K-State athletic department's drug education program, Carl Eller, former Minnesota Viking all-pro performer, will speak at 8:30 p.m. today in the K-State Ballroom.

Eller is the consultant to the National Football League on matters of alcohol and drug abuse and is responsible for starting the Chemical Dependency Awareness and Training programs for the 28 NFL member teams. These programs have helped professional football players and their families get assistance for their chemical addiction and personal problems.

As director of the National Institute of Sports and Humanities, an organization that sponsors programs for the education, training, prevention and treatment of alcoholism and drug abuse, Eller takes his message to high schools, colleges and communities across the country. The title of his speech tonight will be "America Needs Heroes."

Eller is a familiar name in American sports history. He twice won all-American honors at the University of Minnesota, but is probably better remembered for his illustrious career with the Minnesota Vikings. A member of the famed "Purple People Eaters," Eller was the league's Most Valuable Lineman in 1969 and 1971 and was an all-pro defensive end five times. He played in six Pro Bowls, nine conference championships and four Super Bowls.

There is no admission charge for the program, which is open to the general public. A reception will follow the program.

Rugby club grabs sloppy 4-0 victory

While adverse weather caused cancellation of several outdoor activities during the weekend, it failed to wash out the K-State Rugby Club's match against the Topeka Rugby Club on Saturday at the K-State rugby field.

And despite the sloppy, muddy field conditions, the K-State club was able to grind out a 4-0 victory over the visitors.

"At least it wasn't raining while the game was going on, but it was pretty sloppy going," said Kelly Cohan, captain of the K-State club.

The only score of the contest came when the K-State club was able to power the ball over from five meters out following a scrum down. Cohan touched the ball down for the try.

"Basically we just overpowered them," Cohan said. "We spent much of the second half knocking on the door — we just couldn't push it in."

Wet field conditions affected K-State's kicker Jeff Brunner, as he missed a pair of penalty kicks that he said he felt he should have made.

"The mud hampered my kicking a great deal," Brunner said. "There was mud on the ball, on my shoes and it made it real hard to kick."

"But I don't want to make excuses, I should have made the kicks," he said.

K-State club member Rick Aeschliman suffered a mild concussion and had to be removed from the game early in the contest. "It was a hard-hitting game,"

Cohan said. "Every time we play Topeka, it's a tough one."

The victory improves K-State's record to 1-2, as the team prepares for the All Kansas Roundup Tournament on Saturday at Emporia.

There will be teams from Wichita, Emporia, Kansas City, Pittsburgh, Johnson County and possibly a team from Garden City, Cohan said.

"It's the first time for the tournament, and I think we have a super chance of winning," he said.

game because "it is difficult to play 'not to lose' instead of playing to win. Because of our height advantage, people expected us to win."

Donohoe added, "They are a very physical team with constant pressure."

Roosevelt Chapman, 6-4, the highest scorer in Dayton history who was limited to 13 points Sunday, said, "Georgetown's size makes a big difference in your game style, because you have to arc your shots higher. Georgetown is more aggressive than anybody we've played."

Georgetown, No. 2 in the final regular season Associated Press poll, behind North Carolina, now out of the tournament, was top-seeded in the West.

Ewing took game scoring honors with 15 points, grabbed seven rebounds and clogged the middle on defense whether the Hoyas were using a zone or a man-to-man defense.

Georgetown shuffled in 10 players to end the remarkable string of tournament victories for the Flyers, who had been seeded 10th in the West, but got this far by upsetting Louisiana State University, the University of Oklahoma and the University of Washington.

Baseball team drops pair; Bascue's bat hot in losses

The K-State baseball team dropped a pair of games — 6-2 and 2-1 — to Southwest Missouri State University on Sunday at Springfield.

The Wildcats took an early 2-1 lead when Todd Thameret and Steve Goodwin singled and later scored. But the 'Cats were unable to hold off the Bears, who picked up one run in the third inning, one in the fourth, two in the fifth and two in the sixth to grab the victory in the opener.

Wildcat pitcher John Caresio was nailed with the loss, dropping his record to 1-2.

The second game was scoreless until the sixth inning, when the Wildcats were able to push across a run for a 1-0 lead.

The Bears came back with two in the bot-

Walker leads New Jersey past winless Federals

By The Associated Press

Herschel Walker scored four touchdowns to tie a United States Football League record and rushed for 116 yards in his best performance of the season, leading the New Jersey Generals to a 43-6 victory Sunday over the winless Washington Federals.

Walker, who carried the ball 27 times, scored on a 4-yard pass play in the first quarter and on runs of 9 and 3 yards in a space of 70 seconds late in the second quarter. He then scored on a 5-yard run midway in the third quarter, tying the USFL mark for touchdowns in a single game set two weeks ago by Houston's Sam Harrell.

Roger Ruzek had second-half field goals of 47 and 36 yards as the Generals improved to 4-1. Washington is 0-5.

On Sunday action, the Denver Gold stopped the Memphis Showboats, 28-24; the New Orleans Breakers edged the Chicago Blitz, 41-35 in overtime; and the Jacksonville Bulls beat the Los Angeles Express, 13-7.

On Saturday the San Antonio Gunslingers topped the Oakland Invaders, 14-10; the Arizona Wranglers pounded the Oklahoma Outlaws, 49-10; and the Philadelphia Stars slipped past the Pittsburgh Maulers, 25-10.

Brian Franco kicked two field goals, including a 35-yarder with about seven minutes left, to help Jacksonville beat the Los Angeles Express.

The loss kept the Express winless at home in 1984. Each team is 2-3.

The Bulls' winning margin came on a 58-yard pass play from Robbie Mahfouz to Willie McClendon in the third quarter, capping a six-play, 77-yard drive that gave the Bulls the lead for good at 10-7.

Mahfouz, replacing Bulls starter Ken Hobart, completed 11 of 22 passes for 183 yards and the touchdown to McClendon.

The Bulls put the game away when free safety Don Bessillieu intercepted a pass from Express quarterback Tom Ramsey at the Jacksonville 7-yard line with 1:30 left.

Ramsey came in early in the fourth quarter in relief of Frank Seurer. Ramsey was 4-of-7 for 40 yards, including the interception. Seurer completed 17 of 31 passes for 115 yards and one touchdown.

Jacksonville scored on Franco's 32-yard FG, but Los Angeles followed with its only score on a 4-yard pass from Seurer to David Hersey.

New Orleans quarterback Johnnie Walton threw for 440 yards and four touchdowns, including a 44-yard strike to Frank Lockett in overtime, to give the Breakers a victory over the Blitz.

Walton's statistics came on 29 completions of 43 passing attempts.

He also hit running back Buford Jordan on a 14-yard TD pass in the first, tight end Dan Ross on a 4-yard scoring play in the third, and wide receiver Charlie Smith with a nine-yard scoring pass with 1:52 left in the game after Chicago had taken a 32-28 lead.

Chicago tied it at 35-all with no time left on a 23-yard field goal by Kevin Seibel. It was his second field goal of the afternoon. He kicked a 30-yarder as the second quarter drew to a close.

Buford Jordan burst out of the shadow of Marcus Dupree, running for 135 yards, most ever by a Breakers running back, and caught seven passes for 71 yards.

The Breakers are now 5-0; Chicago is 0-5.

Craig Penrose threw two touchdown passes Sunday as Denver came from behind twice to salvage a victory over the Showboats.

But it wasn't until Vincent White scored from the 16 with only 57 seconds left in the game that Denver had the game locked up.

The Showboats led 24-21 with less than 3 minutes left after running back Alan Reid scored a 1-yard run, ending a 16-play, 72-yard drive.

Denver, 4-1, had a 14-0 lead on Memphis mistakes, first on a fumble and four minutes later on an intercepted pass. Memphis, 1-4, made it 14-3 with Alan Duncan's 48-yard FG in the second. Memphis made it 14-10 when Terry Love intercepted a Penrose pass and returned it 79 yards for a touchdown in the third quarter.

The Showboats went ahead 17-14 when quarterback Walter Lewis, who was 17-25 for 175 yards passing, scored on a one-yard keeper just before the end of the third quarter.

Kentucky displays aggressiveness, pride

By The Associated Press

LEXINGTON, Ky. — After six years of tournament disappointments, the University of Kentucky is hot on the chase of the national basketball championship after winning the National Collegiate Athletic Association Midwest Regional and a trip to the Final Four.

The No. 3 Wildcats haven't been to the Final Four since they won it all in 1978, so Saturday's scrapping 54-51 victory over No. 6 Illinois was especially sweet.

"I'm on Cloud 10," said Sam Bowie, expected to bring home several titles when he came to Lexington five years ago. A stress fracture intervened and put the talented 7-foot-1 center on crutches and the bench the last two years.

"A lot of expectations on this team were high, based on the fact we had a lot of talent," said Bowie, a second team All-

America at forward because Melvin Turpin emerged as a scoring power at center during Bowie's layoff. "But talent alone doesn't win championships. You've got to play with a lot of aggressiveness, a lot of pride."

Kentucky seeks its sixth NCAA crown and second for Coach Joe B. Hall.

In 1979 and 1980, upset losses in the tournaments at Rupp Arena left Kentucky out in the cold. Then came Middle Tennessee State University and the University of Alabama-Birmingham, who eliminated the Wildcats in 1981 and 1982. It was the University of Louisville that did it in overtime in the 1983 Midwest final.

University of Illinois Coach Lou Henson called Kentucky a "great team."

"I think they have a real good shot at winning it all. They play hard. We are a better club than when we lost to Kentucky at home. Kentucky probably is the better team now, but it's close."

The Illinois players complained the game was too rough and referees favored Kentucky in the second half, when the Illinois had and an 11-2 foul deficit until the closing seconds.

"Today," Bowie said, "you saw so-called All-Americans diving on the floor, you've seen people scraping their knees, banging their elbows. This is what it's all about."

"We've been in this situation before," Bowie said. "Once again we rose to the top. A lesser team might have fallen. We had to fight and scratch for everything out there today, but once we got this close to the Final Four, we were determined it wasn't going to slip through our fingers."

Added Walker, "I wasn't the player I usually am, but I tried. Sometimes guts can carry you a long way." Like all the way to Seattle.

Music industry ends four-year skid

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — After four years of singing the blues, the music industry is dancing to a happier tune — the sound of cash registers ringing amid a financial and creative renaissance.

Nobody did it better in 1983 than Michael Jackson's "Thriller," which has sold some 32 million copies worldwide to become the best-selling LP of all time and contributed substantially to CBS Records Group's $109.4 million in earnings — a leap of nearly 500 percent over 1982.

But other record companies celebrated too, with other albums scoring multimillion sales: "Synchrocity" by the Police, the "Flashdance" soundtrack, Def Leppard's "Pyromania" and David Bowie's "Let's Dance," to name a few. But perhaps the most welcome development was the emergence of new faces on the Top 10 album and single charts. Groups like Men at Work, Eurythmics, Culture Club, Def Leppard and Duran Duran injected new life into an industry that for a while seemed trapped in a time warp in which only veterans had a chance at success.

The recovery was not dramatic for all — giant Warner Bros. had a decline in earnings for its U.S. record labels — and no one is betting on a return to the music industry's glory years of the 1970s, when growth rates of 15 percent and 20 percent were not uncommon.

But observers say last year's rebound gives the lie to those who feared pop music was permanently on the skids.

"It's as healthy as it's ever been — it's diverse, it's vital," says Arista Records chief Clive Davis. He always maintained that the slump was never as severe as it was made out to be, but rather reflected the general economic conditions of the last four years.

But a slump it certainly was, and perhaps because the music business had so many boom years it came as a shock to many. According to the Record Industry Association of America, the value of domestic record and tape shipments tumbled from $4.31 billion in the peak year of 1978 to $3.59 billion in 1982.

During the four-year period, record companies cut hundreds from their staffs — and dozens from their artist rosters.

The RIAA has yet to compile its 1983 year-end figures, but all indications are that they will show healthy gains.

In Kansas, with all caucuses reporting, Mondale had 372 local delegates, or 48.9 percent, to Hart's 317 or 41.7 percent. Jackson had 25 or 3.3 percent, and 47 or 6.1 percent were unpledged.

The Connecticut primary Tuesday, with just 52 delegates pending, will not help Hart's campaign much, but a victory would hint at the staying power needed in the "marathon" predicted en route to the national convention in July.

Duarte leads in El Salvador's election

By The Associated Press

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — Unofficial returns Monday showed moderate Jose Napoleon Duarte leading in El Salvador's first presidential election in seven years, but he appeared likely to face a runoff with right-wing candidate Roberto d'Aubuisson.

The results, counted by Duarte's own Christian Democratic Party, were similar to estimates given by U.S. observers who said they were based on unofficial data from the Central Election Council.

The official count, stalled in a dispute at the election computer center, but resumed Monday. Final results may not be known until later in the week.

"Seventy-five percent of the people voted against d'Aubuisson, against the death squads, against the violence of the extreme right and the extreme left and against the guerrillas," Duarte said.

D'Aubuisson denies any link to the death squads blamed for many of the killings in El Salvador's 4½ years of civil war. He favors crushing the guerrillas militarily; Duarte favors negotiations. The leftists call the elections a "farce" and did not participate.

Julio Adolfo Rey Prendes, the Christian Democrats' secretary-general said, "We still have hopes for a first-round victory, but I personally think we will get just over 48 percent of the vote."

If neither gets more than half, there will be a runoff between the top two. Some express concern that a contest between the bitter rivals Duarte and d'Aubuisson could further promote instability.

Duarte said his party estimates that 30 to 35 percent of the people who tried to vote could not because of irregularities, mainly bureaucratic bungling.

President Reagan called the election "another victory for freedom over tyranny... Those valiant people braved guerrilla violence and sabotage to do what we take for granted — casting their vote..."

Most disruptions were in the province of San Salvador and may have kept the party from passing the 50 percent mark, Duarte said. The party is strong in the province, which has about 25 percent of the country's eligible voters.

Christian Democrats' figures showed them with 47.3 percent of the vote, with about half the country's precincts reporting.

D'Aubuisson's Republican Nationalist Alliance had 28.7 percent and Francisco Jose Guerrero's National Conciliation Party, 16.4 percent.

The official tabulation was suspended Sunday night in a dispute between the Christian Democrat on the elections council, Roberto Meza Delgado, and the head technician at the tabulation center, Morgan Bojorquez, whom Meza accused of favoring d'Aubuisson.

Meza ordered Bojorquez out of the computation center, a spokesman said, and put in two armed guards to keep him out. The other technicians also left, shutting the center. Counting resumed Monday.

U.S. observers projected a total vote of 1.3 million out of 1.8 million eligible Salvadorans, or about a 70 percent turnout.

House tentatively favors capital improvements bill

The Kansas House of Representatives tentatively approved a capital improvements appropriations bill for state Board of Regents' institutions for fiscal year 1985-1986. It is expected to take final action on the bill today.

If the bill is given final approval, the University of Kansas Medical Center will receive $3.5 million; K-State, $196,000; Emporia State University, $30,000; KU, $170,000; and Wichita State University, $900,000 for fiscal year 1985. The regents will receive $2.8 million to be used for major repairs, special maintenance, remodeling and energy conservation for all the regents' institutions.

For fiscal year 1986, the House is considering appropriations to KU Medical Center of $2.8 million; K-State, $1.3 million; Emporia, $250,000; KU $255,000; Wichita State, $900,000; and the regents, $4 million.

Capital improvement projects at K-State also will receive funding if the bill is approved. An appropriation of $196,000 for final planning of a plant sciences greenhouse is being considered for fiscal year 1985. For fiscal year 1986, an additional $974,000 for construction of the greenhouse is being considered.

Nichols Hall would receive $295,000, in addition to the $4.2 million appropriated last year for the project. Of the initial appropriation, $882,000 has been used.

The bill, if passed by the Senate and signed by Gov. John Carlin, will take effect on July 1, 1984.

Probation spurs forum on rapist's sentencing

By CATHY KARLIN
Copy Editor

Plans for a public forum concerning rape in Manhattan were announced at a press conference Monday by Sandra Coyner, director of Women's Studies.

The forum, sponsored by a coalition of organizations concerned about rape, will feature discussion with Riley County District Judge Jerry L. Mershon and Riley County Attorney Colt Knutson on Mershon's recent decision to grant probation to convicted rapist Calvin Holland.

Holland was granted probation in February after serving approximately 3½ months of an 8- to 20-year sentence for raping a Manhattan woman. The judge made the decision on the condition that he receive at least 30 days of in-patient treatment for alcoholism, Coyner said at the press conference in Blue-mont 108.

"The speakers will present information about the crime perpetrated by Holland, the nature of the decision to grant probation and why probation was granted," she said.

The forum will begin at 7:30 p.m. Monday in the Ecumenical Christian Ministries Center, 1021 Denison Ave. Public parking will be available after 7 p.m. in the University parking lots across the street from the center.

Coyner said that although she was not present at the probation sentencing, she has read the sentencing transcripts. The speakers will be asked to explain statements attributed to them in the transcripts and their failure to address certain issues at the hearing, she said.

"It should have been the role of the county attorney and possibly the judge to raise issues why probation might not be a good idea. I want to hear from those men why they didn't do that."

"It is not our intent to use the forum for an arena to denounce them (Mershon and Knutson) as individuals or to demand their resignation," Coyner said. "It is an opportunity for the public to express concern about what they (officials) did."

Sponsors of the public forum include Manhattan Women Against Rape, the Women's Studies Program, the Women's Resource Center, Ecumenical Christian Ministries, the Community Coalition Against Rape and the Crisis Center Inc.

Members of Women Against Rape, the forum's organizers, plan to concentrate on concerns about the roles of public officials in the prosecution of rape cases, Coyner said. Topics are to include:

- handling rape myths in trials;
- what factors should be used in making the decision whether to grant probation to a convicted rapist;
- when and how the community's need for rape prevention should be

Cancer could kill 450,000 this year, report says

By GREG PROSKE
Collegian Reporter

(Editor's note: This is the first of two articles about current research on the treatment and prevention of cancer.)

It is estimated by the American Cancer Society that 450,000 people in the United States will die from cancer this year.

An society report issued March 7 stated that 148,000 of these estimated cancer deaths could be avoided if the victims were diagnosed and treated during the early stages of the disease.

Although many types of cancer can be successfully treated, such as skin and breast cancer, the nation's cancer death rate is slowly rising.

The report stated that in the nation this year, 870,000 people will be diagnosed as having cancer, in addition to another 400,000 who will be diagnosed as having skin cancer, which responds very well to treatment and is therefore not generally included in overall cancer statistics.

One-third of deaths due to cancer will be caused by cigarette smoking, which can be responsible for cancer of the lungs, oral cavity and pancreas.

An estimated 75 percent of all lung cancer is related to smoking, the report stated.

"Cancer is a cellular disease," said Terry Johnson, director of the Division of Biology and the Center for Basic Cancer Research at K-State.

"Cancer's most life-threatening aspect is that cancer cells grow and recolonize. A colony of cancer cells is called a tumor. Cancer cells break off of a tumor and attach themselves to other organs, and they continue to multiply to form other tumors," Johnson said.

"Unlike normal cells which stop growing when they contact other cells, cancer cells are unsociable and continue to grow," he said.

Tumors hamper the functions of the organs to which they are attached and often render those organs ineffective.

"Cancer cells are mutated cells, which are caused by mutagens," Johnson said.

Mutagens are agents in the body which promote cell mutations, and mutagens, such as nicotine, which cause cancer are called carcinogenic, he said.

"Cancer cells arise in everyone's body every day. However, our immune systems kill those cells. People who have cancer have an immune system somehow made weak so it can't destroy the cancer cells. A lot of cancer research focuses on what causes the immune system to be ineffective in destroying cancer cells," he said.

"Cancer seems to be mostly a disease of the old. We are seeing more cancer today than twenty years ago because people are living longer," Johnson said.

Because cancer cells can survive anywhere in the body, diagnosing it can be very difficult, he said.

Treatment for cancer can come in the form of surgery, X-rays, radioactive substances, chemicals, hormones and immunotherapy.

The following are ways the report listed as revolutionary treatments for cancer:

— A biological response modifier, thymosin, is produced by the thymus gland. A partially purified thymosin preparation called thymosin fraction five has shown promise when used with chemotherapy.

— Synthetic cousins of vitamin A, called retinoids, have prevented bladder and breast cancer in mice and rats, and they may also work against cancers of the lung, esophagus and pancreas in humans.

— The manipulation of proto-oncogenes, cancer-causing genes which are normal and essential for embryonic tissue development and which usually become dormant, may be activated later in life. However, researchers have discovered how to suppress oncogenes in some animals and are trying to determine if the same can be done in humans.

— Ultrasound (high-frequency sound waves) is being used to locate

$1 million should pay light bills

Opal Humbert can't remember when she dropped the sweepstakes envelope in the mail.

"I just wrote my name on it and sent it in," Humbert, 430 Vattier St., said Monday.

Then, sometime in February, Humbert received a letter from Ed McMahon, best known as Johnny Carson's sidekick on "The Tonight Show." McMahon, who had endorsed a sweepstakes for the United States Publishing Exchange, informed her that she had won $1 million.

Humbert said she expects to receive further information about her prize later this week. And when the winnings arrive, she will be able to put them to good use.

"I never did win anything in my life," Humbert said. "I'll be able to use it. My light bills are always high."

Student Senate to allocate $764,800 to groups

Student Senate will allocate about $764,800 before the end of April.

According to senate's fiscal outlook report, that amount is the estimated balance for the 1984-1985 fiscal year. Senate has received funding requests totaling about $788,000. Any part of this budget not allocated to an organization is placed in a reserve account. These figures are based on a combined enrollment of 30,036 students from the fall and spring semesters.

Total allocations last fiscal year amounted to about $797,600, which included $1,520 from a reserve account for maintenance of standing programs.

The senate meeting Thursday will be the last opportunity for groups and organizations wishing to receive funds from senate to defend their financial requests.

Tracy Turner, senate chairman, said the allocation process begins April 10. A bill containing all the requests will be presented to senate and discussed for two weeks. Senate will meet on Tuesday, as well as Thursday, to allow time to discuss the allocations.

Twenty-one groups have requested funding from senate, and two senators have been assigned as liaisons to each group, Turner said. "The senators were just assigned last week," he said. "Talking to their assigned groups is something they'll be doing this week."

For the last two weeks, groups requesting funding have given five-minute presentations to tell senate about their organizations.

The senate Finance Committee considers each organization's request, then makes an allocation suggestion. The committee usually recommends less than the group requests, Turner said.

"They (Finance Committee) bring their suggestions to the senate for discussion, and hopefully we come up with a figure everybody can accept," he said. "But in every case there are bound to be differences."

Currently there are six line item allocations. Line item groups receive a set amount from each student's fees. The six line item groups are the college councils, Associated Students of Kansas, Fine Arts Council, Recreational Services, Student Publications and the Union.

Having a line item is not always an advantage for a group, Turner said.

"If we grant them the line item, the amount of money they get is dependent on the number of students coming to K-State," he said. "They're the ones that get the pinch when enrollment is down."

Cancer-care codes spark controversy

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — A letter code on a blackboard tells doctors at one of the nation's top cancer treatment centers whether a particular patient should be given heroic life-saving measures, raising new debate about hospital procedures for hopelessly ill patients.

A coded DNR order — "do not resuscitate" — is given on the basis of oral directions from the attending physician to the hospital resident and no written record of it is made. Dr. Thomas Fahey, deputy physician-in-charge of Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center, said Monday.

The code is not part of the patient's record and after a patient dies, the blackboard notation is erased. But Fahey said no DNRs are issued for terminally ill patients without prior consent.

"Many physicians and hospitals have policies that prohibit (written) DNR orders because they fear they will be held legally liable," said Bill Read, executive director of a research and education arm of the American Hospital Association.

But Stephanie Steele of the Greater New York Hospital Association countered, "I've sat at many meetings with hospital attorneys where I've heard some of them say that (writing DNRs) is what the hospital must do to protect itself, and an equal number say all you're doing then is documenting a malpractice case against yourself."

"Food for Five" cookbook for sale

Favorite recipes of Grace Shugart, long-time home economics faculty member at K-State, and other K-State home economists, have been collected in a new cookbook, "Food for Five."

The cookbook, which contains more than 300 recipes for families, complements "Food for Fifty," a famous K-State cookbook which was co-authored by Shugart.

Funds raised through the cookbook sale (it costs $9.95) will support a lecture series honoring Shugart, emeritus head of the Department of Dietetics, Restaurant and Institutional Management.

The cookbooks will be on sale after Sunday at the Department of Dietetics, Restaurant and Institutional Management in Justin 108.

Cookbooks also will be sold at the next Shugart Lecture at 10:30 a.m. April 11 at the Union Forum Hall. Speaker will be Mary Beth Crimmins, regional vice president, ARA Services, San Francisco.

Professor awarded fellowship

The International Union Against Cancer in Geneva, Switzerland, has awarded an Eleanor Roosevelt International Cancer Fellowship to Vernon Bode, professor of biology.

The award provides partial support for a sabbatical year of research at the Pasteur Institute in Paris, France. His host at the Pasteur will be Jean-Louis Guenet, head of the Mammalian Genetics Unit in the Department of Immunology.

The American Cancer Society provides funds to the International Union Against Cancer for these memorial fellowships. They are designed to enable highly qualified cancer research workers from any country in the world to work in collaboration with outstanding scientists in another country.

An international panel of scientists meets yearly in Geneva to select those researchers who will be given the awards on the basis of their proposed research, their past research accomplishments, recommendations from other scientists and a personal interview by a panel member.

Bode's research utilizes mutant mice as models for studying mammalian genetics and embryological development. It seeks to provide an understanding of the basic biology of animal cells which can then be utilized in research on the biological mechanisms for a variety of diseases, including cancer.

Bode and Guenet are perfecting new methods for obtaining mutant mice with specific genetic defects. By studying animals with appropriate defective genes, it is possible to dissect complex biological phenomenon into simpler component parts, thereby making it easier to discover and understand how the system works.

For the past 20 years, Bode's research has received continuous support through competitive grants from the National Institutes of Health. He joined the Biology Division at K-State in 1970 and spent a sabbatical year, 1977-1978, at Oxford University in England as an American Cancer Society Scholar.

College study skills course offered

K-State will offer a course in June for college-bound high school juniors and seniors which is designed to make their transition to college easier.

Developing Study Skills for College Success will be offered at 36 Telenet locations. It will meet on Friday mornings and will be taught by Clyde Colwell, assistant professor of curriculum and instruction.

Colwell will cover such topics as how to prepare for exams, listening skills, how to take notes from lectures and textbooks and how to manage time. Participants in the course may earn one hour of college credit.

Army to exhibit modern weapons

The latest in U.S. Army technology will be featured in a color video exhibit titled "Today's Weapons" from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m. Saturday in the Union.

The exhibit is presented by the U.S. Army Material Development and Readiness Command (DARCOM), headquartered in Alexandria, Va., and is sponsored by K-State's Army ROTC.

The exhibit provides a glimpse of the Army's next generation of high-technology armored vehicles, helicopters, missiles and rockets. The videotape features action-oriented footage of seven different weapon systems.

DARCOM is responsible for supplying field soldiers with equipment and weapons. More than 100,000 soldiers and civilians serve at more than 140 DARCOM locations in the United States and overseas. DARCOM personnel accompanying the exhibit will answer questions.

Classification could ease property taxes

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Representatives of Gov. John Carlin called Monday for approval of a proposal to allow classification of property for tax purposes, saying it will help protect farmers and homeowners from a possible $200 million tax increase under reappraisal.

"To reappraise property and to utilize those values for tax purposes in the absence of a classification amendment would be to create a tax burden shift of extremely large proportions, primarily on to homeowners and owners of agricultural land," Secretary of Revenue Harley Duncan said.

"Such a shift would, in my mind, constitute a serious and undesirable policy change in the burden of Kansas taxes and could have long run negative consequences for the effective operation of many governmental units in Kansas."

Duncan testified before the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee in support of a House-passed resolution which would submit a classification amendment to voters in the fall general election. Only supporters of the measure testified Monday. Opponents will appear before the committee today.

Under classification, different types of property could be taxed at different rates. The Kansas Constitution now requires property to be taxed equally, and by statute the rate is set at 30 percent of fair market value.

"Over the past 40 years, assessment to value ratios for real property have continually declined in Kansas, and we have reached a point where to try to achieve uniform and equal assessments would work a literal revolution in the tax structure," Duncan said.

In particular, he noted that taxes on agricultural land and homeowners would increase about $200 million under reappraisal without classification. Under the House-passed measure, the tax shift would be nearly $105 million.

Also supporting the tax proposal was John Myers, a policy analyst in the Division of Budget who spoke on behalf of Gov. John Carlin.

The Kansas Livestock Association and the Kansas Farm Bureau also supported the classification proposal. Mike Beam, a lobbyist for the livestock association, said classification was the only "politically practical" way to resolve current inequities in the property tax system.

The Kansas Association of School Boards urged the committee to approve a classification proposal, but opposed the version passed by the House because it provides for removal of property taxes on livestock and merchant's inventories.

John Koepke, executive director of the school group, objected that the House-passed classification measure narrowed the property tax base instead of preserving the "status quo." Moreover, he warned that the proposal would change the amount of state aid going to school districts. Urban districts would receive more state funding because their wealth, as measured by the school finance formula, would decline under the classification resolution.

Faculty and students who use Form 1040 to itemize deductions on their income tax returns may be aided by comparing their records to the figures in the table below.

The figures have been prepared by the Research Institute of America and recently appeared in a Universal Press Syndicate column. They are national averages of deductions claimed by taxpayers on the 1982 income tax returns.

These averages represent rough guides to deductions on the 1983 returns. As such they can be helpful to the taxpayer in two ways:

1. If a taxpayer's deductions for 1983, in any category, are far above the average shown in the table, his return will be a red flag for audit and he will have to justify all deductions.

2. If a taxpayer's deductions (except for medical expenses) are much below average, then he should recheck his claims to make sure he did not overlook some items he could legally deduct.

Those who will use these figures should remember two things. First, in the case of tax deductions, for sales taxes a taxpayer can use the deductions given in the official sales tax table in the instructions to Form 1040. For other taxes he can claim only the actual amount he paid; he cannot use the tax averages from the table below.

Second, most taxpayers should be reporting a lower medical-expense deduction than the average claimed on returns filed in 1982. This reflects the law change on 1983 medical expenses. In 1983, taxpayers can only deduct expenses that exceeded 5 percent of their adjusted gross income, up from the 3 percent in 1982.

For income tax information or to obtain tax forms, go to or call the Student Governing Association office in the Union Mondays or Thursdays from 2-4 p.m., or the stop at the Tax Information Table at noon every Wednesday on the Union concourse.

Group plans open memorial to honor war dead Rape

By KATHLEEN COLE
Collegian Reporter

The renovation of Nichols Hall may not be the only thing that looks different next spring if a plan to establish a war memorial on the building's south lawn gains administrative approval.

Members of the student chapter of the Association of the United States Army (AUSA), an organization primarily comprised of Army ROTC cadets, recently submitted a request to University administration to begin action on the memorial project.

The organization, in keeping with its goals of civic service involvement, has proposed that a memorial commemorating all members of the U.S. Armed Forces who have died in war be established outside Nichols Hall.

"The south lawn is an open area with lots of trees and protection from the street, so it fits in ideally with what we want to do," Jay Stoker, AUSA civic service chairman and senior in business administration, said. "Our intent is to maintain a kind of quiet, open atmosphere that appeals to those who want a place to go and sit, while also providing a marker that would serve as a reminder of those who gave their lives in service of their country."

According to the formal proposal submitted by AUSA, the Nichols Hall site "is symbolically appropriate as adjacent to the building that once died due to civil unrest resulting from war, and is being brought back much like the bringing back of memories of the fallen who have died due to war."

The memorial, as proposed, would become the only existing memorial on campus to represent, in an open environment, all those who have died in war.

So far, a design for the memorial has not been determined, Stoker said. AUSA is proposing that a landscape design contest be opened to the University, and perhaps more specifically to the College of Architecture and Design, so an appropriate design might be created.

"We thought the idea of opening the contest to the University would result in some creative ideas," Stoker said. He said the group would award some type of prize for the winning design, although it has not yet been determined what it would be.

"We would like to start the contest at the beginning of next fall semester," he said. "The entries could then be judged by the end of the semester so the memorial could be established and ready for dedication at the same time Nichols Hall is completed."

Criteria for the memorial design will be based on several different factors yet to be determined, Stoker said.

Building and landscape costs, University requirements, contributors' wishes and intentions of the AUSA are the primary considerations to be included in the development of the project, he said.

In addition to the design contest, the group also is working on a plan for a fund drive to raise money to pay for the memorial.

"Cost guidelines for the project will be determined by how much we think we can raise in our fund drive," Stoker said.

The first step in raising the money is to develop of possible sponsors, including organizations, businesses and individuals.

"We'll challenge each of them to a specified contribution amount. If we multiply that amount times the number of sponsors we have, we can figure our return, which can then be used as our cost proposal for the project," he said.

The AUSA will be able to contribute a nominal sum to the project, Stoker said.

"We've also talked to some non-profit organizations who said they would donate, and we are considering contacting all active duty and retired alumni. We have other regular contacts in the area, too," he said.

The AUSA civic service committee, which is comprised of a chairman for civic service, landscape and a fund drive, have been assigned to work with administrators in following procedures for establishing the memorial, Stoker said.

The group began working on the project last fall, but did not complete the formal proposal for the memorial until this semester.

"Right now we are free to continue with our plans for the project as long as we can come up with the funds and the University approves the design proposal," Stoker said.

"We believe this not to be an expression of outrage, but as a community concern," she said.

When contacted at his home for comment, Mershon said, "Some lawyers and some individuals have advised me I shouldn't be put in this forum because I shouldn't be put in a position to explain a decision. Certainly courts cannot and should not be required to have to respond or participate in a forum on every decision. But I have a deep personal conviction courts are here to serve the people, not the other way around.

"Courts should be available to discuss informative issues in an appropriate, objective and thoughtful forum on matters that can help concerned individuals better understand the problems and difficulties judges face in the judicial process," Mershon said.

Tuition hikes may push students deeper in debt

By The College Press Service

Administrators said they're confident students will be able to absorb another year of huge tuition increases by resorting to more loans and using more financial aid, despite a recent study showing that financial aid is declining.

Lehigh University at Bethlehem, Pa., for example, is trying to offset a 9 percent tuition hike for next year by making more loans available to students, said Agnes Gifford of the school's treasurer's office.

At Chicago State University, Budget and Planning Director Wayne Rath said students will not be priced out of school "because major scholarship amounts also increase in a percent equal to increases in tuition. That's been consistent over the years."

It also may be changing. "Nobody really expects that federal programs will grow by very much the next few years," said Dennis Martin of the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators in Washington.

A January 1984 College Board study, moreover, concluded federal aid to students has declined by 21 percent since 1981, making campus costs markedly more difficult to finance.

The study blamed the phasing out of Social Security benefits for students and tougher restrictions on Guaranteed Student Loans (GSLs) for letting tuition increases outpace increases in student income and aid each year since 1980.

As a result, students have been going deeper into debt to pay their way, Martin said.

While some schools like Lehigh have institutional loan funds to help students finance their educations, Martin said community colleges and some of the smaller public colleges and independent colleges have trouble making up the increased costs to students.

Even if they can, Martin said, students can't keep going into debt indefinitely.

"It's conceivable," he said, "that schools that can't balance the need for their own fiscal health with students' ability to pay will find themselves with an unacceptably high default rate in the future."

New federal laws keep some students from borrowing more money even if they want to.

Northern Arizona University student Albert Arvallo works during summers but must keep his jobs during the school year to a minimum.

"If you work, they will cut down on your (student) loan," he said.

"My parents' income went up, and now I won't qualify for a loan," said Becky Johnson, a student at Bismarck Junior College, North Dakota.

"My parents' income, although not big, was at a level I couldn't qualify for aid," Jeni Jagow, DePaul University student, said.

"They've taken us to the limit," University of Delaware student Scott Webber said.

Some students said they've been taken over "the limit."

"My sister won't go to school now," said Vivian Burge, a Los Angeles City College student.

"She was on her way to college, but now she's looking for a training program" because LACC has become too expensive for her, Burge said.

"Tuition," said Michael Alexander, a Chaffey College student in Alta Loma, Calif., "puts an additional burden on poor people. We will see a change in our student population because there will be fewer blacks, hispanics and fewer minorities overall."

Enrollment figures suggest higher tuitions have not driven many people out of college in the past.

Despite 45-73 percent hikes during the last three years in 14 southern states, "southern enrollments have been increasing steadily," said Joseph Marks of the Southern Regional Education Board.

Last year's nationwide 10 percent hike at public colleges didn't prevent a 1 percent enrollment increase.

The immediate impact of high tuition increases seems to be on quality of student life rather than on enrollment.

Northern Arizona's proposed $50-a-term hike "makes a difference on laundry costs," Arvallo said. "It's something people don't even think about. I don't go out as much as I'd like to. I can't afford it. I don't go for pizzas."

"My parents pay my tuition, and this kind of puts a strain on them," said Charmin Jackson, a Chicago State University student. "They had to do without things like fixing up the house."

Yet resentment levels seem to have risen above even discomfort levels.

"You get to the point where you feel it's not worth it," said University of Miami student Nancy Larsen.

"There is a new bookstore," Webber said, "but I was perfectly happy with the old one."

IS THE IDEA OF WEARING A UNIFORM KEEPING YOU OUT OF ARMY ROTC?

Whether you realize it or not, you're probably wearing a type of "uniform" right now. There's nothing wrong with it. But an Army ROTC uniform could make you stand out from the crowd.

And ROTC will help you become more outstanding. Because you'll develop into a leader of people and a manager of money and equipment.

So how about switching "uniforms" for a few hours each week?

Midterm proposal ineffective

K-State's midterm grade policy isn't funny, but a recent Faculty Senate proposal to improve the policy reads like a bad joke.

Currently, only freshmen and transfer students receive midterm grades. These grades were intended to help students deal with the adjustment to a new school. But faculty members who give blanket C's or no grades at all have turned midterm grades into little more than a waste of time and money.

It is to Faculty Senate's credit that it has recognized the problem and is attempting to find a more effective system for releasing midterm grades. The proposal being considered would send grades to all students except graduate students. Students would receive an unsatisfactory or satisfactory rating instead of a letter grade.

This proposal would not address the problems encountered with the current system. It would be just as easy to give every student a satisfactory rating as to give them a C. Also, if faculty members now refuse to turn in midterm grades for a few freshmen and transfer students, why does Faculty Senate think they would turn in grades for even more students?

Another problem with the proposal is how to define satisfactory and unsatisfactory class performance. University-wide criteria could be established, but this makes no distinction as to the type of class being graded. A student getting a C in Engineering Physics is probably doing satisfactory work. A student getting a C in Music Listening Laboratory probably is not.

If instructors decide the criteria for satisfactory work for individual classes, a student will have to consult that instructor to find out what the rating means. There is no reason to go through the costly procedure of processing midterm grades when those grades will tell students nothing.

K-State does not need a new midterm grade policy. The current policy would serve well with one slight revision. There must be an enforcement clause in the policy.

Instructors do not fail to turn in final grades, because an instructor failing to do so probably would not have a job in the future. If not turning in midterm grades had the same result, all instructors would give midterm grades.

The enforcement policy should state that giving a blanket grade to the class is the equivalent of turning in no grade for that class. This would eliminate the need for a separate policy dealing with faculty members who give blanket grades.

Faculty Senate may be unwilling to put such an enforcement clause in a policy dealing with other faculty members. But even if it refuses to do so, it should not endorse a policy like the one being considered.

The budget for education is already low. If the University switches to an useless and expensive policy like the one being considered, then more money will be taken from education. And the real joke will be on the students.

Lauri Diehl, for the editorial board

Library should be funded first

Farrell Library is taking a step in the right direction toward improving its services and resources.

Plans have been drafted to change Farrell 315 from a study area to a special collections reading room with security and humidity controls to house rare books. Although actual remodeling of the room will not begin for two to three years, foresight on the part of library administration should be commended.

Cost of the project is estimated at $250,000, but funding has yet to be secured for the room. But as suggested by Antonia Pigno, coordinator of specialized collections and University archives, a Friends of the Library program may be established to raise the necessary funds to renovate Farrell 315.

This is a praiseworthy idea; the only question is why such a program hasn't been established by now, not only for special projects, but as a general alumni-funded beneficiary for the library.

If alumni can be rallied to contribute money for a new coliseum, how impractical is it to expect financial contributions to support the library?

A lot. Faculty who contribute to the University for academic improvements number relatively less than those who willingly donate to support sports programs (including buying tickets to football and basketball games).

But alumni should be aware of the vital role a library plays in academic studies. The KSU Foundation and the Alumni Association should make funding for the library a major monetary priority.

A character analysis of Reagan

WASHINGTON — Senior White House aides, the munchkins of our time, have fanned out across Washington, assuring the secular humanists in the press that what motivates the administration's drive for school prayer is really not just (or not only) religious zeal but also (or mostly) a desire to solidify the president's support among religious fundamentalists. The administration wants God back in the classroom. It will settle, though, for some votes.

This epic moment of cynicism, comparable to the attempt by Republicans in the 1950s to use Sen. Joseph McCarthy to soften up the Democrats, is following a historical pattern. McCarthy could not be contained and neither can the forces of intolerance. Already there is evidence aplenty that we are entering a particularly nasty period. Ronald Reagan may have lost control of the situation.

It could be that what senior White House aides are saying in the newspapers may not, in fact, reflect the president's views. The president seemed sincerely busy trying to push the prayer bill through Congress. He has assured some recalcitrant senators that based on his own experience, the minority has nothing to fear from the majority. We may all breathe a sigh of relief.

Nevertheless, it is clear a whole lot of people have simply had it with the president — and his attempt to make religion a political issue is the last straw. House Speaker Thomas P. (Tip) O'Neill, for one, can hardly contain his contempt for the man. It was O'Neill who said what until recently few in Washington would have dared: the president himself does not go to church.

The speaker was, in short, calling the president a hypocrite. But that was nothing compared to what House Majority Leader Jim Wright said the other day. He called the president a liar. Speaking before the House, he repeated the word nine times, and while the subject was not school prayer but the budget deficit, it has nevertheless become clear that the wraps are off, tempers are short and the president is going to get what some think he has coming.

Congress is one thing; the press is something else. Despite what some believe, the media have not been particularly protective of Reagan. They have, in fact, detailed his lapses in memory, his concocted history, his exaggerations, his embellishments, his laconic style of management and his appalling ignorance on subjects which, like Lebanon, really are matters of life and death.

Now articles are being written about his hypocrisy — alleged or otherwise — and it is noted that this man who extolls the family is hardly even seen with his. A Redbook magazine article in which his son, Michael, says his father has seen one grandchild once and the other never, has been cited with relish, as has the First Family not choosing to attend or not being welcome at the wedding of son, Ron.

Articles have appeared about strains in the first family, such as Nancy's alleged coolness to her husband's children by Jane Wyman. People are beginning to notice, too, that the president never goes to the funerals of his close friends — Justin Dart and Alfred Blommingdale, to name two — and that some of his and Nancy's friends either have the sort of sex lives that are decried daily by the video ministers Reagan courts, or are — gasp! — homosexuals.

All this is incredibly, even excessively, personal and has little if anything to do with the way the president does his job. These statements and articles are, in some sense, tit for the president's tat — a feeling that Reagan, in his endless sermonizing, has become excessively personal. The issue being raised is the one that until now simply could not stick to the president — character. For the first time, the president is being questioned on that score.

Where all this will end, I know not. But there is little reason to believe tempers will cool in an election year. A man who tells others how to live their lives is bound to have his own life examined. Through moral posturing, the president has turned the White House into a glass house. He shouldn't throw stones.

Approval of prayer in schools

I am aware the U.S. Senate has already voted on and defeated the proposed constitutional amendment to allow organized prayer in the schools. However, as long as there are important issues to be decided, the idea of school prayer will return. Perhaps the following idea can be considered for the next round.

I feel the movement was unsuccessful, in part, because one of the most convincing aspects of the prayer idea was never suggested. Namely, that it would be a valuable educational tool. I'm not talking about voluntary prayer, because students have always been free to come to school 10 minutes early and pray if they so desired. No, I refer to teacher-led, organized prayer. It just might be the mechanism to achieve true freedom of religion.

I estimate there are approximately 180 days in the school year. So the top 180 religions and denominations could each draft a careful prayer that best reflected the group's beliefs. Then, every day a different prayer could be recited and the children could learn about a different religion by seeing how and for what the different groups pray.

Today they could pray a Buddhist prayer, tomorrow a Unitarian prayer, the day after a Jewish, Baptist, Moonie, etc. So one day each year, your child would get to hear your own particular point of view.

I think children at least would see that religions have a lot in common, that most probably pray for similar things. Such prayers should provide for greater understanding between people holding different sets of beliefs. Perhaps after this, people in Oklahoma wouldn't burn down houses over such issues as school prayer.

There would of course be problems. To be fair, as the Constitution demands, all religions would have to be treated as equals. Otherwise a lot of irresponsible people would tie up the court system, constantly filing suits complaining that the Baha'i, the Methodists or other organizations were not "true" religions.

Another obstacle would be the unique practices of some religions, such as praying in the nude as does one group in Oregon. However, I predict the general public will be so grateful to have prayer back in the schools they will not mind their children praying together in the nude, one day a year — all over the country.

The educational advantages would extend beyond the schools to the parents. For example, when Johnny would come home his father could ask him, "What religion did you pray today?" A typical response might be: "Today we had a Quaker prayer. It was OK, Daddy, but all we did was pray for peace."

I realize some people thought prayer in the schools would automatically mean "Christian prayer." While that is understandable, I don't believe it could be justified under the Constitution. All religions would have to be represented.

School prayer would be a means to educate children about the less recognized religions in this country. First would be the popular religion that worships the God Money, and his favorite prophet — Profit.

The National Enquirer could compose the official prayer for all the people that worship Linda Evans and the rest of the "beautiful people." Similarly, Hugh Hefner could pen the prayer for worshippers of the naked female breast.

The National Rifle Association could draft a prayer for those who hold the possession of guns to be the noblest of achievements. It could be called "Prayer to the God of Guns," or "Prayer to the God of Self Defense."

Perhaps the professional sports associations could meet to decide on the official prayer to Sports. It might be somewhat like this, "If you make us No. 1 we'll be real good. Amen. Play ball."

So you see, prayer in the schools could be the best road to true freedom of religion. Kansas children, formerly underprivileged, would now leave school having studied many different religions. A young person would not simply be restricted to the religion of his parents. He or she would conceivably select their religion, but they would have the entire spectrum of world religions from which to choose.

Amendment would have 'divisive effect' ...

Editor,

Re: Anne Guislain's column, "Prayer amendment protects rights," in the March 22 Collegian.

In your column, Ann, you do nothing but promote ignorance and misinformation about public school prayer. Your rationale for prayer in school is that students are being denied constitutional rights. Nothing is farther from the truth. Students can pray silently to themselves any time they want to.

Understandably, the kind of prayer that is prohibited is prayer out loud that disrupts the everyday operation of the school. Moreover, the duty of our public schools is to teach objectively and maintain the wall of separation between church and state — an intention of our Constitution that you apply an abjectly narrow interpretation of in your article.

Our government is doing nothing to preclude the free exercise of religion. We live in one of the most free and religiously pluralistic societies in the world. A prayer amendment, if passed, could have a devastating and divisive effect on our public schools. It is an injustice to those children and their families who belong to minority religions or to no religious group. I can imagine a few children of a minority religious group in a school dominated by a single religious faction becoming stigmatized and ostracized because of some instituted prayer time.

What does school prayer accomplish? I have heard Ronald Reagan, Jesse Helms and Jerry Falwell promulgate their beliefs that prayer in school will rectify the moral decadence and restore discipline in young students. It is these kind of vacuous statements that support the prayer amendment.

My fears of a prayer amendment are not delusions of a "knee-knocking liberal." They are real and valid. The ramifications of any prayer amendment might eventually regress us back to the days when students were punished for not participating in prayer because it was contrary to their beliefs.

... may preserve freedom

Editor,

Re: Brian LaRue's column, "True perception of prayer issue," in the March 21 Collegian.

Upon inspection of any number of school administrations' policies on prayer, it is evident that LaRue's "true perception of the prayer issue" is false.

LaRue's main argument centered on the misconception that students currently have the right to pray. In fact, students in many schools are forbidden to pray. As a junior high school student, I was threatened with suspension by the administration if caught praying with others in the school. Recently, a group of students at Piper High School in Kansas City, Kan., were told they could no longer meet together and pray before school. These are just two examples of a number of schools which are denying students desiring to pray the right to do so.

Thus, preservation of religious freedom is truly the central issue here. I am grateful at least a majority of our U.S. senators see the need for this legislation and have seen through the irrelevant arguments of the opposition.

I hope the fight for religious freedom will continue, and the anti-religious bias in our public schools will be replaced by constitutional neutrality.

Walkways designed for nighttime safety

Editor,

You have just finished one of those ugly Monday night biology tests. You step outside. It's dark. Which way will you turn to go home? A concern of mine and a problem you should be concerned with is the safety of the K-State campus at night.

There are several unsafe areas on campus. Many buildings and bushes cause dark areas on campus. One such dark area is along the south side of Cardwell Hall toward Goodnow and Marlatt halls. Another poor area is around the back of the natatorium.

Maybe you are asking yourself to make our campus safe, do we need to put up more lights and go to much expense? Sure, lighting would be great, but I have another solution. What I want to stress is that we can make our campus safer with no expense — just a little time.

To solve this problem of unsafe areas, you should look at a campus map which emphasizes the safe parking and walkways on campus. The maps are located at every residence hall, greek house, at the Women's Resource Center in Holton Hall and are posted on the walls in the restrooms in the Union.

The dark lines on the map illustrate the best walkways on campus to take at night. If you take the time to use these safe routes and walk with a friend, you can be that much safer. Also, too many guys feel they can take any route on campus. If guys could use the safe walkways, they would be doing double duty. They could be safer and make others safer. The more traffic there is on a walkway, the safer you are.

Not only using the walkways will make you safer, but also knowing where and how to use the emergency telephones on campus will help. If you look on the safety map, you will see pictured nine emergency telephones on campus for students to use. In case of an emergency, you can pick up the phone and all you have to do is state the problem. There is no need to tell the K-State Police where you are because each phone is coded into the department.

Using the safe walkways, walking with a friend and knowing where and how to use the emergency telephones are all steps to make you safer on campus at night. Is your safety worth those few minutes? I know I will take the time.

Smoke forces airplane evacuation

LOS ANGELES — An overheated air conditioning unit sent smoke into the cabin of a United Airlines 727 jet Monday as it waited for takeoff from Los Angeles International Airport, and 111 passengers and crew evacuated the airliner.

No injuries were reported, but an Olathe high school student suffered an asthma attack as she left the smoke-filled cabin, one of her teachers said. The plane, Flight 712, was bound for Kansas City.

The passengers and crew left the plane shortly after 7 a.m. from a rear stairway wheeled up to it and did not have to use emergency chutes, said airport spokeswoman Barbara Abels. There were no flames, she said.

"By the time I got to the back of the plane, I was having real trouble breathing ... It was so thick you couldn't see anything," said passenger Cathy Webb of Kansas City.

"The cabin filled with smoke. It was getting pretty heavy," said Mary Center, a teacher from Olathe North High School, who was with 30 students.

Center said the students had already spent the night at Los Angeles International after their flight to Denver was delayed Sunday because of bad weather in Colorado. That forced them to miss a connecting flight at Denver which would have taken them to Kansas City.

Pope desires return to homeland

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II said Monday he has a "fervent" desire to visit Poland's Baltic region, a Solidarity stronghold he was forced to skip during his pilgrimage home last year.

In impromptu remarks during an audience for 900 Polish pilgrims at the Vatican, the pontiff gave a special greeting to groups from Gdansk and Szczecin. He said in Polish that he had wanted to visit the Baltic area during his trip to Poland in June 1983, and the "desire is ever more fervent."

Solidarity, the first independent labor movement in the Soviet bloc, was formed after a series of strikes in the Lenin Shipyards in Gdansk during the summer of 1980.

The Polish church, sensitive to government fears of unrest during the papal tour, did not request a stop in Gdansk, which is the home of labor leader Lech Walesa. The Solidarity leader instead met the pope in a remote mountain resort south of Krakow.

Journalist to retrace 'long march'

PEKING — The 7,600-mile route taken by Mao Tse-tung and the Chinese communists in their historic "long march" half a century ago will be retraced by Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist Harrison Salisbury.

Salisbury is in Peking to research a new book. He says he will spend "several months" retracing the route.

Communist forces led by Mao made the journey in 1934-1935 to escape encirclement by Nationalist troops. The march led Mao and surviving Communist remnants to a safe haven in China's northwest.

The long march followed a meandering, indirect route. Communist forces fought both the Nationalists and, in remote areas, tribal groups.

Salisbury's trip is being arranged by the Chinese Foreign Ministry and follows the original route, with some exceptions.

Salisbury, formerly of The New York Times, won the Pulitzer Prize for his coverage of the Soviet Union and went behind North Vietnamese lines during the Vietnam War to report on civilian casualties.

Resort owners vow to keep lights on

Las Vegas service union plans strike

By The Associated Press

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — Eight years ago when the 26,000-member Culinary Union went on strike, owners of 11 of the largest hotels on the glittering Strip turned out the lights and closed their doors for 15 days. The shutdown cost the city $131 million.

Now, facing a Monday strike deadline, the resort owners say they won't replay the 1976 scenario. They have promised to fight the union, Nevada's largest, by remaining open, hiring new workers if needed and spending extra on advertising in the city's top tourism markets.

Union leaders have said that anyone who wants to work will have to fight their way into and out of the hotels.

"If labor and management do take a hard line, you're going to have confrontation," said Steve Waugh, head of the uniform field services division of the 1,585-member Metro Police department.

Metro Police, preparing for a "worst case" situation, are being briefed in riot-control training.

Behind the pre-strike rhetoric lies an industry emerging from the effects of the recession. Clark County casinos rebounded last year with the highest win level since 1980, raking in $1.9 billion. But the 7.7 percent increase is far below the double-digit returns hotel-casinos had become accustomed to in the late 1970s.

At the height of the recession in 1982, several thousand casino workers were unemployed. Unemployment in the area has since dipped from a high of about 11 percent to below 8 percent.

April is one of the city's best tourism months; last April, for example, accounted for 1.3 million of 1983's record 12.4 million visitors. Some 85,000 conventioners are already booked for this April.

"We are prepared for the eventuality there will be a strike, and the hotels will remain open," says Vincent Helm, executive director of the Nevada Resort Association. The 21-member NRA includes most major Las Vegas resorts.

If the Culinary Union strikes, it would empty the hotels of kitchen employees, food servers, cocktail servers, cashiers, porters, change people, bellhops — most of the employees who make a hotel tick.

Their four-year contract expires April 1 and workers voted overwhelmingly last week to authorize a walkout April 2 if a new pact is not reached.

Also facing April 1 contract deadlines are unions representing a total of 4,000 to 5,000 stagehands, musicians and bartenders. They have indicated they will follow the Culinary members' direction.

NRA officials have said they will hire workers to replace the strikers, and have posted letters at the University of Nevada-Las Vegas offering jobs to students. But Culinary President Joe Hays has warned those workers "would have to fight their way into the hotels and we'll make 'em fight their way out."

"People who want to go to work have that right," Waugh said.

Waugh's department began seminars Friday for supervisors coordinating the 950 uniformed officers who would be called on to maintain order.

"We're going over equipment needs, logistics, manpower, etc.," Waugh said last week. "We've been gearing up for this thing for a year. I see a month of strike action before they get down to serious negotiations. I hope I'm wrong."

"We want to stay neutral, but we will take appropriate action when needed," Waugh said.

Complicating negotiations is the fact the union's secretary-treasurer Jeff McCall faces a bitter re-election battle in May. His two opponents have accused McCall of making concessions to the NRA, thus forcing McCall into a more militant stance.

Both sides have been reluctant to discuss the economic issues publicly, although McCall said last week that the union was seeking a wage increase of 5 to 6 percent and the owners had offered only 1 percent.

Most of the bargaining so far, which has taken place on a sporadic basis over two months, has focused on NRA demands for changes in work rules that the owners claim are too costly.

Helm said the hotels simply want to streamline a union contract that is now "half an inch thick and places restrictions on management's operation of its business."

Helm said current culinary wages range from $6 to $10 an hour in the non-tip categories, $4.60 to $6.70 an hour for workers who also receive tips. He estimated that employees in the tip categories earn at least $50 additional per eight-hour shift.

Echoes of possible labor strife are being heard in other cities, where union members have been distributing leaflets warning tourists not to come to Las Vegas and walk into a strike.

The city's Convention Authority has responded by working up a $158,000 advertising campaign that includes a chef saying "Las Vegas, we're open and cooking."

Judge sentences 4 for barroom rape

By The Associated Press

FALL RIVER, Mass. — Four men convicted of gang-raping a woman on a barroom pool table were sentenced Monday to 6-12 years in prison by a judge who said they "brutalized a defenseless young woman and sought to degrade and destroy her human, individual dignity."

The victim's lawyer said afterward that the 22-year-old mother of two feared for her safety and had moved permanently from the area.

"There were five sentences in this case — one of them exile," said her lawyer, Scott Charnas.

Superior Court Judge William Young imposed terms of 9 to 12 years on Daniel Silva, 27, Victor Raposo, 23, and John Cordeiro, 24. Young sentenced Joseph Vieira, 28, to 6 to 8 years; Bristol County District Attorney Ronald Pina sought a lesser sentence for Vieira, saying he had no prior record and that the woman's testimony that he was directly involved in the rape was not corroborated.

The maximum penalty for aggravated rape is life imprisonment.

Several hundred stood quietly outside the century-old courthouse. The silence erupted into shouts of "Let them go!" The defendants, all Portuguese immigrants, are backed by many in their community who feel they were treated unfairly because of their national origin.

All the sentences will be served at the maximum-security Walpole State Prison. Under state law Vieira must serve at least four years; the others face at least six years before being eligible for parole.

"These individuals stand convicted of most serious crimes: crimes of extreme violence that brutalized a defenseless young woman and sought to degrade and destroy her human, individual dignity," the judge said in a memorandum accompanying the sentences. "Such crimes warrant a significant sanction."

Young did not read the sentencing document aloud, but did tell the court, "These sentences are not passed on these individuals because of who they are, but because of what crime they stand convicted of."

Leaders of the Portuguese community led marches in New Bedford and Fall River last week to protest the verdicts, saying the decision and publicity was partly due to the defendants' Portuguese background.

Pina asked for the sentences "so it can be clear in the society... that this type of crime requires a certain type of punishment which is certain, which is clear, which is fair."

Defense attorneys urged lenient sentences ranging from 18 months to two years in a medium-security prison.

The defense argued that their clients faced possible deportation, a possibility that adds to the punishment. Young said that decision would be made by federal authorities and did not affect his sentencing. The judge can recommend against deportation, but Young gave no indication he would.

City Commission to discuss controversial moving permit

Movement of structures will be the topic of discussion at 4 p.m. today at a Manhattan City Commission work session at City Hall.

Commissioners will discuss the moving of buildings into the Potawatomi Avenue area and the disposition of the city's interest in a moving permit requested to place a structure on a lot at 260 Fair Lane.

The controversial moving permit ordinance proposal requires a fee of $400, showing photographs of structures to be moved onto a lot to neighbors within 200 feet and the signatures of two-thirds of those neighbors. Photographs and fees currently aren't required, but signatures of landowners within 100 feet of where a house is to be placed are required. Developers said at earlier commission meetings that the new guidelines would be unreasonable.

Softball team sweeps three from Cougars

What does a softball team do when there is a triple-header scheduled and rain has turned its playing field into mud?

In most cases both teams would get the day off, but not in case of the games scheduled between K-State and Barton County Community College women's teams Saturday. They just moved to a football stadium.

The games — all of which were five-inning contests — were played on the artificial turf at KSU Stadium instead of the 'Cat's natural turf field at Cico Park.

Barton County probably wishes it had got the day off as the Wildcats swept all three games — 14-4, 4-2, 7-6 — from the Cougars.

The Cougars jumped out in front with two runs in the first inning, but K-State came back with a run of its own in the bottom of the inning when Sherri Chace doubled and later scored.

The Wildcats grabbed a commanding lead as they tallied six runs in each of the second and third innings. Leslie Taylor lashed a double, and Pam Rufener and Annette Kirkham added singles in the second inning outburst.

Chacey, Joyce Hawley and Rufener hit consecutive singles in the third inning and later scored as the Wildcats moved ahead 13-4.

Kathy Gillpatrick was the winning pitcher for K-State, improving her record to 2-3.

Lisa Tarvestad picked up a victory in the second game, despite K-State going hitless.

Tarvestad drew a walk to start the bottom of the third. Taylor also walked and Chacey reached on an error. All three scored when Hawley hit a grounder that both the Cougar shortstop and left fielder misplayed into a two-base error. Hawley later crossed the plate for the 'Cats final run of the inning, scoring on a fielder's choice.

Tarvestad limited Barton County to four hits to pick up her second victory of the season.

Trailing 5-1 heading into the bottom of the fourth inning in the third game, the Wildcats scored six runs to move ahead.

Singles by Marcie Borchard, Mary Sivyer, Rufener and Kirkham, coupled with four Cougar errors, sparked the outburst.

Alise Willson picked up her first win of the season as the 'Cats improved their record to 5-3.

The Wildcats and Cougars are scheduled to play at 2:30 p.m. today at Great Bend.

Tennis teams fall in dual competition

K-State's tennis teams had a difficult time as they fought both rain and opponents in meets last weekend.

The women's team traveled to Wichita, playing in the Sheldon Coleman Mid-America Invitational. The squad's scheduled match against Southern Illinois University was rained out. The team dropped two dual matches — falling to Oklahoma City University, 5-4, and Wichita State University, 9-0.

Meanwhile, the men also lost two duals and had one rained out at the Oral Roberts Quadrangular at Tulsa. The team saw their season record fall to 0-7 with losses to Arkansas Tech, 8-1, and Oklahoma Baptist University, 7-2. K-State's third match, against host Oral Roberts University, was canceled.

The women won four of six singles matches against Oklahoma City but had trouble in the doubles competition, losing all three matches.

No. 1 singles player Tamie Peugh netted the toughest victory, beating Jennifer Parnell, 6-4, 3-6, 6-3. Kim Black, Lisa Creighton and Erica Anderson all claimed straight-set wins.

In doubles, the teams of Tamie Peugh and Black, Susan Peugh and Judy Miller, and Creighton and Anderson all suffered straight-set losses. Peugh and Black played the OCU team of Parnell and Patti Martin closely before falling, 7-6, 7-5.

Against Wichita State, the Wildcats managed to win only one set. The lone bright spot was the play of doubles team Black and Miller, who took the WSU team of Beth Dale and Sally Webster to three sets before losing, 4-6, 6-3, 6-4.

"It looked like Black and Miller played really well together," said K-State Tennis Coach Steve Webb. "We'll probably use them together the rest of the season."

The rest of the women's team fell to Shocker opponents in straight sets.

Against Arkansas Tech, K-State's top doubles team of Chris James and Richard Blevin claimed the Wildcats' only victory.

James again claimed a win in the Oklahoma Baptist dual, topping Norm Weber, 6-4, 7-5. Scott Sandlin picked up K-State's other win, a 6-3, 6-3 victory over Steve Saxon.

The men's team will compete in their first home dual meet of the season when they face Bethany College at 2 p.m. Friday at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Complex.

The women's team will be on the road again, traveling to Springfield for the Southwest Missouri State Triangular on Friday and Saturday.

White's home run pushes Royals past Atlanta, 5-4

By The Associated Press

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — Frank White hit a three-run homer in the fifth inning to give the Kansas City Royals a 5-4 victory over the Atlanta Braves in exhibition baseball Monday.

White's homer, his second of the spring, followed a one-out single by Jorie Orta and a walk to Steve Balboni. The Kansas City second baseman connected off Braves starter and loser Rick Mahler, who is fighting for a job in the Braves starting rotation.

Atlanta opened a 2-0 lead in the first inning when Bob Horner doubled in a run and then scored on a single by Chris Chambliss.

The Royals got a run in the third on Pat Sheridan's double and two groundouts, the last by Balboni getting the run home. The Royals made it 5-3 in the ninth when Balboni picked up his second RBI with a single.

Atlanta closed to within one in its ninth when Matt Sinatro doubled and scored on a single by Paul Runge.

Larry Gura got the victory for the Royals.

Cavaliers take advantage of 'chance'

By The Associated Press

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — When University of Virginia Coach Terry Holland learned the Cavaliers had won an National Collegiate Athletic Association tournament bid despite a 17-11 record, he said, "Thank the Lord. We've got a chance."

Bonner all-district selection

Lady 'Cats center Angie Bonner picked up a post-season honor Monday when she was named to the Kodak All-District Women's Basketball Team for District V. The district includes universities in Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, Oklahoma and South Dakota.

Bonner helped lead the women's team to the Big Eight Conference championship and a berth in the women's division of the National Collegiate Athletic Association tournament. The 6-foot-1 junior averaged 15.1 points per game and shot 61 percent from the field — the conference's best average. Bonner's top-scoring performance was 32 points against the University of Kan-

He can thank his mix of a freshman center, a former walk-on, a 24-year-old transfer, one guard who spent the first three games on suspension and another listed at 5-foot-10 who looks more like 5-foot-6 that the Final Four-bound Cavs now have a chance at the title.

Virginia, after four years of surprising everyone by not winning a championship with 7-foot-4 center Ralph Sampson, now surprises everyone by booking tickets to Seattle the year after Sampson turned pro.

Virginia, 21-11, is the losingest team to advance to the Final Four since Bradley University dragged 12 losses to the semifinals in 1954. They added four to the win column during the tournament by beating Iowa, the University of Arkansas, Syracuse University and Indiana University.

"People didn't really respect us," senior guard Othell Wilson said after Saturday's win. "This right here should earn us as much respect as we want."

The Cavs will be underdogs again Saturday against the University of Houston; they lost to the Cougars 74-65 Feb. 18 in one of their two non-conference defeats. But then Houston lost to North Carolina State University in 1983 in the final game when the Wolfpack scored with two seconds left.

Virginia's chance against Houston could rest on fouls. The Cougars' graceful center Akeem Olajuwon, who scored 29 points in Sunday's victory over Wake Forest, has a propensity to fouling.

And Houston's dunking Phi Slam-ma Jammias tend to turn into the Beta Boo Boos on the free throw line. They missed five one-and-one chances in the last 3:39 of the Wake Forest Game and were 10-for-21 overall.

Olden Polynice, the freshmen center from Haiti via New York, plays hard and seemingly unbothered by his predecessor's legend.

Kenton Edelin, who first made the team as a walk-on, admits his shooting range is "out to about 3 inches," but when he's close, he makes them. He's 11 for 12 from the field in NCAA play.

Wilson spent the first three games suspended for disrupting practice and had a league-high four technicals, but he's been well behaved and has played well in tournament games.

Ricky Stokes, who has to be shorter than his listed 5-foot-10, has played more games than anyone in school history. Rick Carlise, who transferred from Maine three years ago, threw in the clutch game-winner against the Arkansas. And Jimmy Miller came out of a February illness and prolonged shooting slump with eight for 11 in Saturday's game.

Martin receives job from 'friend'

By The Associated Press

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — Before Jerry Martin began his 81-day prison term, he received a telephone call from Davey Johnson.

The rookie manager of the New York Mets, a teammate of Martin's with the Phillies in 1977 and 1978, wanted to offer the 34-year-old outfielder a job.

"He's a friend," Johnson said. "Nothing more needs to be said."

Martin, one of three Kansas City Royal players to plead guilty to charges of trying to possess cocaine, started what originally was a three-month sentence at Fort Worth Federal Prison on Dec. 5. But, because of good behavior, he was released on Feb. 23, nine days ahead of schedule.

Less than a week later, he appeared at the Mets' spring training camp at St. Petersburg, Fla.

"I remember Jerry as a guy who always worked hard and did his best," Johnson said.

On the orders of outgoing Commissioner Bowie Kuhn, who imposed a one-year suspension on the three Royals, Martin would have to pay his own way and could only participate in the team's workouts. He would be ineligible for intra-squad or exhibition games.

"I'm not out of the woods yet," Martin said, "but I can see the light at the end of the forest."

Two weeks into his tryout, the 10-year veteran signed a one-year contract worth $250,000 (he earned $350,000 last year with Kansas City), but the pay won't start until the ban is lifted. A review of the case is set for May 15.

"I won't feel like part of the team until I'm playing," he said.

'Boom or bust' state funding looms in future for colleges

By The College Press Service

University of Iowa biology students peer through microscopes so old there aren't spare parts available to repair them when they break.

Students in history classes are taught on maps made in the early 1920s, and chemistry students can't perform even basic experiments because of the lack of equipment.

More than 1,000 Iowa students, tired of such ill effects of state funding cutbacks — actually are looking forward to a $70 tuition decrease, thanks to a huge new state revenue surplus.

At the same time, California students — after five years of relentless tuition increases and funding cutbacks — actually are looking forward to a $70 tuition decrease, thanks to a huge new state revenue surplus.

For California's colleges, the funding increase also will bring long-awaited faculty salary increases, improved student services and more instructional equipment.

The boom and bust in California and Iowa, it seems, are the newly-typical prospects for state funding of colleges and universities during the coming year.

State funding of higher education is perhaps even more important to campus budgets than federal funding. But state governors, who in recent weeks have unveiled their college budget requests for the coming year, have been offering extremes: either very good or very bad times ahead.

The long-awaited economic recovery has brightened college prospects in many states, but prospects in other still-struggling states have never been dimmer.

That even some states are doing better, however, causes some experts to breathe a little more easily.

"Things look a little more optimistic now," said M.M. Chambers, of the Illinois State University Department of Educational Administration. Chambers tracks college funding in all 50 states.

"At least we're not seeing the cutbacks we were several years ago," he said.

Indeed, over the last three years almost every state reduced higher education funding or at the very least froze school budgets to help stretch dwindling state revenues through the recession.

Many schools suffered mid-year cutbacks, forcing them to raise tuition, eliminate student services, freeze faculty salaries and delay much-needed building improvements.

But now, even as some schools continue to struggle with cutbacks, at least some are beginning to emerge from the recession, officials said.

And, they added, even if the recovery is somewhat spotty, it is probably a harbinger of a better future for all.

"In general the states are getting more in the way of revenues, and they're looking at more modest funding and better times for higher education," said Gordon Van deWater, senior partner of Augenblick-Van deWater, a consulting agency which monitors higher education funding.

At the same time, he said, many colleges are still struggling with decreasing state revenues and uncertain state funding levels.

Ohio State University — where administrators last year had to halt the raising of a campus building because they didn't have the money to pay demolition crews — just received a $25 million funding increase.

In Tennessee, Gov. Lamar Alexander has asked for an additional $1 billion in state education funding over the next three years, much of it to go for pay raises and improved university facilities.

Arkansas, Connecticut, Maryland and Massachusetts are among schools which plan sizable increases in higher education funding for the coming year.

California's budget proposal for next year "is the finest budget we've had in two decades," said William Baker, vice president of budget and university relations with the University of California system.

The new budget proposal means a 20 percent funding increase for the nine-campus system.

"Our (tuition) fees have doubled in the last five years," Baker said. "This year our budget calls to reduce fees by $70 per student, increase faculty salaries by 13 percent, and our budget for institutional equipment will double. It's wonderful."

Things aren't so wonderful in other states.

University of Oklahoma President William Banowsky warned state officials in December that as many as 50 classes could be cut because of funding decreases there. The campus library has already slashed periodical and book orders by nearly 30 percent just to keep operating.

Auburn University is asking state legislators for an extra $7 million in funding to avoid "serious" financial trouble, administrators say.

Southwest Missouri State University just instituted a $3 per credit surcharge after Gov. Kit Bond announced an emergency 2 percent holdback of state funds.

Likewise, Iowa is asking its state schools to give back 2.8 percent of their state funding to cope with a lingering recession there.

"The economic downturn that hit the rest of the country came to Iowa a little late," said Richard Remington, Iowa's vice president of academic affairs.

Still, most higher education officials are optimistic that the period of drastic, ongoing state funding cuts is drawing to a close for everyone.

"Quite a number of states are beginning to project that they'll have budget surpluses next year," Chambers said.

Investigation links AIDS carrier to cases in 10 cities across U.S.

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Forty cases of AIDS in 10 cities have been traced through sexual contacts to a homosexual man who may have been a carrier of the disease, spreading it across the country without knowing he had it.

The man had sex with eight victims of acquired immune deficiency syndrome — four in Los Angeles and four in New York, according to an investigation by the Centers for Disease Control. Those eight in turn had contact with others, and the chain of contact ultimately spread to California, Florida, Georgia, Texas, Pennsylvania and New Jersey — 10 cities in all.

Identification of the AIDS cluster is further evidence for the belief that AIDS is caused by an infectious agent, said William Darrow, the head of the CDC team that tracked down the cases.

In the American Journal of Medicine, Darrow and his colleagues identified a man they call "Patient 0" who links cases in Los Angeles with those in New York.

All 40 victims were homosexual men.

Patient 0 was not the first of the 40 men to get AIDS, Darrow said.

"One of the problems we had...was determining the source of the infection and the spread," Darrow said by phone Monday.

It appears Patient 0 transmitted the disease to at least two others before he had any symptoms himself, the CDC investigators found: "If the infectious-agent hypothesis is true, Patient 0 may be an example of a 'carrier' of such an agent."

Patient 0 eventually developed AIDS and is still alive.

The link between the 40 AIDS victims was identified in early 1982, Darrow said, when there were only 248 known cases among U.S. homosexual men.

Because many of the men in the cluster had multiple sexual contacts that could not be traced, it is hard to be sure just who was the source of disease for each case, Darrow said.

This is not the first report that AIDS may be spread by carriers with no symptoms. In 1982, the CDC cited the case of an infant who developed an AIDS-like illness after a transfusion from a man who appeared well. The man later died of AIDS.

AIDS is marked by the inability of the body's immune system to resist disease. While researchers believe the disease is caused by a virus, they have not yet discovered its cause.

The CDC said homosexual men, Haitians, abusers of injectable drugs and hemophiliacs are the most likely victims of AIDS. The disease appears to be spread through sexual contact, contaminated needles and blood transfusions, but not through casual contact, CDC officials said. By March 19, AIDS struck 3,775 people in this country and killed 1,642.

The new study was conducted by David Auerbach, Harold Jaffe, James Curran, and Darrow, all of the AIDS Activity Center at the CDC. Darrow said the study could not have been done without help from local health departments and the homosexual men who agreed to interviews.

some tumors deep in the body instead of X-rays, since this new method is more effective.

Computerized tomography uses X-rays which produce a two-dimensional image to examine the brain and other parts of the body. This technique is more accurate than conventional X-ray techniques.

Immunotherapy may be able to harness the body's own disease-fighting system to combat cancer with essentially no major overt toxicity.

A two-stage process causes many cancers through exposure to two different kinds of substances known as initiators and promoters. Researchers are now exploring ways of interrupting the process to prevent cancer from developing.

Areas which researchers plan to investigate include genetic engineering, man-made antibodies, mechanisms of carcinogenesis and chemoprevention, the report stated.

In the United States, most cancer cases are believed to be environmentally related, associated in some way with our physical surroundings, personal habits and lifestyles.

People 20 to 40 years of age should have a cancer-related checkup every three years, and those who are 40 and older should have such a checkup every year.

University's tuition rate tops inflation

By BECKY WILEY
Collegian Reporter

The cost of tuition at K-State is increasing more than double the annual inflation rate of 4.6 percent.

Vice President for Business Affairs Daniel Beatty said price increases for the 1984-1985 academic year will range from a 7.5 percent increase in the non-resident undergraduates' tuition to a 19.5 percent boost in the resident graduates' tuition.

In dollars, it means resident undergraduate tuition rose from $410 in fall 1983 to $450 for fall 1984, and resident graduate tuition will jump from $410 to $490. Non-resident undergraduate tuition will increase from $1,200 to $1,290, while non-resident graduate tuition will rise from $1,200 to $1,415.

A major reason for the fee increases is to keep pace with the Kansas Board of Regents' recommendation that students pay for a set amount of the cost of their education.

Salary increases contribute to hike

"There is an unwritten understanding between the Legislature and the Board of Regents that students will pay 25 percent of the cost of their educational instruction," Beatty said.

Faculty and non-faculty salary increases, University expenditures and Legislature appropriations are all factors contributing to the tuition increases, he said.

Beatty said the Legislature passed a 3.29 percent cut in the University's base budget in July 1982. The cut, which took effect in the fiscal year 1983, has carried over into 1984. This 3.29 percent reduction translates to approximately 80 eliminated University positions and a loss of more than $500,000 in other non-salary items.

"Some capital improvements have been made, but they had no effect on tuition," Beatty said.

He cited Nichols Hall as an example. A recommendation by Gov. John Carlin appropriated funds from the Educational Building Fund to be used for the building's restoration, Beatty said.

He said even with tuition increases, the 3.29 percent depletion which resulted from a shortage of state funds hasn't been replaced.

Consequently, the tuition picture for fall 1985 will be just as bleak.

The regents have proposed tuition increases ranging from a 4 percent increase in non-resident graduate tuition to a 13 percent increase in resident graduate tuition. Beatty said that although these increases are still in the proposal stage, it will only be a matter of time until the bill passes through the Senate and is signed by the governor.

A small consolation is that the incidental fees students pay in addition to tuition — $140.50 in fall 1983 — will remain the same for fall 1984, and the academic services fee of $10 will be eliminated beginning in the 1985-1986 academic year.

"They (the incidental fees) don't go up when the tuition does. They are on a special basis and will only increase when bonds are incorporated," Beatty said.

"The fees won't change next fall.

They will change when the stadium bonds retire, but then it will be a shift rather than an increase," he said.

Several U.S. colleges foresee tuition hikes

By The College Press Service

Tuitions at many schools next year may increase faster than the inflation rate, according to scattered recent announcements by university and college administrators across the country.

Schools as diverse as Loyola University of Maryland, Metropolitan Community Colleges of Kansas City, and the universities of Missouri and Rochester already have announced tuition increases for next year which are more than double the current annual inflation rate of 4.6 percent.

More than 13 universities or state university systems, among many others, recently unveiled plans to raise tuition for the 1984-1985 academic year by more than 7.5 percent.

The hikes, moreover, follow years of double-digit increases for students.

For example, it costs 12 percent more to attend a four-year public college this year than it did last year, according to the College Board's annual college cost survey.

Four-year private college tuition went up 11 percent, while two-year campus tuitions increased by 9 percent, the survey found.

The national averages for 1984-1985 school year tuition hikes won't be compiled until next fall. However, recent announcements by individual colleges suggest the upward tuition spiral will continue.

Administrators say the increases are necessary to compensate for the federal and state budget cuts of the last four years, to make long-delayed salary increases to faculty members, to restore and build facilities put on hold during the budget crunches and to try to recover from the sky-high interest rates of the recession.

"Colleges got killed when interest rates were 18 percent," said Fary Quehl of the Council on Independent Colleges in Washington, D.C.

"We have not caught up with budget cuts," James Quinn, Washington State University registrar, said. "We've not yet recovered."

Pondering why tuition rates should exceed the inflation rate, Meredith Ludwig of the American Association of State Colleges and Universities said speculation is that (the increases are) to complete or add to projects and programs that have been put off for several years.

One long-delayed item of housekeeping is faculty compensation. Recent studies illustrate that college teachers' buying powers are now lower than they were in 1972, mainly due to a decade of high inflation.

Panel may select counsel in Meese case

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Attorney General William French Smith asked a special three-judge panel Tuesday to appoint a special prosecutor to investigate the finances and other controversies surrounding White House Counselor Edwin Meese III.

Meese, nominated by President Reagan to succeed Smith, had asked for a special prosecutor to investigate allegations that arose during his Senate Judiciary Committee confirmation hearings, which have been suspended indefinitely.

Smith asked that the prosecutor look into Meese's receipt of loans from, and his other financial transactions with, individuals who later received federal jobs; special treatment for business entities in which Meese had an interest; Meese's promotion in the military reserve, and his statements about how much he knew of the receipt by the Reagan campaign in 1980 of campaign materials from former President Jimmy Carter's campaign.

"Irrespective of whether all these matters involve specific information sufficient to constitute grounds to investigate whether or not federal criminal statutes are implicated, I believe they should be included in the independent counsel's jurisdiction," Smith told a special three-judge panel.

Under the Ethics in Government Act, the three appellate judges have the authority to choose a special prosecutor, or independent counsel as the post is known in the law, to conduct the investigation.

Smith asked for permission to release his report publicly and the judges granted it, because it had been widely reported that the Justice Department was conducting a preliminary investigation to determine whether it should ask for a special prosecutor.

Meese himself asked Smith to request the naming of a special prosecutor, after senators who opposed his nomination already had done so.

Smith also asked the judges to publicly identify the special prosecutor once he is named.

Meese, whose nomination to succeed Smith as attorney general has been held up by the Senate Judiciary Committee while the investigation proceeds, has denied any wrongdoing in any of the matters mentioned by Smith, a fact that Smith noted in his application.

Risk of cancer may be reduced with proper diet, researcher says

By GREG PROSKE
Collegian Reporter

(Editor's note: This is the second of two articles about current research on the treatment and prevention of cancer.)

Most cancer in the United States is related to environmental causes, including the food people consume.

"There is evidence to suggest that diet may affect cancer," said Robert Reeves, associate professor of foods and nutrition and K-State cancer researcher.

"High fat diets are supposed to promote tumor growth," Reeves said. "If Americans could further modify their diet, they could reduce their risk of cancer," he said.

Reeves does his research on nutrition and cancer in the Center for Basic Cancer Research, organized under the Division of Biology.

"I have two hundred students studying the effects of a high fiber, high fat diet on the incidence of colon tumors induced by 1,2 dimethylhydrazine, which is a known carcinogen (a cancer-causing agent)," he said.

An American Cancer Society report issued March 7 has suggested seven dietary ways which may help prevent cancer:

1. Avoid obesity. This suggestion is based in part on an ACS 12-year study of almost one million Americans. The study found cancer risks to be higher among overweight men and women particularly those 40 percent or more overweight.

2. Reduce total fat intake. This is particularly important in deterring cancer of the breast, colon or prostate, the report stated.

3. Eat more high-fiber foods, such as fruits, vegetables and whole grain cereals. Due to inconclusive research, not all scientists agree that high-fiber foods are an effective cancer deterrent.

4. Include vitamins A and C in the daily diet. It is recommended that obtaining the vitamins from fruits and vegetables is better than from capsules or tablets because vitamin A can be toxic in excess.

5. Include cruciferous vegetables, such as cabbage, broccoli, brussels sprouts, kohlrabi and cauliflower in the diet. Epidemiologic studies suggest these vegetables may reduce the risk of cancers of the gastrointestinal and respiratory tracts. The risk of chemically induced cancer may be reduced by the consumption of these vegetables.

6. If alcohol is consumed, it should be used in moderation. Those who drink large amounts of alcohol, and especially those who also smoke cigarettes, run an unusually high risk of getting cancer of the oral cavity, lungs and pancreas.

7. Consumption of salt-cured, smoked and nitrate-cured foods also should be moderate. Ham, fish and some varieties of sausage that are smoked absorb cancer-causing tars similar to those in tobacco smoke.

Fisherman discovers slain woman; investigators seek victim's identity

By The Associated Press

JUNCTION CITY — A young woman found stabbed to death near a Milford Lake boat ramp was the victim of "a sadistic, brutal killing," an investigator said Tuesday.

"There was evidence she had been bound and abused prior to her death. She had a lot of bruises over her entire body," Geary County sheriff's investigator Albert Buskey said. Buskey refused to divulge further details of the slaying.

An autopsy showed the victim — believed to be 17 to 19 years old — died of a stab wound in the back.

The body was found Monday afternoon under a pine tree at the east end of Milford Lake by a fisherman, and still had not been identified more than 24 hours later. Buskey said he had no suspects.

"We're kind of in a holding pattern until we learn her identity," he said.

Authorities were seeking assistance Tuesday in identifying the victim, who was described as white, about 5 foot 2 and weighing 105 to 110 pounds, with brown eyes and medium-length curly brown hair. Officers said she was wearing blue jeans and a white sweater but no shoes when she was found.

Council to discuss changes in campus parking manual

By TONA TURNER
Collegian Reporter

Definitions of terms, parking permit changes and increases in campus parking fines are included in proposed amendments to the 1985 Traffic and Parking Regulations manual to be discussed and voted on at a public hearing next week.

A public hearing by the K-State Traffic and Parking Council is scheduled for 3:30 p.m. April 5 in the Union Big Eight Room. The hearing concerns the adoption of new regulations governing traffic and parking on the roads, streets, driveways and parking facilities on campus, said Helen Cooper, assistant director of planning and the person responsible for the proposed Traffic and Parking Regulations manual.

The council's proposed 1985 Traffic and Parking Regulations Manual would feature the addition of word definitions, Cooper said. Words such as "visitor," "faculty/staff," and "storage" have caused much controversy in the past because of differences in interpretation, she said.

In the new regulations manual, the term "faculty/staff" would be changed to "employee," which is defined as "any person engaged by Kansas State University for teaching, extension, research, administration, service or any person employed by an agency connected to or assigned to the University." The reduced parking permit fee for employees earning $10,000 or less also would be eliminated.

Parking permit procedures will undergo many changes if the proposal passes. The current bumper sticker permits will be replaced by movable permits that hang from the rear-view mirror. This will allow students or employees who own more than one vehicle the opportunity to transfer the permit.

An adhesive decal that matches the movable permit, along with adhesive single-car permits, must be applied on the inside front windshield in the lower corner on the driver's side, according to the proposed manual.

In addition, "temporary" parking permits would replace the "short term" parking permits. Current regulations define "short term" as "excess of one week and not more than eight weeks." The cost of the short term permit is $5. New regulations propose the temporary permit, which would cost $1 per day, $2 per week and $5 per month. No refunds would be allowed on temporary permits.

Violation fees, including those for bicycles, would increase, according to the new proposal. The current $7.50 fee (those paid within 14 days) would increase to $8, and the $12.50 fee (those paid after 14 days) would be raised to $13.

Reserved parking stalls would still be available to "persons whose University duties require the use of their car for frequent trips on and off campus throughout the day on a close time schedule."

However, the charge for reserved stalls would increase from $60 to $100 per year for a specified 10-hour period. The charge for a 24-hour stall would increase from $100 to $150. Students or employees interested in reserved parking facilities may apply to the Traffic and Parking Council.

K-State President Duane Acker signed an attached financial impact statement to the proposal that states, "It is not anticipated that the changes in the proposed Regulations Governing Traffic and Parking on the Roads, Streets, Driveways and Parking Facilities at Kansas State University will have any predictable fiscal impact on this agency (the University)." It is recognized that certain fees and penalties are being changed by the proposed Regulations; however, it is the opinion of this office that the fiscal impact upon individuals subject to this Regulation will be minimal.

Should the proposal be passed at the April 5 hearing, Cooper said it would go to the Kansas Board of Regents. If the regents pass the proposal, it will be forwarded to the Reviser of Statutes in Topeka and will become a new regulation at K-State.

Hart sweeps New England states with Connecticut primary victory

By The Associated Press

HARTFORD, Conn. — Gary Hart, cementing a six-state sweep of New England, won an easy victory Tuesday over Walter F. Mondale in the Connecticut Democratic presidential primary — prelude to next week's showdown in New York.

"It was apparently a very good win for Gary Hart, and I commend him for it," Mondale told reporters. "We now go to New York for the next campaign."

Hart, who has been criticizing Mondale for declining to urge an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces from Central America, said he believed his stand on the volatile issue had won voter approval.

"I think the results showed a rejection of a foreign policy which calls for the continued presence of American troops in Honduras and the possible loss of American lives there," he said in Brooklyn.

He declined to predict how Connecticut would help his campaign in New York, saying only, "We expect to do very well."

With all of Connecticut's 722 precincts reporting, Hart had 53 percent of the vote. Former Vice President Mondale had 29 percent, and the Rev. Jesse Jackson was third with 12 percent.

Hart was winning 33 of the 52 Connecticut delegates at stake. Mondale led for 18 delegates to the Democratic National Convention and Jackson for 1.

Mondale continues to hold a substantial lead nationwide. Including Connecticut, he has 692 delegates to 422 for Hart. Jackson has 76. Others accounted for 72 and there were 160 uncommitted delegates. It takes 1,967 delegates to win the nomination.

Student named program finalist

Evon Lynch, sophomore in animal sciences and industry, has been named a national finalist in the third annual Scott Paper Co. Sani-Prep Dairy Science Scholarship program.

Lynch is competing for one of 15 scholarships, each in the amount of $1,000.

Her topic is "Doing what we can...by 'selling' DHI (production) testing." Her paper will be judged by a panel of experts from the American Dairy Science Association.

Winners will be announced at the annual meeting of the American Dairy Science Association, scheduled this year for late June at Texas A & M University, College Station, Texas.

Sani-Prep is a disposable dairy towel made by Scott Paper Co. Such single-service towels are recommended for both washing and drying by the National Mastitis Council as a means for helping prevent mastitis from spreading from one cow to another.

Scott Paper Co., in cooperation with the American Dairy Science Association, developed the $15,000 scholarship program to encourage original and creative thinking in the solution of problems in the field of dairy science.

Visiting English scholar to speak

Norman Grabo, Chapman professor of English at the University of Tulsa, will be a visiting scholar for the Department of English on Thursday.

Grabo, who currently is composing a history of American literature from 1520 to 1820, will speak on "Creative History" at 4 p.m. in Union 207. The public is invited.

Grabo has published a seminal study of the poetry of Edward Taylor, a New England Puritan of the 17th century, as well as editions of two of Taylor's major works. He also is editor of two widely used anthologies of American literature. His most recent work is an edition of "Arthur Mervyn," a work of the 19th-century novelist Charles Brockden Brown published in 1980, and "The Coincidental Art of Charles Brockden Brown," published in 1981.

Before becoming Chapman Professor of English at Tulsa in 1983, Grabo taught at Texas A & M, Michigan State University and the University of California at Berkeley.

Grabo held a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1970-1971 and a National Endowment for the Humanities Fellowship in 1980.

President heralds crime tip cards

The Kansas City Chiefs Crime Prevention Card program has been recognized by President Reagan as one of the outstanding crime prevention programs in the United States.

Among members of the Chiefs organization to attend the White House ceremonies commemorating National Crime Prevention Week were Nick Lowery, placekicker; Mitch Wheeler, director of promotions; and Don Steadman, director of administration. Reagan and U.S. Attorney General William French Smith praised the Crime Prevention Card Program for being an excellent example of the private sector joining forces to combat a public problem.

The program is co-sponsored by Frito-Lay and KCTV-5.

Since 1979, law enforcement agencies throughout Missouri, Kansas, Iowa and Nebraska have distributed more than 16 million Chiefs crime tip cards to youth. The objective of the program is to encourage positive encounters between police officers and youths and communicate crime prevention and good neighbor tips through a non-authoritarian vehicle.

Stress workshop may aid students in managing test-anxiety problems

By KATHLEEN COLE
Collegian Reporter

Students whose grades reflect stress or ineffective study habits may be victims of test anxiety, a condition that limits performance on tests.

One way students can learn to overcome test anxiety is by attending workshops sponsored by U-LearnN and the Counseling Center in Holton Hall.

A workshop, "Coping: Test Anxiety Management," will be conducted from 2 to 3 p.m. today to help students learn to deal with problems related to testing.

Participants can talk about particular problems they may be having in classes, specific subjects or study skills in general, said Laurie McCauley, conductor of the workshop and graduate in counseling.

"Once we have identified the problems, then we can decide if they are related to stress, study skills or some other cause," she said. "For instance, if a student says, 'I read the first question and knew I bombed the test,' or 'I knew the answer to that question, but I still got it wrong,' we may want to examine how the student studies," McCauley said.

Some students think that if they go to their classes, take notes, read the chapters and work out the problems at the end, they will do well on the exams, she said. While this method may work for some, others must explore alternative methods of studying, she said.

"We may suggest the student go through and read the sections, outline them, finish reading the chapter and then answer the questions at the end," McCauley said. "Another technique is to take the sections outlined in bold print and make questions out of each of them.

"The point is for students to know they're not stuck with the problem," she said. "Most of us have experienced difficulties with tests ourselves at one time or another. We want students to understand they can learn from the experience. That's what the workshop is for; it's a good step in problem prevention, and it also serves as a source of referrals for pursuing remedial procedures."

After students discover the reasons for their test anxiety, they may want to make an appointment with a counselor to obtain additional help in resolving the problem. Likewise, U-LearnN and the Counseling Center have numerous resources available to aid in improving study skills and reducing stress.

"Students can listen to a series of tapes we make available that are aimed at helping individuals develop effective relaxation techniques," McCauley said. Those who are affected by stress when testing may find relaxation methods particularly helpful in preparing for exams. Students who listen to the tapes can later recall the techniques presented as a means of mental preparation.

"It is hoped that through the workshop, students will realize test anxiety can be dealt with in a positive way," McCauley said.

Committee to review retake plan

Retaking a class may no longer remove the original grade from a student's grade point average.

A proposal to change the University's retake policy will be considered at an Academic Affairs Committee meeting on April 3. John Eck, professor of physics, said the new retake policy, if adopted, would involve any completed University class to be permanently included on a student's transcript.

This means that if a student retakes a class, the second grade received would be averaged with the first grade.

The current retake policy states that undergraduate students may retake a course to improve the grade. If a course is retaken, the original grade is lined out and a retake notice is inserted. The first grade is not figured into the student's cumulative GPA. Only the retake grade is used in GPA computations, even if it is lower than the original grade.

WE'LL PAY YOU TO GET INTO SHAPE THIS SUMMER.

If you have at least two years of college left, you can spend six weeks at our Army ROTC Basic Camp this summer and earn approximately $600.

And if you qualify, you can enter the ROTC 2-Year Program this fall and receive up to $1,000 a year.

But the big payoff happens on graduation day. That's when you receive an officer's commission.

So get your body in shape (not to mention your bank account).

Enroll in Army ROTC. For more information, contact your Professor of Military Science.

Second House committee to vote on pari-mutuel betting proposal

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A proposal to let voters decide whether to amend the Kansas Constitution and legalize pari-mutuel wagering on any kind of racing won endorsement Tuesday in a House committee, but it now must win approval in a second committee before it reaches the House floor.

The controversial resolution, which originally spoke only to wagering on horse racing, would put the gambling question on the November general election ballot.

It now goes to the Calendar and Printing Committee, composed of the seven party leaders in the House where it's virtually assured of dying because of House Speaker Mike Hayden's opposition to the measure.

The House Federal and State Affairs Committee endorsed the resolution after widening the scope of the measure by taking out references to horse racing. As it now reads, wagering on any kind of racing, including horse and dog races, would be permitted.

"It will just make the Constitution a lot clearer," said Rep. Jayne Aylward, R-Salina, as the resolution cleared the committee on an unrecorded voice vote. The measure was sponsored by Rep. Mike Peterson, D-Kansas City.

There are several reasons besides Hayden's opposition that the odds are against the resolution. If it does advance to the floor of the House for debate and action, passage is unlikely because all proposals to amend the constitution must have two-thirds support in both the House and Senate.

That means it needs 84 votes to clear the 125-member House and 27 votes in the 40-seat Senate. Last year, only 19 senators voted in favor of a similar resolution and in 1982, only 18 senators supported the issue on a floor vote. It passed the Senate in 1970 but was surrounded by scandal and died in the House.

The Rev. Richard Taylor, leader of the state's dry and anti-gambling forces called Kansans For Life At Its Best, immediately blasted the committee's action, saying they are trying to confuse the issue.

Taylor complained that lawmakers are trying to wash their hands of the gambling issue and simply pass it on to voters to decide. He maintains their vote represents approval or disapproval of gambling, nothing less.

In other action Tuesday, the committee endorsed a bill which would ensure that blind people with seeing-eye dogs would be guaranteed access to restaurants and grocery stores.

Also endorsed was a bill that exempts livestock haulers from being ticketed by police for littering a highway with manure.

The measure would exempt cattle haulers from the litter violation when cattle are in a truck or trailer and manure spills unintentionally. The cattle truck must have been cleaned periodically, however.

Public should attend rape forum

Manhattan residents, both natives and students, should be irate about Riley County District Judge Jerry Mershon's grant of probation to convicted rapist Calvin Holland. Mershon granted Holland probation after he served 3½ months of an eight-to-20-year sentence for raping a Manhattan woman, on the condition he undergo at least 30 days of inpatient treatment for alcoholism.

Does Mershon expect one month of treatment for alcoholism to be a substitute punishment for eight to 20 years of prison? What happens if Holland rapes again after his treatment ends? Will he then be sentenced to 60 days of alcoholism treatment?

Mershon has set a dangerous precedent. Local civic and women's groups have been dealt a divisive setback and now require new strength and effort to continue the fight for just treatment of rapists.

Merchon's motives in granting the probation are questionable. Did he believe alcoholism to be the determining motivation in Holland's criminal action?

Treatment for alcoholism will not cure a rapist, even if he is an alcoholic. Mershon has ignored community concern to combat rape.

A public forum, organized by Manhattan Women Against Rape, will be held at 7:30 p.m. Monday at the Ecumenical Christian Ministries Center, 1021 Denison Ave. Concerns about rape prosecution will be directed to Mershon and Riley County Attorney Colt Knutson. Every concerned Manhattan citizen should attend.

Positive study attitude pays off

There are only six weeks of school left until dead week. Great, right? Sure, it's great, but it's also six weeks that could go by too soon for students who are not making every effort to do as well during the last part of the semester as they have so far.

Now is not the time to slack off on school responsibilities.

It is understandable that students may feel the urge to get somewhat lazy at this time of the year. After all, midsemester depression is common; spring is supposedly just around the corner; there are many more fun things to do than study or complete projects; and it is natural for seniors to be anxious to graduate.

If at this point it takes an even greater effort to get an assignment done or be well-prepared for a test, students should make that effort. The rewards will come, and the effort will result in success.

Another problem students face is the feeling that they have too much work to do and not enough time to do it. This common difficulty may cause some to only partially complete assignments.

Studying at a university is a privilege. Students should realize they are lucky to be able to attend an affordable institution of higher education. Hardships such as spells of laziness or lack of time will occur, but those who are able to effectively deal with problems such as these will benefit most from a college education.

Now is not the time to be negligent in studying. Maintaining a positive attitude and working hard will make the next six weeks pass quickly. Spring fever and senioritis are curable.

Burnout even strikes columnists

Here I am, sitting in front of a video display terminal at 11:30 p.m. Monday, trying to think of a column idea.

Let's see...school prayer has been tackled. The DUI laws, vehicle inspections, cordless telephones...all taken. How about Ed Meese? Nah. He's been attacked by everybody this side of the Pacific Ocean.

Here's an oldie-but-goodie: Student Senate. Well, senate's been quiet lately. Busy, but quiet.

I could write about winter. I hate snow and ice. But so do a lot of people. What else is new?

Such is the life of a columnist. Here one minute, bum the next. But nothing is worse than having "the well run dry" — that is, not having any ideas to analyze and write about.

I read the Collegian and three or four other newspapers each day. I read Time and Newsweek. I talk to as many people as I can, probing for ideas.

Sometimes, there aren't enough hours in a day to write columns. Ideas just roll in. People stop to say, "Hey, Brian, have you heard..." This is a wonderful way to live and write.

Then there are times, like now, when the burnout factor is high. One can only digest so much news and ideas before the whole thought process breaks down.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

This situation also happens with classes. How can you study when your brain feels like it was struck by lightning? Mental fatigue isn't as obvious as its physical counterpart, yet mental fatigue can occur with great frequency in a high-pressure, competitive business — and college fits the bill.

I view each column as a part of me — my soul, my intellect — being shared with approximately 15,000 others. I sweat over each column. I worry about my work and strive to do the best job possible, because my audience deserves nothing less than my best effort.

That's why I'm frustrated. For some reason, I have reached a low point. Ideas aren't jumping out at me.

I take that back. I do have some ideas, but for the sake of my health and ailing bank account, I'll not use them.

I've seen this frustration in the eyes and faces of others lately. Spring break is but a memory. Tests, papers and assignments are creeping up, or, in some cases, have hit with the force of a thousand bricks.

As Bill Murray said in the movie "Stripes," "And then, depression set in."

There are various ways to work out the frustration and depression of burnout. Talking to others is often a good way to defeat burnout, as long as you don't depress the other person in the process.

Physical activity also is a good release. I find a good, hard, fast game of basketball works for me. I know some people who play racquetball, run or lift weights as way to overcome burnout.

A change of scenery, such as a short trip away from Manhattan, can also help relieve burnout.

Lafene Student Health Center and Pawnee Mental Health Services offer help to those in need of professional counseling when burnout and depression are too great to handle alone.

I guess what I'm trying to say in this column is that if you are suffering from burnout, you are not alone. Now then, what about winter...

Dear President: Deficit is past due

WASHINGTON — Dear Ronald Reagan: As you know, we have written you previously about your PAST DUE deficit and have yet to get a satisfactory response. This is our final letter. We know your credit rating is important to you, and so we are taking this opportunity to review your financial situation. Immediate attention to this problem is required or we will have to take FURTHER ACTION.

When you first contacted this office in 1980, you said you would be able to lower taxes, increase defense spending and balance the budget. This office had grave doubts about your plan, but we allowed you to proceed because YOUR BUSINESS IS IMPORTANT TO US.

But Mr. Ronald Reagan, you have not been able to balance the budget. According to our figures, your budget will be short $200 billion by the end of fiscal 1985. If this sum is added to previous deficits, we are talking of a debt approaching a trillion dollars. Mr. Ronald Reagan, we value your business, but YOU HAVE DONE NOTHING TO BRING YOUR BUDGET INTO BALANCE.

Mr. Ronald Reagan, in 1980 you said you would balance the budget. Every year since, you have made the same claim. Not only did you fail to balance the budget as promised, but also the budget you recently submitted to this office shows AN ADDITIONAL DEFICIT. As usual, you say you will attend to this problem NEXT YEAR.

Mr. Ronald Reagan, we have been very patient with you, but look at what you have done. The government has to borrow its funds somewhere, and it will be competing with others for the limited money available. This either will keep interest rates at the current high level or increase them further. As you know, the cost of borrowing money

Columnist

(interest rates) is reflected in the price of almost everything — from new cars to new houses.

But additionally, Mr. Ronald Reagan, a perusal of your statements indicates that YOU DO NOT KNOW WHAT YOU ARE DOING. We are sorry for being so blunt, but this office has gone over your books and discovered that you are now spending more on interest payments than you have cut from social programs for the poor. In other words, what you have taken from poor people you are now giving to bankers and rich foreign investors.

This office also has concluded, Mr. Ronald Reagan, that high interest rates and the prospect that they will go even higher has attracted a lot of foreign money to this country. We need not tell you that this is not good.

The result is that the dollar has increased in value, meaning cheap meals for a privileged few in Paris, but — MORE IMPORTANT — a higher cost for American exports. This means that American firms that do business abroad are being priced out of the market. At the same time, foreign firms now are able to sell here more cheaply. This accounted for a $60.6 billion trade deficit in 1983 and a projected deficit of $100 billion for 1984.

Mr. Ronald Reagan, we have written to you repeatedly about these matters, and all we get back is promises that the budget will be balanced — but the promise always is for NEXT year.

This is unacceptable to us. While normally we refrain from telling clients how to conduct their business, it seems obvious to us that you cannot continue both to spend the way you have on defense and also permit the rich to avoid paying their fair share of taxes. Your figures indicate that the rich enjoyed the major share of your tax reductions. A little corporate tax would not hurt, either.

In the end, Mr. Ronald Reagan, these choices are UP TO YOU. But we cannot continue to finance your debt or continue to rely on your promises that next year you will balance the budget. This, then, is your FINAL WARNING. You have refused to respond adequately to previous letters. Therefore, we must inform you that your request for another $200 billion loan is DENIED.

We are sorry to have taken such stern measures. We always have valued your business, but we feel that you have taken advantage of the LIBERAL CREDIT POLICIES extended to your predecessors. Remember, your credit rating is important to you. But frankly, Mr. Ronald Reagan, you don't have one anymore.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR pertaining to matters of public interest are encouraged. All letters must be typewritten or neatly printed, signed by the author and should not exceed 300 words. The author's major, classification or other identification and a telephone number where the author can be reached during business hours must be included. The Collegian reserves the right to edit letters for style and spatial considerations, and to withhold letters from publication.

Anti-rape groups deserve support at forum

Editor,

Congratulations, Manhattan (what a wonderful place to live), especially in reference to probation granted by Judge Jerry Mershon toward convicted rapist Calvin Holland. It's nice to know this small Midwest community can grant probation from rape charges in less than four months. That's not too much to pay for the violent, demoralizing act that occurred.

Oh, yes, it was also recommended that Holland receive at least 30 days of inpatient treatment for alcoholism.

Apparently, in our community rape has less deterrent factors than DUI, drug possession, arson or theft. Considering the rape problem in the past several years, it's amazing this court action could even seriously be considered. I seriously urge all Manhattan residents and K-State students to wholly support efforts by Manhattan Women Against Rape, Community Coalition Against Rape, the Crisis Center Inc. and others. Acts of violence such as these require severe deterrents, not probation.

Pregnant students need caring attitude

Editor,

Re: "Students' choices raise country abortion rate" in the March 1 Collegian.

In this article, Thomas Marzen of Americans United For Life noted that students are largely disdainful of accepting the prevailing values of society. Marzen said "most students are pro-abortion, not because they know why, but because it's chic and intellectually fashionable."

This is sad. Hundreds of thousands of babies are aborted every year. Biologists have indeed proven the baby in the womb is alive and growing. The baby is dependent on its mother for nourishment and life.

Yes, the baby in the womb is alive. Some babies live through the saline solution method of abortion, as noted. The baby is aborted alive. It is then up to the doctor to save the child or to let it die.

How can such an advanced society as ours be so ignorant as to the value of life? If the aborted baby that is left crying, to die in a can, could change his or her tears into words, they would probably sound like this:

"Please Mommy, don't leave me here so all alone! I don't want to die! Please somebody, let me live! Won't anyone love me?"

Those could have been from my twin sister or my younger brother or sister. I thank God for the gift of life. And I thank my parents for caring enough to let me live.

I encourage all of us to take a stand on life. Let's not conform to what is fashionable, but instead let's take a stand and say "I care."

Reagan deserves praise for 'admirable job'

Editor,

Enough!

For quite some time, I have been reading the many editorials in the Collegian. I am sickened by the anti-Reagan columns in particular. Although President Reagan has only been in office three years, he has done a remarkably good job. Inflation is very low, unemployment has shown a marked decrease, and our national defense is now being built back to a respectable level it hasn't been at for 20 years.

Most of all, Reagan is a good leader. He has instilled in most Americans a feeling of confidence in the government once again. He has certainly gained the respect of other nations throughout the world. In total, considering the state of our country prior to his taking office, Reagan has definitely done an admirable job.

I would enjoy seeing one of the many who have criticized him take the job of the president for one day. I would wager that most of you would realize President Reagan deserves recognition for what he has accomplished.

Reagan certainly will have my vote in November.

Week brought world closer

Editor,

Congratulations are certainly due the K-State international students for their effort in making International Week an outstanding event during this academic year. It would be difficult to cite all those who gave of their time and energy to bring to our campus a bit of the world in which we all live. After the excellent cultural exhibits displayed in the Union, the international potluck dinner on Saturday evening was the piece de resistance for the week.

It would be remiss of me, however, not to mention the International Coordinating Council as the overall sponsor of the week and to say that I regret we do not have a Stanley, Davis or Heisman trophy to present to that dedicated body of students (international or U.S.) for their unselfish contribution of time and energy to bring the world to our doorstep.

Although enrollment in the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications has risen during the past few years, the department is suffering from inadequate funding for equipment to be used in radio and television courses.

About 25 students and faculty members from the radio and television division of the department met Tuesday in McCain Auditorium to discuss financial problems and what could be done to solve them.

Dana Hawkins, senior in radio and television, asked the students to write letters to K-State President Duane Acker requesting consideration for more funding from the University. She and some concerned students are meeting with Acker today at 11 p.m.

David MacFarland, associate professor in journalism and mass communications, said the radio and television division is the most expensive part of the department.

"Our enrollment has continued to go up, and we've had less equipment per person than before," MacFarland said. "We've been looking for ways to support ourselves independently. We try to stay abreast with the latest equipment, but the state-of-the-art changes so fast. Our color cameras are four years old. They were obsolete when we ordered them."

Lee Buller, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications, said he has cut back on teaching television in his Reporting 2 class, designed to be a class in which students receive hands-on experience in reporting and using equipment, because he does not feel comfortable with the equipment. He said it has had numerous failures

"I am considering reducing television even further," Buller said. "I am considering teaching it as a theoretical class."

For the first time this year, radio and television majors are required to take the Radio and Television in Society class before they can take Fundamentals of Radio and Television Production. Only the top 50 to 60 percent of those taking Radio and Television in Society will pass, Paul Prince, associate professor in journalism and mass communications, said.

"These changes may allow us to move people a lot faster," Prince said. "The major changes will allow us to work with deteriorated equipment and to maintain our degree of excellence."

Although it won't be voted on until the Manhattan City Commission meeting April 3, Mayor Wanda Fataley told house movers at a Tuesday afternoon work session that a proposed $400 moving permit fee ordinance "is probably going to change."

The issue arose at a commission meeting three weeks ago as city staff made several recommendations concerning the changing of certain items in the Building and Structures Codes concerning the movement of houses.

City Manager Don Harmon proposed that the moving permit fee be set at $100.20 per square foot of floor area moved.

Requirements in the proposed codes consist mainly of four items:

- The proposed use of the moved structure would have to conform to the city's building codes.

— Signatures from owners of property within 200 feet of the lot where the structure is to be placed must accompany the application. There also must be a two-thirds majority of signatures from owners of property directly adjacent to the lot. The signatures must be accompanied by a signed form from neighboring property owners stating that they have seen photographs of the house and were given an opportunity to see the structure in person.

— If a moved house is placed within the city, the owner has 90 days after issuance of the permit to bring the structure up to codes. Attached to that item is a clause stating that if the structure has a substantially deteriorated exterior it must be repaired, re-covered or replaced.

— A fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months may be invoked if any of the ordinances aren't followed within the 90-day time period.

Commissioners also were told by Jerry Petty of the city staff that the city's approval is needed for a house to be moved into a lot on Riley Lane because the city owns one of the two properties adjacent to the lot and both lots would be included as two-thirds of the majority. Commissioners are to consider that move next week.

TOPEKA — The House Education Committee approved a resolution Tuesday directing the state Board of Education to develop a one-year internship program for beginning teachers which could be implemented in the 1986-87 school year.

But it tabled, after a lively debate, another resolution to direct the Department of Economic Development to develop a media campaign promoting public education.

Spokesmen for Gov. John Carlin, teachers, school boards and the Kansas Board of Regents spoke in support of the internship proposal, which provides for a three-member panel of professional educators to advise and evaluate first-year teachers.

The panel would consist of a master teacher, selected by fellow professionals; a school administrator, and a representative of a college of education at one of the state's six universities.

"We believe the idea of an internship will allow that committee to work very closely with that first year teacher, to answer questions and to help determine whether that person should pursue teaching as a career," said Craig Grant, lobbyist for the Kansas National Education Association.

Bob Wootton, Carlin's legislative liaison, said the internship proposal was part of the governor's program for public education.

Carlin would support an internship program which would allow teachers to be certified only after a one-year internship. Wootton said. The governor also believes the internship should count toward the probationary period during which teachers may be fired without reason, he said.

The House sent a bill to Clinton Tuesday for his signature or veto, which would increase the probationary period from two years to three.

Carlin also wants the board to include in its proposed program a "second chance" for teachers deemed by the panel as needing additional experience before certification, Wootton said.

The committee voted to table the media campaign resolution after agreeing to an amendment by Rep.

Denise Apt, R-Iola, which changed the purpose of the campaign from promoting the image of teachers to promoting the image of public education.

But Rep. Bill Reardon, D-Kansas City, said a media campaign promoting teachers would improve public education by attracting more people to the teaching profession.

Cathy Kruzic, director of the tourism division of the Department of Economic Development, estimated the production of videotapes and radio announcements would cost the state about $10,000.

Livestock inspectors want firearms

TOPEKA — State livestock inspectors would be granted police powers to carry guns and make arrests under a House-passed bill endorsed Tuesday by the Senate Agriculture and Small Business Committee.

G.D. Gurss, head of the Kansas Animal Health Department, said his inspectors need to be able to arrest people suspected of stealing cattle. He said it was inconvenient for inspectors to have to "hunt up some other individuals to make the arrests."

Before approving the bill, the committee expanded the inspector-training requirements in the bill to force inspectors to complete the same training program as special arson investigators, who also are allowed to carry firearms and make arrests.

Originally the bill called for grain inspectors to take a 40-day firearms training program, similar to the training law enforcement officers receive.

The 40-hour firearms training remained in the proposal, along with a 70-day law enforcement education program.

The measure now advances to the Senate floor for debate and action. If approved, it will be returned to the House for consideration of amendments.

Carter speaks on Mideast policy

DALLAS — Former President Jimmy Carter says he is disappointed that the settlement he worked out with then-Egyptian President Anwar Sadat and then-Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin has yet to be fully implemented.

"I don't think either nation would allege that the other has violated terms of the accord, but both would say that the other has failed to carry out the spirit of the agreement," Carter said Monday, fifth anniversary of the Camp David accords, during a speech at Southern Methodist University.

"Still, a cold peace is better than a hot war," he said.

The talks were an example of a role he sees as vital for a U.S. president, but one that President Reagan has forsaken, Carter said.

Carter said that after the U.S. Embassy in Teheran was seized, he sent Iran's Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini a message that if any of the hostages were put on trial, Iran would be cut off immediately from all its commercial activity with other countries.

"And I told him that if a single hostage were killed, we would immediately launch a military attack on the people of Iran," said Carter. "I think Khomeini knew we would have done so, and I would have."

He would be there if he could

SCRANTON, Pa. — A song writer whose plea to Frank Sinatra to help a local charity was rebuffed has put pen to paper again to say Sinatra is forgiven for not honoring a promise made 40 years ago.

Last week, Sinatra's lawyers chastised the Pennsylvania Chapter of the Multiple Sclerosis Society for trying to lure him to a charity ball April 6. Sinatra, the national MS chairman, has another engagement, according to his lawyers.

Charity organizers had hoped to use a casual promise Sinatra made to Peter Horger in 1941 in Scranton. Horger said the singer, a virtual unknown at the time, promised to return if he became famous.

Songwriter Jim Cullen, 29, turned the promise into a song, "Won't You Come Back," which was played over National Public Radio.

He now has used the same medium to say all's forgiven:

"The chairman of the board
Would be here if he could.
What can we say,
But thank you, anyway."

Weather

Cloudy and windy today with a 40 percent chance of rain, high 45 to 50. North winds 15 to 30 mph and gusty. Mostly cloudy tonight, low mid-30s. Partly cloudy Thursday, high 50.

Ill-suited voice masks fine guitar music

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

The musical selection performed by Doug Sharpe, fifth year student in architecture, at the Nooner on Tuesday in the Catskeller seemed to suffer from a case of multiple personalities as Eddy Arnold's "Tennessee Stud" was soon followed by "House of the Rising Sun."

Review

But music arrangement and selection were coincidental to the overall performance, which coupled sound acoustic guitar playing with an extremely mediocre voice.

Sharpe performed with a monotone voice that didn't add much excitement to a number of John Prine songs, which are somewhat monotonous themselves. Sharpe's first song by Prine, "Please Don't Bury Me," sounded like the slow buzz of a wounded bumble bee.

When Sharpe performed other famous songs by John Edward and John Denver, the same problem occurred. Sharpe's voice didn't seem to conform to the vocal norms with which such songs should be sung — a voice higher and more distinct.

Sharpe went through a temporary metamorphosis with an extremely good performance of Neil Young's "Needle and the Damage Done," from Young's "Harvest" album. Sharpe's voice became much smoother and more audible, but more importantly it moved up the scale a few notches. When mixed with his guitar playing, it produced an extremely pleasurable sound.

Unfortunately Sharpe's voice nose-dived once again when he followed that performance with Dan Fogelberg's "Morning Sky," which would seem to call for a more easily flowing voice. It was hard to understand his words because they blended with the low chords on his guitar.

Sharpe was joined by Don Hannon on the bass and acoustic guitar on a number of songs — I think. The reason I only think he was playing was because I couldn't hear it. I was sitting at the back of the room, but surely one is supposed to hear bass on a James Taylor or Eddie Arnold song.

It's evident that Sharpe has talent on the guitar, as demonstrated by his instrumental performance. But he seems to be a fan of bluegrass music, since he said he was in a bluegrass combo called the "Bluegrass Stooges" a few years ago. Too bad. Sharpe could really do justice to a different type of music to which his voice might be better adapted.

Cuban authorities take hijackers into custody

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — Three men demanding $5 million hijacked a Piedmont Aviation jet with 57 people aboard to Havana on Tuesday, but were quickly taken into custody by Cuban authorities, the Federal Aviation Administration said.

The takeover of the Charleston, S.C.-to-Miami flight was the first time in six months that a domestic flight had been hijacked to Cuba and the 12th such incident since last May 1.

"The word 'explosives' was mentioned but we don't know what they have," said Jack Barker, an Atlanta-based spokesman for the FAA. No injuries were reported.

Dennis Feldman, an FAA spokesman in Washington, said the Boeing 737 landed in Havana at 4:20 p.m. EST. Less than an hour later he said the FAA had received word that the hijackers were in custody.

The flight arrived safely in Miami shortly before 7 p.m., said controller Robert Craig.

Flight 451, which originated in Newark, N.J., and stopped in Charlotte, N.C., was hijacked at 3:43 p.m. EST after departing Charleston, said Feldman.

Joe Leahy, operations manager for Charleston International Airport, said the flight's crew was notified over south Florida that people aboard wanted the plane taken to Cuba.

As the plane approached the Miami airport, a passenger handed a flight attendant a note, said Ken Carlson of Piedmont headquarters in Winston-Salem, N.C.

The man, "claiming to be armed and claiming to have explosives on board the aircraft, and claiming to have two accomplices on board, demanded that the plane be flown to Havana," Carlson said.

"He promised that the crew and passengers would be released unharmed after landing."

The hijacker's claim that he had two accomplices had not been confirmed, Carlson said.

The jet was carrying 52 passengers and a five-member crew, he said.

The last hijacking to Cuba was on Sept. 22, when a New York-to-Virgin Islands flight was diverted after a man with a black box claimed to have a bomb and demanded to go to Havana. There were 10 earlier hijackings to Cuba beginning last May 1 involving South Florida flights.

Officials at Miami International Airport stopped two men before boarding a Piedmont flight to Tampa Sept. 14 and charged them in a suspected hijacking attempt. Two other attempted hijackings were thwarted in the air by passengers who overpowered air pirates.

Shortly after the rash of hijackings started last year, FAA stepped up security measures by placing sky marshals aboard certain flights and making more thorough baggage checks.

Barker said there was no sky marshal aboard Flight 451.

He also said he was surprised that anyone would divert a flight to Cuba since the island government has indicated that all air pirates receive harsh treatment.

"These people face long prison terms in Cuba," Barker said.

Alumnus donates paintings to K-State

The Department of Art recently received a donation of six oil paintings from the estate of the late Col. Francis ImMache, a K-State alumnus.

"The paintings are a significant addition to the permanent art collection and will be especially valuable as part of our teaching collection. We are delighted with the paintings and are most grateful to the ImMache estate," Jessica Reichman, curator of collections, said.

Four of the paintings, "Still Life with Pears," 1943; "Look Over Lake Lugano," 1943; "Waiting Woman," 1945; and "Vase of Sunflowers," 1946 are original works of the German ar-ist Karl Hofer.

The two landscape paintings, "Summer Landscape" and "Winter Landscapes," are original works of J. Rolf Knoblock.

All six paintings will be on display on the second floor of the Union during April.

Karl Hofer, 1878-1955, was considered one of Germany's most important modern artists. During World War II, Hofer's art was considered "degenerate" by the Nazis and was banned. Hofer's studio and home were burned in a bombing raid in 1943, destroying more than 300 of his paintings. Hofer later fled to West Berlin and became head of the West Berlin Academy of Art, Reichman said.

While stationed in Germany during the war, ImMache wanted to acquire a contemporary painting as a memento of Germany. ImMache and Hofer met in Berlin in 1947. Hofer selected his painting "Waiting Woman" for ImMache. ImMache sought more of Hofer's paintings and later acquired "Look Over Lake Lugano," "Still Life with Pears" and "Vase of Sunflowers," Reichman said.

In exchange for the paintings, ImMache sent Hofer care packages of necessities. The two men became friends and maintained regular correspondence.

ImMache graduated from K-State in May 1929. His major was agriculture, according to records in the registrar's office.

K-State owns approximately 1,000 artistic items. These items are divided into two groups: the lending art collection, which is comprised of items produced by student, faculty and some professionals; and the permanent art collection, which is comprised of items produced only by professionals.

These pieces of art may be found distributed throughout the Union, K-State's administrative offices and other offices on campus.

Introducing:

1984 Miss Agriculture Candidates

Miss Agriculture will be crowned 1 p.m. Sunday during the Agriculture Awards Assembly in the Union Forum Hall.

Each candidate was nominated by a living group or agriculture club. After the nomination, the candidates attended a tea with the six judges and participated in a series of interviews.

The judges include two students, the College of Agriculture Student Senate president, faculty members and representatives of professional groups. They chose the six candidates after the tea to compete in the final competition.

The six finalists each gave a speech and participated in a discussion interview panel.

Miss Agriculture is expected to promote agriculture and the College of Agriculture by attending various agriculture events in the state.

SHARON BOWMAN
Junior in Agriculture Economics

Analyzing the current situation of declining enrollment within the College of Agriculture, I view the position of K-State Miss Agriculture as vitally important. Serving as a public relations tool, I would strive to spread my enthusiasm about the opportunities and activities our college offers to prospective students.

Part of my responsibilities also would emphasize informing the general public. Self satisfaction would be achieved through dedication to this position. By reaching out and promoting agriculture while working with people on campus and statewide, my purpose as a devoted K-State student would be fulfilled.

Coordinating summer activities is one of my main goals. Working with fairs, media and other interested groups would provide exposure for the college and continue as Miss Agriculture's goals during the 1985 school year.

DARA KEENER
Junior in Horticulture

Hi, I'm Dara Keener, a junior in horticulture. My home is in Shawnee, where I was a very active 4-H member for 10 years. This and my parents' farm background were my exposure to agriculture.

The horticulture club nominated me for the position of Miss Agriculture. This title offers me many challenges. Not only would it put me in a great position to meet many new people, but as Miss Agriculture, I would have the opportunity to gain an additional understanding of agriculture throughout Kansas. The prospect of promoting K-State and agriculture as an agriculture ambassador truly excites me.

Being a native of Kansas, I regard the position of Miss Agriculture as an honor. I would serve with dignity and decorum, striving to make every student and faculty member proud that I was representing their college.

LINDA JOHNSON
Sophomore in Agriculture Economics

Opportunity, teamwork, leadership and goals are all words which describe the relationship between Kansas State University and the people of agriculture.

I would be honored to represent the University as Miss Agriculture and serve the agriculture industry as an ambassador and spokesperson.

Agriculture is a very important part of the state and K-State. I'm proud to be a part of one of the top agriculture colleges in the country and would like the opportunity to promote agriculture throughout Kansas.

One of the main responsibilities of Miss Agriculture is to recruit young, enthusiastic people. With the increase of technology in agriculture, it is very important to have highly educated people.

ALISON MEYER
Junior in Agronomy

The position of Miss Agriculture presents a three-fold honor: the opportunity to represent the College of Agriculture, Kansas State University and agriculture in general.

Undoubtedly, this is not a minor responsibility, nor a minute task. Miss Agriculture must serve as a distinguished ambassador for these three areas and communicate effectively their significance, excellence and opportunities.

There are numerous reasons why I would like to be Miss Agriculture. The challenge of the position, the chance to meet people and the promotion of the three areas I mentioned are a few.

But one of the most important goals is to correspond and inform others of the immense opportunities here at K-State and in agriculture. Agriculture is often under-rated and disrespected. The relevance of agriculture cannot be emphasized enough; the essence of our livelihoods depends upon it.

AMY JO REINHARDT
Sophomore in Agriculture Economics

Every day a new dinner table is set. This dinner table accommodates the 240,000 new mouths to feed in the world that are born each day. It's a table that seats people on both sides, one foot apart, and it stretches 68 miles long. With those statistics, shouldn't everyone be interested in agriculture and a good education?

Agriculture has been a major part of my life since the day I was born. I live on a Holstein dairy farm in southeast Kansas where my family is currently milking 75 cows. Since agriculture is important to me, I would love to represent K-State and the College of Agriculture by holding the position of Miss Agriculture.

This position plays an important role in the future of our college. I would like the challenge of meeting with different organizations and presenting what the College of Agriculture has to offer today and in the future.

JULIE SCHULER
Sophomore in Animal Sciences and Industry

I've always been involved and felt close to agriculture and Kansas State University since I was raised in a large farm family of eight children.

When I found out that I had been nominated by Phi Delta Theta Fraternity as a Miss Agriculture candidate, I was very excited.

I feel strongly that agriculture needs a spokesperson, especially since agriculture is composed of many diverse phases. The important role that this spokesperson would have would be through public relations and education of the public about agriculture products.

This is where the role of Miss Agriculture comes in. She is a goodwill ambassador and educator for the College of Agriculture by representing it at different state events, not to mention involvement and cooperation with staff, alumni and prospective students. She helps in recruitment by reaching out and making potential students aware of the many opportunities at K-State in agriculture.

Manhattan offers more convenience

Wheat commission organizes move

By TODD NIGHSWONGER
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Wheat Commission, located in Hutchinson for the past 27 years, is preparing to move its operation to Manhattan.

The move, scheduled for the end of April, will take place for several reasons, Steven Graham, administrator of the wheat commission, said.

When the commission was begun in 1957, Hutchinson was in the middle of a large cash wheat market, Graham said. Its purpose was to help sell surplus Kansas wheat at a better price, he said.

Over time, the cash market moved to Kansas City, and several organizations dealing with the wheat industry began to come to Manhattan.

"Over the years Manhattan has become a center for certain things related to wheat," Graham said.

Located in Manhattan are the Department of Grain Science and Industry at K-State, the U.S. Grain Marketing Research Laboratory, the American Institute of Baking and the Wheat Quality Council.

"A lot of people are saying that Manhattan probably has more of these grain-related experts than any other place in the world," he said.

This abundance of wheat-related organizations has caused staff members at the commission to make frequent trips to Manhattan.

"It seems like somebody is up here every week," he said.

The commission is a state agency which deals with the Legislature in Topeka, so trips there also are made, Graham said.

He said the move would improve the efficiency of the commission because it would save travel time and money and would make it easier to coordinate with the wheat organizations in Manhattan.

"This is just a better location to base ourselves today," Graham said.

The move also will allow the wheat commission to improve contact with foreign wheat buyers who come to the Manhattan area as wheat teams to be educated about the benefits of using U.S. wheat instead of wheat from other countries.

The buyers are informed about how the wheat market works,

Graham said, and they also participate in two-week short courses in milling, grain marketing and feed milling. These courses are provided by the International Grains Program, started in 1978 by the wheat commission and the University's Department of Grain Science and Industry.

The Kansas Wheat Commission is a fee-funded agency which receives no tax money from the state's general fund.

"The source of income for the wheat commission comes directly from wheat producers," Graham said.

When a wheat farmer sells a bushel of wheat, the commission receives four mills ($4 per 1,000 bushels). The wheat producers can get a refund if they don't want to support the commission, but Graham said the percentage of refunds have been very low since most producers realize the commission is a benefit to them.

The wheat commission's funds are budgeted into three major areas.

One part goes to the International Grains Program. A second portion funds research aimed at improving the marketability of wheat.

Examples of wheat marketing include increasing protein content of wheat to make it more uniform for baking purposes and developing oriental noodles using U.S. hard, red winter wheat. In the past the winter wheat has been used for bread baking because it contains a large amount of protein which causes it to rise.

A third area of the budget funds the U.S. Wheat Associates, an international organization based in Washington, D.C., which is comprised of all the wheat commissions in the United States.

U.S. Wheat Associates has 14 offices around the world that keep daily contact with foreign buyers, millers, bakers and users of American wheat.

The first wheat commission was begun in Oregon in 1948, while most of the others formed in the 1950s.

Currently there are 14 state wheat commissions from the Great Plains to the Pacific Northwest. The most recent addition is California, and Graham said Arkansas is being considered as a site for a wheat commission.

The Kansas Wheat Commission's new location will be 2630 Claflin Road on leased property owned by the KSU Foundation, Graham said.

The commission has a staff of eight people including the administrator, assistant administrator, agricultural marketing specialist, informational writer, nutritionist, secretary and two account clerks.

Because of family ties and other similar situations, a few of the staff members chose not to make the move, Graham said.

"We will have to hire a few new people," he said. "With any change, especially where something has been the same for many years, you're going to have resistance."

Graham said the overall move, though, has been taken fairly well by everyone involved.

Lewis' style leads Cougars to Seattle

By The Associated Press

Coach Guy V. Lewis of the University of Houston isn't going to change his style now that he's got his fifth-ranked Cougars into the Final Four for the third straight year.

"The biggest thing for a coach is to coach what is right for him," said Lewis, who has taken large doses of criticism despite his years of success with the school.

"I can't coach like Joe B. Hall (of the University of Kentucky) or Bob Knight (of Indiana University). The worst thing for a coach is to try to imitate somebody else's coaching style."

Over the years, Lewis' style has been labeled as undisciplined, and he's been accused of blowing the big games, like last year's championship final to underdog North Carolina State University. This all coming despite his 25 consecutive winning seasons at Houston.

On Saturday, Lewis' Cougars, 31-4, have another big game against unrated University of Virginia, 21-11, in the semifinals of the National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball tournament at Seattle. The victor will take on the winner of the later semifinal between No. 2 Georgetown University, 32-3, and No. 3 Kentucky, 29-4, for the national championship Monday night.

"Most of the people who talk about our program don't know anything about the game, so I don't pay much attention to it," Lewis says.

Houston's top player this season has been All-American Akeem Olatunji, a 7-footer from Nigeria. Olatunji turned in a dominating performance, scoring 29 points, as Houston beat Wake Forest University 68-63 last Sunday to win the Midwest Regional.

Virginia, which finished sixth this season in the Atlantic Coast Conference, won the East Regional by beating Indiana 50-48 last Saturday. Indiana had ousted the region's top-seeded team, No. 1 University of North Carolina, in an earlier round.

The Cavaliers, who entered the tournament with a 17-11 record, are led by point guard Othell Wilson and transfer Rick Carlisle, who had 19 points against Indiana.

Like so many other coaches in similar positions, Virginia's Terry Holland expects the underdog role to work in his favor.

"There's a big difference between being expected to win and not being expected to win," Holland said. "You can see the pressure affect teams favored to win."

While Lewis hasn't let his reputation affect him, Georgetown Coach John Thompson would like to shed the Hoyas' reputation as being thugs. Since the arrival of Patrick Ewing three years ago, Georgetown has been dubbed "The Beast of the East."

"I resent the implications," Thompson said.

Georgetown beat Dayton University 61-49 on Sunday to win the West Regional, and the Hoyas are making their second trip to the Final Four in three years. Georgetown has pinned much of its success on a tough, physical defense, which has held opponents to 39 percent from the field this season.

Against Kentucky, Thompson feels the height of the Hoyas — 7-foot Ewing and 6-foot-10 Ralph Dalton — might offset the twin towers of Kentucky — 7-foot-1 Sam Bowie and 6-foot-11 Melvin Turpin. Kentucky defeated the University of Louisville 54-41 last Saturday to win the Midwest Regional, with Bowie leading the way.

Slow grievance procedure frustrates suspended Wilson

By The Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Willie Wilson of the Kansas City Royals is frustrated with the slow route an appeal of his season-long suspension by baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn is taking through the grievance process.

Wilson's appeal of Kuhn's decision was heard 10 days ago in Tampa, Fla., by Arbitrator Richard Bloch, but the results have not been released.

"I'd just like to know if I can pack my clothes up and go back to New Jersey for a few months, or unpack them and try and help the team," Wilson said Monday. "Just tell me one way or the other. It's not that hard. Hey, just tell me I can play or I can't."

The grievance procedure calls for Bloch to reply within five days after receiving written briefs from the commissioner's office. The commissioner's office filed the briefs Friday — three days later than anticipated so it could be Thursday or Friday before Wilson learns of his fate. Bloch is currently vacationing in Snowbird, Utah.

"If they could just let me know, it'd help me get on with my life. They're not helping me out," Wilson said. "It seems like the people doing all this stuff aren't interested in your life. They're just taking you for granted. That's the frustrating part. It seems like nobody cares. They're supposed to get the papers in at a certain time. We do our part, then they don't do their part."

The speedy center fielder is one of three members of the Royals' 1983 squad currently under one-year suspension by Kuhn. The other two are Willie Aikens and Jerry Martin. Aikens was traded to the Toronto Blue Jays and Martin is in the New York Mets training camp trying to make the 40-man roster.

All three were suspended after pleading guilty to misdemeanor charges of attempting to obtain cocaine. All three served three-month prison terms and were given two years probation along with former teammate Vida Blue.

"I don't know what to think right now," Wilson said. "I'm just going on it's going to be a year. Whatever comes is going to be a surprise. All I want to do is play baseball and earn a living for my family."

Richard tosses final pitch for Houston

By The Associated Press

COCOA, Fla. — J.R. Richard, whose fastball had taken him to the top of the pitching profession before he was felled by a stroke in 1980, was released by the Houston Astros Tuesday, apparently spelling an end to his baseball career.

Richard, 34, had been attempting a major league comeback with the Astros, who invited him to spring training this season as a non-rostered player. Richard's agent, Tom Reich, had said this was Richard's last shot at reclaiming his All-Star career.

Richard had not pitched in any A Team exhibition games and had been signed to a contract with the Astros' Triple A affiliate at Tucson, Ariz.

Richard left the Astros training site immediately after receiving word of his release and could not be reached for comment.

"This was an extremely difficult decision for us," John J. McMullen, Astros chairman of the board, said. "J.R. has been an example to everyone whether they be a baseball fan or not. He has come back from a physical setback which would have made lesser men curtail their activity, but not J.R."

Richard collapsed July 30, 1980 while working out in the Astrodome. He underwent surgery to remove a blood clot from his neck and later had further surgery to remove a blockage in an artery in his shoulder.

Richard later filed suit against doctors who treated him.

Richard compiled a career record of 107-71 and 3.14 earned run average over nine major league seasons. He last pitched competitively at Tucson late last season, compiling an 0-2 record and 13.68 ERA in six starting assignments.

Control of his pitches and slow reflexes had been Richard's major problems in attempting a comeback.

"We don't want J.R. to get hurt and we don't want him to hurt anybody," General Manager Al Rosen told the Houston Post.

Astros pitching coach Les Moss said he was most worried about Richard's control and reaction to line drives hit in his direction.

McMullen said the decision on Richard had been made after several days of discussions with Richard and Reich.

"It is now felt in J.R.'s best interests that he pursue a career other than baseball," McMullen said. "Tom has been very involved in the decision making process regarding J.R. throughout the years and has done an exemplary job in helping this man through some extremely difficult times."

Asked prior to the announcement of his release if he had been treated fairly, Richard said, "What they (the Astros) think and what I think are probably two different things."

Crew team not ready to roll over against KU

The K-State's crew team will host its only home meet when the Wildcats take on the University of Kansas on Saturday at Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

"They (KU) are easily one of the top crews in the Midwest," Coach Pete Hamma said. "They're going to come here looking to beat us easily."

Despite the fact that the Jayhawks racked up nine wins March 17 at the Heart of Texas Regatta, Hamma said his oarsmen aren't ready to "give up the ship."

"We'll give them our best shot every time we see them," Hamma said. "We'll be facing them four of the next five weekends."

Hamma said he plans some lineup changes in the eight-man varsity crew for Saturday's meet.

"We'll have two new faces rowing this week. We're a young crew. We essentially have five novices on the varsity eight — KU has none."

Hamma said the best chances for Wildcat victories are in the novice races.

The first race will begin at 10 a.m. with the men's novice, followed by the women's novice and the men's varsity.

The best spot for viewing the races is at the boathouse cove on the east side of the lake, Hamma said.

The Kansas crew races in carbon fiber shells, while the K-State crew uses heavier, wooden ones, he said.

The K-State crew team is currently trying to raise money for the purchase of a new carbon fiber shell. The cost of the new boat is $10,000.

"We're looking for 100 people to donate $100," said Don Rose, assistant crew coach.

"We're planning on having an auction in April in front of the Union or in the courtyard," he said.

"It's been at least ten years since we've had a new racing shell, and since then they've changed from making the boats out of wood to carbon fiber, which is lighter and faster," Rose said.

Rose compared the racing of wooden shells against carbon fiber shells to a pole vaulter who vaulted with a wooden pole instead of a carbon one. "It's (modern equipment) one of the tools you've got to have," he said.

Physical play worries Michigan coach

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The University of Michigan vs. the University of Notre Dame.

You can smell the coals burning at the tailgate parties. The leaves are falling in South Bend and Ann Arbor.

Their meeting Wednesday night, however, will be on 33rd Street in New York, indoors, with the players wearing shorts and sneakers and the 47th National Invitation Tournament title at stake. Then why all the talk about football?

"(Bo) Schembechler and (Gerry) Faust would love to see this game," said Digger Phelps, Notre Dame basketball coach, referring to Michigan's and Notre Dame's football coaches, respectively.

Michigan Coach Bill Frieder seemed especially concerned about the matchup of the sophomore centers, 6-foot-10, 195-pound Roy Tarpley of the Wolverines, and Notre Dame's 6-foot-9, 245-pound Tim Kempton.

"I'm concerned about their physical play," Frieder said of the 21-11 Fighting Irish. "Watching Kempton scares me. You take a skinny kid like Roy Tarpley and he runs into Kempton on a screen and he may not get up. I mean I'm scared. Kempton fouls you and you end up on the floor and you don't make the basket and you usually don't make the free throws."

Pass out the helmets and break out the footballs.

"It's going to be very tough, very physical inside," Michigan's freshman guard Antoine Joubert said.

The Wolverines' big guys didn't need much help in their 78-75 semifinal victory over Virginia Tech Monday night. Michigan, 22-10, outbounced the Hokies 41-25 with 6-foot-11 forward Tim McCormick leading the way with 12. He was followed by Tarpley, who led the Wolverines with 23 points, including the clinching free throws with 45 seconds remaining, and 6-foot-7, 230-pound reserve Butch Wade with 11 each.

"Their ability to dominate both boards and their depth are my biggest concerns," Phelps said. "Then you have to worry about the penetration of Eric Turner and when Joubert turns it on he's as good as any freshman guard in the country."

Joubert came through for Michigan in two ways against Virginia Tech. In addition to his 17 points, he was credited with stopping Hokies' guard Dell Curry who scored 16 of his game-high 24 points in the first half.

"We struggled in the first half defensively," Frieder said of the 44-40 deficit he faced at halftime. "We usually play better than that. Turner did a good job on Curry for six, eight minutes in the second half and then Joubert had to push him out the rest of the night."

Joubert's concern in the championship game will be Notre Dame's Tom Sluby, who finished with 26 points in the 65-59 Irish victory over Southwestern Louisiana University.

"Sluby will probably try to take me inside and mix it up," Joubert said. "Curry just shot those long bombs."

Virginia Tech, 21-13, and Southwestern Louisiana, 23-9, will meet in the consolation game.

Late-inning comeback gives Kansas City win

By The Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Utility man Orlando Sanchez singled home the game-winning run in the bottom of the eighth inning Tuesday as the Kansas City Royals rallied to defeat the Atlanta Braves 4-3 in an inter-league exhibition baseball game.

Frank White opened the rally by singling to left field with one out in the eighth and took second when Jerry Royster bobbled the ball for an error. He came home on a double by Don Slaught, tying the game at 3-3. Sanchez, a catcher and backup first baseman in his first year with the Royals, then singled home Slaught with what proved to be the game-winning hit.

Reliever Keith Creel, who came on in the eighth inning, set down the Braves in order in the ninth to pick up the win. Steve Bedrosian was the loser.

The Royals opened the scoring in the fourth on a single by White and three walks by starter Rick Camp, but the Braves tied the game in the fifth on a run-scoring single by Randy Johnson.

Royster had an RBI-double in the sixth and rookie Steve Currie added a run-scoring single in the seventh to put Atlanta on top, 3-1.

The Royals cut the margin to 3-2 in the bottom half of the seventh when Darryl Motley grounded out to drive home Butch Davis, who opened the inning with a triple.

African leaders survive unrest of times Tuition

By The Associated Press

A generation after they led Africa to independence, half a dozen revolutionaries survive as national leaders, a remarkable record of longevity on this turbulent continent.

Age, a dozen wars and more than 50 coups have taken a toll of the men who guided the guerrilla struggles and negotiations that threw off European colonial rule and established 50 independent nations of 400 million people.

The latest to fall is Ahmed Sekou Toure of Guinea, who died Monday in Cleveland, Ohio.

The survivors preside over differing political and economic systems — dictatorships and one-party democracies, Marxism and free enterprise. For some, military force plays a key role in forestalling or quelling dissent.

But these leaders face a common problem: how to promote well-being among some of the world's poorest and fastest-growing populations.

At least two survivors — presidents Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia and Julius Nyerere of Tanzania — stand as elder statesmen, with influence in African affairs that goes far beyond their national borders.

Sekou Toure was known as one of the earliest and most vigorous opponents of French rule.

He became president in 1958, a year after Kwame Nkrumah, whose pan-African rhetoric inspired nationalists across the continent, led Ghana to independence from Britain.

Nkrumah, exiled after a coup, died in Guinea in 1972.

Others of that first generation who have died include President Jomo Kenyatta of Kenya, who welcomed British aid and allied his country with the West; King Sobhuza II of Swaziland, once the world's longest-reigning monarch; and President Agostinho Neto, who put Angola solidly in the pro-Soviet bloc.

Two have solved Africa's perennial problem of how to hand over power by retiring. President Leopold Senghor led Senegal to independence from France in 1960, resigned in 1981 and lives on the French Riviera, giving lectures on Africa.

Amadou Ahidjo resigned as president in 1982 after governing Cameroon for all its 22 years of independence and lives in France. A military court condemned him to death last month for allegedly plotting a comeback; Ahidjo's hand-picked successor, Paul Biya, commuted the sentence to a period of detention.

The survivors include:

— Kaunda, 59, one-time teacher and peacemaker in many African disputes. He speaks strongly against white-ruled South Africa's race-separation policies but advocates discussions with South Africa as a means of encouraging change.

Kaunda was host last month to a South African-Angolan meeting that led to a disengagement of South African forces from southern Angola, where they were stationed against guerrillas seeking independence for South-West Africa, or Namibia. He plays a guitar at political meetings, cries publicly when moved and once threatened to resign if Zambians didn't stop drinking.

— Nyerere, 62, a teacher who translated Shakespeare into Swahili, became the only black African leader to overthrow a neighbor when his army ousted Ugandan dictator Idi Amin in 1979. He became a leading theoretician of African-style Socialism, which advocated the enforced creation of communal villages and the elimination of economic privilege.

Tanzania's increasing economic difficulties and corruption in state control boards led Nyerere recently to admit that the system was working poorly and to reinstate some private incentives.

— Hastings Kamuzu Banda, a former doctor and life president of Malawi, about 85. The landlocked nation of 6 million lacks mineral resources but it is one of the few African countries that feeds itself. Banda employs authoritarian methods, including the banning of skirts above the knee and long hair for men, and tells visitors he is happy that Malawians have largely achieved the goals he set for them — enough food, clothing, and houses that don't leak when it rains.

— Habib Bourguiba, life president of Tunisia, 80. He has become one of the world's longest-ruling chiefs of state since obtaining independence from France in 1956. Despite heavy-handed methods and increasing health problems, his followers still accord him an unfading hero-worship.

— Milton Obote, prime minister of Uganda, 60, one of the few African leaders to make a comeback. He led Uganda out of British rule in 1962 but was overthrown by Amin in 1971 and spent eight years in Tanzanian exile before Nyerere defeated Amin.

— Felix Houphouet-Boigny, president of Ivory Coast, 78. Following independence in 1960, he retained French aid and technicians; Ivory Coast remained one of the most economically successful countries in west Africa.

And a younger group has remained at the top of nations which gained independence in later years. Among them:

— Samora Machel, president of Mozambique, 50. His guerrilla movement installed socialism after the Portuguese withdrew in 1975, but Machel, facing drought and economic failures, concluded a non-aggression pact with South Africa this month that is expected to open the way for South African investment and Western influence.

— Robert Mugabe, prime minister of Zimbabwe, 60. A leader in the black revolt against white rule in Rhodesia, he was elected president in 1980.

"Faculty salaries haven't kept up with inflation," Quehl said.

"Our salaries are basically in the cellar by national standards," Richard Rhoda, of the Tennessee State University and Community College System, said.

To bring them up, Tennessee colleges hope to raise tuitions by as much as 10 percent for next year, while the state legislature ponders increasing state higher education funding by 12 percent, Rhoda said.

Nationwide, state support for colleges has risen 14 percent over the last two years, according to M.M. Chambers of Illinois State University's periodic surveys of state higher education funding.

But those average increases apparently have not been enough to compensate for severe cutbacks in the amount of money campuses received from the federal government since 1980.

Consequently, many schools are now asking their students to pay a higher percentage of what it costs to educate them.

Administrators figure it's "reasonable" for tuition to cover about 25 percent of the cost of education, with state, federal and private monies paying for the rest, Joseph Marks of the Southern Regional Education Board, said.

But recent audits in 14 southern states found tuition covered only about 19 percent of a student's annual education costs.

The study convinced many southern schools to raise tuition rates rapidly.

West Virginia students now pay 73 percent more in tuition than they did three years ago, although their rates were relatively low at the time.

The University of Georgia has imposed 15 percent tuition hikes for three straight years, Marks said, and Louisiana State University has increased tuition 38 percent over two years to bring student contributions up to near the 25 percent mark.

Yet at Washington State, students already pay 33 percent of the costs of their education.

"You can really look at this in two ways," Dennis Martin of the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators, said.

"You can look at it as raising tuition at two or three times the inflation rate, and you can wonder how people figure what the inflation rate is, or you can see that the percentage (tuition) increases for next year are much lower than last year's," he said.

Committee discusses drinking-age increase

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A conference committee nearly reached tentative agreement Wednesday on a bill to raise Kansas' legal age for drinking 3.2 percent beer to 19, but broke up without finalizing its report in order to try to persuade one of its members to return and participate.

Part of the tentative agreement was to make the age change effective July 1 this year, but exempt young people who turn 18 before that date. If their 18th birthdays fell before July 1, 1984, they would be allowed to go to taverns, and buy and drink 3.2 beer. Those with birthdays after June 30 would have to wait until they are 19.

Sen. Richard Gannon, D-Goodland, stormed out of the meeting after accusing his fellow conference committee members of apparently violating the state's Open Meetings Law by conferring in unannounced sessions on the bill.

The chairman of the six-member conference committee, Rep. Robert H. Miller, R-Wellington, and Sen. Paul Hess, R-Wichita, chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee who also is on the conference committee, both vehemently denied Gannon's allegation.

They said no more than two members of the conference committee ever talked about a proposed agreement ahead of Wednesday's formal meeting. It would take discussions involving three of the six members to constitute a violation of the law.

Gannon said he believed prior discussions had "impugned the integrity of the Legislature," and said he would not be party to "violating the law."

The Goodland Democrat said he had no evidence of violations but that members of the attorney general's staff were "very interested" in what has happened.

"I can't say (that violations have occurred)," said Gannon. "I don't know what they've done. I wasn't privy to anything. I just know it's very strange that Tuesday they brought a copy of a report to me that already had five signatures on it."

Hess and the Rev. Richard E. Taylor Jr., president of Kansans for Life at Its Best, the state's temperance organization, both claimed Gannon opposes raising the beer drinking age and was trying to cloud the issue by making the Open Meetings Law violation allegation.

Gannon confirmed to reporters that he opposes raising the drinking age, but said there are things some of his fellow senators badly want included in the liquor bill and he considered it his solemn duty to fight to be included in deliberations on the bill so he could represent their views.

Gannon and Senate Minority Leader Jack Steineger of Kansas City sent one letter and Sen. Ed Reilly, R-Leavenworth, sent another, both asking Attorney

Democrats clash in New York debate

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Democratic front-runners clashed Wednesday night in an intense and angry debate, with Walter Mondale demanding Gary Hart withdraw ads "that suggest I'm out trying to kill kids." Hart responded: "Why do you question my commitment to arms control and civil rights?"

Their angry exchange was the climax of a 60-minute, prime-time debate six days before the crucial New York presidential primary.

"Why do you run those ads...when you know better?" Mondale asked Hart. "I'm a person who believes in peace."

A few moments later the former vice president said, "I think you ought to pull those ads down this night."

Hart countered by asking Mondale: "Why have you questioned my commitment to arms control and civil rights when you know I have just as much commitment to both of those as you do?"

The third candidate, the Rev. Jesse Jackson, said, "Tomorrow the issue will be this rat-a-tat (between Hart and Mondale) without giving a direction. The fact is, the reason they are having this kind of a kinship struggle is because there are such similarities in policy. It's a matter of both running in the same direction just a little slower."

The candidates met in Low Auditorium at Columbia University. The debate was sponsored by CBS and moderated by Dan Rather.

"Tonight we started showing where the beef is," Mondale said following the debate.

Hart and Mondale lost little time going after each other over votes on the windfall profits tax and the Chrysler bailout legislation, but the question that dominated the debate was when and where to commit U.S. combat forces.

They agreed they would defend West European allies, but differed over Central America and the oil-rich Persian Gulf.

Hart said, "I think some of us learned a lesson from Vietnam, and that is military might in the third world is not always going to work. That's why I disagree with Vice President Mondale on Central America and elsewhere."

Mondale said he opposed President Reagan's policies in Central America but there was difference between that and "just pulling the plug and walking out of there."

Hart said Mondale was willing to "sacrifice American lives" in a war for Persian Gulf oil and added, "I don't think we ought to lose American lives fighting for someone else's oil."

"Don't worry about Walter Mondale and American lives," said the former vice president. "I'll stand strong there."

Hours before the debate, Hart had a private meeting with French President Francois Mitterrand. The session was requested by Mitterrand.

In a speech to a Wall Street audience, Hart denounced the Reagan administration as "one of the worst in this nation's history in terms of presidential leadership demanding those who serve in high public office to meet the highest standards of ethics and commitment to public stewardship."

"I think it is time we had people serving in the public interest and not their own private interest."

Hart called on Reagan to withdraw the nomination of Edwin Meese III to be attorney general.

Senate passes regent schools' funding

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Senate gave first-round approval Wednesday to a measure providing $617 million to operate the state university system and the Kansas Technical Institute next year, including money for a 7 percent salary increase for faculty members.

The bill also would provide an additional $24.6 million to the six universities, KTI and the Board of Regents Office for capital improvement projects.

As approved by the Senate, the bill appropriates nearly $1.9 million more than the House version of the proposal and about $250,000 more than recommended by Gov. John Carlin. A final roll call vote on the measure is scheduled on Thursday.

Of the total funding, $305.7 million comes from general fund revenues. The remainder is from other sources including fees and federal funds.

The higher education bill provides general operating money for the seven institutions under the control of the regents for the 1985 fiscal year, which begins July 1. It does not include money for salary increases for classified employees such as clerks and secretarial workers. The amount of the pay increase will be decided later in a separate bill. Carlin has recommended a 5 percent increase, which would cost $5.6 million.

The measure does provide for a 7 percent faculty salary increase, a 5 percent salary increase for student workers, a 7 percent increase for utility expenses and an 8 percent increase for other operating expenses, which includes some building maintenance and equipment purchases.

Carlin had recommended a 6 percent faculty salary increase and 5 percent increase in other operating expenses, but the House boosted both by 1 percent. The governor had recommended an 8 percent increase for utilities, but that was cut. Carlin's recommendation for student hourly salaries was accepted by the Legislature.

Here is the total funding for the regents' institutions as approved by the Senate and as recommended by Carlin:

- University of Kansas, $153.5 million; $152.5 million.
- KU Medical Center, $159.4 million; $159.5 million.

- Kansas State University, $151.3 million; $150.9 million.
- K-State Veterinary Medical Center, $8.4 million; $8.4 million.
- Wichita State University, $60.4 million; $59.7 million.
- Fort Hays State University, $25.6 million; $25.4 million.
- Emporia State University, $25 million; $24.9 million.
- Pittsburg State University, $23 million; $22.9 million.
- Kansas Technical Institute, $3.6 million; $3.7 million.
- Regents' Office, $6.7 million; $6.6 million.

Even without money for classified employee salary raises, the Senate-approved measure would provide a $19.3 million increase in total funding for the institutions over last year.

No objections were raised to the proposal during debate, and no attempts were made to increase funding.

Water supply may diminish in plains area

By DIONA NACE
Collegian Reporter

A readily available source of water is important for any farmer. But to people in the High Plains Region, which includes western Kansas, whose agriculture-based economy has come to depend on irrigation, a water source may be depleting quickly.

David Kromm, professor of geography, and Stephen White, head of the Department of Geography, have completed nearly half of a two-year study to be an independent supplement to the federally-funded High Plains Ogalla Aquifer Study released a year ago.

Natural recharge of the aquifer (an underground water supply) is minimal, and withdrawal for irrigation is depleting it. The High Plains study estimated regional dependence on the aquifer projected probable consequences of water management alternatives and examined the possibilities of importing water into the area.

Based on previous research into response to ground water depletion in southwestern Kansas, Kromm and White said they feel the High Plains study was incomplete. They said it failed to assess the feasibility of management options in terms of differences in local water management arrangements and it ignored perceptions held by residents of the region.

Kromm and White said they perceive what will eventually happen with the aquifer not only depends on economic and technical conditions as investigated by the High Plains study, but also on the knowledge, preferences and actions of the residents in the troubled area.

About 3,000 people in the High Plains region, which includes areas in six states, are receiving questionnaires from Kromm and White to help the researchers determine public perceptions of the water depletion problem and how they would like to see it managed.

Kromm and White said they have randomly selected names of residents in 14 counties where there is concern about water shortages.

These counties are Lamb, Gaines and Hansford counties in Texas; Finney, Wichita and Thomas counties in Kansas; Dawson, Holt, Chase and Sheridan counties in Nebraska; Texas County in Oklahoma; Yuma and Kit Carson counties in Colorado and Curry County in New Mexico.

The questionnaire will determine

Senate to review plan for Salvadoran aid cut

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A Democratic leader Wednesday predicted Senate approval of a compromise $61.7 million military aid package for El Salvador, but Secretary of State George P. Shultz said he would resist any move to cut off the aid if the government now being chosen is overthrown in a military coup.

"I think it is not necessary and is inappropriate to seem to be predicting that possibility," Shultz said. "The military in El Salvador has gone to great lengths to depoliticize themselves. I don't see any evidence of anything to the contrary."

Shultz made his remarks to the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that oversees the State Department budget.

Sen. Dale Bumpers, D-Ark., said he had heard speculation about a possible coup if centrist presidential candidate Jose Napoleon Duarte, who led in Sunday's first round of voting in El Salvador, is elected in a runoff expected to be held in May.

He asked Shultz if he would support an amendment to cut off aid in that event. "No, sir," Shultz said.

The Senate is expected to vote this week on a bill that would provide $61.7 million in emergency military aid to El Salvador in the current fiscal year. The Appropriations Committee approved $93 million in aid by a close vote earlier this month, but the Reagan administration compromised on the lower figure after Senate Democrats threatened to delay action.

Congress has already approved $64.8 million in military aid for the Central American nation in this fiscal year, but ordered that $20 million of it could not be spent until there is a trial and verdict in the case of four American churchwomen murdered in El Salvador in December 1980.

Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, D-Hawaii, the sponsor of the compromise measure, told reporters, "It's going to pass." Inouye is chairman of a Democratic task force on Central America and senior Democrat on the appropriations subcommittee that handles foreign spending.

Inouye said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., indicated in a meeting of the task force that he plans to offer an amendment to provide only enough money to last through May, withholding further installments until after the runoff when the makeup of the new government is known.

Meanwhile, Rep. Clarence Long, D-Md., chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations, said, "I am concerned that we need them (the Salvadoran regime) more than they need us, and we are going to continue to give them arms no matter how atrocious their behavior is."

Meese fails to report gift, violates law, CBS discovers

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — White House Counselor Edwin Meese III accepted a pair of $375 cuff links given to him by the South Korean government and failed to report it or turn the gift over to the government as required by law, CBS reported Wednesday.

In another allegation against President Reagan's nominee to be attorney general, the network said Meese received the jewelry while accompanying the president on a 1983 trip to South Korea and didn't hand in the gift until Wednesday, after CBS raised the issue.

Under federal law, officials have 60 days to give up gifts exceeding $140 from foreign powers. CBS said White House aides Michael K. Deaver and James A. Baker and National Security Adviser Robert C. McFarlane received similar cuff links from the South Koreans, but handed them in within the time limit.

CBS quoted White House aides as saying that Meese had not returned the cuff links because he had been told that the South Koreans had been advised not to provide gifts worth more than $140.

White House spokeswoman Kim Hoggard refused to comment on the CBS report.

The latest report follows a justice department decision to ask for a special prosecutor to investigate other charges raised against Meese since his nomination to be attorney general was sent to the Senate for confirmation.

Nutrition, fitness experts to speak

K-State experts on nutrition and exercise will be the featured speakers for a "Let's Talk About It" program at noon today in the Union Catskeller.

The program is directed to those planning to begin an exercise program to get in shape.

Featured speakers will be Connie Bachofer, senior in foods and nutrition in business-community service; Ronald Bulbulian, assistant professor of health, physical education and leisure studies and Martha Olson, dietitian at Lafene Student Health Center.

The "Let's Talk About It" series deals with current events and controversial issues on campus and is sponsored by the Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee. The public is invited.

Royal Purple wins five-star rating

The 1983 "Royal Purple," K-State's yearbook, has received a five-star rating from the Associate Collegiate Press.

The book, who's editor last year was Jean Nicholson, senior in management, next goes to Pacemaker competition. It will be screened by judges who select the nation's top trend-setting collegiate publications.

The University holds the record of 30 consecutive yearbook All-American awards, a feat unmatched by any other university.

Associate editor for the book was Donna Osborn, who graduated in December with a degree in journalism.

The Associate Collegiate Press "Yearbook Guidebook," a publication dealing with yearbook editing, made four references to the "Royal Purple." It was cited for outstanding graphic layout, photography, feature writing and sports writing.

Foundation promotes staffer

Art Loub, executive vice president of the KSU Foundation, has announced the promotion of staff member Rusty Andrews to the position of director of corporate and foundation relations.

Andrews moves into the post after serving as the assistant director of annual giving since January 1983.

In the new position, Andrews will concentrate on the corporation aspects of fund raising for the University. He will deal with contributions from the various corporations, foundations and trusts with which the University has or can develop contacts. In addition to his other duties, Andrews also will manage the operation of the Foundation's computer systems.

Andrews came to the Foundation with a background in higher education and broadcasting. After two years in Wichita with the Kansas State Network, working in television and radio, he moved to Manhattan, where he served for three years as the director of public relations at Manhattan Christian College.

Professor appointed to board

Dennis Day, professor of landscape architecture, has been appointed to the Landscape Architectural Accrediting Board.

The board is responsible for accrediting schools that have landscape architecture programs, he said.

Day will serve a three-year term along with eight other individuals on the board.

To be appointed to the board, Day was first nominated by the president of the American Society of Landscape Architecture. After undergoing a clearing process and being confirmed by the consul on education, members are appointed by the ASLA to the position.

The board, which evaluates about 45 schools which are currently accredited, meets three or four times a year. The schools are accredited for five years, unless a program warrants a re-evaluation before the term is completed.

Associate professor wins award

Don Lindley, associate professor of leisure studies, is the 1984 recipient of the Distinguished Professional Service Award, the highest professional award given by the Kansas Recreation and Parks Association.

Recipients of the award are selected for state, regional and national experience in recreation and parks, leadership in developing recreation and parks programs and service to the professional organization.

Lindley, a therapeutic recreation specialist, is a consultant to community leisure service agencies.

He completed the National Workshop for Accreditation Visitation Evaluation, sponsored by the National Council on Accreditation, during the 1983 NRPA Congress.

Renewed search outrages students

College continues hunt for president

By The College Press Service

NORTH ADAMS, Mass. — Thanks largely to a technicality, the leaders of 2,000-student North Adams State College have decided to junk the results of an eight-month, $17,000 search for a new president and start over again.

A storm protest, much of it aimed at getting the school's trustees to resign, may convince the leaders to junk that decision too, however.

In early March, the 10 trustees could not agree which of the final four candidates — culled by a search committee from among 170 applicants — to elect as president, and instead voted to re-open the search from scratch.

Outrage followed.

More than half the student body and school faculty signed petitions demanding the trustees choose a new president from among the four finalists. The petitions asked for the trustees' resignation if they didn't comply.

Trustee Chairman Carmen Massimiano was "bitterly disappointed over the failure of the board to select a new president, and the apparent unwillingness of the trustees to compromise."

"I could hardly believe what happened that night," said Trustee Margaret Lanoue.

All trustees said the finalists were well-qualified, but blame an odd "70-point system" of electing a new leader for the stalemate.

Under the system, which Lanoue endorsed as a means of avoiding making the presidential selection into a mere popularity contest, the 10 trustees would award from three to 10 points to each candidate. Using secret ballots, the election would end when one of the candidates amassed 70 points.

But after three ballots, none of the candidates had garnered enough points, and the trustees could agree only to discard the finalists they had and start the search procedure over again.

Campus reaction was heated. Both the student government and the Faculty Senate launched petition drives. Both pledged to sit in at the next trustees' meeting until the trustees agreed to elect one of the original finalists.

But at last week's meeting, the trustees merely accepted the petitions and pledged to debate the issue at their next meeting.

In the interim, some of the trustees seem to have changed their minds.

"I'd like to see one of these four candidates selected," said William Napolitano, a trustee who served on the search committee.

Lanoue said only that she hopes the issue will be resolved soon.

Correction

The Collegian couldn't win at the numbers game Wednesday. In the article "University tuition rate tops inflation," it was incorrectly reported that Vice President of Business Affairs Daniel Beatty said that the Kansas Legislature passed a 3.29 percent cut in the University's base budget in July 1982. He actually said that a $3.29 million cut was passed.

The article "Risk of cancer may be reduced with proper diet, researcher says," incorrectly stated that Robert Reeves, associate professor of foods and nutrition and K-State cancer researcher, works with 200 students who are performing research on the effects of a high fiber, high fat diet on the incidence of colon tumors. There are actually two students performing the research.

The same article quoted Reeves as saying, "High fat diets are supposed to promote tumor growth. If Americans could further modify their diet, they could reduce their risk of cancer." The quote should have been, "High fat diets are supposed to be promoters of tumor growth, rather than initiators. If Americans modified their dietary fat intake, they may reduce their risk of cancer."

In the article "Mayor says house-moving fee to change," it was incorrectly stated that City Manager Don Harmon proposed creating a fee for moving houses of $100.20 per square foot of floor area moved. Harmon actually proposed a $100 fee in addition to 20 cents per square foot of floor space moved.

Students sue for negligence; schools forced to raise costs

By The College Press Service

ROCKY MOUNT, N.C. — After a December 1980 night basketball game, a non-student, Kermit Smith, jumped three North Carolina Wesleyan College cheerleaders as they were leaving the gym parking lot.

Smith forced them into his car at knife point and drove them to a nearby quarry.

There, he raped and then murdered 20-year-old Wheellette Venita Collins. When he turned to free and attack the other two women, however, he was overpowered by them. They fled to safety.

Smith was later caught and convicted. He's now in prison, on death row.

North Carolina Wesleyan, however, is still on trial.

The two survivors of the nightmare sued for a second time last December, almost three years to the day after the tragedy, claiming the college negligently contributed to the crime by not providing adequate security or lighting in the gym parking lot.

Students, in fact, are taking their colleges to court in increasing numbers recently, observers said, charging them with negligence in mishaps ranging from minor cuts to rape and murder.

The suits lead to higher education costs, strict new rules for students, defensive administrators and even a sense of lost collegiality.

But the cases continue anyway. A court recently made Ohio University pay damages to a student who, while trying to open a jammed dorm window, shattered the glass and cut himself.

In mid-January, a student paralyzed in a University of Denver fraternity house trampoline accident took his university to court, claiming DU was responsible for the accident.

A court last fall held Notre Dame liable for injuries suffered by a student who got drunk at the football stadium and fell over a railing.

The "creeping legalism," as some administrators call it, has affected many types of schools.

Seventy-two percent of the schools belonging to the Christian College Coalition, for example, have been sued by their students recently.

"One would have thought that the Christian mission of these colleges and the Christian commitments of their constituencies would have mitigated the litigious approach to resolving differences, complaints and wrongs," said Dr. W. Richard Stephens, Greenville College. Stephens oversaw a study of suits against coalition colleges.

"Ohio State," reported OSU presidential assistant Larry Thompson, "has had three suits in the last month."

Sheldon Steinbach, lawyer for the American Council on Education, said, "Universities are increasingly being held liable for the well-being of their students."

The suits, he said, are "a part of modern society. We're an increasingly litigious society."

"Society is changing," said Amos Link, attorney for the murdered North Carolina Wesleyan cheerleader's family. "These atrocities may have always been occurring, but people may not have been as conscious of their rights and have not been doing anything about it."

"We have more attorneys than any other country in the world and they have to find something to do," said University of Denver Dean of Students, Bob Burrell.

"Unless laws are changed to not let lawyers handle the cases on a contingency basis, there will be no relief," said Charles Grier, Brigham Young's insurance overseer. "Lawyers file $4 million suits, expecting to receive half of it."

Colleges don't always lose the cases, of course.

Hammond said a 1979 Delaware Valley College case established that schools must make students aware of potential physical hazards and must apply "minimum standards of care" in maintaining their campuses.

But colleges are otherwise not responsible for the actions of third parties, he said.

And a 1979 study of how public institutions — including some colleges — negligence trials ended found the institutions won 54 percent, said Jeannine Squaric of Jury Verdict Research in Solon, Ohio.

"These suits need to be handled, even if ruled in your favor," Thompson said. "Lawyers don't come for free. No question it has to increase the cost of education."

The rash of lawsuits has other effects. The University of Kentucky's student government, for instance, recently backed off funding an escort service for fear of a negligence suit if it was unable to protect a student from an attack.

Notre Dame banned alcohol from campus recently in part because it feared being liable for drinking-related accidents at the school.

"You might try to get away from activities like sororities and fraternities," said Denver attorney Victor Quinn. "The leases are long-term, but when they run out, the university could tell them 'We don't want you on our property.' That's that."

"It sets up a more combative environment, a less collegiate environment," OSU's Thompson said. "In the past, it was not in good taste to sue your institution. There isn't that closeness anymore."

Court settles in favor of college, denies student due process right

By The College Press Service

NEW YORK — Striking down a lower court decision that would have resulted in sweeping changes in the ways colleges discipline their students, the New York Supreme Court Appellate Division last week ruled that students' constitutional rights to due process don't always apply to disciplinary procedures.

The court said a student at the State University of New York at Cortland did not have a right to have an attorney to represent her or to a review of written transcripts of the university's decision to suspend her for a semester.

SUNY officials accused her of cheating twice.

But whether or not she had cheated was never the real issue. "The student admitted the first time she was caught cheating that she had plagiarized an essay," said Peter Crary, SUNY lawyer.

The issue instead was how closely the disciplinary proceedings she went through had to resemble courtroom procedures.

At SUNY's campuses, the colleges must give students written notice of the charges against them, provide an open hearing in which the student can call one witness and provide students with a notice of what final penalties, if any, are imposed on them.

This student, Marguerite Moresco, asserted she was entitled to the same professional representation and review of the written proceedings she would have in protecting herself in a civil or criminal court.

New York's state Supreme Court — which is not the state's highest court — agreed with the student.

But then the appellate court sided with SUNY, saying the student's rights in a "collegial atmosphere" were "best served by a nonadversarial setting" without dueling lawyers and transcripts.

Richard Shay, the student's attorney, could not be reached for comment.

SUNY, however, is "quite satisfied" with the decision, Crary said.

He said letting a student take a lawyer into disciplinary hearings and providing transcripts of the

6,000 to 7,000 disciplinary hearings a year on the SUNY campuses would place "an absolutely intolerable burden on the university."

"Due process does not require a full adversarial hearing," Crary said. "The student had the right to confront witnesses, be represented by someone in the college community and receive complete written charges against her."

Yet in many school discipline situations, the legal cards are already stacked against students, the authors of a new book about school discipline argue.

"School systems rarely have discipline cases that wind up in court," said Ellen Jane Hollingsworth, co-author of "School Discipline," which was published in January.

"The constitutional protections of the student's rights are not really very broad anyway," she said. "A student threatened with suspension only has the right to tell his or her side of the story. The principal can listen, then suspend the student anyway."

a resident's knowledge of the aquifer and its relation to the regional economy; his perception of issues regarding ground water depletion and its possible economic, social and environmental consequences; and his perception of the range of the choices in adjusting to problems associated with ground water depletion.

Kromm, a natural resources specialist, and White, a population geographer, have documented the existing laws and the ground water management districts and agencies that operate in the six states. They are presenting this data as a list of various alternative management strategies and institutional arrangements to people living in the selected counties.

Questionnaire recipients constitute a wide spectrum of people who depend on water from the aquifer.

Preference variability will be measured in terms of socioeconomic characteristics, location and water management institutional arrangements.

Kromm and White said they will compare their findings with those of the High Plains study to see if they correlate and adequately reflect the knowledge and preferences of regional residents and point up any regional differences of opinion.

The study itself will be completed in July 1985, Kromm said, but a preliminary survey of results will be compiled and released this summer. After the study is completed, a brochure will be prepared reporting their conclusions and policy recommendations from analyzing the survey results.

The brochure will be distributed through the cooperative extension services and water research institutes in each of the states in the High Plains region.

Panel passes 'whistleblowing' bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — After rejecting a proposal to protect faculty members from disciplinary action if they contact their legislators or report illegal activities, a Senate committee approved a "whistleblower" bill Wednesday which would protect classified employees from such retaliation.

Under the bill, which has passed the House and now goes to the Senate floor for debate and action, no state agency supervisor could prohibit a classified employee from discussing the agency with legislators or from reporting any violations of state or federal law or regulation.

Speaking before the Senate Governmental Organization Committee, Kauffman defended the regents against allegations that some faculty members had been prohibited from contacting their legislators. The regents request only that faculty members who wish to appear before legislative committees "inform the board of their intent to appear," he said.

Lynelle King, executive director of the Kansas State Nurses Association, said some members of the nursing faculty at Wichita State University had been told to stop contacting their legislators about nursing legislation.

"If there is a problem," Kauffman said, "I say to the Kansas State Nursing Association that we want to sit down and work it out with them. But including unclassified faculty in this bill is totally unnecessary."

The committee had discussed at its hearing Tuesday the proposal by the nursing group and the Kansas Association of Public Employees to include faculty members in the provisions of the bill.

Faculty members "are covered under the tenure contract and the tenure board," said Sen. Frank Gaines, D-Augusta. "If you change the bill to include unclassified faculty, you're putting them under the Civil Service Board."

The bill would allow classified employees to appeal to the state Civil Service Board when they believe they have been fired, transferred or demoted for conferring with legislators or reporting illegal activities.

A holy different thing

Manhattan is missing out. In Wichita, cable subscribers can get a channel devoted to Christian programming featuring Jim Bakker and his wife Tammy Faye. One of Bakker's goals is to build Heritage USA, a city for Christians. Construction has begun in Charlotte, N.C.

According to the program, someone who donates $1,000 can become a lifetime partner in the PTL (Praise the Lord) club. This entitles the member to three nights and four days in the Heritage hotel once a year for the rest of his life. For the rest of their days, members can vacation and be absolved of sins at the same time (and not have to associate with sinners).

But that's not all that is offered on this television program. For a small statue of David slaying Goliath to sit on your coffee table, just send $125 to Bakker. There are cassette tapes of the Bible that can be purchased for a minimum pledge of $15 per month — if you act right now you can still get the first cassette tape of Genesis!

There also is an album by Tammy Faye available, but if you don't have any money, just write that you are praying for Jim and a medallion will be sent to you (one way of getting your address on their mailing list).

Bakker was real excited about raising money for PTL's new project — sending up its own satellite so everyone who wants to can "feed their family" Christian programming 24 hours a day. The station will feature its own programs and news events so a Christian viewer will never need to change channels.

Can you imagine? A person could watch PTL and get all the information he needs to know. But if its programming quality is anything like the show on March 25, people won't get their money's worth.

The first 15 minutes of the hour-long show was a progress report about construction of Heritage USA. Instead of a commercial, there was a saxophone solo. Then Bakker started listing the ways people could contribute to his cause. This took an additional 15 minutes. Tammy Faye sang "Amazing Grace" two or three times, during which the television audience was asked to get out their checkbooks. Then it was back to Bakker for a prayer.

But before the prayer, Bakker repeated how to make the lifetime pledge, buy the cassette Bible, statue of David or record album, and asked the telephone operators (standing by) to relate some of the telephone pledges. Then he and Tammy Faye said goodbye to the audience and asked them to keep up on their pledges.

Bakker never did pray with the audience. He was so busy reiterating what the audience could get for their money that he missed the whole point of the show. No scripture was read, no sermon preached and only one song was sung. Bakker is missing an important point of Christian life. Prayer should be a vital part of Christian television programming.

Connie Woodard, for the editorial board

Value of parking changes varies

Some order may come out of confusion if the Board of Regents approves regulation revisions in the 1985 Traffic and Parking Regulations manual as suggested by the Traffic and Parking Council. Or it may not.

Changing references to "faculty/staff" to "employee" will help clarify who can park where.

New permits designed to hang from the rear-view mirrors of cars will replace the traditional bumper stickers, facilitating a transfer of the permit to another vehicle. But an adhesive decal also will have to be applied in the lower corner of the driver's side on the inside front windshield, along with a single-car permit.

What's wrong with the old bumper sticker permits? The parking council is replacing one permit with two. The new permits should be effective enough to justify such a change in design. It is most likely that such a change would increase the chance of confusion about permits.

Maybe the regents will recognize an unnecessary reform when they see one.

YUMPs coming of age politically

WASHINGTON — As a rule, fame in America is only as current as the last issue of People magazine. Andy Warhol says it only lasts 15 minutes. Consequently, young upwardly-mobile professionals, or YUMPs, whom presidential contender Gary Hart has helped make America's latest overnight celebrities, may become victims of this cultural tendency.

But the YUMPs' (or YUPs', depending on how you like your acronyms) emergence is neither sudden nor transitory. Behind the affinity that many of them have for Hart is a fundamental notion about their own place in both politics and the economy. Of course, Hart's star may fall in their estimation, but to explain the Coloradoan's popularity as an example of trendy consumerism might be unduly compulsive.

America's young professionals, whether urban or suburban, already affluent or still aspiring to be so, have prompted our curiosity for some time. Their role in giving Hart most of his primary victories so far (mostly in states where unemployment is below the national average) was no surprise, especially after the success the similarly cerebral John Anderson had with them in 1980.

But our immediate interest, we admit, comes in response to skeptics — such as The Washington Post's George Will, an old 42 — who've suggested that YUMPs (a club Will limits to 25-to-40-year-olds) take their politicians with their tortellini or any other foodstuffs sanctioned by D.E. Crimmins' "The Official Young Aspiring Professional's Fast-Track Handbook." Some stereotypes can go too far.

While the more affluent and ambitious members of the baby boom bear a strong resemblance to Crimmins' caricature, their political interests are both diverse and substantive. Their vote, like that of a machinist or senior citizen, is an expression of how they feel about themselves. A politician can become a symbol; his campaign a metaphor for his supporters' own struggles.

Hart's generational message, however, runs across typical partisan lines. It speaks to millions of Americans who, despite their relative wealth and comfort, feel shortchanged and frustrated.

Last year, the Brookings Institution issued a study illustrating the extent to which younger adults have enjoyed greater benefits in education, housing and other essentials than their frequent complaints indicate.

Yet their sheer numbers have stymied the expectations of continued career advancement of which they became prisoners in grade school. Nowadays, even J.D.s and M.B.A.s aren't guaranteed exemptions from a middle-management glut, with which they will slowly grow old. For many older YUMPs, there is an unsettling sensation that their gray hairs are multiplying more quickly than their opportunities.

But one thing is fairly certain: Hart is only among the first political practitioners to grasp the restiveness of a newly-emerging voting bloc. This group's independent political inclinations will benefit both Democrat and Republican to the extent that either party speaks to its common experiences. Its increased involvement may well prove to be a godsend to moderates and a deadly blow to the far right.

At work is the Vietnam-Watergate generation's rebirth in politics. Hart may fail to ride this generation's self-interest to the White House this year, but other candidates will undoubtedly have a chance to try again in the future.

CONFIDENTIALLY, SERGEANT, I'M GETTING WORRIED ABOUT ACID RAIN

Israel becomes election year issue

WASHINGTON — The King of Jordan, Hussein Bin Talal, descendant of desert warriors, a Hashimite from the Hejaz of Arabia and a pretty nifty pilot, is right. This is not the year to do business with America.

That is about what the King has been saying. Apparently vying with Cher to see who can do more interviews, the King has told almost anyone who would listen that America has lost its credibility in the Middle East, is unreasonably partial to Israel and, especially this year, is a captive of the so-called Israeli lobby.

Whether there is, in fact, an Israeli lobby is a question I leave aside for the moment. But there is no doubt there is such a thing as the Jewish vote, and in an election year it is not to be dismissed.

And almost no one has. The first to chuck his principles and go a-courting this vote was Sen. John Glenn, D-Ohio, whose differences with Israel were reflected in his senate votes. Upon becoming a presidential candidate, though, he revised his thinking and in a New York speech stopped just short of doing a hora.

Now comes Sen. Gary Hart, D-Colo., who, unlike Glenn, remains a presidential candidate. Hart once had a position on the question of whether the United States should move its embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. He said the move should be made "only after negotiations" with the Arabs.

RICHARD COHEN Columnist

Hart now says he will support a bill introduced by Sen. Daniel Moynihan, D-N.Y., that would direct the State Department to move the embassy to Jerusalem. The bill has co-sponsors galore (37 in the Senate; 201 in the House) and, although non-binding, one vehement opponent in the person of Secretary of State George Shultz. He holds the quaint view that the president, not Congress, should make foreign policy.

In any other year there would be no question of that. This being an election year, though, foreign policy considerations take a back seat to political ones — even to the suggestion that Israel ought to make some concessions of its own. More than politics is at stake here. The United States, while reaffirming its friendship with Israel, should not be in a position where the King of Jordan, already injured, can claim gratuitous insult as well. Moving the embassy would tell the Arabs what they think they already know — that parity is a term limited to farm programs.

If you are looking for a legality in this situation, you will be sorely disappointed. In the 1947 partition plan, Jerusalem, along with its virtual suburb, Bethlehem, were supposed to be international cities. Jordan seized East Jerusalem by war, and the Israelis took it the same way. This, by the way, also happens to be the way Jordan seized and then lost the West Bank.

A country ought to be able to choose its capital for itself, and Israel should be no exception. But the greater issue here is the ability of the United States to broker a Middle East peace and, in the process, ensure the security of Israel. Insulting the Arabs and at the same time showing up Hussein as ineffective is no way to do that. Hart was right the first time and so, for that matter, are both Shultz and, in a sense, Hussein, whose gripes are hardly limited to the issue of Jerusalem.

For Israelis, the principle of Jerusalem is an important one — important enough so that Costa Rica was rewarded in technical aid for moving its embassy from Tel Aviv. But the United States has matters of principle, too. One is that with rare exceptions, the president makes foreign policy. The other is that even in an election year, principle itself is more important than votes.

Letters

Review of performance overly critical

Editor,

Re: "Ill-suited voice masks fine guitar music," in the March 28 Collegian:

This letter is in reponse to the review of Doug Sharpe's nooner performance on March 27. Let me say first of all that I do not know Sharpe, and so this is not a partisan point of view.

I object to the review because the reviewer seems intent on making Sharpe feel as bad as possible about his singing voice. Comparing Sharpe's voice to "the wounded buzz of a bumble bee" seems unnecessarily vicious. Let's keep in mind that the performance wasn't billed as professional, didn't cost anybody anything, and was solely for the enjoyment of the audience.

Searching for possible reasons to justify the nasty tone of the review, I wondered if the reviewer's intent was to warn the public away from what he thought was bad entertainment.

But obviously that couldn't be his intent, for the performance was a one-time thing. If the reviewer's intent was to simply inform the public of the performance, why then did he have to be so critical? I wonder...was the reviewer trying to sound "professional," perhaps like a slick Newsweek magazine reviewer would?

If so, the reviewer should be made aware of two facts: one, the performer was not a professional and didn't represent himself as such; and two, it takes more than a critical tone to be a good reviewer.

State requires firm to restrict dioxin site

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state Department of Health and Environment on Wednesday ordered the immediate paving of a one-acre area of a dioxin-contaminated industrial site in Kansas City, Kan.

In addition, the agency called for the owners of the Thompson-Hayward Chemical Co. to erect a fence around the area and restrict access to it. Also, the company is to prepare a plan for decontamination of a building in the one-acre restricted zone, monitoring and maintenance of the site.

The action was ordered by the department after new tests detected dioxin contamination up to 48 parts per billion in 42 samples of soil, dust and other sediment. Traces of the toxic chemical from 1.2 to 140 parts per billion were detected at the plant in samples taken last May and June.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency considers unacceptable any dioxin contamination higher than 1 part per billion in a residential area. That is equal to one second in 32 years.

In a prepared statement released Wednesday, Health and Environment officials said there is no "immediate public health threat off-site or to workers at the facility."

"The levels of dioxin at the Thompson-Hayward site are cause for concern," said Barbara Sabol, secretary of health and environment.

"Thompson-Hayward has agreed to take immediate action to limit exposure in order to minimize the potential for adverse impacts on the workers' health, and those who otherwise may be exposed in the immediate vicinity of the dioxin contamination."

The dioxin is a byproduct of pesticide production at the plant, which was stopped in 1978.

The Thompson-Hayward plant is in the Turner Industrial District — an older industrial region along the Kansas River just a few miles west of downtown Kansas City, Mo.

The entire plant site covers 17 acres. The restricted zone centers around a "pesticide processing" building, which has been closed since last spring.

Under the Health and Environment order, only authorized personnel with safety equipment will be allowed in the one-acre restricted zone where the soil and surface dioxin contamination was found.

The company was told to pave all open areas in the restricted zone to seal the soil and prevent spreading of the contamination. Any currently paved surfaces are to be swept and vacuumed.

As the second part of the order, the company is to submit a plan and timetable to Health and Environment by April 9 for decontaminating the pesticide processing building, sampling of air, monitoring and maintenance of the site, limiting future excavation in the contaminated area and imposing "restrictive covenants" on the deeds of the property.

In addition, the state environmental agency said "what appears to be buried metal" has been detected in an area north of a river levee adjacent to the plant. The company was ordered to excavate the area to determine what the nature of the material.

Bob Moody, public information officer for the state agency, said metal detectors found the unidentified materials.

Finally, Thompson-Hayward was directed to expand its efforts to determine "the extent and levels of groundwater contamination and the potential for off-site migration of organic contaminants in the groundwater."

The latest dioxin tests by the company were reported to the Department of Health and Environment last month. Since that time, the agency has been studying the information to determine what action to take.

The original owner of the plant — Thompson-Hayward Agriculture and Nutrition Co. — sold the contaminated facility in 1981 to the president owner, Thompson-Hayward Chemical Co. Both firms operate in side-by-side plants and both are cooperating in the clean-up, according to Sabol.

Dioxin also has been found in another Kansas site. State officials announced last October that dioxin had been detected in a sample of "oil liquids" from a groundwater test well at the Furley hazardous waste dump in Sedgewick County. The 80-acre waste dump, about 10 miles northeast of Wichita, has been closed since January 1982.

Local doctor turns cheese connoisseur

By LEE WHITE
Manhattan Editor

For those who don't know their muenster from their asiago, Eugene Klingler, surgeon and Manhattan city commissioner, has the answers.

Tuesday Klingler taught a class about the cheeses of Europe for the second time at the home of Ron and Jean Lee, 2402 Rogers Blvd. Lee, professor in physics, and Mrs. Lee have taught two or three cooking classes a week at home since 1977.

Klingler said he doesn't know how he became a cheese connoisseur, but thinks his German heritage may have something to do with it.

"I grew up in a German household, and we always had a lot of cheese around the house," Klingler said. "Nobody else around the house now really likes it except my daughter."

At Tuesday's class, participants sampled about a dozen European cheeses, including various types of Swiss and Italian cheeses, while Klingler explained how they are made and used. Imported dark beers as well as bread Mrs. Lee made accompanied the cheese samples. The class ended with everyone eating bowls of French onion soup with their favorite cheeses on top.

Eugene Klingler

Most knowledge of cheese is acquired by reading cooking publications, Klingler said.

"You read books on it," he said. "Occasionally you run across a good article in 'Food and Wine' or 'Cuisine.'"

Klingler said he also discovers facts about cheese from publications sent by a New York mail order firm where he buys some of his cheese. He said he likes most cheeses, but some have fallen from his favor.

"I don't like the gimmicky cheeses with chives and the cheddars they put port wine and muscatel in," Klingler said. "Take a poor cheese and dump junk in it and you get a poor cheese with junk in it."

"I like to come home and eat a reasonably firm cheese with some apples and Triscuits. A couple of cronies and I will get together on Saturday afternoons and eat cheese and have a beer on the side."

Klingler said he "probably wouldn't turn down" any of the cheeses sampled Tuesday night, but added he remains partial to bleu and Roquefort cheeses as overall favorites.

Cheese can be stored well, has butyrate, protein and carbohydrates and is relatively cheap, Klingler said. Some bad nutritional aspects include a high cholesterol level and the possibility of calcium deposits forming in kidneys — a trait common to other dairy products — if enough is eaten, he said.

Overall, however, Klingler said cheese is "very good for nutrition."

Even before the discovery of penicillin, people advocated drinking beer and eating Limburger cheese, which is inoculated with penicillin, for the treatment of sore throats, Klingler said. Other cheeses such as Roquefort and bleu contain penicillin, but he said he hasn't heard of people who are allergic to penicillin having adverse reactions to eating cheese.

Klingler hasn't scheduled another class for the public, but said he would like to conduct another one.

"I have a couple (of classes) to do for conventions this summer if I can work them in," he said. "But medicine is still what I do."

Eggs challenge the chip in snack food world

By CARA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Times were when many discounted the egg as being anything but oval, white, and boring.

However, times have changed, and the egg is entering the fast-paced world of snack foods. It is in this arena where the egg will compete with other American snack favorites such as the potato chip.

To seriously challenge such entrenched favorites the egg has taken a new shape and name.

The "Egg Ring," recently patented by the University, is the title for this new snack food product. It resembles an onion ring and is made of egg whites dipped in a batter and deep-fried.

"We were looking for a nutritional product that had all the satisfying qualities that make people snack," Frank Cunningham, professor of food science and co-inventor, said.

Jan Wiker, who is a graduate of K-State now working in California, came up with the idea, Cunningham said.

Cunningham was studying onion rings with Wiker when the latter thought, "Hey, why not make an egg ring?"

Cunningham said that the "Egg Ring" invention took about two years to perfect. "Egg Rings" would be marketed as a frozen product to be thawed out and reheated.

"Egg Rings" contains no fat, cholesterol, additives or salt. The product also is low in calories.

Although "Egg Rings" are made mainly from formed egg whites, several flavors can be added to make them taste as the manufacturer chases. So far, barbecue, nacho, cheddar cheese and taco flavors have been produced.

The "Egg Ring" product is a value-added product, Cunningham said. A value-added product is one that has been improved through processing so it has a higher retail value.

Now, with the "Egg Ring" process patented, the University is looking for a company who is willing to be a licensee. This would entail the signing of an agreement by a company willing to pay royalties for the privilege of using the patent rights.

Though Cunningham is interested in all types of food, his main interest lies in snack foods. Batter and breading processes are Cunningham's specialty. This is the process that was used to develop the "Egg Rings."

"As far as I know, we are the only university group that has done any research in batter and breading technology," Cunningham said.

Cunningham is the co-author of two books on batter and breading processes entitled "Batter and Breading," and "Batter and Breading Technology." Darrel Suderman, a research scientist with Durkee foods who received his doctorate in food science at K-State, is co-author of the books.

Oil moratorium fails in Senate

WASHINGTON — The Senate refused on Wednesday to impose a year-long moratorium on oil industry mergers, rejecting arguments that some $29 billion in takeovers announced in recent weeks pose unknown threats to the nation's economy and energy supplies.

Senators voted instead to direct three of its committees to study the merger trend and report back this summer with recommendations. The alternative proposal carries no restrictions on the industry.

Supporters of a moratorium said the alternative was a hollow shell that meant nothing. But, said Sen. Bennett Johnston, D-La., the sponsor of the moratorium proposal, "I know how to count votes. We've been beaten on this issue."

His comment came after the Senate voted 57-39 against a motion to table — in effect kill — the substitute calling for a study.

Wronged man may get $50,000

TOPEKA — A Parsons man who spent 21 months in prison for a robbery he did not commit would receive $50,000 in compensation from the state under a bill endorsed Wednesday by the Senate Ways and Means Committee.

The bill, sponsored by the Joint Committee on Special Claims Against the State, now goes to the Senate floor for debate and action.

Keith Carl, 24, spent nearly two years in the Kansas State Industrial Reformatory in Hutchinson after he was convicted of robbing a Parsons restaurant at gunpoint on the night of Oct. 13, 1980.

Another man later confessed to the crime and Carl was released from prison July 13, 1982.

"I believe that there is enough feeling in the House and Senate to put $50,000 in there to cover a wrong that has been done by the state of Kansas," said Sen. Billy McCray, D-Wichita, in asking the committee to increase the amount of the $36,000 award approved by the House on Tuesday.

The claims committee voted last fall to recommend Carl be paid $75,000 for the time he spent in prison. Carl had asked for $500,000.

However, after three meetings, the House Ways and Means Committee sliced the award by more than half, leaving $36,000.

Members of the House then tried to restore the deleted $39,000 but were unsuccessful three times during floor debate.

Boy George stirs up BYU campus

PROVO, Utah — Boy George is a hit on the pop charts, but not in the bookstore at Brigham Young University, where albums of his group Culture Club have been pulled from shelves pending a review.

"It is more an evaluation of the artist than of his music," said bookstore director Roger Utley, adding that the records would be reviewed for their suitability for students.

Paul Richards, a spokesman for the Mormon-owned school, said: "The administration has no standard policy on Boy George. It's a bookstore matter."

Utley said he decided to remove the albums because of recent action taken by student program officials.

Culture Club was to be used as a theme for the campaign of a student Culture Office candidate, Ruth Terri, who planned to use posters featuring herself posed with several people dressed as Culture Club members.

She said she was not to use the photo because Ryan Thomas, director of student programs, felt Culture Club promotes homosexuality and transvestism.

Last week, school officials said a student band which appeared under the name "The Club" — featuring "Guy George" as lead singer — had been banned from further performances.

Civil war creates economic havoc

Lebanon's industry in 'worst condition'

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Workers report daily to the Weathermate factory just east of Beirut to assemble the heating and cooling units that the company has been producing for 21 years.

But the company's sales manager, George Khalil said the workers were simply adding to Weathermate's already sizable inventory. "We haven't had an order since last September," Khalil said.

Weathermate, like hundreds of other industrial plants in Lebanon, is a severely wounded victim of nearly nine years of civil warfare. And many economic experts fear that if peace doesn't arrive soon, there will be little left of the industrial base to rebuild.

Marwan Iskacdar, a leading Lebanese economist, estimated that industry accounted for 20 percent of the nation's pre-war economy, or about $1 billion annually.

"Today it is at best $350 million," he said. "Industry is the economic sector in the worst condition of all."

The years of war also have wrought havoc on Lebanon's other major economic sectors such as agriculture, movement of goods from the West to the Arab world and tourism.

By most calculations, one-third of Lebanon's manufacturing capacity has been destroyed since 1975, and many plants remain shuttered because workers can't reach them safely.

Between one-third and one-half of Lebanon's industrial workers have been laid off, economists estimate. And many skilled workers have emigrated to other nations to find jobs.

The industrial decline has had a ripple effect, too, reducing the work of the "commercial class" that imported raw materials and helped export finished goods. It also has strained some financial institutions stuck with now-shaky industrial loans.

The fate of many industries — including Weathermate — has been dictated by war.

Before the sectarian fighting began in 1975, Weathermate employed 78 workers and produced about 1,000 climate control systems a year. The factory sustained more than $28,000 in shell damage during fighting in 1978, but was rebuilt.

Export markets in other Arab countries began to dry up first "out of fear we couldn't keep our commitments," Khalil, the sales manager, said. Then domestic orders diminished as the construction of new buildings slowed, and all-out civil warfare last fall and again in February "hit us, hit everybody very hard," he said.

Expert supports computer crime laws

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Senate panel was urged Wednesday to establish laws to specifically prohibit computer crimes, particularly theft of computer services.

"Our feeling is that current statutes do not cover computer crime," said James Green, president of the Topeka chapter of the Data Processing Management Association.

He urged the Senate Judiciary

Committee to endorse a House-passed bill to fight computer break-ins.

The bill would establish the crime of "computer theft" to cover instances in which a person gains unauthorized access to a computer system and obtains information.

Also the bill establishes "computer crime" to make it unlawful to destroy or damage computer equipment, software or any data in a computer system.

Violations of either crime would be a class A misdemeanor if the damage or loss was valued at less than $100, and a class D felony for losses exceeding $100. The misdemeanor would be punishable by one year in the county jail and a $2,500 fine. The felony would be punishable by 2-10 years in jail and a $5,000 fine.

Rick Dobbs, an attorney for the Boeing Military Airplane Co. in Wichita, said existing laws on theft requires "proof of intent to permanently deprive" an individual of his property.

He contended that standard would be difficult to prove with computer crimes when only information is taken. In effect, he said, only an unauthorized copy is taken.

"Computer-assisted theft is what we're talking about," said Dobbs.

He said he knew of no cases in Kansas in which a person had been prosecuted for computer theft under existing law. However, Dobbs said there had been instances of computer tampering at Boeing.

Currently, 22 states have specific computer crime laws.

The committee took no action on the bill, and no one opposed the measure.

Also Wednesday the committee considered a House-passed bill to increase from $500 to $1,000 the maximum claim that can be brought in a small claims court. It also would increase the docket fee from $10 to $15.

Rep. Dennis Spaniol, a Wichita Republican who sponsored the measure, said it is to adjust the claims limit for inflation.

The Kansas Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Kansas Food Dealers' Association supported the bill.

In particular, they supported a provision which would allow people to hire a representative to file their claims to recover debts. A lawyer cannot be used in a small claims suit.

No one opposed the bill, but Marjorie Van Buren of the Office of Judicial Administration and a representative of the Kansas Association of District Court Clerks expressed concern that the bill could result in a caseload increase. That would increase court costs, Van Buren said.

The committee did not act on the measure.

Lawyer helps escapee, faces 3-year sentence

By The Associated Press

CLINTON, Tenn. — A mentally disturbed female lawyer who helped a prisoner escape was sentenced to the maximum three years in prison Wednesday, after refusing to repent from the witness stand or testify about their 4½ months on the run together.

Mary Evans, 27, who had originally pleaded guilty to an escape charge in return for probation, showed no emotion as she was sentenced by Criminal Court Judge James B. Scott.

Scott refused to release her on bond pending appeal. He said Evans, described by doctors as a suicidal schizophrenic, could be better protected from herself in prison.

Evans was a court-appointed attorney defending William Timothy Kirk, 37, on prison murder charges when she arranged for him to be taken from Brushy Mountain Penitentiary to the Oak Ridge office of Dr. Gary Salk for psychological tests on March 31, 1983.

She admitted slipping Kirk a small pistol, which he used to disarm three guards. The couple took the guards' pistols and $25 from Salk's wallet and fled in Evans' car, driving through North Carolina and Florida, living in motels and gambling.

Evans had been helping prepare his defense on charges of murdering two prison inmates. Kirk was convicted in absentia while on the run but has not been sentenced yet for those crimes.

FBI agents arrested them Aug. 17 outside a Daytona Beach, Fla., telegraph office where they had gone to pick up money.

Ritchie said that by sending Evans to prison, she couldn't get the psychiatric treatment she needs. He urged Scott to allow his client, who has surrendered her law license, to "make a positive contribution to society."

But the judge said: "She is guilty. I charge her with more responsibility than I do the average citizen."

Movie's offbeat characters add charm

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

In "Local Hero," the owner of Knox Oil and Gas, Felix Happer — an eccentric old man whose office is complete with a planetarium for a ceiling — decides that an oil refinery must be established on the coast of Scotland. The only coastline that is suitable, though, is a cove where there is a small village named Ferness. Happer sends a representative, Mac MacIntyre (played by Peter Riegert,) to convince the residents to sell their land.

Review

Were this to have been made 30 years ago, the results quite predictably would have found the village residents so attached to their community that they would never have wanted to leave. But this is exactly where "Local Hero" differs from expectations; the town's residents are ready and willing to sell. They don't want MacIntyre to know this, though, so they sneak around behind his back, having meetings and talk about the Rolls Royces they have been pricing. They all have visions of becoming millionaires.

Before MacIntyre reaches Ferness, director Bill Forsyth plunges him and his sidekick — a sex-obsessed young Scot named Danny Oldsen — into a fog so thick that they must stop their car and wait for the fog to clear. This very effectively creates the transition from the oil company's world into the delightfully dreamy world of Ferness.

There is a Nigerian preacher in the all-white town. There is a beautiful marine biologist who may or may not have been a mermaid. There is a motorcyclist who zooms through the streets every few minutes. There is a blue and orange-haired punk rock groupie. What are these people doing here? Well, Forsyth offers no explanations. They all simply become part of the wonderfully ludicrous images with which the film abounds.

MacIntyre and Oldsen walk along the beach, carrying their electric briefcases and wearing three-piece suits. Air Force jets fly by on their way to a near-by bomb test site. MacIntyre says, "About those jets, — they really spoil a really nice area." This comment begins MacIntyre's gradual conversion to becoming a villager. Before long he stops shaving and begins wearing the same style clothing as Ferness residents. He hangs out in the bar, getting to know what it's like to be a resident of the town. And, before the film is over, MacIntyre actually wants to stay in the village instead of returning to his $80,000-a-year job and Porsche 930 in Houston.

Burt Lancaster's role as Felix Happer is only a supporting one, but he makes his presence felt throughout the film. He makes a very impressive entrance into Ferness, dropping from the sky by way of helicopter.

There are very few punch lines delivered in "Local Hero." Most of the time Forsyth is content just to set up whimsical scenes that are balanced with an almost deadpan demeanor by the actors. When punch lines are delivered, though, the effect is often hilarious. Even those moments where the punch lines are missing are rendered with such a droll charm that they don't fail to be amusing. That is the charm of the movie. Forsyth doesn't stretch overly hard to create humor; he allows the comedy to grow out of the plot and characters.

"Local Hero" isn't without it's flaws, though. Most notable are the scenes in Houston, which are rendered with little of the imagination Forsyth brings to Scotland. There are also references late in the film to a relationship between Mac and a hotel owner's wife, but nothing had been shown to happen between them. Quite likely these scenes ended up on the editing room floor, but the hole they leave is not large enough that any of the film's charm is sacrificed.

Prize-winning cellist to give recital today

Cellist Yo-Yo Ma gave his first public recital at the age of 5. By the time he was 19, critics were comparing him to Pablo Casals, the master cellist of the 20th century.

In 1978 he won the Avery Fisher Prize, one of America's highest awards given to young musicians. Currently 28 years old, Yo-Yo Ma has been called "one of the greatest instrumental talents alive" by famed violinist Isaac Stern.

Ma, who will perform at 8 p.m. today in McCain Auditorium, was born in 1955 in Paris, the son of two Chinese parents. He began his cello studies at the age of 4, and at 7 moved to the United States and enrolled in the pre-college music program at the Juilliard School in New York.

When ready for college, he decided he wanted a change from his strict home life, and enrolled at Harvard. During this time, Ma limited his personal engagements to only one per month so that he could concentrate on his studies.

Ma said he is "drawn to music that represents an ideal world, a distilled vision of human suffering where art and tragedy are balanced out."

"I have a wonderful sense of being able to do what I want to do," Ma told Boston Phoenix music critic Lloyd Schwartz. "I never thought it was possible."

Kansas Board of Education may be appointed by Carlin

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas voters would have a chance to decide whether the state Board of Education should be appointed by the governor or should continue to be elected under a House-passed measure approved Wednesday by the Senate Education Committee.

The committee voted 5-4 to approve the resolution and it send to the Senate floor for debate. It would reduce the board from 10 to nine members and make them appointed by the governor rather than elected by voters.

Because the change would require an amendment to the state constitution, a two-thirds vote of both houses — 27 in the Senate and 84 in the House — is necessary to submit the issue to the voters in November. The House voted 89-34 to pass the resolution.

"I'm a big advocate of popular politics but as I looked at it, I did not see the elective process as meaningful," said Sen. Wint Winter Jr.,

R-Lawrence. "One out of 10 voters makes an informed decision about the Board of Education. Uninformed discretion is no discretion at all."

Winter echoed the comments of the resolution's sponsors, who say it would make the board more like the Kansas Board of Regents and, therefore, more effective at developing educational policy and legislation.

"What we need is top-flight educational professionals to fine tune the system," Winter said. "Public school teachers are crying out for the same kind of guidance university faculty have."

But Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Lenexa, took issue with Winter's claims.

"I have not received any overriding indication that the present situation is not working," Bogina said. "So I don't see the need for drastic change, for taking away the right of the people to vote."

Appointed boards are not always an improvement over elected officials, he said.

Guide outlines requirements for Kansas voters

By STEVE SWAFFORD
Collegian Reporter

Before Kansans can vote, certain criteria must be met.

Voting requirements are set by the state and federal government. According to the "Sally Sunflower's Guide to Voting in Kansas," published by Kansas Secretary of State Jack Brier, a Kansas voter must be a U.S. citizen, at least 18 years old, a resident of Kansas and live in the voting area.

Registration takes about three minutes for first-time registrants and five minutes for re-registering after a change of address. It can be done by mail by contacting Riley County Election Officer Wanda Coder or at Coder's office at the Riley County Courthouse. Other registration sites may also be designated by Coder.

Registration closes 20 days before any election date and reopens the day after the election. According to the voting guide, if a person moves into the state and is unable to register before the 20-day restriction, a special ballot may be obtained.

To be eligible for this special ballot, the voter must be a citizen of the United States and a qualified voter in the state of previous residency. The voter must have moved to Kansas 30 days before the election and must apply to the county election officer not earlier than 25 days before the election and not later than noon on the day before the election.

Voters who change their name or address must re-register, the voting guide states. Previous registration cards must be canceled when a voter moves.

Re-registration may also be necessary if a voter fails to vote in a general election at which members of the U.S. electoral college are selected or in the November general election. Voters must contact Coder's office to determine if re-registration is necessary.

A party affiliation may be declared by the voter at the time of registration, or the voter may sign a declaration the first time they vote in a primary election. The voter may also choose not to be affiliated with any political party.

If a voter decides to change party affiliation, a declaration may be filed with the election officer at any time except when registration is closed for 20 days before the election, according to the guide.

July 17 is the last day to register for the primary election on Aug. 7. Voter registration reopens Aug. 8 and closes Oct. 16 for the general election Nov. 6.

The federal officials to be elected in 1984 in Kansas are five representatives, a senator, the vice president and the president.

State officials to be elected include all state senators and representatives, three of the seven Kansas Supreme Court judges and four of the seven Court of Appeals judges.

Riley County voters will vote on a 2nd District representative to the State Board of Education. They also will select the county clerk, treasurer, register of deeds, attorney, sheriff, surveyor and commissioners.

The polls are open from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. on election day, unless other hours are announced by county election officer.

Supreme Court weighs student rights

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Concern over drug trafficking in the nation's public schools clashed with student privacy rights Wednesday in a spirited Supreme Court debate.

A New Jersey prosecutor said all drugs seized by public school officials, even in unlawful searches, should be allowed as trial evidence when students are criminally prosecuted.

State Deputy Attorney General Allan Nodes said school searches must be exempt from the "exclusionary rule" which bans presentation of evidence illegally seized by police.

But Lois DeJulio, a lawyer representing a former Piscataway, N.J., High School student, said allowing such an exemption will rob students of an important lesson — "that our constitutional system of government is more than a collection of empty promises."

"For every search that discloses a student's wrongdoing there will be countless more in which the privacy rights of innocent students will be sacrificed," said DeJulio, a public defender.

Drug searches prompt concern

At issue in a dispute being watched closely by school authorities nationwide is whether the exclusionary rule, created by the Supreme Court in 1914 to deter illegal police conduct, applies to searches in public schools by administrators and teachers.

The justices are expected to announce their decision by July.

At one point, Justice Harry A. Blackmun noted that drugs seized under questionable circumstances in private schools could be used as evidence in criminal prosecutions.

"So, if a youngster wants to get into drugs, he better stay in the public schools."

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger spoke of "the social costs" of freeing student drug dealers because of procedural blunders.

And Justice Lewis F. Powell worried aloud about having to train teachers in the intricacies of search-and-seizure law.

He said "community pressure" already exists as a more effective deterrent to unreasonable searches by teachers.

The New Jersey case arose when in March 1980, a 14-year-old girl was caught smoking in a restroom at Piscataway High, breaking school rules. The girl, identified only as T.L.O., was taken by a teacher to a vice principal's office. The girl denied that she smoked. The vice principal opened the girl's purse and saw a pack of cigarettes.

He then noticed that the purse also contained a package of rolling papers, the kind often used for marijuana cigarettes. And digging further into the purse, he found records indicating that the girl had been selling marijuana cigarettes for $1 each to her schoolmates.

The police were notified, and the girl subsequently was tried as a juvenile and given a year's probation.

The New Jersey Supreme Court overturned the delinquency finding, however, after ruling that the vice principal's action had violated the girl's 4th Amendment right against unreasonable searches.

The state court invoked the exclusionary rule in deciding that the items found in the purse never should have been allowed as evidence.

The New Jersey court did not bar school officials from basing disciplinary action against the girl on the search. But the state court said the seized material could not be used in criminal action.

Panel reviews plan to classify property

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Senate committee began to deliberate Wednesday on a House-passed property classification proposal and requested information on a simplified tax plan.

The Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee directed the legislative research staff to develop the proposal after hearing from a university economist.

Glenn Fisher, a Wichita State University economics professor, suggested that any classification plan have only a few classes of property. Also he said lawmakers should keep the assessment ratios between the highest and lowest class as small as possible.

The House-passed measure before the committee provides for about 10 property classes and establishes varying assessment rates for them. There is a 5 to 1 ratio between the lowest class, residential and agricultural land, and the highest class, which is utility real estate.

Classification, which requires an amendment to the Kansas Constitution, would permit different types of property to be taxed at different rates.

Fisher suggested a proposal with only two classes of property: Residential and agricultural real estate assessed at 15 percent of its fair market value and all other property at 30 percent.

The committee, after listening to the economist who helped develop classification plans in Minnesota and Illinois, asked its staff to develop figures for such a plan. Specifically, the staff is to determine an assessment rate on agricultural and residential property if all other property is assessed at 30 percent of its fair market value. The panel wants the rate to mirror the current assessments on farmland and homeowners.

For purposes of developing the plan, the committee called for the property tax base to be expanded by elimination of some exemptions. Farm machinery would be returned to the tax rolls. In addition, there would be no exemption for merchants' inventories as under the House proposal.

The committee's action did not represent an endorsement of the plan, however. Sen. Bud Burke, R-Leawood, committee chairman, said the proposal was being drafted solely for further discussion by members.

Still it was clear from Wednesday's deliberations that the Senate committee dislikes many provisions of the House-passed classification proposal.

"I think many senators are committed to trying to work out a classification amendment that is simple and broad-based," said Sen. Fred Kerr, R-Pratt.

The constitution calls for equal taxation and assessment. However, state tax officials agree that inequities have developed because property has not been reappraised since the 1960s.

Agricultural land, for example, is assessed at about 6 percent of its fair market value statewide and residential property at 8 percent. State law calls for all property to be assessed at 30 percent.

Gov. John Carlin and other lawmakers support classification as a way to ease possible tax shifts onto homeowners and farmers from reappraisal. In general, classification would legal the current tax structure. However, the House version would lower the assessment rate on residential property to 6 percent and would phase out taxes on merchants' inventories and livestock over five years.

Fisher faulted the House-passed measure because it "singles out productive property such as manufacturing machinery and inventories for heavy taxation."

The House version would assess commercial and industrial property at 15 percent — a 50 percent increase over the existing statewide average.

Fisher said uniform and equal taxation was the most fair method, but conceded that Kansas lawmakers had few alternatives to classification because of the gross inequities that have developed.

He warned that a proposal with many property classes would "invite litigation."

Proposal would toughen dog-fight law

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A proposal to put "more teeth" into a 1982 law which banned pit-dog fighting and a bill establishing a voluntary motor vehicle inspection program within the Kansas Highway Patrol won first-round debate today in the Kansas House.

Also tentatively approved were bills allocating money for the state's mental hospitals and prison system, and pieces of the 50-year state water plan being developed by the Kansas Water Office.

The dog-fighting bill, which has already passed the Senate, would outlaw the training, owning, keeping, selling or transporting of dogs for the purpose of dog fighting.

The penalty for attending a dog fight would increase to a class B misdemeanor, punishable by six months in jail and a $1,000 fine. Currently, it is a class C misdemeanor, which carries a one month jail sentence and a $500 fine.

In addition, the bill calls for law enforcement personnel to confiscate any dogs kept by a person arrested for dog fighting and prohibit the dogs' return to their keeper if the person is convicted.

The changes were requested by the Wichita Humane Society which said it had to return 12 dogs last winter to their owners even though the owners were convicted of dog fighting.

Rep. Ginger Barr, R-Auburn, added language during floor debate that would permit the return of non-aggressive dogs used as "bait" by dog fighters to incite aggressive dogs to attack.

The inspection program, as proposed by Rep. Robert Frey, R-Liberal, in an amendment to another bill, would benefit anyone who wanted "someone in authority other than neighborhood mechanics" to determine the safety of an automobile.

The major benefit would be to semi-trailer rigs which travel through other states which have mandatory inspection programs. Under Frey's amendment, Kansas truckers would be able to get a safety inspection certificate from the Kansas Highway Patrol, or anyone designated by the patrol as a safety inspection station. The certificate would exempt the truckers from having to pass safety inspections in other states.

"The cost of the inspections would be paid from fees charged for the service," Frey said. "It wouldn't cost anything and provide a valuable service."

The Legislature voted earlier this session to eliminate the mandatory vehicle inspection program, calling it ineffective and a waste of trooper time and state money.

Frey's amendment was added on to a Senate-passed bill which calls for all wrecker or tow-trucks to be licensed and registered with the Kansas Corporation Commission.

The bill stiffens insurance requirements for the wrecker services, forcing tow-truck owners to carry liability and cargo insurance. It also calls for $10 registration, to be paid one time only, and a $10 annual permit.

"This is a simple step toward cleaning up the industry," said Rep. Rex Crowell, R-Longton. "There's no argument the industry has an image problem."

All wreckers would be forced to have their names and addresses written on the side of their trucks.

One appropriations bill is the budgets bills for three youth centers, six state hospitals, the Kansas Neurological Institute in Topeka, the Rainbow Mental Health facility in Kansas City, Kan., and the division of mental health and retardation within the Social and Rehabilitation Services Department.

The bill calls for state tax dollars

spendings of:

—$5.2 million at Topeka Youth Center.

—$3 million at Atchison Youth Center.

—$2.5 million at Beloit Youth Center.

—$16.8 million at Larned State Hospital.

—$11.2 million at Osawatomie State Hospital.

—$4.8 million at Parsons State Hospital.

—$2.5 million at Norton State Hospital.

—$9.3 million at Topeka State Hospital.

—$6.9 million at Kansas Neurological Institute.

—$2 million at the Rainbow Mental Health Center.

—$12.9 million for SRS-division of mental health and retardation.

First-round approval came only after the House rejected attempts by Reps. Jesse Branson of Lawrence and Gary Blumenthal of Merriam, both Democrats, to increase the money for mental health services. Branson wanted to add $1 million and Blumenthal wanted half that much. Both were overwhelmingly defeated.

The second funding bill appropriates tax dollars including:

—$17.2 million for Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing.

—$13 million for the Department of Corrections.

—$11.5 million for the Kansas State Industrial Reformatory at Hutchinson.

—$3.5 million for the Correctional-Vocational Training Center at Topeka.

Lava flow from Mauna Loa creeps to 7 miles from city

By The Associated Press

HILLO, Hawaii — A mile-wide lava flow from Mauna Loa slowed but moved to within seven miles of Hawaii's second-largest city Wednesday, and residents living in its path made plans to leave if the molten rock threatened their homes.

"I'll jump in one car and my wife will jump in another car and we'll grab what we can," said Victor Souza, 34, whose home is among those nearest the flow.

The main lava flow slowed during the night, advancing to within seven miles of homes in Hilo's upper Kaumana section, said Reggie Okamura of the U.S. Geological Survey's Hawaiian Volcano Observatory.

There was no immediate danger to populated areas on the island of Hawaii, he said. The main flow reached a fairly flat area and its advance slowed to about 400 feet per hour, Okamura said.

The flat area is a mile wide, he said, but he could not estimate how long the lava would build up before tumbling downhill again.

The front of the flow widened to just under a mile wide, he said.

The flow earlier had been moving at 1,000 feet per hour, and at that rate it could have reached homes in the city of 48,000 today.

Civil defense officials made no move to evacuate residents and Mayor Herbert Matayoshi said it was too early to declare an emergency.

Some residents of the Kaumana area made tentative plans to move belongings, but most said they weren't worried yet.

"I'll leave if the flow comes within two miles," said Souza, a resident of the new Kaumana City subdivision closest to the flow.

"I don't want to fool around with nature," he said. "I'm not going to stay around to try to divert the lava in order to save the house," said Souza, 34, who moved into the subdivision with his wife Linda and their two daughters last October.

A fountain of lava spraying up to 100 feet high was feeding the main flow and several smaller flows, Okamura said.

One of the smaller flows had threatened the 72-inmate Kulani Prison, but stopped about three miles above the minimum-security facility. None of the smaller flows posed any threat, although one had cut a secondary power line serving a television relay station.

State and county officials on Tuesday rejected a proposal to build giant earthen walls to deflect the lava. The barriers were not feasible and could divert the flow from one residential area to another, Gov. George Ariyoshi said.

Officials also rejected a proposal to bomb the flow and other large-scale efforts to divert it.

The eruption earlier drew large crowds of sight-seers, but rain and overcast skies reduced visibility Wednesday and kept spectators away.

The eruption began early Sunday morning at the summit of the 13,682-foot Mauna Loa. It was the first eruption at Mauna Loa in nearly nine years. A 1975 outburst was the first in 25 years. An 1881 eruption sent lava within a mile of Hilo Harbor, covering areas which are now developed.

Scientists also were keeping a close watch on Kilauea Volcano, which has been erupting intermittently about 20 miles away since Jan. 3, 1983. Scientists have said another outburst at Kilauea is imminent. A simultaneous eruption would be the first since 1868.

Officials ban crosses in classrooms in Poland's battle of church, state

By The Associated Press

MIETNE, Poland — Communist authorities have ordered defiant teenagers to obey a ban on crucifixes in classrooms or quit school, an official confirmed Wednesday. Many students said they'd leave.

Bishop Jan Mazur, meanwhile, entered the second day of a bread-and-water fast to protest the government's position in the three-week-old conflict between church and state.

Ryszard Domanski, administrator of the agricultural high school where the "war of the crosses" began, confirmed that the school's 600-plus students would be barred from class unless they or their parents signed a declaration agreeing to abide by school regulations.

The declaration, recognizing the separation of church and state, indirectly endorses the removal of crosses ordered by the government.

The crosses have been a fixture in classrooms and other public buildings for decades in this devoutly Roman Catholic country.

Domanski told Western reporters that 34 students had quit the Stanislaw Staszic Agricultural School in Mietne, a rural village 40 miles south of Warsaw, rather than sign the declaration.

He refused to say how many of the students, ranging in age from 15 to 20, had signed the declaration. Student accounts varied, putting the number who had signed at 100 to 150 parents and 17 to 90 students.

Domanski said that the number attending classes had been "fluid" since the school reopened Tuesday for the first time since a 12-hour sit-in by 400 students on March 7. He would not elaborate.

The Mietne sit-in led to other protests in following days at high schools in neighboring Garwolin.

More than a dozen students interviewed on the almost deserted campus Wednesday afternoon said no more than 50 pupils had attended class that morning. They spoke on condition their names not be used.

They said the majority had quit or intended to do so as soon as they found new schools. Several students were spotted carrying their belongings from the dormitories.

Dorm residents who did not sign the declaration but remained on campus while their transcripts were being processed "are being refused meals," according to two 16-year-old girls.

But the students appeared to have dropped plans to join Mazur's protest. "We were going to stage a hunger strike in the church, but the priests wouldn't let us," said a 20-year-old student who has participated in talks with the bishop on resolving the crucifix issue.

A parish priest said the fathers at the Church of the Transfiguration in Garwolin had not decided whether to join Mazur's fast, but supported the bishop's move.

Mazur acted after the minister of religious affairs, Adam Lopatka, reneged on a promise made a week ago to drop demands that the students or their parents sign the declaration.

The Battle in Seattle

Here are the pairings for the Final Four of the 1984 National Collegiate Athletic Association Basketball Tournament in Seattle, Wash.

Final Four coaches ponder title chances; Thompson resents dirty play implications

By The Associated Press

SEATTLE — University of Kentucky Coach Joe B. Hall, for one, would like to set aside accusations that his team's Final Four opponent, Georgetown University, plays dirty.

"I don't think it really matters what we think," Hall said. "It's up to the officials to call the game. It's their job."

Hall's third-ranked Wildcats meet No. 2 Georgetown Saturday in the semifinals of the National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball tournament following the game between unranked University of Virginia and No. 5 University of Houston.

The winners play Monday night to determine the national collegiate championship.

"It's our job to play the game, and that's what we intend to do. We're not there to officiate," Hall said Wednesday via a telephone hookup with all the Final Four coaches, except John Thompson of Georgetown, who was here.

Thompson, who has said he resents implications that his Hoyas play like thugs, told the news conference he hopes none of the officials arrived here with preconceived notions about Georgetown's style of play.

He likened the situation to prejudicial publicity before a trial.

"The only problem I have with being called aggressive and intimidating ... is that I certainly hope the people who are calling the game aren't picking this stuff up and coming in with a predetermined idea about it," Thompson said.

Neither Coach Terry Holland of Virginia nor Guy Lewis of Houston said he could see anything improper about Georgetown's style of play.

"Georgetown plays a very physical brand of basketball like all of us would like our teams to play," Holland said.

Lewis added, "I admire their team myself. They look very aggressive and play good defense. I see nothing wrong with the way they play."

"People are entitled to say the things that they say about us," Thompson said, "as long as they understand that other people are entitled to remain silent."

Both Thompson and Hall drew laughter on two different subjects.

Thompson, who sequesters his team in different locations while on the road in an attempt to keep its concentration high, refused to divulge where his Hoyas were staying this week.

"I'm going to have a raffle on that subject," he answered with a smile in answer to a question. "I can't give you that information free because I've already read three different places where we're staying, one of them being the hotel where we're at right now."

Hall's team is headed by the menacing "Twin Towers" of 7-foot-1 Sam Bowie and 6-foot-11 Melvin Turpin.

"I don't consider us physical at all," he said amid laughter. "We're a finesse ball club."

Holland talked about trying to defend Houston's star center, Akeem Olajuwon, who scored 29 points in the Cougars' victory over Wake Forest University last weekend to get to Seattle.

"I think it was one of the finest games that I've ever seen a big man have," Holland said. "If he plays like that against us, we'll be packing it in to go back to Charlottesville."

Lewis, whose Cougars lost in the NCAA finals to North Carolina State University in Albuquerque, N.M., last season, heaped praise on underdog Virginia, a team Houston beat this season 74-65.

"It's going to be a great ball game," Lewis said. "I think Virginia is very capable of beating us and I think they're very capable of winning it all. There's no way we're looking past them. Not on your life."

Hall called the ability of point guard Dicky Beal to come back from arthroscopic knee surgery Aug. 26 as a key to Kentucky's excellent season.

"There were many times during the season that it appeared like he might not be able to make it at all and might not be a factor," Hall said. "But the last nine games he has really come on and played great for us."

"His recovery has really meant a lot to us. He's become the leader of our team, the inspiration of our team, the spirit of our team and the bulk of our speed, he's the leader offensively and defensively."

Thompson said he felt the Georgetown-Kentucky matchup was more than just a battle between 7-foot Patrick Ewing of the Hoyas and the gigantic duo of Bowie and Turpin.

Workouts suffer from rainy conditions

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

K-State athletic teams have had to deal with more than opponents during the spring season so far — the weather also has been a major obstacle. With "rain, and more rain" being the weatherman's favorite forecast, coaches have had to improvise to gain valuable practice time for their teams.

For some squads, outdoor practices have been rare occurrences, setting back progress made before the start of the spring season.

"We've only been able to have one outdoor practice so far because of weather," Tennis Coach Steve Webb said. "That puts us way behind other schools."

The tennis teams need at least one good week of outdoor practices to catch up with other teams, Webb said.

The rain hasn't helped the softball team either, according to the squad's coach, Ralph Currie.

"We got off to a slow start and the rain has slowed us up some," Currie said. "We were fortunate to get in games with Barton County (Saturday)."

To avoid another rained-out series, the softball team played three five-inning contests at KSU Stadium against Barton County Community College, with the facility's artificial surface able to dry out faster than natural turf at Cico Park.

The rain also has caused Track Coach Steve Miller some concern.

"This week we will probably run rain or shine," Miller said. "Here it is six weeks until the Big Eight (competition begins), and we haven't started outdoor competition yet. I am concerned. This is the latest start I can ever remember."

As a result, Miller said he will run everyone in their natural events in an outdoor meet to be held at the R.V. Christianson track on Saturday.

"At this point we can't afford to move people around. We have been able to train outdoors, but without a question, we are behind."

But for one K-State coach, the rain clouds have left a silver lining.

Baseball Coach Bill Hickey said not being able to practice outdoors has been frustrating for his team, but with the Brandenburg Indoor Complex, his team has a leg up on other teams in the area.

"It's really frustrating to be back inside after thinking we were through with the rain and snow,"

Hickey said. "In terms of our quality of play, I guess it has the same effect on everybody — it almost puts you back at square one."

Hickey said teams from the South have a several week advantage over Midwest clubs because of the warmer weather, but in the Big Eight Conference, the advantage teams such as Oklahoma State University and the University of Oklahoma had at the start of the season has been negated because of the bad weather.

"The whole thing the weather has done is make everybody equal,"

Football team begins drills

K-State's football team, originally scheduled to begin spring practice today, got an early start Wednesday by holding indoor workouts at the Brandenburg Indoor Complex.

The Wildcats' offensive and defensive squads practiced at the complex in separate one-hour sessions.

"We only had 19 of our allotted 20 practices scheduled, so we thought we might as well use the last one today," Coach Jim Dickey said Wednesday. "This practice will allow the kids a chance to get used to their equipment and walk through a few things before we get started in

Hickey said. "The Oklahoma teams had an advantage over us at the start of the year, but their momentum has been killed because of the weather."

Hickey said the Brandenburg Complex, one of his program's main important selling points when recruiting, may help the team bounce back faster than other teams in the Midwest.

"We're one of the only teams in the Midwest to have a facility like Brandenburg — we try to sell that when we recruit players," he said.

earnest tomorrow."

The Wildcats opened spring drills with 94 players, 50 of them returning lettermen.

Free safety David Ast, fullback Charles Crawford and defensive tackle George Fowler will miss the spring session while recovering from knee injuries suffered last season.

Barring any postponements due to the weather, the Wildcats will conclude spring practice April 27.

The annual Purple-White spring intrasquad game will be April 28.

Title holders to fight for world supremacy

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Larry Holmes and Gerrie Coetzee said Wednesday they will fight June 8 at Las Vegas, Nev., for what they consider world heavyweight supremacy even if the World Boxing Association should strip Coetzee of the title.

Kenneth Bounds, president of JPD Sports of Houston, the main promoter, also said he is confident there will be no problems with promoter Don King, who has a promotional contract with Coetzee and is being paid to step aside. King is hollering for his money.

"Gerrie is ready to fight Larry Holmes regardless of any executive body," said Bounds, about the possibility of Coetzee having title recognition withdrawn by the WBA.

"I want to fight Larry Holmes because he is one of the greatest fighters around and the greatest heavyweight champion of our time," Coetzee, a South African living in the United States, said at a news conference.

Coetzee won the WBA title with a 10th-round knockout of Michael Dokes last Sept. 23.

"I think if Gerrie Coetzee is lucky enough to whip me, he'll be recognized as the heavyweight champion, and I'll praise him as a great fighter," said Holmes, who last December relinquished the World Boxing Council title he held for 5½ years and is now recognized as champion by the new International Boxing Federation.

The fight will be sanctioned by the IBF, whose president, Robert W. Lee, attended the news conference.

"A year or two down the road the WBA and the WBC won't exist," snapped Holmes.

Elias Cordova, chairman of the WBA championship committee, reportedly has said that if Coetzee fights Holmes, he could be stripped of the title because Holmes is not ranked.

Baltimore owner still stadium hunting

By The Associated Press

PHOENIX, Ariz. — Phoenix businessmen, saying they would wait no longer for Robert Irsay to make up his mind, on Wednesday withdrew the offer they made to the Baltimore Colts owner in hopes of luring his National Football League team to Arizona.

The withdrawal left Indianapolis and Baltimore in contention as sites for the Colts' next season.

Irsay has been considering moving the Colts for the past two months but has not given any hints about which way he is leaning.

NFL officials reportedly have told Irsay they want a decision on where the team will play by Sunday so that the league can prepare a schedule for next season.

Harry Cavanagh, a Phoenix attorney belonging to the group wooing Irsay, said he and other members spoke Wednesday morning with Irsay.

"Mr. Irsay stated that he still had not made up his mind and needed additional time, but the Phoenix contingent felt they could not wait any longer," Cavanagh said.

Cavanagh and other members of the Arizona group previously expressed optimism about their chances of persuading Irsay to move his Colts to 70,021-seat Sun Devil Stadium in suburban Tempe with the promise that a domed stadium would be built later.

"The complexity of the transaction and the recent moves by the state of Maryland and the city of Baltimore have made the likelihood of the NFL team being moved to Phoenix appear very doubtful," he said in a statement released on behalf of himself, Arizona Public Service Co. Chairman Keith Turley and real-estate developer Eddie Lynch.

"Phoenix made its best offer, but unfortunately could not match the offers of either Baltimore or Indianapolis," he said.

Indianapolis has the new Hoosier Dome, which seats more than 61,000. Representatives of that city reportedly have offered to build a practice field and office-compound facility and arrange for a loan of $15 million at less than current interest rates.

Baltimore officials and businessmen have offered Irsay a $15 million loan at 8 percent interest, and a California developer has offered to build a domed stadium in Baltimore for the Colts and baseball's Baltimore Orioles if both teams agree to long-term leases.

Cavanagh had said the Phoenix group's offer also included a $15 million loan at discounted rate, rent-free use of the 70,021-seat Sun Devil Stadium and a guaranteed $3 million in ticket sales.

Seven-run inning lifts Royals to 12-7 win

By The Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Darryl Motley hit a home run with two men on base in Kansas City's seven-run fifth inning to lift the Royals to a 12-7 victory over the Montreal Expos in exhibition baseball Wednesday.

Kansas City sent 11 batters to the plate in the fifth-inning barrage off losing pitcher Bob James. The Royals had 16 hits in the game.

Motley also had an RBI double in the second inning that tied the game at 1-1. The Royals' Onix Concepcion had four hits in four turns at bat, and Butch Davis had three hits, including a solo homer and an RBI double.

Montreal's Gary Carter slugged a two-run homer in the top of the fifth, giving the Expos a short-lived 4-3 lead.

Bud Black, who will start for the Royals in their season-opener Monday against the New York Yankees, picked up the victory.

Committee discusses drinking-age increase

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A conference committee nearly reached tentative agreement Wednesday on a bill to raise Kansas' legal age for drinking 3.2 percent beer to 19, but broke up without finalizing its report in order to try to persuade one of its members to return and participate.

Part of the tentative agreement was to make the age change effective July 1 this year, but exempt young people who turn 18 before that date. If their 18th birthdays fell before July 1, 1984, they would be allowed to go to taverns, and buy and drink 3.2 beer. Those with birthdays after June 30 would have to wait until they are 19.

Sen. Richard Gannon, D-Goodland, stormed out of the meeting after accusing his fellow conference committee members of apparently violating the state's Open Meetings Law by conferring in unannounced sessions on the bill.

The chairman of the six-member conference committee, Rep. Robert H. Miller, R-Wellington, and Sen. Paul Hess, R-Wichita, chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee who also is on the conference committee, both vehemently denied Gannon's allegation.

They said no more than two members of the conference committee ever talked about a proposed agreement ahead of Wednesday's formal meeting. It would take discussions involving three of the six members to constitute a violation of the law.

Gannon said he believed prior discussions had "impugned the integrity of the Legislature," and said he would not be party to "violating the law."

The Goodland Democrat said he had no evidence of violations but that members of the attorney general's staff were "very interested" in what has happened.

"I can't say (that violations have occurred)," said Gannon. "I don't know what they've done. I wasn't privy to anything. I just know it's very strange that Tuesday they brought a copy of a report to me that already had five signatures on it."

Hess and the Rev. Richard E. Taylor Jr., president of Kansans for Life at Its Best, the state's temperance organization, both claimed Gannon opposes raising the beer drinking age and was trying to cloud the issue by making the Open Meetings Law violation allegation.

Gannon confirmed to reporters that he opposes raising the drinking age, but said there are things some of his fellow senators badly want included in the liquor bill and he considered it his solemn duty to fight to be included in deliberations on the bill so he could represent their views.

Gannon and Senate Minority Leader Jack Steineger of Kansas City sent one letter and Sen. Ed Reilly, R-Leavenworth, sent another, both asking Attorney

Democrats clash in New York debate

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Democratic front-runners clashed Wednesday night in an intense and angry debate, with Walter Mondale demanding Gary Hart withdraw ads "that suggest I'm out trying to kill kids." Hart responded: "Why do you question my commitment to arms control and civil rights?"

Their angry exchange was the climax of a 60-minute, prime-time debate six days before the crucial New York presidential primary.

"Why do you run those ads...when you know better?" Mondale asked Hart. "I'm a person who believes in peace."

A few moments later the former vice president said, "I think you ought to pull those ads down this night."

Hart countered by asking Mondale: "Why have you questioned my commitment to arms control and civil rights when you know I have just as much commitment to both of those as you do?"

The third candidate, the Rev. Jesse Jackson, said, "Tomorrow the issue will be this rat-a-tat (between Hart and Mondale) without giving a direction. The fact is, the reason they are having this kind of a kinship struggle is because there are such similarities in policy. It's a matter of both running in the same direction just a little slower."

The candidates met in Low Auditorium at Columbia University. The debate was sponsored by CBS and moderated by Dan Rather.

"Tonight we started showing where the beef is," Mondale said following the debate.

Hart and Mondale lost little time going after each other over votes on the windfall profits tax and the Chrysler bailout legislation, but the question that dominated the debate was when and where to commit U.S. combat forces.

They agreed they would defend West European allies, but differed over Central America and the oil-rich Persian Gulf.

Hart said, "I think some of us learned a lesson from Vietnam, and that is military might in the third world is not always going to work. That's why I disagree with Vice President Mondale on Central America and elsewhere."

Mondale said he opposed President Reagan's policies in Central America but there was difference between that and "just pulling the plug and walking out of there."

Hart said Mondale was willing to "sacrifice American lives" in a war for Persian Gulf oil and added, "I don't think we ought to lose American lives fighting for someone else's oil."

"Don't worry about Walter Mondale and American lives," said the former vice president. "I'll stand strong there."

Hours before the debate, Hart had a private meeting with French President Francois Mitterrand. The session was requested by Mitterrand.

In a speech to a Wall Street audience, Hart denounced the Reagan administration as "one of the worst in this nation's history in terms of presidential leadership demanding those who serve in high public office to meet the highest standards of ethics and commitment to public stewardship."

"I think it is time we had people serving in the public interest and not their own private interest."

Hart called on Reagan to withdraw the nomination of Edwin Meese III to be attorney general.

Senate passes regent schools' funding

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Senate gave first-round approval Wednesday to a measure providing $617 million to operate the state university system and the Kansas Technical Institute next year, including money for a 7 percent salary increase for faculty members.

The bill also would provide an additional $24.6 million to the six universities, KTI and the Board of Regents Office for capital improvement projects.

As approved by the Senate, the bill appropriates nearly $1.9 million more than the House version of the proposal and about $250,000 more than recommended by Gov. John Carlin. A final roll call vote on the measure is scheduled on Thursday.

Of the total funding, $305.7 million comes from general fund revenues. The remainder is from other sources including fees and federal funds.

The higher education bill provides general operating money for the seven institutions under the control of the regents for the 1985 fiscal year, which begins July 1. It does not include money for salary increases for classified employees such as clerks and secretarial workers. The amount of the pay increase will be decided later in a separate bill. Carlin has recommended a 5 percent increase, which would cost $5.6 million.

The measure does provide for a 7 percent faculty salary increase, a 5 percent salary increase for student workers, a 7 percent increase for utility expenses and an 8 percent increase for other operating expenses, which includes some building maintenance and equipment purchases.

Carlin had recommended a 6 percent faculty salary increase and 5 percent increase in other operating expenses, but the House boosted both by 1 percent. The governor had recommended an 8 percent increase for utilities, but that was cut. Carlin's recommendation for student hourly salaries was accepted by the Legislature.

Here is the total funding for the regents' institutions as approved by the Senate and as recommended by Carlin:

- University of Kansas, $153.5 million; $152.5 million.
- KU Medical Center, $159.4 million; $159.5 million.

- Kansas State University, $151.3 million; $150.9 million.

- K-State Veterinary Medical Center, $8.4 million; $8.4 million.

- Wichita State University, $60.4 million; $59.7 million.

- Fort Hays State University, $25.6 million; $25.4 million.

- Emporia State University, $25 million; $24.9 million.

- Pittsburg State University, $23 million; $22.9 million.

- Kansas Technical Institute, $3.6 million; $3.7 million.

- Regents' Office, $6.7 million; $6.6 million.

Even without money for classified employee salary raises, the Senate-approved measure would provide a $19.3 million increase in total funding for the institutions over last year.

No objections were raised to the proposal during debate, and no attempts were made to increase funding.

Water supply may diminish in plains area

By DIONA NACE
Collegian Reporter

A readily available source of water is important for any farmer. But to people in the High Plains Region, which includes western Kansas, whose agriculture-based economy has come to depend on irrigation, a water source may be depleting quickly.

David Kromm, professor of geography, and Stephen White, head of the Department of Geography, have completed nearly half of a two-year study to be an independent supplement to the federally-funded High Plains Ogalla Aquifer Study released a year ago.

Natural recharge of the aquifer (an underground water supply) is minimal, and withdrawal for irrigation is depleting it. The High Plains study estimated regional dependence on the aquifer projected probable consequences of water management alternatives and examined the possibilities of importing water into the area.

Based on previous research into response to ground water depletion in southwestern Kansas, Kromm and White said they feel the High Plains study was incomplete. They said it failed to assess the feasibility of management options in terms of differences in local water management arrangements and it ignored perceptions held by residents of the region.

Kromm and White said they perceive what will eventually happen with the aquifer not only depends on economic and technical conditions as investigated by the High Plains study, but also on the knowledge, preferences and actions of the residents in the troubled area.

About 3,000 people in the High Plains region, which includes areas in six states, are receiving questionnaires from Kromm and White to help the researchers determine public perceptions of the water depletion problem and how they would like to see it managed.

Kromm and White said they have randomly selected names of residents in 14 counties where there is concern about water shortages.

These counties are Lamb, Gaines and Hansford counties in Texas; Finney, Wichita and Thomas counties in Kansas; Dawson, Holt, Chase and Sheridan counties in Nebraska; Texas County in Oklahoma; Yuma and Kit Carson counties in Colorado and Curry County in New Mexico.

The questionnaire will determine

Senate to review plan for Salvadoran aid cut

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A Democratic leader Wednesday predicted Senate approval of a compromise $61.7 million military aid package for El Salvador, but Secretary of State George P. Shultz said he would resist any move to cut off the aid if the government now being chosen is overthrown in a military coup.

"I think it is not necessary and is inappropriate to seem to be predicting that possibility," Shultz said. "The military in El Salvador has gone to great lengths to depoliticize themselves. I don't see any evidence of anything to the contrary."

Shultz made his remarks to the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that oversees the State Department budget.

Sen. Dale Bumpers, D-Ark., said he had heard speculation about a possible coup if centrist presidential candidate Jose Napoleon Duarte, who led in Sunday's first round of voting in El Salvador, is elected in a runoff expected to be held in May.

He asked Shultz if he would support an amendment to cut off aid in that event. "No, sir," Shultz said.

The Senate is expected to vote this week on a bill that would provide $61.7 million in emergency military aid to El Salvador in the current fiscal year. The Appropriations Committee approved $93 million in aid by a close vote earlier this month, but the Reagan administration compromised on the lower figure after Senate Democrats threatened to delay action.

Congress has already approved $64.8 million in military aid for the Central American nation in this fiscal year, but ordered that $20 million of it could not be spent until there is a trial and verdict in the case of four American churchwomen murdered in El Salvador in December 1980.

Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, D-Hawaii, the sponsor of the compromise measure, told reporters, "It's going to pass." Inouye is chairman of a Democratic task force on Central America and senior Democrat on the appropriations subcommittee that handles foreign spending.

Inouye said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., indicated in a meeting of the task force that he plans to offer an amendment to provide only enough money to last through May, withholding further installments until after the runoff when the makeup of the new government is known.

Meanwhile, Rep. Clarence Long, D-Md., chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations, said, "I am concerned that we need them (the Salvadoran regime) more than they need us, and we are going to continue to give them arms no matter how atrocious their behavior is."

Meese fails to report gift, violates law, CBS discovers

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — White House Counselor Edwin Meese III accepted a pair of $375 cuff links given to him by the South Korean government and failed to report it or turn the gift over to the government as required by law, CBS reported Wednesday.

In another allegation against President Reagan's nominee to be attorney general, the network said Meese received the jewelry while accompanying the president on a 1983 trip to South Korea and didn't hand in the gift until Wednesday, after CBS raised the issue.

Under federal law, officials have 60 days to give up gifts exceeding $140 from foreign powers. CBS said White House aides Michael K. Deaver and James A. Baker and National Security Adviser Robert C. McFarlane received similar cuff links from the South Koreans, but handed them in within the time limit.

CBS quoted White House aides as saying that Meese had not returned the cuff links because he had been told that the South Koreans had been advised not to provide gifts worth more than $140.

White House spokeswoman Kim Hoggard refused to comment on the CBS report.

The latest report follows a justice department decision to ask for a special prosecutor to investigate other charges raised against Meese since his nomination to be attorney general was sent to the Senate for confirmation.

Nutrition, fitness experts to speak

K-State experts on nutrition and exercise will be the featured speakers for a "Let's Talk About It" program at noon today in the Union Catskeller.

The program is directed to those planning to begin an exercise program to get in shape.

Featured speakers will be Connie Bachofer, senior in foods and nutrition in business-community service; Ronald Bulbulian, assistant professor of health, physical education and leisure studies and Martha Olson, dietitian at Lafene Student Health Center.

The "Let's Talk About It" series deals with current events and controversial issues on campus and is sponsored by the Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee. The public is invited.

Royal Purple wins five-star rating

The 1983 "Royal Purple," K-State's yearbook, has received a five-star rating from the Associate Collegiate Press.

The book, who's editor last year was Jean Nicholson, senior in management, next goes to Pacemaker competition. It will be screened by judges who select the nation's top trend-setting collegiate publications.

The University holds the record of 30 consecutive yearbook All-American awards, a feat unmatched by any other university.

Associate editor for the book was Donna Osborn, who graduated in December with a degree in journalism.

The Associate Collegiate Press "Yearbook Guidebook," a publication dealing with yearbook editing, made four references to the "Royal Purple." It was cited for outstanding graphic layout, photography, feature writing and sports writing.

Foundation promotes staffer

Art Loub, executive vice president of the KSU Foundation, has announced the promotion of staff member Rusty Andrews to the position of director of corporate and foundation relations.

Andrews moves into the post after serving as the assistant director of annual giving since January 1983.

In the new position, Andrews will concentrate on the corporation aspects of fund raising for the University. He will deal with contributions from the various corporations, foundations and trusts with which the University has or can develop contacts. In addition to his other duties, Andrews also will manage the operation of the Foundation's computer systems.

Andrews came to the Foundation with a background in higher education and broadcasting. After two years in Wichita with the Kansas State Network, working in television and radio, he moved to Manhattan, where he served for three years as the director of public relations at Manhattan Christian College.

Professor appointed to board

Dennis Day, professor of landscape architecture, has been appointed to the Landscape Architectural Accrediting Board.

The board is responsible for accrediting schools that have landscape architecture programs, he said.

Day will serve a three-year term along with eight other individuals on the board.

To be appointed to the board, Day was first nominated by the president of the American Society of Landscape Architecture. After undergoing a clearing process and being confirmed by the consul on education, members are appointed by the ASLA to the position.

The board, which evaluates about 45 schools which are currently accredited, meets three or four times a year. The schools are accredited for five years, unless a program warrants a re-evaluation before the term is completed.

Associate professor wins award

Don Lindley, associate professor of leisure studies, is the 1984 recipient of the Distinguished Professional Service Award, the highest professional award given by the Kansas Recreation and Parks Association.

Recipients of the award are selected for state, regional and national experience in recreation and parks, leadership in developing recreation and parks programs and service to the professional organization.

Lindley, a therapeutic recreation specialist, is a consultant to community leisure service agencies.

He completed the National Workshop for Accreditation Visitation Evaluation, sponsored by the National Council on Accreditation, during the 1983 NRPA Congress.

Renewed search outrages students

College continues hunt for president

By The College Press Service

NORTH ADAMS, Mass. — Thanks largely to a technicality, the leaders of 2,000-student North Adams State College have decided to junk the results of an eight-month, $17,000 search for a new president and start over again.

A storm protest, much of it aimed at getting the school's trustees to resign, may convince the leaders to junk that decision too, however.

In early March, the 10 trustees could not agree which of the final four candidates — culled by a search committee from among 170 applicants — to elect as president, and instead voted to re-open the search from scratch.

Outrage followed.

More than half the student body and school faculty signed petitions demanding the trustees choose a new president from among the four finalists. The petitions asked for the trustees' resignation if they didn't comply.

Trustee Chairman Carmen Massimiano was "bitterly disappointed over the failure of the board to select a new president, and the apparent unwillingness of the trustees to compromise."

"I could hardly believe what happened that night," said Trustee Margaret Lanoue.

All trustees said the finalists were well-qualified, but blame an odd "70-point system" of electing a new leader for the stalemate.

Under the system, which Lanoue endorsed as a means of avoiding making the presidential selection into a mere popularity contest, the 10 trustees would award from three to 10 points to each candidate. Using secret ballots, the election would end when one of the candidates amassed 70 points.

But after three ballots, none of the candidates had garnered enough points, and the trustees could agree only to discard the finalists they had and start the search procedure over again.

Campus reaction was heated. Both the student government and the Faculty Senate launched petition drives. Both pledged to sit in at the next trustees' meeting until the trustees agreed to elect one of the original finalists.

But at last week's meeting, the trustees merely accepted the petitions and pledged to debate the issue at their next meeting.

In the interim, some of the trustees seem to have changed their minds.

"I'd like to see one of these four candidates selected," said William Napolitano, a trustee who served on the search committee.

Lanoue said only that she hopes the issue will be resolved soon.

Correction

The Collegian couldn't win at the numbers game Wednesday. In the article "University tuition rate tops inflation," it was incorrectly reported that Vice President of Business Affairs Daniel Beatty said that the Kansas Legislature passed a 3.29 percent cut in the University's base budget in July 1982. He actually said that a $3.29 million cut was passed.

The article "Risk of cancer may be reduced with proper diet, researcher says," incorrectly stated that Robert Reeves, associate professor of foods and nutrition and K-State cancer researcher, works with 200 students who are performing research on the effects of a high fiber, high fat diet on the incidence of colon tumors. There are actually two students performing the research.

The same article quoted Reeves as saying, "High fat diets are supposed to promote tumor growth. If Americans could further modify their diet, they could reduce their risk of cancer." The quote should have been, "High fat diets are supposed to be promoters of tumor growth, rather than initiators. If Americans modified their dietary fat intake, they may reduce their risk of cancer."

In the article "Mayor says house-moving fee to change," it was incorrectly stated that City Manager Don Harmon proposed creating a fee for moving houses of $100.20 per square foot of floor area moved. Harmon actually proposed a $100 fee in addition to 20 cents per square foot of floor space moved.

Man burglarizes residence

On March 12 an apartment in the 1400 block of McCain Lane was burglarized.

The burglar used a small pry tool such as a screwdriver to pry off a screen, then broke out the window glass. The suspect then was able to reach inside, unlock the door and gain entry.

Once inside, the suspect went through the entire residence and apparently placed the items he wanted on the bed. The suspect then picked up the bedding containing the items and fled through the front door of the apartment.

Among items taken were a make-up mirror, a white rabbit fur coat, an AM/FM clock radio and 15 to 20 women's sweaters.

A witness described the suspect as a 20-year-old white male, 5 feet 9 inches tall, 175 pounds and with dark hair. It is estimated the loss in this incident is in excess of $500.

Anyone having information on this or any other crime may call Crime Stoppers at 539-7777. Callers will remain anonymous and may qualify for cash rewards up to $1,000.

Students sue for negligence; schools forced to raise costs

By The College Press Service

ROCKY MOUNT, N.C. — After a December 1980 night basketball game, a non-student, Kermit Smith, jumped three North Carolina Wesleyan College cheerleaders as they were leaving the gym parking lot.

Smith forced them into his car at knife point and drove them to a nearby quarry.

There, he raped and then murdered 20-year-old Whelette Venita Collins. When he turned to free and attack the other two women, however, he was overpowered by them. They fled to safety.

Smith was later caught and convicted. He's now in prison, on death row.

North Carolina Wesleyan, however, is still on trial.

The two survivors of the nightmare sued for a second time last December, almost three years to the day after the tragedy, claiming the college negligently contributed to the crime by not providing adequate security or lighting in the gym parking lot.

Students, in fact, are taking their colleges to court in increasing numbers recently, observers said, charging them with negligence in mishaps ranging from minor cuts to rape and murder.

The suits lead to higher education costs, strict new rules for students, defensive administrators and even a sense of lost collegiality.

But the cases continue anyway. A court recently made Ohio University pay damages to a student who, while trying to open a jammed dorm window, shattered the glass and cut himself.

In mid-January, a student paralyzed in a University of Denver fraternity house trampoline accident took his university to court, claiming DU was responsible for the accident.

A court last fall held Notre Dame liable for injuries suffered by a student who got drunk at the football stadium and fell over a railing.

The "creeping legalism," as some administrators call it, has affected many types of schools.

Seventy-two percent of the schools belonging to the Christian College Coalition, for example, have been sued by their students recently.

"One would have thought that the Christian mission of these colleges and the Christian commitments of their constituencies would have mitigated the litigious approach to resolving differences, complaints and wrongs," said Dr. W. Richard Stephens, Greenville College. Stephens oversaw a study of suits against coalition colleges.

"Ohio State," reported OSU presidential assistant Larry Thompson, "has had three suits in the last month."

Sheldon Steinbach, lawyer for the American Council on Education, said, "Universities are increasingly being held liable for the well-being of their students."

The suits, he said, are "a part of modern society. We're an increasingly litigious society."

"Society is changing," said Amos Link, attorney for the murdered North Carolina Wesleyan cheerleader's family. "These atrocities may have always been occurring, but people may not have been as conscious of their rights and have not been doing anything about it."

"We have more attorneys than any other country in the world and they have to find something to do," said University of Denver Dean of Students, Bob Burrell.

"Unless laws are changed to not let lawyers handle the cases on a contingency basis, there will be no relief," said Charles Grier, Brigham Young's insurance overseer. "Lawyers file $4 million suits, expecting to receive half of it."

Colleges don't always lose the cases, of course.

Hammond said a 1979 Delaware Valley College case established that schools must make students aware of potential physical hazards and must apply "minimum standards of care" in maintaining their campuses.

But colleges are otherwise not responsible for the actions of third parties, he said.

And a 1979 study of how public institutions' — including some colleges — negligence trials ended found the institutions won 54 percent, said Jeannine Squaric of Jury Verdict Research in Solon, Ohio.

"These suits need to be handled, even if ruled in your favor," Thompson said. "Lawyers don't come for free. No question it has to increase the cost of education."

The rash of lawsuits has other effects. The University of Kentucky's student government, for instance, recently backed off funding an escort service for fear of a negligence suit if it was unable to protect a student from an attack.

Notre Dame banned alcohol from campus recently in part because it feared being liable for drinking-related accidents at the school.

"You might try to get away from activities like sororities and fraternities," said Denver attorney Victor Quinn. "The leases are long-term, but when they run out, the university could tell them 'We don't want you on our property.' That's that."

"It sets up a more combative environment, a less collegial environment," OSU's Thompson said. "In the past, it was not in good taste to sue your institution. There isn't that closeness anymore."

Court settles in favor of college, denies student due process right

By The College Press Service

NEW YORK — Striking down a lower court decision that would have resulted in sweeping changes in the ways colleges discipline their students, the New York Supreme Court Appellate Division last week ruled that students' constitutional rights to due process don't always apply to disciplinary procedures.

The court said a student at the State University of New York at Cortland did not have a right to have an attorney to represent her or to a review of written transcripts of the university's decision to suspend her for a semester.

SUNY officials accused her of cheating twice.

But whether or not she had cheated was never the real issue.

"The student admitted the first time she was caught cheating that she had plagiarized an essay," said Peter Cray, SUNY lawyer.

The issue instead was how closely the disciplinary proceedings she went through had to resemble courtroom procedures.

At SUNY's campuses, the colleges must give students written notice of the charges against them, provide an open hearing in which the student can call one witness and provide students with a notice of what final penalties, if any, are imposed on them.

This student, Marguerite Moresco, asserted she was entitled to the same professional representation and review of the written proceedings she would have in protecting herself in a civil or criminal court.

New York's state Supreme Court — which is not the state's highest court — agreed with the student.

But then the appellate court sided with SUNY, saying the student's rights in a "collegial atmosphere" were "best served by a nonadversarial setting" without dueling lawyers and transcripts.

Richard Shay, the student's attorney, could not be reached for comment.

SUNY, however, is "quite satisfied" with the decision, Cray said.

He said letting a student take a lawyer into disciplinary hearings and providing transcripts of the

6,000 to 7,000 disciplinary hearings a year on the SUNY campuses would place "an absolutely intolerable burden on the university."

"Due process does not require a full adversarial hearing," Cray said. "The student had the right to confront witnesses, be represented by someone in the college community and receive complete written charges against her."

Yet in many school discipline situations, the legal cards are already stacked against students, the authors of a new book about school discipline argue.

"School systems rarely have discipline cases that wind up in court," said Ellen Jane Hollingsworth, co-author of "School Discipline," which was published in January.

"The constitutional protections of the student's rights are not really very broad anyway," she said. "A student threatened with suspension only has the right to tell his or her side of the story. The principal can listen, then suspend the student anyway."

a resident's knowledge of the aquifer and its relation to the regional economy; his perception of issues regarding ground water depletion and its possible economic, social and environmental consequences; and his perception of the range of the choices in adjusting to problems associated with ground water depletion.

Kromm, a natural resources specialist, and White, a population geographer, have documented the existing laws and the ground water management districts and agencies that operate in the six states. They are presenting this data as a list of various alternative management strategies and institutional arrangements to people living in the selected counties.

Questionnaire recipients constitute a wide spectrum of people who depend on water from the aquifer.

Preference variability will be measured in terms of socioeconomic characteristics, location and water management institutional arrangements.

Kromm and White said they will compare their findings with those of the High Plains study to see if they correlate and adequately reflect the knowledge and preferences of regional residents and point up any regional differences of opinion.

The study itself will be completed in July 1985, Kromm said, but a preliminary survey of results will be compiled and released this summer. After the study is completed, a brochure will be prepared reporting their conclusions and policy recommendations from analyzing the survey results.

The brochure will be distributed through the cooperative extension services and water research institutes in each of the states in the High Plains region.

Panel passes 'whistleblowing' bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — After rejecting a proposal to protect faculty members from disciplinary action if they contact their legislators or report illegal activities, a Senate committee approved a "whistleblower" bill Wednesday which would protect classified employees from such retaliation.

Under the bill, which has passed the House and now goes to the Senate floor for debate and action, no state agency supervisor could prohibit a classified employee from discussing the agency with legislators or from reporting any violations of state or federal law or regulation.

Speaking before the Senate Governmental Organization Committee, Kauffman defended the regents against allegations that some faculty members had been prohibited from contacting their legislators. The regents request only that faculty members who wish to appear before legislative committees "inform the board of their intent to appear," he said.

Lynelle King, executive director of the Kansas State Nurses Association, said some members of the nursing faculty at Wichita State University had been told to stop contacting their legislators about nursing legislation.

"If there is a problem," Kauffman said, "I say to the Kansas State Nursing Association that we want to sit down and work it out with them. But including unclassified faculty in this bill is totally unnecessary."

The committee had discussed at its hearing Tuesday the proposal by the nursing group and the Kansas Association of Public Employees to include faculty members in the provisions of the bill.

Faculty members "are covered under the tenure contract and the tenure board," said Sen. Frank Gaines, D-Augusta. "If you change the bill to include unclassified faculty, you're putting them under the Civil Service Board."

The bill would allow classified employees to appeal to the state Civil Service Board when they believe they have been fired, transferred or demoted for conferring with legislators or reporting illegal activities.

A holy different thing

Manhattan is missing out. In Wichita, cable subscribers can get a channel devoted to Christian programming featuring Jim Bakker and his wife Tammy Faye. One of Bakker's goals is to build Heritage USA, a city for Christians. Construction has begun in Charlotte, N.C. According to the program, someone who donates $1,000 can become a lifetime partner in the PTL (Praise the Lord) club. This entitles the member to three nights and four days in the Heritage hotel once a year for the rest of his life. For the rest of their days, members can vacation and be absolved of sins at the same time (and not have to associate with sinners). But that's not all that is offered on this television program. For a small statue of David slaying Goliath to sit on your coffee table, just send $125 to Bakker. There are cassette tapes of the Bible that can be purchased for a minimum pledge of $15 per month — if you act right now you can still get the first cassette tape of Genesis! There also is an album by Tammy Faye available, but if you don't have any money, just write that you are praying for Jim and a medallion will be sent to you (one way of getting your address on their mailing list). Bakker was real excited about raising money for PTL's new project — sending up its own satellite so everyone who wants to can "feed their family" Christian programming 24 hours a day. The station will feature its own programs and news events so a Christian viewer will never need to change channels. Can you imagine? A person could watch PTL and get all the information he needs to know. But if its programming quality is anything like the show on March 25, people won't get their money's worth. The first 15 minutes of the hour-long show was a progress report about construction of Heritage USA. Instead of a commercial, there was a saxophone solo. Then Bakker started listing the ways people could contribute to his cause. This took an additional 15 minutes. Tammy Faye sang "Amazing Grace" two or three times, during which the television audience was asked to get out their checkbooks. Then it was back to Bakker for a prayer. But before the prayer, Bakker repeated how to make the lifetime pledge, buy the cassette Bible, statue of David or record album, and asked the telephone operators (standing by) to relate some of the telephone pledges. Then he and Tammy Faye said goodbye to the audience and asked them to keep up on their pledges. Bakker never did pray with the audience. He was so busy reiterating what the audience could get for their money that he missed the whole point of the show. No scripture was read, no sermon preached and only one song was sung. Bakker is missing an important point of Christian life. Prayer should be a vital part of Christian television programming. Connie Woodard, for the editorial board

Value of parking changes varies

Some order may come out of confusion if the Board of Regents approves regulation revisions in the 1985 Traffic and Parking Regulations manual as suggested by the Traffic and Parking Council. Or it may not. Changing references to "faculty/staff" to "employee" will help clarify who can park where. New permits designed to hang from the rear-view mirrors of cars will replace the traditional bumper stickers, facilitating a transfer of the permit to another vehicle. But an adhesive decal also will have to be applied in the lower corner of the driver's side on the inside front windshield, along with a single-car permit. What's wrong with the old bumper sticker permits? The parking council is replacing one permit with two. The new permits should be effective enough to justify such a change in design. It is most likely that such a change would increase the chance of confusion about permits. Maybe the regents will recognize an unnecessary reform when they see one.

YUMPs coming of age politically—

WASHINGTON — As a rule, fame in America is only as current as the last issue of People magazine. Andy Warhol says it only lasts 15 minutes. Consequently, young upwardly-mobile professionals, or YUMPs, whom presidential contender Gary Hart has helped make America's latest overnight celebrities, may become victims of this cultural tendency. But the YUMPs' (or YUPs', depending on how you like your acronyms) emergence is neither sudden nor transitory. Behind the affinity that many of them have for Hart is a fundamental notion about their own place in both politics and the economy. Of course, Hart's star may fall in their estimation, but to explain the Coloradoan's popularity as an example of trendy consumerism might be unduly compulsive. America's young professionals, whether urban or suburban, already affluent or still aspiring to be so, have prompted our curiosity for some time. Their role in giving Hart most of his primary victories so far (mostly in states where unemployment is below the national average) was no surprise, especially after the success the similarly cerebral John Anderson had with them in 1980. But our immediate interest, we admit, comes in response to skeptics — such as The Washington Post's George Will, an old 42 — who've suggested that YUMPs (a club Will limits to 25-to-40-year-olds) take their politicians with their tortellini or any other foodstuffs sanctioned by D.E. Crimmins' "The Official Young Aspiring Professional's Fast-Track Handbook." Some stereotypes can go too far. While the more affluent and ambitious members of the baby boom bear a strong resemblance to Crimmins' caricature, their political interests are both diverse and substantive. Their vote, like that of a machinist or senior citizen, is an expression of how they feel about themselves. A politician can become a symbol; his campaign a metaphor for his supporters' own struggles. Hart's generational message, however, runs across typical partisan lines. It speaks to millions of Americans who, despite their relative wealth and comfort, feel shortchanged and frustrated. Last year, the Brookings Institution issued a study illustrating the extent to which younger adults have enjoyed greater benefits in education, housing and other essentials than their frequent complaints indicate. Yet their sheer numbers have stymied the expectations of continued career advancement of which they became prisoners in grade school. Nowadays, even J.D.s and M.B.A.s aren't guaranteed exemptions from a middle-management glut, with which they will slowly grow old. For many older YUMPs, there is an unsettling sensation that their gray hairs are multiplying more quickly than their opportunities. But one thing is fairly certain: Hart is only among the first political practitioners to grasp the restiveness of a newly-emerging voting bloc. This group's independent political inclinations will benefit both Democrat and Republican to the extent that either party speaks to its common experiences. Its increased involvement may well prove to be a godsend to moderates and a deadly blow to the far right. At work is the Vietnam-Watergate generation's rebirth in politics. Hart may fail to ride this generation's self-interest to the White House this year, but other candidates will undoubtedly have a chance to try again in the future.

CONFIDENTIALLY, SERGEANT, I'M GETTING WORRIED ABOUT ACID RAIN

Israel becomes election year issue—

WASHINGTON — The King of Jordan, Hussein Bin Talal, descendant of desert warriors, a Hashimite from the Hejaz of Arabia and a pretty nifty pilot, is right. This is not the year to do business with America. That is about what the King has been saying. Apparently vying with Cher to see who can do more interviews, the King has told almost anyone who would listen that America has lost its credibility in the Middle East, and especially this year, is a captive of the so-called Israeli lobby. Whether there is, in fact, an Israeli lobby is a question I leave aside for the moment. But there is no doubt there is such a thing as the Jewish vote, and in an election year it is not to be dismissed. And almost no one has. The first to chuck his principles and go a-courting this vote was Sen. John Glenn, D-Ohio, whose differences with Israel were reflected in his senate votes. Upon becoming a presidential candidate, though, he revised his thinking and in a New York speech stopped just short of doing a hora. Now comes Sen. Gary Hart, D-Colo., who, unlike Glenn, remains a presidential candidate. Hart once had a position on the question of whether the United States should move its embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. He said the move should be made "only after negotiations" with the Arabs.

Hart now says he will support a bill introduced by Sen. Daniel Moynihan, D-N.Y., that would direct the State Department to move the embassy to Jerusalem. The bill has co-sponsors galore (37 in the Senate; 201 in the House) and, although non-binding, one vehement opponent in the person of Secretary of State George Shultz. He holds the quaint view that the president, not Congress, should make foreign policy. In any other year there would be no question of that. This being an election year, though, foreign policy considerations take a back seat to political ones — even to the suggestion that Israel ought to make some concessions of its own. More than politics is at stake here. The United States, while reaffirming its friendship with Israel, should not be in a position where the King of Jordan, already injured, can claim gratuitous insult as well. Moving the embassy would tell the Arabs what they think they already know — that parity is a term limited to farm programs. If you are looking for a legality in this situation, you will be sorely disappointed. In the 1947 partition plan, Jerusalem, along with its virtual suburb, Bethlehem, were supposed to be international cities. Jordan seized East Jerusalem by war, and the Israelis took it the same way. This, by the way, also happens to be the way Jordan seized and then lost the West Bank. A country ought to be able to choose its capital for itself, and Israel should be no exception. But the greater issue here is the ability of the United States to broker a Middle East peace and, in the process, ensure the security of Israel. Insulting the Arabs and at the same time showing up Hussein as ineffective is no way to do that. Hart was right the first time and so, for that matter, are both Shultz and, in a sense, Hussein, whose gripes are hardly limited to the issue of Jerusalem. For Israelis, the principle of Jerusalem is an important one — important enough so that Costa Rica was rewarded in technical aid for moving its embassy from Tel Aviv. But the United States has matters of principle, too. One is that with rare exceptions, the president makes foreign policy. The other is that even in an election year, principle itself is more important than votes.

Letters

Review of performance overly critical

Editor, Re: "Ill-suited voice masks fine guitar music," in the March 28 Collegian: This letter is in response to the review of Doug Sharpe's nooner performance on March 27. Let me say first of all that I do not know Sharpe, and so this is not a partisan point of view. I object to the review because the reviewer seems intent on making Sharpe feel as bad as possible about his singing voice. Comparing Sharpe's voice to "the wounded buzz of a bumble bee" seems unnecessarily vicious. Let's keep in mind that the performance wasn't billed as professional, didn't cost anybody anything, and was solely for the enjoyment of the audience. Searching for possible reasons to justify the nasty tone of the review, I wondered if the reviewer's intent was to warn the public away from what he thought was bad entertainment. But obviously that couldn't be his intent, for the performance was a one-time thing. If the reviewer's intent was to simply inform the public of the performance, why then did he have to be so critical? I wonder...was the reviewer trying to sound "professional," perhaps like a slick Newsweek magazine reviewer would? If so, the reviewer should be made aware of two facts: one, the performer was not a professional and didn't represent himself as such; and two, it takes more than a critical tone to be a good reviewer. State requires firm to restrict dioxin site

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state Department of Health and Environment on Wednesday ordered the immediate paving of a one-acre area of a dioxin-contaminated industrial site in Kansas City, Kan.

In addition, the agency called for the owners of the Thompson-Hayward Chemical Co. to erect a fence around the area and restrict access to it. Also, the company is to prepare a plan for decontamination of a building in the one-acre restricted zone, monitoring and maintenance of the site.

The action was ordered by the department after new tests detected dioxin contamination up to 48 parts per billion in 42 samples of soil, dust and other sediment. Traces of the toxic chemical from 1.2 to 140 parts per billion were detected at the plant in samples taken last May and June.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency considers unacceptable any dioxin contamination higher than 1 part per billion in a residential area. That is equal to one second in 32 years.

In a prepared statement released Wednesday, Health and Environment officials said there is no "immediate public health threat off-site or to workers at the facility."

"The levels of dioxin at the Thompson-Hayward site are cause for concern," said Barbara Sabol, secretary of health and environment.

"Thompson-Hayward has agreed to take immediate action to limit exposure in order to minimize the potential for adverse impacts on the workers' health, and those who otherwise may be exposed in the immediate vicinity of the dioxin contamination."

The dioxin is a byproduct of pesticide production at the plant, which was stopped in 1978.

The Thompson-Hayward plant is in the Turner Industrial District — an older industrial region along the Kansas River just a few miles west of downtown Kansas City, Mo.

The entire plant site covers 17 acres. The restricted zone centers around a "pesticide processing" building, which has been closed since last spring.

Under the Health and Environment order, only authorized personnel with safety equipment will be allowed in the one-acre restricted zone where the soil and surface dioxin contamination was found.

The company was told to pave all open areas in the restricted zone to seal the soil and prevent spreading of the contamination. Any currently paved surfaces are to be swept and vacuumed.

As the second part of the order, the company is to submit a plan and timetable to Health and Environment by April 9 for decontaminating the pesticide processing building, sampling of air, monitoring and maintenance of the site, limiting future excavation in the contaminated area and imposing "restrictive covenants" on the deeds of the property.

In addition, the state environmental agency said "what appears to be buried metal" has been detected in an area north of a river levee adjacent to the plant. The company was ordered to excavate the area to determine what the nature of the material.

Bob Moody, public information officer for the state agency, said metal detectors found the unidentified materials.

Finally, Thompson-Hayward was directed to expand its efforts to determine "the extent and levels of groundwater contamination and the potential for off-site migration of organic contaminants in the groundwater."

The latest dioxin tests by the company were reported to the Department of Health and Environment last month. Since that time, the agency has been studying the information to determine what action to take.

The original owner of the plant — Thompson-Hayward Agriculture and Nutrition Co. — sold the contaminated facility in 1981 to the president owner, Thompson-Hayward Chemical Co. Both firms operate in side-by-side plants and both are cooperating in the clean-up, according to Sabol.

Dioxin also has been found in another Kansas site. State officials announced last October that dioxin had been detected in a sample of "oil liquids" from a groundwater test well at the Furley hazardous waste dump in Sedgewick County. The 80-acre waste dump, about 10 miles northeast of Wichita, has been closed since January 1982.

Local doctor turns cheese connoisseur

By LEE WHITE
Manhattan Editor

For those who don't know their muenster from their asiago, Eugene Klingler, surgeon and Manhattan city commissioner, has the answers.

Tuesday Klingler taught a class about the cheeses of Europe for the second time at the home of Ron and Jean Lee, 2402 Rogers Blvd. Lee, professor in physics, and Mrs. Lee have taught two or three cooking classes a week at home since 1977.

Klingler said he doesn't know how he became a cheese connoisseur, but thinks his German heritage may have something to do with it.

"I grew up in a German household, and we always had a lot of cheese around the house," Klingler said. "Nobody else around the house now really likes it except my daughter."

At Tuesday's class, participants sampled about a dozen European cheeses, including various types of Swiss and Italian cheeses, while Klingler explained how they are made and used. Imported dark beers as well as bread Mrs. Lee made accompanied the cheese samples. The class ended with everyone eating bowls of French onion soup with their favorite cheeses on top.

Eugene Klingler

Most knowledge of cheese is acquired by reading cooking publications, Klingler said.

"You read books on it," he said. "Occasionally you run across a good article in 'Food and Wine' or 'Cuisine.'"

Klingler said he also discovers facts about cheese from publications sent by a New York mail order firm where he buys some of his cheese. He said he likes most cheeses, but some have fallen from his favor.

"I don't like the gimmicky cheeses with chives and the cheddars they put port wine and muscatel in," Klingler said. "Take a poor cheese and dump junk in it and you get a poor cheese with junk in it."

"I like to come home and eat a reasonably firm cheese with some apples and Triscuits. A couple of cronies and I will get together on Saturday afternoons and eat cheese and have a beer on the side."

Klingler said he "probably wouldn't turn down" any of the cheeses sampled Tuesday night, but added he remains partial to bleu and Roquefort cheeses as overall favorites.

Cheese can be stored well, has butyrate, protein and carbohydrates and is relatively cheap, Klingler said. Some bad nutritional aspects include a high cholesterol level and the possibility of calcium deposits forming in kidneys — a trait common to other dairy products — if enough is eaten, he said.

Overall, however, Klingler said cheese is "very good for nutrition."

Even before the discovery of penicillin, people advocated drinking beer and eating Limburger cheese, which is inoculated with penicillin, for the treatment of sore throats, Klingler said. Other cheeses such as Roquefort and bleu contain penicillin, but he said he hasn't heard of people who are allergic to penicillin having adverse reactions to eating cheese.

Klingler hasn't scheduled another class for the public, but said he would like to conduct another one.

"I have a couple (of classes) to do for conventions this summer if I can work them in," he said. "But medicine is still what I do."

Eggs challenge the chip in snack food world

By CARA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Times were when many discounted the egg as being anything but oval, white, and boring.

However, times have changed, and the egg is entering the fast-paced world of snack foods. It is in this arena where the egg will compete with other American snack favorites such as the potato chip.

To seriously challenge such entrenched favorites the egg has taken a new shape and name.

The "Egg Ring," recently patented by the University, is the title for this new snack food product. It resembles an onion ring and is made of egg whites dipped in a batter and deep-fried.

"We were looking for a nutritional product that had all the satisfying qualities that make people snack," Frank Cunningham, professor of food science and co-inventor, said.

Jan Wiker, who is a graduate of K-State now working in California, came up with the idea, Cunningham said.

Cunningham was studying onion rings with Wiker when the latter thought, "Hey, why not make an egg ring?"

Cunningham said that the "Egg Ring" invention took about two years to perfect. "Egg Rings" would be marketed as a frozen product to be thawed out and reheated.

"Egg Rings" contains no fat, cholesterol, additives or salt. The product also is low in calories.

Although "Egg Rings" are made mainly from formed egg whites, several flavors can be added to make them taste as the manufacturer chooses. So far, barbecue, nacho, cheddar cheese and taco flavors have been produced.

The "Egg Ring" product is a value-added product, Cunningham said. A value-added product is one that has been improved through processing so it has a higher retail value.

Now, with the "Egg Ring" process patented, the University is looking for a company who is willing to be a licensee. This would entail the signing of an agreement by a company willing to pay royalties for the privilege of using the patent rights.

Though Cunningham is interested in all types of food, his main interest lies in snack foods. Batter and breading processes are Cunningham's specialty. This is the process that was used to develop the "Egg Rings."

"As far as I know, we are the only university group that has done any research in batter and breading technology," Cunningham said.

Cunningham is the co-author of two books on batter and breading processes entitled "Batter and Breading," and "Batter and Breading Technology." Darrel Suderman, a research scientist with Durkee foods who received his doctorate in food science at K-State, is co-author of the books.

Oil moratorium fails in Senate

WASHINGTON — The Senate refused on Wednesday to impose a year-long moratorium on oil industry mergers, rejecting arguments that some $29 billion in takeovers announced in recent weeks pose unknown threats to the nation's economy and energy supplies.

Senators voted instead to direct three of its committees to study the merger trend and report back this summer with recommendations. The alternative proposal carries no restrictions on the industry.

Supporters of a moratorium said the alternative was a hollow shell that meant nothing. But, said Sen. Bennett Johnston, D-La., the sponsor of the moratorium proposal, "I know how to count votes. We've been beaten on this issue."

His comment came after the Senate voted 57-39 against a motion to table — in effect kill — the substitute calling for a study.

Wronged man may get $50,000

TOPEKA — A Parsons man who spent 21 months in prison for a robbery he did not commit would receive $50,000 in compensation from the state under a bill endorsed Wednesday by the Senate Ways and Means Committee.

The bill, sponsored by the Joint Committee on Special Claims Against the State, now goes to the Senate floor for debate and action.

Keith Carl, 24, spent nearly two years in the Kansas State Industrial Reformatory in Hutchinson after he was convicted of robbing a Parsons restaurant at gunpoint on the night of Oct. 13, 1980.

Another man later confessed to the crime and Carl was released from prison July 13, 1982.

"I believe that there is enough feeling in the House and Senate to put $50,000 in there to cover a wrong that has been done by the state of Kansas," said Sen. Billy McCray, D-Wichita, in asking the committee to increase the amount of the $36,000 award approved by the House on Tuesday.

The claims committee voted last fall to recommend Carl be paid $75,000 for the time he spent in prison. Carl had asked for $500,000.

However, after three meetings, the House Ways and Means Committee sliced the award by more than half, leaving $36,000.

Members of the House then tried to restore the deleted $39,000 but were unsuccessful three times during floor debate.

Boy George stirs up BYU campus

PROVO, Utah — Boy George is a hit on the pop charts, but not in the bookstore at Brigham Young University, where albums of his group Culture Club have been pulled from shelves pending a review.

"It is more an evaluation of the artist than of his music," said bookstore director Roger Utley, adding that the records would be reviewed for their suitability for students.

Paul Richards, a spokesman for the Mormon-owned school, said: "The administration has no standard policy on Boy George. It's a bookstore matter."

Utley said he decided to remove the albums because of recent action taken by student program officials.

Culture Club was to be used as a theme for the campaign of a student Culture Office candidate, Ruth Terri, who planned to use posters featuring herself posed with several people dressed as Culture Club members.

She said she was not to use the photo because Ryan Thomas, director of student programs, felt Culture Club promotes homosexuality and transvestism.

Last week, school officials said a student band which appeared under the name "The Club" — featuring "Guy George" as lead singer — had been banned from further performances.

Civil war creates economic havoc

Lebanon's industry in 'worst condition'

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Workers report daily to the Weathermate factory just east of Beirut to assemble the heating and cooling units that the company has been producing for 21 years.

But the company's sales manager, George Khalil said the workers were simply adding to Weathermate's already sizable inventory. "We haven't had an order since last September," Khalil said.

Weathermate, like hundreds of other industrial plants in Lebanon, is a severely wounded victim of nearly nine years of civil warfare. And many economic experts fear that if peace doesn't arrive soon, there will be little left of the industrial base to rebuild.

Marwan Iskacdar, a leading Lebanese economist, estimated that industry accounted for 20 percent of the nation's pre-war economy, or about $1 billion annually.

"Today it is at best $350 million," he said. "Industry is the economic sector in the worst condition of all."

The years of war also have wrought havoc on Lebanon's other major economic sectors such as agriculture, movement of goods from the West to the Arab world and tourism.

By most calculations, one-third of Lebanon's manufacturing capacity has been destroyed since 1975, and many plants remain shuttered because workers can't reach them safely.

Between one-third and one-half of Lebanon's industrial workers have been laid off, economists estimate. And many skilled workers have emigrated to other nations to find jobs.

The industrial decline has had a ripple effect, too, reducing the work of the "commercial class" that imported raw materials and helped export finished goods. It also has strained some financial institutions stuck with now-shaky industrial loans.

The fate of many industries — including Weathermate — has been dictated by war.

Before the sectarian fighting began in 1975, Weathermate employed 78 workers and produced about 1,000 climate control systems a year. The factory sustained more than $28,000 in shell damage during fighting in 1978, but was rebuilt.

Export markets in other Arab countries began to dry up first "out of fear we couldn't keep our commitments," Khalil, the sales manager, said. Then domestic orders diminished as the construction of new buildings slowed, and all-out civil warfare last fall and again in February "hit us, hit everybody very hard," he said.

Expert supports computer crime laws

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Senate panel was urged Wednesday to establish laws to specifically prohibit computer crimes, particularly theft of computer services.

"Our feeling is that current statutes do not cover computer crime," said James Green, president of the Topeka chapter of the Data Processing Management Association.

He urged the Senate Judiciary

Committee to endorse a House-passed bill to fight computer break-ins.

The bill would establish the crime of "computer theft" to cover instances in which a person gains unauthorized access to a computer system and obtains information.

Also the bill establishes "computer crime" to make it unlawful to destroy or damage computer equipment, software or any data in a computer system.

Violations of either crime would be a class A misdemeanor if the damage or loss was valued at less than $100, and a class D felony for losses exceeding $100. The misdemeanor would be punishable by one year in the county jail and a $2,500 fine. The felony would be punishable by 2-10 years in jail and a $5,000 fine.

Rick Dobbs, an attorney for the Boeing Military Airplane Co. in Wichita, said existing laws on theft requires "proof of intent to permanently deprive" an individual of his property.

He contended that standard would be difficult to prove with computer crimes when only information is taken. In effect, he said, only an unauthorized copy is taken.

"Computer-assisted theft is what we're talking about," said Dobbs.

He said he knew of no cases in Kansas in which a person had been prosecuted for computer theft under existing law. However, Dobbs said there had been instances of computer tampering at Boeing.

Currently, 22 states have specific computer crime laws.

The committee took no action on the bill, and no one opposed the measure.

Also Wednesday the committee considered a House-passed bill to increase from $500 to $1,000 the maximum claim that can be brought in a small claims court. It also would increase the docket fee from $10 to $15.

Rep. Dennis Spaniol, a Wichita Republican who sponsored the measure, said it is to adjust the claims limit for inflation.

The Kansas Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Kansas Food Dealers' Association supported the bill.

In particular, they supported a provision which would allow people to hire a representative to file their claims to recover debts. A lawyer cannot be used in a small claims suit.

No one opposed the bill, but Marjorie Van Buren of the Office of Judicial Administration and a representative of the Kansas Association of District Court Clerks expressed concern that the bill could result in a caseload increase. That would increase court costs, Van Buren said.

The committee did not act on the measure.

Movie's offbeat characters add charm

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

In "Local Hero," the owner of Knox Oil and Gas, Felix Happer — an eccentric old man whose office is complete with a planetarium for a ceiling — decides that an oil refinery must be established on the coast of Scotland. The only coastline that is suitable, though, is a cove where there is a small village named Ferness. Happer sends a representative, Mac MacIntyre (played by Peter Riegert,) to convince the residents to sell their land.

Review

Were this to have been made 30 years ago, the results quite predictably would have found the village residents so attached to their community that they would never have wanted to leave. But this is exactly where "Local Hero" differs from expectations; the town's residents are ready and willing to sell. They don't want MacIntyre to know this, though, so they sneak around behind his back, having meetings and talk about the Rolls Royces they have been pricing. They all have visions of becoming millionaires.

Before MacIntyre reaches Ferness, director Bill Forsyth plunges him and his sidekick — a sex-obsessed young Scot named Danny Oldsen — into a fog so thick that they must stop their car and wait for the fog to clear. This very effectively creates the transition from the oil company's world into the delightfully dreamy world of Ferness.

There is a Nigerian preacher in the all-white town. There is a beautiful marine biologist who may or may not have been a mermaid. There is a motorcyclist who zooms through the streets every few minutes. There is a blue and orange-haired punk rock groupie. What are these people doing here? Well, Forsyth offers no explanations. They all simply become part of the wonderfully ludicrous images with which the film abounds.

MacIntyre and Oldsen walk along the beach, carrying their electric briefcases and wearing three-piece suits. Air Force jets fly by on their way to a near-by bomb test site. MacIntyre says, "About those jets, — they really spoil a really nice area." This comment begins MacIntyre's gradual conversion to becoming a villager. Before long he stops shaving and begins wearing the same style clothing as Ferness residents. He hangs out in the bar, getting to know what it's like to be a resident of the town. And, before the film is over, MacIntyre actually wants to stay in the village instead of returning to his $80,000-a-year job and Porsche 930 in Houston.

Burt Lancaster's role as Felix Happer is only a supporting one, but he makes his presence felt throughout the film. He makes a very impressive entrance into Ferness, dropping from the sky by way of helicopter.

There are very few punch lines delivered in "Local Hero." Most of the time Forsyth is content just to set up whimsical scenes that are balanced with an almost deadpan demeanor by the actors. When punch lines are delivered, though, the effect is often hilarious. Even those moments where the punch lines are missing are rendered with such a droll charm that they don't fail to be amusing. That is the charm of the movie. Forsyth doesn't stretch overly hard to create humor; he allows the comedy to grow out of the plot and characters.

"Local Hero" isn't without it's flaws, though. Most notable are the scenes in Houston, which are rendered with little of the imagination Forsyth brings to Scotland. There are also references late in the film to a relationship between Mac and a hotel owner's wife, but nothing had been shown to happen between them. Quite likely these scenes ended up on the editing room floor, but the hole they leave is not large enough that any of the film's charm is sacrificed.

Prize-winning cellist to give recital today

Cellist Yo-Yo Ma gave his first public recital at the age of 5. By the time he was 19, critics were comparing him to Pablo Casals, the master cellist of the 20th century.

In 1978 he won the Avery Fisher Prize, one of America's highest awards given to young musicians. Currently 28 years old, Yo-

Ma has been called "one of the greatest instrumental talents alive" by famed violinist Isaac Stern.

Ma, who will perform at 8 p.m. today in McCain Auditorium, was born in 1955 in Paris, the son of two Chinese parents. He began his cello studies at the age of 4, and at 7 moved to the United States and enrolled in the pre-college music program at the Juilliard School in New York.

When ready for college, he decided he wanted a change from his strict home life, and enrolled at Harvard. During this time, Ma limited his personal engagements to only one per month so that he could concentrate on his studies.

Ma said he is "drawn to music that represents an ideal world, a distilled vision of human suffering where art and tragedy are balanced out."

"I have a wonderful sense of being able to do what I want to do," Ma told Boston Phoenix music critic Lloyd Schwartz. "I never thought it was possible."

Guide outlines requirements for Kansas voters

By STEVE SWAFFORD
Collegian Reporter

Before Kansans can vote, certain criteria must be met.

Voting requirements are set by the state and federal government. According to the "Sally Sunflower's Guide to Voting in Kansas," published by Kansas Secretary of State Jack Brier, a Kansas voter must be a U.S. citizen, at least 18 years old, a resident of Kansas and live in the voting area.

Registration takes about three minutes for first-time registrants and five minutes for re-registering after a change of address. It can be done by mail by contacting Riley County Election Officer Wanda Coder or at Coder's office at the Riley County Courthouse. Other registration sites may also be designated by Coder.

Registration closes 20 days before any election date and reopens the day after the election. According to the voting guide, if a person moves into the state and is unable to register before the 20-day restriction, a special ballot may be obtained.

To be eligible for this special ballot, the voter must be a citizen of the United States and a qualified voter in the state of previous residency. The voter must have moved to Kansas 30 days before the election and must apply to the county election officer not earlier than 25 days before the election and not later than noon on the day before the election.

Voters who change their name or address must re-register, the voting guide states. Previous registration cards must be canceled when a voter moves.

Re-registration may also be necessary if a voter fails to vote in a general election at which members of the U.S. electoral college are selected or in the November general election. Voters must contact Coder's office to determine if re-registration is necessary.

A party affiliation may be declared by the voter at the time of registration, or the voter may sign a declaration the first time they vote in a primary election. The voter may also choose not to be affiliated with any political party.

If a voter decides to change party affiliation, a declaration may be filed with the election officer at any time except when registration is closed for 20 days before the election, according to the guide.

July 17 is the last day to register for the primary election on Aug. 7. Voter registration reopens Aug. 8 and closes Oct. 16 for the general election Nov. 6.

The federal officials to be elected in 1984 in Kansas are five representatives, a senator, the vice president and the president.

State officials to be elected include all state senators and representatives, three of the seven Kansas Supreme Court judges and four of the seven Court of Appeals judges.

Riley County voters will vote on a 2nd District representative to the State Board of Education. They also will select the county clerk, treasurer, register of deeds, attorney, sheriff, surveyor and commissioners.

The polls are open from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. on election day, unless other hours are announced by county election officer.

Kansas Board of Education may be appointed by Carlin

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas voters would have a chance to decide whether the state Board of Education should be appointed by the governor or should continue to be elected under a House-passed measure approved Wednesday by the Senate Education Committee.

The committee voted 5-4 to approve the resolution and it send to the Senate floor for debate. It would reduce the board from 10 to nine members and make them appointed by the governor rather than elected by voters.

Because the change would require an amendment to the state constitution, a two-thirds vote of both houses — 27 in the Senate and 84 in the House — is necessary to submit the issue to the voters in November. The House voted 89-34 to pass the resolution.

"I'm a big advocate of popular politics but as I looked at it, I did not see the elective process as meaningful," said Sen. Wint Winter Jr.,

R-Lawrence. "One out of 10 voters makes an informed decision about the Board of Education. Uninformed discretion is no discretion at all."

Winter echoed the comments of the resolution's sponsors, who say it would make the board more like the Kansas Board of Regents and, therefore, more effective at developing educational policy and legislation.

"What we need is top-flight educational professionals to fine tune the system," Winter said. "Public school teachers are crying out for the same kind of guidance university faculty have."

But Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Lenexa, took issue with Winter's claims.

"I have not received any overriding indication that the present situation is not working," Bogina said. "So I don't see the need for drastic change, for taking away the right of the people to vote."

Appointed boards are not always an improvement over elected officials, he said.

Supreme Court weighs student rights

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Concern over drug trafficking in the nation's public schools clashed with student privacy rights Wednesday in a spirited Supreme Court debate.

A New Jersey prosecutor said all drugs seized by public school officials, even in unlawful searches, should be allowed as trial evidence when students are criminally prosecuted.

State Deputy Attorney General Allan Nodes said school searches must be exempt from the "exclusionary rule" which bans presentation of evidence illegally seized by police.

But Lois DeJulio, a lawyer representing a former Piscataway, N.J., High School student, said allowing such an exemption will rob students of an important lesson — "that our constitutional system of government is more than a collection of empty promises."

"For every search that discloses a student's wrongdoing there will be countless more in which the privacy rights of innocent students will be sacrificed," said DeJulio, a public defender.

Drug searches prompt concern

At issue in a dispute being watched closely by school authorities nationwide is whether the exclusionary rule, created by the Supreme Court in 1914 to deter illegal police conduct, applies to searches in public schools by administrators and teachers.

The justices are expected to announce their decision by July.

At one point, Justice Harry A. Blackmun noted that drugs seized under questionable circumstances in private schools could be used as evidence in criminal prosecutions.

"So, if a youngster wants to get into drugs, he better stay in the public schools."

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger spoke of "the social costs" of freeing student drug dealers because of procedural blunders.

And Justice Lewis F. Powell worried aloud about having to train teachers in the intricacies of search-and-seizure law.

He said "community pressure" already exists as a more effective deterrent to unreasonable searches by teachers.

The New Jersey case arose when in March 1980, a 14-year-old girl was caught smoking in a restroom at Piscataway High, breaking school rules. The girl, identified only as T.L.O., was taken by a teacher to a vice principal's office. The girl denied that she smoked. The vice principal opened the girl's purse and saw a pack of cigarettes.

He then noticed that the purse also contained a package of rolling papers, the kind often used for marijuana cigarettes. And digging further into the purse, he found records indicating that the girl had been selling marijuana cigarettes for $1 each to her schoolmates.

The police were notified, and the girl subsequently was tried as a juvenile and given a year's probation.

The New Jersey Supreme Court overturned the delinquency finding, however, after ruling that the vice principal's action had violated the girl's 4th Amendment right against unreasonable searches.

The state court invoked the exclusionary rule in deciding that the items found in the purse never should have been allowed as evidence.

The New Jersey court did not bar school officials from basing disciplinary action against the girl on the search. But the state court said the seized material could not be used in criminal action.

Panel reviews plan to classify property

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Senate committee began to deliberate Wednesday on a House-passed property classification proposal and requested information on a simplified tax plan.

The Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee directed the legislative research staff to develop the proposal after hearing from a university economist.

Glenn Fisher, a Wichita State University economics professor, suggested that any classification plan have only a few classes of property. Also he said lawmakers should keep the assessment ratios between the highest and lowest class as small as possible.

The House-passed measure before the committee provides for about 10 property classes and establishes varying assessment rates for them. There is a 5 to 1 ratio between the lowest class, residential and agricultural land, and the highest class, which is utility real estate.

Classification, which requires an amendment to the Kansas Constitution, would permit different types of property to be taxed at different rates.

Fisher suggested a proposal with only two classes of property: Residential and agricultural real estate assessed at 15 percent of its fair market value and all other property at 30 percent.

The committee, after listening to the economist who helped develop classification plans in Minnesota and Illinois, asked its staff to develop figures for such a plan. Specifically, the staff is to determine an assessment rate on agricultural and residential property if all other property is assessed at 30 percent of its fair market value. The panel wants the rate to mirror the current assessments on farmland and homeowners.

For purposes of developing the plan, the committee called for the property tax base to be expanded by elimination of some exemptions. Farm machinery would be returned to the tax rolls. In addition, there would be no exemption for merchants' inventories as under the House proposal.

The committee's action did not represent an endorsement of the plan, however. Sen. Bud Burke, R-Leawood, committee chairman, said the proposal was being drafted solely for further discussion by members.

Still it was clear from Wednesday's deliberations that the Senate committee dislikes many provisions of the House-passed classification proposal.

"I think many senators are committed to trying to work out a classification amendment that is simple and broad-based," said Sen. Fred Kerr, R-Pratt.

The constitution calls for equal taxation and assessment. However, state tax officials agree that inequities have developed because property has not been reappraised since the 1960s.

Agricultural land, for example, is assessed at about 6 percent of its fair market value statewide and residential property at 8 percent. State law calls for all property to be assessed at 30 percent.

Gov. John Carlin and other lawmakers support classification as a way to ease possible tax shifts onto homeowners and farmers from reappraisal. In general, classification would legal the current tax structure. However, the House version would lower the assessment rate on residential property to 6 percent and would phase out taxes on merchants' inventories and livestock over five years.

Fisher faulted the House-passed measure because it "singles out productive property such as manufacturing machinery and inventories for heavy taxation."

The House version would assess commercial and industrial property at 15 percent — a 50 percent increase over the existing statewide average.

Fisher said uniform and equal taxation was the most fair method, but conceded that Kansas lawmakers had few alternatives to classification because of the gross inequities that have developed.

He warned that a proposal with many property classes would "invite litigation."

Proposal would toughen dog-fight law

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A proposal to put "more teeth" into a 1982 law which banned pit-dog fighting and a bill establishing a voluntary motor vehicle inspection program within the Kansas Highway Patrol won first-round debate today in the Kansas House.

Also tentatively approved were bills allocating money for the state's mental hospitals and prison system, and pieces of the 50-year state water plan being developed by the Kansas Water Office.

The dog-fighting bill, which has already passed the Senate, would outlaw the training, owning, keeping, selling or transporting of dogs for the purpose of dog fighting.

The penalty for attending a dog fight would increase to a class B misdemeanor, punishable by six months in jail and a $1,000 fine. Currently, it is a class C misdemeanor, which carries a one month jail sentence and a $500 fine.

In addition, the bill calls for law enforcement personnel to confiscate any dogs kept by a person arrested for dog fighting and prohibit the dogs' return to their keeper if the person is convicted.

The changes were requested by the Wichita Humane Society which said it had to return 12 dogs last winter to their owners even though the owners were convicted of dog fighting.

Rep. Ginger Barr, R-Auburn, added language during floor debate that would permit the return of non-aggressive dogs used as "bait" by dog fighters to incite aggressive dogs to attack.

The inspection program, as proposed by Rep. Robert Frey, R-Liberal, in an amendment to another bill, would benefit anyone who wanted "someone in authority other than neighborhood mechanics" to determine the safety of an automobile.

The major benefit would be to semi-trailer rigs which travel through other states which have mandatory inspection programs. Under Frey's amendment, Kansas truckers would be able to get a safety inspection certificate from the Kansas Highway Patrol, or anyone designated by the patrol as a safety inspection station. The certificate would exempt the truckers from having to pass safety inspections in other states.

"The cost of the inspections would be paid from fees charged for the service," Frey said. "It wouldn't cost anything and provide a valuable service."

The Legislature voted earlier this session to eliminate the mandatory vehicle inspection program, calling it ineffective and a waste of trooper time and state money.

Frey's amendment was added on to a Senate-passed bill which calls for all wrecker or tow-trucks to be licensed and registered with the Kansas Corporation Commission.

The bill stiffens insurance requirements for the wrecker services, forcing tow-truck owners to carry liability and cargo insurance. It also calls for $10 registration, to be paid one time only, and a $10 annual permit.

"This is a simple step toward cleaning up the industry," said Rep. Rex Crowell, R-Longton. "There's no argument the industry has an image problem."

All wreckers would be forced to have their names and addresses written on the side of their trucks.

One appropriations bill is the budgets bills for three youth centers, six state hospitals, the Kansas Neurological Institute in Topeka, the Rainbow Mental Health facility in Kansas City, Kan., and the division of mental health and retardation within the Social and Rehabilitation Services Department.

The bill calls for state tax dollars spending of:

—$5.2 million at Topeka Youth Center.

—$3 million at Atchison Youth Center.

—$2.5 million at Beloit Youth Center.

—$16.8 million at Larned State Hospital.

—$11.2 million at Osawatimie State Hospital.

—$4.8 million at Parsons State Hospital.

—$2.5 million at Norton State Hospital.

—$9.3 million at Topeka State Hospital.

—$6.9 million at Kansas Neurological Institute.

—$2 million at the Rainbow Mental Health Center.

—$12.9 million for SRS-division of mental health and retardation.

First-round approval came only after the House rejected attempts by Reps. Jesse Blumenthal of Lawrence and Gary Blumenthal of Merriam, both Democrats, to increase the money for mental health services. Blumenthal wanted to add $1 million and Blumenthal wanted half that much. Both were overwhelmingly defeated.

The second funding bill appropriates tax dollars including:

—$17.2 million for Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing.

—$13 million for the Department of Corrections.

—$11.5 million for the Kansas State Industrial Reformatory at Hutchinson.

—$3.5 million for the Correctional-Vocational Training Center at Topeka.

Lava flow from Mauna Loa creeps to 7 miles from city

By The Associated Press

HILLO, Hawaii — A mile-wide lava flow from Mauna Loa slowed but moved to within seven miles of Hawaii's second-largest city Wednesday, and residents living in its path made plans to leave if the molten rock threatened their homes.

"I'll jump in one car and my wife will jump in another car and we'll grab what we can," said Victor Souza, 34, whose home is among those nearest the flow.

The main lava flow slowed during the night, advancing to within seven miles of homes in Hilo's upper Kaumana section, said Reggie Okamura of the U.S. Geological Survey's Hawaiian Volcano Observatory.

There was no immediate danger to populated areas on the island of Hawaii, he said. The main flow reached a fairly flat area and its advance slowed to about 400 feet per hour, Okamura said.

The flat area is a mile wide, he said, but he could not estimate how long the lava would build up before tumbling downhill again.

The front of the flow widened to just under a mile wide, he said.

The flow earlier had been moving at 1,000 feet per hour, and at that rate it could have reached homes in the city of 48,000 today.

Civil defense officials made no move to evacuate residents and Mayor Herbert Matayoshi said it was too early to declare an emergency.

Some residents of the Kaumana area made tentative plans to move belongings, but most said they weren't worried yet.

"I'll leave if the flow comes within two miles," said Souza, a resident of the new Kaumana City subdivision closest to the flow.

"I don't want to fool around with nature," he said. "I'm not going to stay around to try to divert the lava in order to save the house," said Souza, 34, who moved into the subdivision with his wife Linda and their two daughters last October.

A fountain of lava spraying up to 100 feet high was feeding the main flow and several smaller flows, Okamura said.

One of the smaller flows had threatened the 72-inmate Kulani Prison, but stopped about three miles above the minimum-security facility. None of the smaller flows posed any threat, although one had cut a secondary power line serving a television relay station.

State and county officials on Tuesday rejected a proposal to build giant earthen walls to deflect the lava. The barriers were not feasible and could divert the flow from one residential area to another, Gov. George Ariyoshi said.

Officials also rejected a proposal to bomb the flow and other large-scale efforts to divert it.

The eruption earlier drew large crowds of sight-seers, but rain and overcast skies reduced visibility Wednesday and kept spectators away.

The eruption began early Sunday morning at the summit of the 13,682-foot Mauna Loa. It was the first eruption at Mauna Loa in nearly nine years. A 1975 outburst was the first in 25 years. An 1881 eruption sent lava within a mile of Hilo Harbor, covering areas which are now developed.

Scientists also were keeping a close watch on Kilauea Volcano, which has been erupting intermittently about 20 miles away since Jan. 3, 1983. Scientists have said another outburst at Kilauea is imminent. A simultaneous eruption would be the first since 1868.

Officials ban crosses in classrooms in Poland's battle of church, state

By The Associated Press

MIETNE, Poland — Communist authorities have ordered defiant teen-agers to obey a ban on crucifixes in classrooms or quit school, an official confirmed Wednesday. Many students said they'd leave.

Bishop Jan Mazur, meanwhile, entered the second day of a bread-and-water fast to protest the government's position in the three-week-old conflict between church and state.

Ryszard Domanski, administrator of the agricultural high school where the "war of the crosses" began, confirmed that the school's 600-plus students would be barred from class unless they or their parents signed a declaration agreeing to abide by school regulations.

The declaration, recognizing the separation of church and state, indirectly endorses the removal of crosses ordered by the government.

The crosses have been a fixture in classrooms and other public buildings for decades in this devoutly Roman Catholic country.

Domanski told Western reporters that 34 students had quit the Stanislaw Staszic Agricultural School in Mietne, a rural village 40 miles south of Warsaw, rather than sign the declaration.

He refused to say how many of the students, ranging in age from 15 to 20, had signed the declaration. Student accounts varied, putting the number who had signed at 100 to 150 parents and 17 to 90 students.

Domanski said that the number attending classes had been "fluid" since the school reopened Tuesday for the first time since a 12-hour sit-in by 400 students on March 7. He would not elaborate.

The Mietne sit-in led to other protests in following days at high schools in neighboring Garwolin.

More than a dozen students interviewed on the almost deserted campus Wednesday afternoon said no more than 50 pupils had attended class that morning. They spoke on condition their names not be used.

They said the majority had quit or intended to do so as soon as they found new schools. Several students were spotted carting their belongings from the dormitories.

Dorm residents who did not sign the declaration but remained on campus while their transcripts were being processed "are being refused meals," according to two 16-year-old girls.

But the students appeared to have dropped plans to join Mazur's protest. "We were going to stage a hunger strike in the church, but the priests wouldn't let us," said a 20-year-old student who has participated in talks with the bishop on resolving the crucifix issue.

A parish priest said the fathers at the Church of the Transfiguration in Garwolin had not decided whether to join Mazur's fast, but supported the bishop's move.

Mazur acted after the minister of religious affairs, Adam Lopatka, reneged on a promise made a week ago to drop demands that the students or their parents sign the declaration.

The Battle in Seattle

Here are the pairings for the Final Four of the 1984 National Collegiate Athletic Association Basketball Tournament in Seattle, Wash.

Final Four coaches ponder title chances; Thompson resents dirty play implications

By The Associated Press

SEATTLE — University of Kentucky Coach Joe B. Hall, for one, would like to set aside accusations that his team's Final Four opponent, Georgetown University, plays dirty.

"I don't think it really matters what we think," Hall said. "It's up to the officials to call the game. It's their job."

Hall's third-ranked Wildcats meet No. 2 Georgetown Saturday in the semifinals of the National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball tournament following the game between unranked University of Virginia and No. 5 University of Houston.

The winners play Monday night to determine the national collegiate championship.

"It's our job to play the game, and that's what we intend to do. We're not there to officiate," Hall said Wednesday via a telephone hookup with all the Final Four coaches, except John Thompson of Georgetown, who was here.

Thompson, who has said he resents implications that his Hoyas play like thugs, told the news conference he hopes none of the officials arrived here with preconceived notions about Georgetown's style of play.

He likened the situation to prejudicial publicity before a trial.

"The only problem I have with being called aggressive and intimidating... is that I certainly hope the people who are calling the game aren't picking this stuff up and coming in with a predetermined idea about it," Thompson said.

Neither Coach Terry Holland of Virginia nor Guy Lewis of Houston said he could see anything improper about Georgetown's style of play.

"Georgetown plays a very physical brand of basketball like all of us would like our teams to play," Holland said.

Lewis added, "I admire their team myself. They look very aggressive and play good defense. I see nothing wrong with the way they play."

"People are entitled to say the things that they say about us," Thompson said, "as long as they understand that other people are entitled to remain silent."

Both Thompson and Hall drew laughter on two different subjects.

Thompson, who sequesters his team in different locations while on the road in an attempt to keep its concentration high, refused to divulge where his Hoyas were staying this week.

"I'm going to have a raffle on that subject," he answered with a smile in answer to a question. "I can't give you that information free because I've already read three different places where we're staying, one of them being the hotel where we're at right now."

Hall's team is headed by the menacing "Twin Towers" of 7-foot-1 Sam Bowie and 6-foot-11 Melvin Turpin.

"I don't consider us physical at all," he said amid laughter. "We're a finesse ball club."

Holland talked about trying to defend Houston's star center, Akeem Olajuwon, who scored 29 points in the Cougars' victory over Wake Forest University last weekend to get to Seattle.

"I think it was one of the finest games that I've ever seen a big man have," Holland said. "If he plays like that against us, we'll be packing it in to go back to Charlottesville."

Lewis, whose Cougars lost in the NCAA finals to North Carolina State University in Albuquerque, N.M., last season, heaped praise on underdog Virginia, a team Houston beat this season 74-65.

"It's going to be a great ball game," Lewis said. "I think Virginia is very capable of beating us and I think they're very capable of winning it all. There's no way we're looking past them. Not on your life."

Hall called the ability of point guard Dicky Beal to come back from arthroscopic knee surgery Aug. 26 as a key to Kentucky's excellent season.

"There were many times during the season that it appeared like he might not be able to make it at all and might not be a factor," Hall said. "But the last nine games he has really come on and played great for us."

"His recovery has really meant a lot to us. He's become the leader of our team, the inspiration of our team, the spirit of our team and the bulk of our speed, he's the leader offensively and defensively."

Thompson said he felt the Georgetown-Kentucky matchup was more than just a battle between 7-foot Patrick Ewing of the Hoyas and the gigantic duo of Bowie and Turpin.

Workouts suffer from rainy conditions

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

K-State athletic teams have had to deal with more than opponents during the spring season so far — the weather also has been a major obstacle. With "rain, and more rain" being the weatherman's favorite forecast, coaches have had to improvise to gain valuable practice time for their teams.

For some squads, outdoor practices have been rare occurrences, setting back progress made before the start of the spring season.

"We've only been able to have one outdoor practice so far because of weather," Tennis Coach Steve Webb said. "That puts us way behind other schools."

The tennis teams need at least one good week of outdoor practices to catch up with other teams, Webb said.

The rain hasn't helped the softball team either, according to the squad's coach, Ralph Currie.

"We got off to a slow start and the rain has slowed us up some," Currie said. "We were fortunate to get in games with Barton County (Saturday)."

To avoid another rained-out series, the softball team played three five-inning contests at KSU Stadium against Barton County Community College, with the facility's artificial surface able to dry out faster than natural turf at Cicco Park.

The rain also has caused Track Coach Steve Miller some concern.

"This week we will probably run rain or shine," Miller said. "Here it is six weeks until the Big Eight (competition begins), and we haven't started outdoor competition yet. I am concerned. This is the latest start I can ever remember."

As a result, Miller said he will run everyone in their natural events in an outdoor meet to be held at the R.V. Christianson track on Saturday.

"At this point we can't afford to move people around. We have been able to train outdoors, but without a question, we are behind."

But for one K-State coach, the rain clouds have left a silver lining.

Baseball Coach Bill Hickey said not being able to practice outdoors has been frustrating for his team, but with the Brandenburg Indoor Complex, his team has a leg up on other teams in the area.

"It's really frustrating to be back inside after thinking we were through with the rain and snow,"

Hickey said. "In terms of our quality of play, I guess it has the same effect on everybody — it almost puts you back at square one."

Hickey said teams from the South have a several week advantage over Midwest clubs because of the warmer weather, but in the Big Eight Conference, the advantage teams such as Oklahoma State University and the University of Oklahoma had at the start of the season has been negated because of the bad weather.

"The whole thing the weather has done is make everybody equal,"

Hickey said. "The Oklahoma teams had an advantage over us at the start of the year, but their momentum has been killed because of the weather."

Hickey said the Brandenburg Complex, one of his program's main important selling points when recruiting, may help the team bounce back faster than other teams in the Midwest.

"We're one of the only teams in the Midwest to have a facility like Brandenburg — we try to sell that when we recruit players," he said.

Football team begins drills

K-State's football team, originally scheduled to begin spring practice today, got an early start Wednesday by holding indoor workouts at the Brandenburg Indoor Complex.

The Wildcats' offensive and defensive squads practiced at the complex in separate one-hour sessions.

"We only had 19 of our allotted 20 practices scheduled, so we thought we might as well use the last one today," Coach Jim Dickey said Wednesday. "This practice will allow the kids a chance to get used to their equipment and walk through a few things before we get started in earnest tomorrow."

The Wildcats opened spring drills with 94 players, 50 of them returning lettermen.

Free safety David Ast, fullback Charles Crawford and defensive tackle George Fowler will miss the spring session while recovering from knee injuries suffered last season.

Barring any postponements due to the weather, the Wildcats will conclude spring practice April 27.

The annual Purple-White spring intrasquad game will be April 28.

Title holders to fight for world supremacy

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Larry Holmes and Gerrie Coetzee said Wednesday they will fight June 8 at Las Vegas, Nev., for what they consider world heavyweight supremacy even if the World Boxing Association should strip Coetzee of the title.

Kenneth Bounds, president of JPD Sports of Houston, the main promoter, also said he is confident there will be no problems with promoter Don King, who has a promotional contract with Coetzee and is being paid to step aside. King is hollering for his money.

"Gerrie is ready to fight Larry Holmes regardless of any executive body," said Bounds, about the possibility of Coetzee having title recognition withdrawn by the WBA.

"I want to fight Larry Holmes because he is one of the greatest fighters around and the greatest heavyweight champion of our time," Coetzee, a South African living in the United States, said at a news conference.

Coetzee won the WBA title with a 10th-round knockout of Michael Dokes last Sept. 23.

"I think if Gerrie Coetzee is lucky enough to whip me, he'll be recognized as the heavyweight champion, and I'll praise him as a great fighter," said Holmes, who last December relinquished the World Boxing Council title he held for 5½ years and is now recognized as champion by the new International Boxing Federation.

The fight will be sanctioned by the IBF, whose president, Robert W. Lee, attended the news conference.

"A year or two down the road the WBA and the WBC won't exist," snapped Holmes.

Elias Cordova, chairman of the WBA championship committee, reportedly has said that if Coetzee fights Holmes, he could be stripped of the title because Holmes is not ranked.

Baltimore owner still stadium hunting

By The Associated Press

PHOENIX, Ariz. — Phoenix businessmen, saying they would wait no longer for Robert Irsay to make up his mind, on Wednesday withdrew the offer they made to the Baltimore Colts owner in hopes of luring his National Football League team to Arizona.

The withdrawal left Indianapolis and Baltimore in contention as sites for the Colts' next season.

Irsay has been considering moving the Colts for the past two months but has not given any hints about which way he is leaning.

NFL officials reportedly have told Irsay they want a decision on where the team will play by Sunday so that the league can prepare a schedule for next season.

Harry Cavanagh, a Phoenix attorney belonging to the group wooing Irsay, said he and other members spoke Wednesday morning with Irsay.

"Mr. Irsay stated that he still had not made up his mind and needed additional time, but the Phoenix contingent felt they could not wait any longer," Cavanagh said.

Cavanagh and other members of the Arizona group previously expressed optimism about their chances of persuading Irsay to move his Colts to 70,021-seat Sun Devil Stadium in suburban Tempe with the promise that a domed stadium would be built later.

"The complexity of the transaction and the recent moves by the state of Maryland and the city of Baltimore have made the likelihood of the NFL team being moved to Phoenix appear very doubtful," he said in a statement released on behalf of himself, Arizona Public Service Co. Chairman Keith Turley and real-estate developer Eddie Lynch.

"Phoenix made its best offer, but unfortunately could not match the offers of either Baltimore or Indianapolis," he said.

Indianapolis has the new Hoosier Dome, which seats more than 61,000 Representatives of that city reportedly have offered to build a practice field and office-compound facility and arrange for a loan of $15 million at less than current interest rates.

Baltimore officials and businessmen have offered Irsay a $15 million loan at 8 percent interest, and a California developer has offered to build a domed stadium in Baltimore for the Colts and baseball's Baltimore Orioles if both teams agree to long-term leases.

Cavanagh had said the Phoenix group's offer also included a $15 million loan at discounted rate, rent-free use of the 70,021-seat Sun Devil Stadium and a guaranteed $3 million in ticket sales.

Seven-run inning lifts Royals to 12-7 win

By The Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Darryl Motley hit a home run with two men on base in Kansas City's seven-run fifth inning to lift the Royals to a 12-7 victory over the Montreal Expos in exhibition baseball Wednesday.

Kansas City sent 11 batters to the plate in the fifth-inning barrage off losing pitcher Bob James. The Royals had 16 hits in the game.

Motley also had an RBI double in the second inning that tied the game at 1-1. The Royals' Onix Concepcion had four hits in four turns at bat, and Butch Davis had three hits, including a solo homer and an RBI double.

Montreal's Gary Carter slugged a two-run homer in the top of the fifth, giving the Expos a short-lived 4-3 lead.

Bud Black, who will start for the Royals in their season-opener Monday against the New York Yankees, picked up the victory.

TO BILL the Birthday Boy: I want to snuggle with you and pinkie for the rest of our lives! Love, P22nd! Love, Deb. (127)

TYNN—Today's the day and I'm here to stay. Cause with the Lord, there's no other way. Love, Garf. (127)

BW—128 more days until our day, but today is just for you. So make it a happy one and know that I love you—Future CW. (127)

KDS TONI and "Bob's Date". The function was fun and the pool table was great. Hope you had fun with the bum in the car after he stole that sign for you. Whenever we get to K.U. we'll be sure to look ya up! D and O. (127)

DONNA—CONGRATULATIONS on acceptance into P.T. school. I can't wait until next year! Watch out K.C. L.L. Cheryl. (127)

FROM VISTA to Bockers and long talks all through, we shared and we laughed and together we grew. It's amazing how in only one night, our frowns were turned right side up, our icicles melted, and bonds which will last forever were formed. Thanks from two who care, P.S. Does that part your fanny? (127)

AGR DEAN—Happy Birthday. Thanks for all the nights we've spent together. We really do make good chemistry together. G.B.S. and Chowtime. (127)

TO THE AZD "Padre" Houseboys, Phi Tau Friends and the good Sig Alphas: Down by the Paddle Wheel parties we did hold, you watched from above, but you never did scold. Shrimp and Lowenbrau, those "fun" logic games, and a surprise breakfast treat. Boy that Padre life just can't be beat. The memories of the fun in the sun (and in the pool), made us realize you all are too cool! We had a blast! Sorry so late. Love, The 5 party warriors from below! (127)

PHI DELTS—The bright sun came up, the dew fell away, "good morning Phi Delt," we came to say. Come '84 Homecoming, we'll be a pair, so get excited, or you'll be square! Love, Tri-Sigs. (127)

JERRY AND John: We're surprised too! Didn't know you could have sex on a slice of bread! We found it, my "Footloose" thru the college—bigger! Dallas! Keep drinkin' those six pak bottles out at Tuttle in the fog! And ya know what ya get when ya get home? A swift kick in the rear if ya don't get my love! Tr-la-la-boom-de-yes (we're laughing!) L.N. and J.G. (127)

MYRNA J—Happy Belated Birthday! Hope you had a great one! Lots of love, your Handsome. (127)

General Robert Stephan to investigate whether the law has been violated by conference committee meetings.

An aide said Stephan planned to question Senate President Ross Doyen and Speaker Mike Hayden about activities of the conference committee to determine whether he should look further into the matter. Neil Woerman, Stephan's administrative assistant, said the attorney general might decide Thursday whether to proceed or drop it.

In his letter to Stephan, Gannon noted he was never advised of any conference committee meeting, yet the report signed by five of its members was presented to him

Tuesday on the Senate floor. He said when he questioned how the report got signed, the report was taken back.

Gannon did not say who brought him the report, but Hess confirmed he did. Hess and Miller said the report was circulated first among the three House members on the committee, then the three senators — with no more than two conference committee members ever conferring on it at any one time.

But Gannon and Steineger said in their letter, "We believe these circumstances warrant your immediate investigation as to whether the (Senate) rules, and more particularly the Kansas Open Meetings Act, have been violated. Certainly, the Senate Democratic member of the conference committee does not wish to participate in any coverup activities."

Reilly, who is chairman of the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee, which handles liquor legislation in the Senate, said in his letter to Stephan, "There is no question in my mind as to the violation of (the legislative rule) which specifically states 'all meetings of conference committees shall be open to the public and no meeting shall be adjourned to another time or place in order to subvert such policy.'"

Reilly said he has maintained a log of events involving work on the bill which he offered to Stephan.

Miller adjourned the conference committee until Thursday, while Sen. Charlie Angell, R-Plains, another member, attempts to persuade Gannon to return to the panel and help deliberate.

However, Gannon said he was not returning "until the attorney general tells me what he's going to do." Stephan was out of town today.

The committee doesn't need Gannon to complete its report and send it to the two houses for their approval. This is the second conference committee appointed to the beer age bill, and only four signatures are required for approval.

The House members of the committee balked at Hess' attempts to amend into the bill certain other liquor law changes favored by the Senate.

Hess had attempted to put together a package which would include raising the 3.2 drinking age in Kansas from 18 to 19, allowing private clubs to be licensed on trains, allowing small motels to contract with local private clubs to serve their guests and allowing cash bars at conventions and fundraisers, along with taxing beer sold in taverns and private clubs. Bills have passed the Senate to do those things, but all have failed in the House.

False alarms surface in cookie sabotage

By The Associated Press

Reports of pins or needles in Girl Scout cookies spread today to at least 12 states, but some turned out to be hoaxes, and inspectors reported no evidence of tampering at a Kentucky bakery that made about half the cookies sold nationwide.

"People are overreacting a bit and there are some pranks being played," said Madeline Gifford, executive director of a Girl Scout council in Brewer, Maine. "One little girl confessed to her mother that she had put a pin in a cookie."

In Pennsylvania, state police said a 16-year-old boy in Indiana County and a 24-year-old woman in Home had reported finding pins in the cookies but it was later determined they had placed the pins themselves. Officers said both would be charged with filing false reports.

Pins, needles and paper clips were first discovered two weeks ago in Missouri in cookies sold by St. Louis Girl Scouts.

Private prison spurs town controversy

By The Associated Press

NORTH SEWICKLEY, Pa. — Entrepreneurs want to convert an old lock-bolt factory into one of the nation's first privately owned prisons, but some residents in this farming community say they don't want the facility in their back yard.

Officials of Buckingham Security Ltd. of Lewisburg say they hope to build an $18 million minimum-security prison from the former Textron lock-bolt plant, which closed last year and employed up to 400 workers.

Buckingham Security officials say the 650-bed prison, to be called Riverhaven, would be the country's first private prison for adult offenders with lengthy sentences.

The plan has drawn fire from residents in this community about 40 miles northwest of Pittsburgh. Township supervisors say they will decide next month whether to allow the project.

"Whatever way you look at it, it's still a prison and we don't want it here," said Ruth Gordon, 52, a housewife who has mounted an anti-prison petition drive which has attracted 800 signatures in a township of about 7,000 residents.

But some other residents, citing the area's 10 percent-plus unemployment rate, say they support the project.

"I'm unemployed, my neighbors are unemployed..." said John Reman, a one-time factory worker laid off for nearly four years. "I'll support anything that brings jobs to the area," he said.

The Buckingham Security prison would house "protective custody" prisoners who must be kept apart from other inmates because they are police informants, first-time offenders or white-collar convicts.

Joseph Fenton, Buckingham Security executive vice president, said his project would take such inmates from federal and state prisons and would save public prisons the cost of housing them separately.

He said prison officials in 17 states told Buckingham that they would have "no problem" contracting enough inmates to fill Riverhaven.

Land serves as parking lot before transfer to owner

Despite the presence of parked vehicles in the trailer court property adjacent to the Jardine Terrace apartments, located at the corner of Claflin and Denison avenues, the lot is not for use by the general public.

"This (the trailer court lot) is private property owned by the (KSU) Foundation," David Weaver, Foundation property manager, said. "It is not University ground."

"We were running out of parking places at our present lot, and we had this ground," he said, "so we are allowing members of our secretarial staff to use it for parking on the streets there."

Weaver said, however, this arrangement is temporary due to the land being purchased recently for construction of greek housing, which should begin in about one month.

"Parking is by permit only, and as of this time, the (enforcement) policy will be to put a notice on the vehicle for the first violation," he said. "The second time we will tow them, and the owner will be responsible for those charges."

Committee amends prior bingo bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee introduced Wednesday another bingo bill, attempting to change two of the provisions in a bingo revision bill already signed into law this session by Gov. John Carlin.

The bill would restore the charge per card to $1 and would remove a restriction on bingo parlors being located within 1,000 feet of each other.

The earlier bill, which takes effect July 1, reduced the card price to 50 cents and imposed the 1,000-foot restriction in an attempt to prevent operators of bingo parlors from circumventing the prohibition against conducting more than one game a day by moving games from one spot to another at the same location.

The Senate Ways and Means Committee Tuesday killed a bill which would have increased from three to six the number of days in the week small bingo parlors can operate.
